Seeing Krishna leave the sabha, the Kauravas and all the kings follow him, like the Devas behind Indra. However, without a thought for any who walk behind him, Krishna of the fathomless soul emerges into the open, like a fire. At the gate his sarathy Daruka waits for him with his white chariot of the tinkling moonbells and golden embellishments, of untold speed, whose wheels rumble like thunderheads, its seats covered with white tiger-skins, and to which Saibya and his other horses are harnessed. Mounted and ready to ride with Krishna is that favourite of the Vrishnis, Hridika's son, Maharatha Kritavarman.

Krishna is about to leave when Dhritarashtra calls after him:

'O Parantapa, Janardana, you have seen how powerless I am to control my sons. You know everything now. Having seen how fervently I try to bring peace between the Kurus and the Pandavas, and knowing that I am blind and helpless, it is not fitting for you to doubt me. Kesava, I have no ill-will towards the Pandavas. You heard what I said to Duryodhana. The Kauravas and all the kings of the Earth also know that I have done everything in my power to make peace.'

Krishna now says to Dhritarashtra, Drona, Pitamaha Bhishma, Vidura, Bahlika and Kripa, 'You have all witnessed what transpired in the hallowed Kuru sabha. You have seen how Duryodhana, like some lout, walked out of the court in anger, and how Dhritarashtra describes himself as being powerless. Now with leave from you all, I will return to Yudhishtira.' And, saluting them, Krishna climbs into his chariot and departs.

Those Bharatarishabhas, those maharathas Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Vidura, Aswatthama, Vikarna and Yuyutsu follow him. And as the Kurus look on, Kesava turns his great white ratha of the tinkling bells toward the home of his aunt Kunti."

"Vaisampayana said, 'After entering Kunti's house and worshipping her feet, Krishna tells her briefly about all that happened in the Kuru sabha.

He says, 'The Rishis and I spoke in many ways and reasonably to persuade Duryodhana, but he would not heed anything we said. The time of his and his followers' end has come. Let me go now to the Pandavas. What message would you send them? Wise Matuli, speak to me, I want to hear what you have to say.'

Kunti says, 'Krishna, say to virtuous Yudhishtira: "My son, your dharma has diminished. Your mind is afflicted and you are like a man who vainly reads the Vedas without understanding their inner meaning, and who, thus, remains ignorant. You choose to take the Vedas literally while only your own intellect can see the truth. Think about your svadharma, for which Brahma created you. The Kshatriya was created from his arms, and by the strength of his arms he must live and perform the harsh deeds he may need to in order to protect his people. There is a story told in this connection, which I heard long ago.

In the days of yore, a gratified Vaisravana gifted the Earth to the Rajarishi Muchukunda. The sage refused the gift and said he wanted only to enjoy what he had won by his own prowess. The delighted Vaisravana marvelled at his response. In keeping with Kshatriya dharma, Muchukunda conquered the Earth by the strength of his arms and ruled over it.

Remember, Bhaarata, that a fourth of the punya gained by the subjects of a king who protects them accrues to the king himself, if a king keeps dharma that confers divine status on him, but if he sins, he finds Naraka, hell, for himself. Dandaneeti, the law of punishment, enforced by the king, ensures that the four varnas live by their inherent svadharma; and this leads to the king acquiring dharma, artha and moksha.

When the king fully upholds the Dandaneeti, the law, without discarding any part of it, the golden immaculate age, the Krita Yuga, sets in. Have no doubts about whether the king makes the yuga, or the yuga makes the king, do as he does. We know for certain that it is the king who ushers in the yuga. Indeed, it is the king who is responsible for ushering in all the yugas—Krita, Treta or Dwapara, and even the Kali yuga.

That king who ushers in a Krita yuga enjoys Swarga to the fullest. The king who causes a Treta yuga to set in does enjoy heaven but not fully. For fetching a Dwapara yuga, a king enjoys Swarga in proportion to his deeds. However, the evil king who causes a Kali yuga earns untold sin and lives in Naraka for countless years. This king's sins affect the world, and the world's sins affect him.

Observe your kingly duties as befits your lineage. The path you want to take is not the way of a Rajarishi. The man who, from faintness of heart, allows his compassion to shake him from his dharma does not find the punya that accrues from cherishing his subjects with love. When we blessed you, neither Pandu, nor your grandfather Vyasa or I ever wished on you the impulses which now prompt you. What we prayed for was sacrifice, charity, merit, courage, subjects and children, greatness of soul, and might and energy.

Brahmanas who wished you well worshipped and gratified the Devas and the Pitrs for life, wealth and children for you, whilst adding Swaha and Swadha to their mantras. As do the Devas, parents expect from their children generosity, tolerance, performance of yagnas, study and protection of their subjects. Whether this is virtue or not, you must perform these duties because of your birth. Though nobly born, my sons are destitute and persecuted. Hungry men can approach a brave and benevolent king and he will give them food and refuge. What can be more virtuous than for a man, who has acquired a kingdom, to make all the people of the world his own with his generosity, or establish his authority over them by the truth of his words?

A Brahmana’s dharma is to be a priest or a mendicant, a Kshatriya’s is to protect his subjects, a Vaisya’s dharma is to earn wealth and a Sudra’s is to serve the other three varnas. The life of a beggar is forbidden for you, and so is farming. You are a Kshatriya and, therefore, the protector of all who are in distress. You have to live by the prowess of your arms. Mahabaho, recover your rightful share of the kingdom, which you have lost, by conciliation, by argument, by giving gifts, by diplomacy or violently.

What can be sadder for me, who brought you into this world, than to be dependent on others for my sustenance? Fight, in keeping with your duty, the dharma of kings. Do not allow your Pitrs to sink into the disgrace of infamy. Do not exhaust your punya and, with your younger brothers, meet a sinful end.”’”

"Kunti says, 'Krishna, there is an ancient story told of the conversation between Vidula and her son. You must tell Yudhishtira this story, or any other that you think better. Listen to the tale.

There was a noblewoman, a queen called Vidula, who was blessed with great wisdom and foresight. She was famous, prone to anger and devoted to Kshatriya dharma. She was well-educated, and all the kings of the Earth knew of her. Vidula would listen to discourses of all kinds given by eminent sages.

One day, she rebuked her son, who lay prostrate with grief and despair after having been defeated in battle by the king of the Sindhus. She said, "You are not my son, making your enemies joyful as you do. You are not born from your father and me; from where have you come? You have no anger and cannot be called a man; and your unmanly body is a eunuch's and bears no sign of strength. Do you mean to spend your life in dejection and despair? For your own sake, be as a Kshatriya should and do your duty by your subjects.

Do not disgrace your soul; do not be satisfied with a little. Set your sights on great things and shed your fear. Rise, coward; you collapse like a woman after one defeat; do not be the source of delight to your enemies and grief to your friends; do not abandon honour and good sense.

Little streams are filled with only a little water. The palms of a mouse hold a very small quantity. It takes very little, small acquisitions, to satisfy a coward. It is better to die pulling out the fangs of a serpent than to die like a dog. Exercise your strength and risk your life. Like an intrepid hawk that ranges the skies, fearlessly wander the Earth, display your strength, silently watch your enemies and wait for an opportune moment.

You lie here like a man struck by lightning, a corpse. Rise, coward; shake off the memory of your defeat. Do not cower in hiding, so miserably. Let your deeds bring you renown. Eschew mediocrity; do not stand behind anyone, but proudly stand at the head of all. Blaze forth like a roaring fire. Even if for a moment, shine like a tinduka twig, rather than smoulder from unfulfilled desire like chaff. It is better to blaze for a single moment than to smoke impotently for ever.

It does not befit a Kshatriya to be either too fierce or inordinately mild. By achieving every possible feat on the battlefield, a brave man discharges his Kshatriya dharma and never disgraces himself. Whether he gains his objective or not, the man of good sense never wallows in grief. A true Kshatriya forges ahead to accomplish his next objective, without caring for even his life.

So, my son, show your strength or give up your life. What use is living like this, without honour, in shame, in disregard of Kshatriya dharma, and having lost the punya of all the yagnas you performed and nullified your past achievements? The basis of all your joy has been destroyed. Why, then, do want to live? If a man must fall, he should seize his enemy and fall with him. Even if his roots are severed, a man must not give in to despair. Think of the horse, which uses all its strength to pull carriages and chariots, or carry heavy burdens, and use your own strength and honour.

Understand what real manliness is, and work to redeem and elevate the honour of your race that has been lost because of you. The man who has failed to accomplish anything great or noteworthy only increases the human population by one. He is neither man nor woman. He whose fame is not based on charity, asceticism, truth, learning and the acquisition of wealth is only waste born of his mother's body; while, he who surpasses others in learning, asceticism, wealth, prowess and deeds is truly a man.

For you to adopt the idle and wretched life of begging alms is in no way noble but only cowardly. A man can never have joy from a weak friend, whom enemies are delighted to see, who is despised by others, who has neither possessions nor fine clothes, who is pleased with the smallest acquisitions, who is destitute, who has no courage and who is base.

Driven out of our home, exiled from our kingdom, deprived of all sources of enjoyment and wealth, we will soon die. I have given birth to Kali himself in the form of my son, who is a sinner among the virtuous, and who destroys our dynasty and family. O, let no woman ever have the misfortune of bearing a son like you, apathetic, weak, self-pitying and the joy of his foes. Do not smoulder sadly, but flare up like a great flame and show your prowess. Slay your enemies. Even if for a brief moment, blaze over your enemies' heads.

A real man nurtures his wrath and gives no quarter, whilst a man who forgives easily and has no anger is neither a man nor a woman but a eunuch. Contentment, softness of heart, fearfulness and the lack of effort destroy prosperity. The man who makes no effort does not win greatness. My son, exert yourself to undo the shackles of these failings that will lead to ruin. Steel your heart and go after your lost wealth.

A man is called a purusha because he can overcome his enemy. The man who acts like a woman does not deserve to be called a purusha. A brave and mighty king, who goes majestically through life like a lion, is subject to fate, like all other creatures, but his subjects are never unhappy. The king who disregards his own happiness and pleasure and seeks the prosperity of his kingdom is the source of great joy to his ministers and friends."

Hearing these words, the son said, "If you do not see me, of what use would the whole Earth be to you, of what use your ornaments, all objects of pleasure, and life itself?"

The mother said, "Let your enemies conquer regions that are the domain of the poor and low-born; let your well-wishers enjoy realms that are reserved for noble souls. Do not live the wretched life of a beggar, destitute and without servants, a weak and powerless life, lived on food given in charity. Our Brahmanas and your friends should depend on you for their sustenance, just as all the living depend on clouds for rain, as the Devas depend on Indra.

The life of a man, on whom all other beings depend for their well-being, is not in vain, but like the tree full of ripe fruit that birds flock to. Indeed the life of that brave man, by whose strength his friends attain happiness, like the Devas derive happiness through Sakra's prowess, is blessed. The man who lives on the strength of his arms wins fame in this life and bliss in the hereafter.’’

"Kunti says, 'Vidula said, "If, defeated, you choose to give up manliness, you will soon find yourself on the path that the lowly walk. A Kshatriya who does not exercise his might to the best of his ability, from fear of death, is like a thief.

Ah sadly, my grave words, which are for your good, and fitting and reasonable as well, fall uselessly on your ears, like medicine given to a dying man. What I say makes no impression on you.

It is true that the king of the Sindhus has many followers. Discount them, for they are weak and ignorant; but though discontented under his command, they can do nothing for themselves but wait for their master to be overtaken by some disaster to be free of him. As for his enemies, they will join their forces with yours when they see your strength. Unite with them and bide your time in the mountains, until fate strikes at your enemy, as it must, for he is old and not immune to disease or death.

Your name, Sanjaya, means victorious. I hardly see you living up to it. Be true to your name; do not prove it falsely given. A great Brahmana saw you when you were a child and predicted that you would fall into distress but rise to greatness again. Remembering his words, I feel some hope, and that is why I repeat myself over and over, my son.

The man who pursues his objectives prudently, and with determination, and who has others working with him towards the same end, will surely be successful. Whether I stand to gain, or lose what I have, Sanjaya, I will not stop fighting.

Sambara said that there is nothing more miserable than not to know where one's next meal will come from. It is worse than losing a husband or a son. Poverty is only another form of death.

I was born into a noble family and have been taken from one great lake to another. I am much blessed; my husband respects and cherishes me and I wield authority over so many. My friends have seen me living amongst well-wishers, my body bathed and adorned in rich clothes, garlands and ornaments. When you see me and your wife emaciated by hunger, you will not want to live, Sanjaya. Of what use will life be to you when you see our servants, our Acharyas and our Brahmanas leave us from want of sustenance?

What peace can my heart have if I do not see you following your dharma again, to reach for mighty achievements in the way you once used to? My heart will burst if I have to turn away a Brahmana, for my husband and I have never done so in the past. We were the protectors of others and never had to ask for protection ourselves. I will die if I have to be dependent on someone else.

My son, be our means of crossing this stormy ocean; be our raft. Make lavish room for us where now there is none. Bring us back to life. If you have a lust for life, you will be able to face any enemy. But if you insist on behaving like a eunuch and wallowing in self-pity, it would be better to end your life.

A brave man wins fame by killing even a single enemy. By killing Vritra, Indra achieved greatness; he acquired sovereignty over the Devas, the cup for drinking Soma and the lordship of all the worlds. When a Kshatriya declares himself in battle and challenges his mail-clad foes, when he slays the best of the enemy warriors, when he wins renown in fair fight, his enemies feel pain and bow to him. Men who are not brave contribute their own wealth to his cause and fight his fight, uncaring of their lives. Whether kingdoms are overtaken by ruin, or whether life itself is endangered, noble men do not give up until they destroy the enemy who is within reach.

Sovereignty is either Amrita or the gate of Swarga. Think of it as such and, bearing in mind that it is now shut against you, fall like a burning torch amongst your enemies. Rajan, slay your foes in battle; do your duty as a Kshatriya; let me not see you downcast. Enhancer of your enemies' fears, let me not see you dejected and miserable, surrounded by us who also grieve, while your enemy exults.

Rejoice in your wealth, and with the Sauvira daughters; do not be weak and ruled by the daughters of the Sindhus. If a handsome, educated, noble young man of renown, like you, yields in this unbecoming manner, like an angry bull with its yoked burden, life is like death itself.

How can my heart know peace if I see you eulogise other men or walk submissively behind them? Never has there been anyone in our race who walked behind another. My son, it is not fitting for you to live as a dependent.

I know what the essence of Kshatriya dharma is, as declared by our elders and sages of antiquity. Eternal and constant, Brahma himself ordained it. He who has been born into this world as a Kshatriya of a noble family, and who has studied Kshatriya dharma, will never be anxious about his sustenance, or bow to anybody on this Earth. You must stand erect with courage and honour and put forth your effort to vanquish your enemy, for effort is manliness. One should rather break in the joints than bend his will to another's. A noble Kshatriya should always walk like an infuriated elephant. He should, my Sanjaya, bow only to Brahmanas, for the sake of dharma. He should rule over all other varnas, destroying every evil-doer. Whether or not he has allies, this is how he should live, all his life.'""

"Kunti says, 'Hearing his mother's words, the son said, "O cruel and wrathful mother, you value heroism on the battlefield so highly, it seems as if your heart is made of stone. Fie on Kshatriya dharma, with which you urge me to battle, as if I were a stranger to you and not your only son, as if you were not my mother. If you do not recognise me, if you disown me, of what use will all the Earth be to you, of what use your jewels and riches, indeed, of what use your life itself?"

The mother said, "My son, wise men always base their actions on dharma and artha. I urge you to focus on these virtues and go to battle. This is time to show your prowess. If you do not fight, you will earn general contempt and my disapproval. If I say nothing when you are about to be tainted with dishonour and ridicule, my love for you would be as worthless a donkey's for her young.

Do not take the path that the wise disapprove of, which fools would take, for it is a base and ignorant way, in which innumerable common creatures of the world take refuge, with neither honour nor glory. However, if you choose the way of the Kshatriya, the way of war, you will endear yourself to me. If you tread the high path of dharma and seek artha, while using only ways of the godly and the honest, and relying on your own effort, you will be dear to me indeed. Real joy comes from sons and grandsons who are well taught and brave; while one who is happy with a son who is apathetic, immodest and without dharma might as well not have a son.

The base man, who never performs his duty but cleaves to cowardice and sin, does not find happiness here or in the hereafter. A Kshatriya is born to do battle and win victory. Whether he wins or dies, he will attain Swarga. The joy that a Kshatriya experiences by conquering his enemies has no equal even in the realms of Indra. If a great Kshatriya meets with defeat many times, he would still wait, burning with anger, for a chance to avenge himself and vanquish his enemy. How can he have peace of mind other than by killing his enemy or dying himself in the attempt?

The wise man considers pettiness distasteful. Insignificant things will eventually become the source of great pain to the man who finds them attractive. The man who does not have what is worthy soon becomes unhappy. He becomes needy and is overwhelmed, like the Ganga when she enters the ocean."

The son said, "Mother, you should not be saying such things to your son. Be loving and stand by him silently."

The mother said, "I am pleased to hear this. You have the right to remind me of my duty. And so, I will urge you even more to do yours. I will honour you only when I will see you crowned with success after slaughtering all the Saindhavas."

The son said, "With no wealth or allies, how can I have success or victory? Knowing this, I have relinquished the desire for kingdom, as a sinner does his wish for heaven. If, in your wisdom, you can see how I can succeed, tell me of it, and I will do as you command."

The mother said, "My son, do not disgrace yourself by anticipating failure. In the past, you have had victories as well as losses. You should never try to attain your goals using anger and foolhardiness. Success is never certain, yet men still act. Sometimes they succeed and sometimes do not. However, those who do nothing will never succeed. How can anyone dream of success without effort?

Effort can have one of two results—success or failure. The man who already believes that he will fail will never have success or prosperity. With firm belief in yourself, and with alertness, put all your energy into everything you do. Prosperity comes to the wise king who acts with valour and forethought, after having performed all auspicious rites to propitiate the Devas and Brahmanas. As the Sun does to the east, the goddess of fortune comes to him.

You have heard what I want you to do; now show me your manliness. It is your dharma to do your utmost to achieve your goals. Gather to you others who have enmity towards your enemy, men who are also hungry for victory and prosperity, men whom your enemy has weakened, who are jealous of him, whom he has humiliated. With their help you can break the ranks of the Saindhava, even as a violent storm does clouds.

Give your allies their share of wealth before it is due, be active and speak pleasantly, respectfully, to them; and they will stand by you in battle. When the enemy realises that you care little for your life, he will be as fearful of you as of a snake living in his house.

If a man does not try to kill in war an enemy he knows is powerful, he should at least conciliate him with friendly overtures and gifts, which is almost a victory. You can find artha through diplomacy, and if your wealth increases, your friends will adulate you and look on you as their refuge. If you lose your wealth, your friends and relatives will abandon you and, worse still, mistrust and despise you.

However, the man, who befriends his enemy, can never regain his kingdom.”””

"Kunti says, 'The mother said, "Whatever calamity may strike a king, he must never betray his fear. Seeing a frightened king, the whole kingdom, his army and ministers will also be afraid and his subjects will become disunited. Some will defect to the enemy; others will abandon the king; some, whom he has humiliated, will try to finish him. His close friends might stay loyal to him and want his welfare, but will wait helplessly, like a cow for her tethered calf.

Well-wishers grieve for their king when he is plunged in distress, as true friends will. There are many, whom you have honoured in the past, who still bear friendship for you; and you have many true friends, who grieve over your loss of the kingdom and who want to share your troubles. Do not make them abandon you at seeing how frightened you are.

I tell you all this because I want to see your strength, manliness and intelligence; and to encourage and awaken your strength. If you understand that I speak the truth, gather courage and set your mind on victory, Sanjaya. We have a number of treasure-houses that you are unaware of; only I know they exist. I will place all these at your disposal. You also have many sincere friends who will share not only your joys but your troubles, and will not turn away from battle. Parantapa, such men are fitting allies and advisors of a king who wants victory."

Although he was not greatly intelligent, his mother's words melted away the despair that had gripped Sanjaya's heart; and he said to her, "With you, who are so devoted to my welfare, for my guide, I will lift my kingdom out of the depths into which it has sunk, or die in the attempt. I stayed mainly silent while you spoke, because I wanted to hear more. Just as a man's thirst for amrita is never slaked, I am not yet satiated with your love and wisdom.

Mother, I swear to you, I will win the support of my friends, and rouse myself to crush my enemy and be victorious!"

Stung by what his mother said, Sanjaya reared up like a proud horse of high pedigree and soon achieved everything she had urged him to.

When enemies beleaguer a king and he is overwhelmed by despair, his minister should tell him this excellent tale, to arouse his courage and infuse him with strength. Indeed, this story is called Jaya, and everyone who desires victory should hear it. And, having listened to it, a Kshatriya may vanquish his enemies and conquer the whole world.

A pregnant woman who hears it will give birth to a son, and repeatedly hearing it will ensure that a hero is born to her. The Kshatriya woman who listens to it will have a son of irresistible prowess, deeply learned and the most generous of men; who practises the severest tapasya and is utterly devout; who blazes with tejas and is the best of men; who is mighty and greatly blessed; who is a Maharatha, highly intelligent, irresistible in battle, ever victorious and invincible; and who suppresses the sinful and protects the righteous.'""

"Kunti says, 'Say to Arjuna, "When you were born and I was in the asrama surrounded by my sakhis, a celestial voice spoke from the sky, saying, Kunti, this son of yours will rival the thousand-eyed Indra. He will vanquish all the assembled Kurus in battle. With Bhima, he will conquer all the Earth and his fame will reach into the heavens. With Vasudeva as his ally he will slay the Kurus in battle and recover his lost kingdom. He will be blessed with great prosperity and, with his brothers, he will perform three mahayagnas.

Ever-glorious one, you know how devoted to truth Arjuna is, and how irresistible. Let it be as that asariri said. If dharma exists, those words will prove true, and you will fulfil them. I do not doubt what the voice said. I bow to dharma, which supersedes everything else. Tell my Dhananjaya all this.

To Bhima, who is always ready for battle, say these words, "The time has come to fulfil the reason for which a Kshatriya woman gives birth to a son. The best men never grieve when a war has to be fought." You know Bhima's heart. That Parantapa will not rest until he has exterminated his enemies.

Krishna, speak next to the beloved Draupadi of great renown, noble Pandu's daughter-in-law, who knows every detail of dharma. Say to her,

“Panchali, you are of noble descent and endowed with great fame. You are an exemplary wife to my sons and I bless you.”

You must say to the sons of Madri, who always live by Kshatriya dharma, “Treasure that which you acquire by prowess more than life itself. Objects thus won fill the heart of a true Kshatriya with joy. Even while you lived a virtuous life, before your very eyes the Kurus spoke cruel and abusive words to Panchali. Will any Kshatriya worth his name forgive such an insult?

The loss of the kingdom did not distress me nor did the defeat at dice; but to see the noble, beautiful Draupadi weeping in the sabha broke my heart. Alas, she, who is ever devoted to Kshatriya dharma, found no protector then, though her husbands are such powerful men.”

O Mahabaho, tell Purushavyaghra Arjuna, that best of warriors, that he should always do as Draupadi says. You know that, when angered, Bhima and Arjuna can send even the Devas to Yamaloka. Was it not an unbearable torment for them to see their wife being dragged into the sabha? Kesava, remind them of the vile things that Dusasana said to her in the presence of all the Kuru warriors.

Ask after the welfare of the Pandavas, Draupadi and their children for me. Tell them that I am well. Now go on your auspicious mission and, precious Krishna, protect my sons,’ says Kunti.

Krishna pays homage to her by walking around her in pradakshina, and then the mighty-armed one walks in leonine majesty out of Pritha’s apartments. He dismisses the Kurus, who follow him with Bhishma at their head, and, taking Karna with him in his chariot, leaves the Kuru capital accompanied by Satyaki.

And after he leaves, the Kurus gather and discuss what Krishna said and the wonderful vision he showed them. They say, ‘Overcome by ignorance, the Earth is caught in death’s meshes. Through Duryodhana’s folly, everything is doomed.’

Krishna leaves the city and goes on his way, talking at length with Karna, before letting him go and urging his horses to greater speed. With Daruka holding their reins those horses fly with the speed of the mind and flash across the sky, devouring it as they go. Covering the long distance like swift hawks, they arrive at Upaplavya, bearing the wielder of the Saranga,” said Vaisampayana.

Vaisampayana said, "When they hear of Kunti's message to her sons, Bhishma and Drona say to the defiant Duryodhana, 'Naravyaghra, did you hear the fiery words that Kunti said to Krishna? Her sons will do as she says, especially as Krishna approves. They will not be pacified until they have their share of the kingdom.

You inflicted untold pain on Draupadi and the sons of Pritha in the sabha. Bound by dharma, at the time they swallowed your savage insults. Now that Yudhishtira has Arjuna, master of the astra shastra, the determined Bhima, the Gandiva and its inexhaustible quivers, Arjuna's chariot that flies the Vanara banner, Nakula and Sahadeva, both blessed with brilliant tejas and awesome might, and Krishna and his allies by his side, the Dharmaraja will be unforgiving.

Duryodhana, you saw for yourself how Arjuna vanquished us in battle outside Virata's city. Dhananjaya, who flies the emblem of Hanuman on his flag, singly annihilated the dreaded Nivatakavachas. Have you forgotten the incident with the cattle, when the Gandharvas routed Karna and seized you and your brothers, whilst you wore armour and rode in your rathas? It was Arjuna who rescued you. Is all this not proof enough for you of what will happen if you go to war against Kunti's sons?

Bharatottama, you and your brothers must make peace with the Pandavas. O save this mother Earth from the apocalypse that looms.

Yudhishtira is your elder brother; he is virtuous, affectionate, sweet-spoken and learned. Give up your evil plans and unite with that tiger among men.

If the Pandava sees you put away your bow, and wipe the angry frown from your face and look cheerful, it will bode well indeed for your vamsa. Go to him with your ministers and embrace him as a brother. Pay your respects to him as a king, as you used to, and let Yudhishtira hold you lovingly in his arms.

Let that most terrible warrior Bhima, of the lionish shoulders, mighty thighs and long, powerful arms embrace you. Then let Dhananjaya, of the lotus-petal eyes, wavy hair and conch-like neck greet you respectfully. Let those Purushavyaghras the twins, their beauty unrivalled on Earth, wait on you as their guru, affectionately and reverently. Let all the Kshatriyas with Krishna at their head shed tears of joy.

Divest yourself of pride and reunite with your brothers. Rule the whole Earth with them. Let all the kings embrace one another and joyfully return to their homes. There is no need for war, Duryodhana. Listen to your friends' sage advice, for they warn you that a complete decimation of Kshatriyas will be the only outcome of the war you mean to fight.

The stars are not propitious: animals and birds of ill omen, and all kinds of ominous signs can be seen, particularly in our kingdoms, which portend an unprecedented massacre of Kshatriyas. Meteors fall on your forces; our animals are listless and seem to weep; vultures wheel above our troops. The city and the palace have lost their old appearance and seem sinister. Jackals howl and run in all directions, and fires blaze up everywhere of their own accord.

Listen to your parents and to us, who want only your good. Mahabaho, war and peace both lie within your control. If you ignore the advice of your friends, you will repent when your army is shredded by Partha's arrows. You will remember these words when you hear mighty Bhima's terrible battle cry and the twang of the Gandiva. If you cannot find it in yourself to return to dharma, what we say will inexorably come to pass.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Duryodhana frowns, his eyes glitter and he averts his gaze from his elders, saying not a word in reply. Bhishma and Drona look at each other and address him once more.

Bhishma says, 'What can be sadder for us than to have to fight against Yudhishtira, who is devoted to serving his elders, who has no envy, who knows himself and is truthful?'

Drona says, 'I love Arjuna more than I love my son Aswatthama; and that hero who flies the ape-emblazoned banner reveres me more than my son does. Alas, out of loyalty to the Kuru House, I will have to fight him, who is dearer to me than my son. Fie on Kshatriya dharma. By my grace, there is no archer to equal Arjuna on Earth.

He who hates his friends, he who is sinful, he who denies God and he who is crooked and deceitful never receives the worship of the righteous, like a sacrifice performed by an ignorant man. Though dissuaded repeatedly, a sinful man will still want to continue sinning, while a righteous man will never abandon dharma, even if he is tempted to sin. Though you have been deceitful and vicious to the Pandavas, they still want to do the right thing by you.

O Duryodhana, your sins will bring you to disaster. The Kuru Pitamaha, Vidura, Krishna and I have all spoken to you, but you have not understood what is good for you. Like the Ganga flowing into the ocean, which abounds with sharks, crocodiles, timingalas and giant tortoises, you want to penetrate the Pandava host, which teems with heroes. You enrobe yourself in Yudhishtira's wealth as if it was discarded by him, and you think of it as your own.

Though Pritha and Pandu's son lived twelve years in the forest with Draupadi and his brothers, who, even amongst kings, can vanquish him? Yudhishtira shone in splendour even in the presence of Kubera, to whom all the Yakshas and their kings are servile. The Pandavas went to Kubera's court and obtained immense wealth from there, and now they want to attack your swollen kingdom and take back their sovereignty.

Both Bhishma and I have given gifts, poured libations on the fire, studied the scriptures and gratified Brahmanas by gifts of wealth. Our life on Earth has come to an end. Our work is done. You, however, have much to lose—happiness, your kingdom, friends and wealth—and great will be the catastrophe you face, if you go to war against the Pandavas.

How can you vanquish Yudhishtira when Draupadi, who is ever truthful and devoted to stern vratas and tapasya, prays for his success? How will you overcome that son of Pandu who has Krishna for his mentor, who has Dhananjaya for a brother? How will you defeat that son of Pandu, of the austere tapasya, who has on his side so many greatly intelligent Brahmanas who have mastered their senses?

In the way that a well-wisher would when he sees his friend drowning in an ocean of distress, I tell you again—there is no need of war. Make peace with those heroes for the sake of the prosperity of all the Kurus. Do not court defeat and death, with your sons, allies and our army.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, in the presence of all the princes and vassals Krishna left the city, taking Karna with him in his chariot. What did he of the immeasurable soul say to Radheya? What pacifying words did Govinda speak to the Sutaputra? Tell me, Sanjaya, whatever Krishna, of the voice as deep as newly formed monsoon clouds, said to Karna, mild or stern.'

Sanjaya says, 'Bhaarata, I will repeat the very words, both intimidating and mild, full of dharma, fraught with truth, beneficial and pleasing to the heart, that Krishna spoke to Radha's son.

Krishna said, "Radheya, you have worshipped many Brahmanas who have perfect knowledge of the Veda. With dhyana, and a mind free of envy, you have frequently sought knowledge from them, and thus you know the eternal truth of the Vedas and the subtleties of the Shastras.

Those who know the Shastras say that sons are of two kinds—kanina and sahoda. Both are born before her marriage to an unwed maiden who later marries their father. You were born in this way, Karna; you are Pandu's son. Be a king, as the Shastras dictate you should. On your father's side you have Pritha's sons for kin, and on your mother's, the Vrishnis. Bharatarishabha, both these families are your own.

Come with me today and let the Pandavas know that you are Kunti's son, born before Yudhishtira was. The five Pandava brothers, Draupadi's five sons and Subhadra's invincible son will all worship at your feet. All the kings and princes, who have gathered for the Pandava cause, all the Andhakas and all the Vrishnis, will do the same. For your investiture, queens and princesses will bring water in gold, silver and earthen jars, aromatic herbs and all kinds of grain, jewels and flowers. Draupadi will be a wife to the six of you.

Let Dhaumya, of the restrained soul, pour ghee on the sacred fire, and let the Pandavas' Brahmanas, for whom the Vedas are the final authority, perform your investiture. Let the Pandavas' family priest, who is devoted to Vedic rites, the five sons of Pandu, all bulls among men, Draupadi's five sons, the Panchalas, the Chedis and me join in installing you as sovereign lord of the Earth.

Let Dharma's son Yudhishtira, of the great soul and stern vows, be your heir apparent and rule the kingdom under your authority. Let him stand behind you in your chariot, holding the white chamara fan. Let Bhimasena hold the royal white parasol over your head. Arjuna will drive your chariot drawn by white horses, adorned with a hundred tinkling bells, its sides covered with tiger-skins. Nakula and Sahadeva, Draupadi's five sons, the Panchalas and that Maharatha Sikhandin will all follow. I with all the Andhakas and the Vrishnis will walk behind you. All the Dasarhas and the Dasarnas will be your kinsmen.

O Mahabaho, enjoy the sovereignty of the Earth with your brothers the Pandavas, with japas and homas and auspicious rites being performed in your honour. Let the Dravidas, the Kuntalas, the Andhras, the Talacharas, the Chuchupas and the Venupas, all walk ahead of you. Let vabdhis and magadhis sing hymns in your praise. Let the Pandavas proclaim, Victory to Vasusena!

O Kuntiputra, rule the kingdom surrounded by the Pandavas, like the Moon by the stars, and gladden Kunti's heart. Let your friends rejoice and your enemies tremble. Even today, let there be a union between you and the sons of Pandu, your brothers.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Karna said, "O Kesava, I have no doubt that you speak out of love, affection and friendship for me, and also because you wish me well. I already know and understand everything you have said.

By descent, as well as by the laws of the Shastras, I know that I am Pandu's eldest son. Before she married Pandu, my mother, while still a virgin, conceived me through intercourse with Surya Deva, and, at his command, abandoned me as soon as I was born. Yes, by dharma I am indeed the firstborn son of Pandu.

Kunti abandoned me without a thought. The Suta, Adhiratha, saw me floating down the river, took me home and gave me to Radha. Her breasts filled with milk out of a mother's love, and she adopted and raised me as her own. How can we, who know dharma and are always listening to scriptures deprive her of her pinda?

Adhiratha, too, looked upon me only as a son and I loved him as my father. It was he who, with a father's love, performed all the samskaras for me from my infancy, as prescribed in the shastras. He had the Brahmanas name me Vasusena. When I grew to be a young man I married the girls my father chose. Through them all my sons and grandsons were born. My heart is bound to them by love. Neither from joy nor fear, neither for all the Earth nor mountains of gold will I break those bonds.

For thirteen years I have enjoyed lordship, without a thorn in my side, under Duryodhana's patronage. At the same time, I have performed the yagnas that being a Suta demands; and all my family rites and marriages were performed in accordance with Suta customs. Knowing that I am loyal to him, Duryodhana has made preparations for war and taken an openly hostile stand against the Pandavas. This is also why I have been chosen to fight Arjuna in the war that will be. O Krishna, I could never be disloyal to Duryodhana, not from fear of death, nor for ties of blood or any temptation at all. If I now withdraw from meeting Arjuna in battle, I will disgrace both myself and him.

I know that you said whatever you did out of love for me. The Pandavas are obedient to you and will do as you say. However, you must keep our conversation to yourself. If Yudhishtira comes to know that I am Kunti's first-born son, he will never accept the kingdom; and if this mighty and burgeoning empire becomes mine, I will give it to Duryodhana.

Let Dharmaraja Yudhishtira become king. He, who has Krishna for his mentor, Dhananjaya and Bhima for his warriors, and Nakula, Sahadeva and the sons of Draupadi by his side, is fit to rule the Earth. The Panchala prince Dhrishtadyumna, that mighty Maharatha Satyaki, Uttamaujas, Yudhamanyu, the prince of Somakas who is devoted to dharma, the ruler of the Chedis, Chekitana, the invincible Sikhandin, the Kekaya brothers whose skin is the hue of indragopaka insects, Bhimasena's uncle Raja Kuntibhoja who has rainbow coloured horses, Maharatha Syenajit, Virata's son Sanka and you yourself, Krishna, are on his side. This assemblage of Kshatriyas is like an ocean. Yudhishtira has as good as already won this radiant kingdom, celebrated among all the kings of the Earth.

Duryodhana is about to perform a great astra yagna, a sacrifice with weapons, of which you, Krishna, will be the Yajaman, as well as the Adhvarya, the head priest. Clad in his coat of mail, Arjuna, who flies the Vanara-emblazoned banner, will be the Hotri, the giver of offerings. His bow Gandiva will be the sruva, the sacrificial ladle, and the prowess of his warriors will be the ghrita he pours. The Aindra, Pasupata, Brahma and Sthunakarna astras he invokes will be the sacrificial mantras. Arjuna and Subhadra's son Abhimanyu, who is equal to, if not more powerful than, his father, will be the hymn that is sung. Mighty Bhima who roars in battle, that destroyer of elephant legions, that Naravyaghra will be the Udgatri, who chants the Veda, and the Prastota, who makes all the preparations, at this yagna. Dharmatma Yudhishtira, who is devoted to the performance of japa and homa, will be the Brahmana of that sacrifice.

The sounds of conches, tabors and drums, and the leonine roars rising into the heavens will be the gong that announces the meal. Madri's two sons Nakula and Sahadeva, of the great renown and strength, will be the slayers of the sacrificial animals. Rows of shining chariots, flying flags of all colours, will be the stakes to which the yagnapasus are tied. Karninas, nalikas, narachas and arrows with heads like calf-teeth will be the spoons used to distribute the Soma rasa; tomaras will be the vessels holding the Soma, and bows will be the pavitras—kusa leaves for pouring ghee.

Swords will be the papalas—the chalices, the heads of slain warriors will be the purodasas—the oblations, and their blood the ghrita. Lances will be the paridhas—the kindling, and bright maces will be the saktis—pokers used to stir the fire. Drona and Kripa's disciples and Saradwat's son will be the Sadasyas—the guests and assisting priests. The arrows shot by Arjuna, by other mighty warriors, by Drona and Drona's son will be the ladles for serving the Soma.

Satyaki will be the chief assistant to you, Krishna, the Adhvarya. Duryodhana will be the Dikshita—performer of this yagna, and his vast army will play the role of his wife. When the evening rites of this yagna begin with the animal sacrifices, mighty Ghatotkacha will be the slayer of the animals. Dhrishtadyumna, who was born from a sacrificial fire, will be the Dakshina—the fee paid to the priest—of the yagna.

I am consumed with remorse for my sin of speaking harsh words to the Pandavas in order to please Duryodhana. Krishna, the moment of my death at Arjuna's hands will mark the commencement of the punaschiti, the second part of the yagna of war. When Pandu's second son Bhima drinks the blood of the roaring Dusasana, only then the part of the yagna when the Soma rasa is drunk will occur.

When the two Panchala princes Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin overthrow Drona and Bhishma the yagna will be paused for a while; and when mighty Bhimasena kills Duryodhana the yagna will end. When the wives of Dhritarashtra's sons and grandsons stream onto the battlefield haunted by dogs, vultures and other birds of prey, and weep loudly in mourning with Gandhari for their slain husbands, sons and protectors, then the avabhrita snana, the final bath at the conclusion of the yagna, will take place.

Krishna, I pray you, for your own sake, do not let the old and learned Kshatriyas die miserable deaths. This vast host of Kshatriyas must die honourably by weapons on Kurukshetra, that most sacred of all places in the three worlds. Lotus-leaf-eyed one, somehow enable us to achieve our goal, so that the Kshatriya race may attain Swarga. As long as mountains stand and rivers flow the fame of this sacrifice in blood will last. Brahmanas will recite the Mahabharata, this great war of the Bhaaratas. The fame that they achieve in battle is Kshatriyas' true wealth.

O Krishna, bring Kuntiputra Arjuna before me to fight; and keep our conversation a secret forever.'""

"Sanjaya says, 'Krishna smiled and said to him, "Karna, do you not wish to have the empire in the way I have shown you? Do you not want to rule over the Earth, which I am giving you?

The victory of the Pandavas is certain; there is no doubt of that. Arjuna's triumphal banner with the fierce Vanara on it seems to be flying already. The divine illusionist Bhaumana has created it with such enchantment that it stands high, like Indra's banner, and displays on it celestial creatures of forms that symbolise victory. Rising upwards and across for a Yojana, unobstructed by mountains or trees, it blazes like fire. When you see Arjuna in battle on his chariot drawn by white horses, with Krishna as his sarathy; when he looses the astras Aindra, Agneya and Maruta; and when you hear the twang of Gandiva splitting the air like thunder, then all signs of the Krita, the Treta and the Dwapara yugas will disappear. Only the wrath of the Kali will remain.

When you see in battle the invincible Yudhishtira, who is devoted to japa and homa, and who dazzles in brilliance like the Sun, protecting his mighty army and burning the army of his enemies, then all signs of the Krita, the Treta, and the Dwapara yugas will disappear.

When you see in battle the mighty Bhimasena, having drunk Dusasana's blood, dance like a fierce elephant with rent temples that has killed a fearsome antagonist, then all signs of the Krita, the Treta and the Dwapara yugas will disappear.

When you see in battle Arjuna contain Drona, Bhishma, Kripa, Duryodhana and Jayadratha of the Sindhus, all of whom rush to attack him, then all signs of the Krita, the Treta and the Dwapara yugas will disappear.

When you see in battle the two mighty sons of Madri, those Maharathas who shatter enemy chariots into shards, wreak havoc on the armies of Dhritarashtra's sons from the very moment that weapons begin to clash, like a pair of maddened elephants, then all signs of the Krita, the Treta and the Dwapara yugas will disappear.

Karna, go back and tell Drona, Bhishma and Kripa that this month is a delightful one, with an abundance of food, drink and all things salubrious. Plants and herbs are in a season of vigorous growth; the trees are full of fruit, and the flies are gone. The roads are free of slush, the water is sweet and the weather is pleasant, neither hot nor cold.

Seven days from now will be Amavasya, the day of the new moon. Let the battle begin then, for it is Indra's day. Tell all the kings who have come to fight that I will fulfil their cherished desires. All the kings and princes who are with Duryodhana, and who are killed by weapons, will attain Moksha.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing Krishna's auspicious words, Karna worshipped him and said, "Knowing everything, why do you still want to confuse me? The destruction of the whole world is at hand because of Sakuni, Dusasana, Duryodhana and me. Certainly, Krishna, a great and fierce war will soon be fought between the Pandavas and the Kurus, which will soak the earth with blood. All the kings and princes who follow Duryodhana will be consumed by the fire of weapons and go to Yama.

Frightful visions and omens appear, making the people's hair stand on end; and they all portend Duryodhana's defeat and Yudhishtira's victory. That fierce planet of dark effulgence, Sanaischara—Saturn—is in opposition to the star Prajapatya, and will bring untold suffering on Earth. The planet Angaraka—Mars—wheels towards the constellation Jyeshta and approaches Anuradha as if seeking friendship, foretelling a great slaughter. Without doubt, Krishna, a terrible calamity for the Kurus is at hand, especially as all the planets oppose the nakshatra Chitra. The Sun spot has changed its position and Rahu approaches Surya to devour him. Meteors, thundering and shaking, fall from the sky.

Elephants trumpet loudly, the horses shed tears and shun food and water. Mahabaho, these omens forecast a great and universal slaughter. In Duryodhana's army the horses, elephants and soldiers, eat little but excrete a lot. Wise men say that these conditions are harbingers of defeat.

The elephants and horses that belong to the Pandavas are all in good spirits and the animals all wheel to the right. These signs augur success. In Duryodhana's army, all the animals move to the left while disembodied voices speak overhead, warning of doom. Auspicious birds—mayuras, hamsas, kraunchas, chatakas, jivajivas and sankhas—follow the Pandavas, while kazhukas, lankas, vakas, hawks, pisachas, jackal packs and swarms of bees follow the Kauravas. The Pandava drums boom without being struck, while those in Duryodhana's camp stay silent even when they are beaten.

Many other signs of defeat manifest themselves in Duryodhana's encampment: water tanks roar like bulls; soldiers are drenched in rains of flesh and blood; misty, ethereal edifices with high walls, deep trenches and imposing entrances suddenly appear, shimmering in the skies over the Kuru camp; and a black ring encircles the Sun. Sunrise and sunset are macabre, and jackals howl hideously at these sandhyas. These omens all foretell defeat.

Bizarre birds, all one-winged, one-eyed and one-legged, screech horribly, also portending defeat. Other ferocious birds with black wings and red legs hover over the Kuru camp at nightfall. Duryodhana's soldiers show hatred for Brahmanas, for their gurus and for all their loyal servants. From Duryodhana's camp the eastern horizon appears red; the south has the hue of weapons; and the west the colour of the Earth; and all the four directions seem ablaze. I know that all these omens augur grave danger.

I had a vision, Krishna, in which I saw Yudhishtira and his brothers climbing to a palace built on a thousand pillars. They all wore white robes and crowns and sat on white thrones. I saw you wrap the blood-dyed earth in an uncanny cover of weapons. Yudhishtira climbed upon a heap of bones and happily ate payasa and ghrita out of a golden cup. I saw him swallow the Earth, which you handed to him. He will surely rule this Bhumi.

I saw Vrikodara, of fierce deeds, standing on the summit of a mountain with his mace in his hand, and he looked as if he was devouring this world. For sure, he will slay us all in savage battle. I know that victory follows dharma.

I saw Dhananjaya, wielder of the Gandiva, riding with you on the back of a white elephant, and he shone with lustre. I have no doubt, O Krishna, that you will kill all the kings led by Duryodhana in the war that will be.

I saw Nakula and Sahadeva, and that Maharatha Satyaki, adorned with white bracelets, white necklaces, white garlands and wearing white robes.

Those tigers among men sat on grand palanquins borne on men's shoulders, with great royal parasols held over their heads. I saw three of Duryodhana's warriors—Aswatthama, Kripa and Kritavarman of the Sattvatas—also clad in white turbans, while all the other kings wore red turbans.

I saw the Maharathas Bhishma and Drona climbing into a carriage drawn by camels, and they rode past Duryodhana and me towards Agastya's kingdom. We shall soon find Yamaloka for ourselves. I have no doubt that all the kings and I, and indeed the entire assemblage of Kshatriyas, will enter the Gandiva fire and die."

Krishna said, "Yes, Karna. If you spurn my advice, the Earth will soon be destroyed. When a pralaya is at hand, adharma assumes the appearance of dharma and lodges itself in the heart."

Karna said, "Krishna, if we emerge alive from this great battle, which will raze numberless heroic Kshatriyas, we might meet here again. Otherwise we shall meet in Swarga and, O Anagha, to me this latter seems the only possibility."

Saying this, Karna clasped Krishna to him in a fervent embrace. With that, he alighted from Krishna's chariot and, riding in his own gold-decked one, the dejected Karna returned here to Hastinapura,' says Sanjaya."

Vaisampayana said, "When Krishna's mission for peace in Hastinapura fails, and after he leaves the Kurus and sets out for the Pandava camp, Vidura comes to Kunti and speaks to her, slowly, in grief.

He says, 'O Jivaputri, mother of living children, you know that I am always inclined to peace, but, although I cry myself hoarse, Duryodhana pays no heed to what I say. Yudhishtira has as allies the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Kekayas; he has Bhima, Arjuna, Krishna, Satyaki and the twins. Despite this he remains in Upaplavya, and out of his love for his kinsmen, still looks to dharma, seeming weak though he is in fact so powerful. Dhritarashtra, though he is old, does not care for peace and, intoxicated with pride in his sons, walks a sinful path.

The evil-mindedness of Jayadratha, Karna, Dusasana and Sakuni has caused this strife between cousins. Their sins against Yudhishtira Dharmaraja will soon fetch nemesis upon us all. Is there anyone who would not be filled with sorrow to see the Kurus persecuting dharma? When Krishna returns without having been able to make peace, the Pandavas will prepare for war, and the sins of the Kurus will lead to the very race of Kshatriyas being annihilated. My mind is filled with these thoughts and I get no sleep by day or by night.'

Kunti listens to Vidura, who has always wished her sons well and, sighing deeply in grief, she thinks to herself, 'Fie on wealth, for the sake of which this great slaughter of kinsmen is about to take place. In this war friends will slay friends and kinsmen their own blood. What can be sadder than to see the Pandavas, the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Yadavas assembled to fight the Kurus? Ah, I see no benefit whatever in war. On the other hand, if we do not fight, we face poverty and humiliation. Death is preferable to poverty, but the extermination of one's kinsmen is not victory.

As I reflect on this my heart wells with sorrow. That Pitamaha Bhishma, Acharya Drona and Karna are on Duryodhana's side sharpens my fear. Surely Drona will never fight willingly against his pupils. Why does the Pitamaha not show any affection for the Pandavas? That leaves the sinful Karna, who follows the deluded Duryodhana who hates the Pandavas.

Single-mindedly pursuing the ruin of the Pandavas, Karna is powerful indeed. This thought is what most burns me now. I will meet him today and disclose the truth of his birth to him, and try to draw his heart towards the Pandavas.

When I was a maiden in my father Kuntibhoja's antahpura, Durvasa Muni was pleased by the way I looked after him and gave me a boon of mantras. With a trembling heart, I thought of the power of those mantras and what Durvasa said: that they were incantations to summon any Deva I chose. I was just a girl then, and had not attained puberty; and I thought constantly about the mantras. Watched over by my nursemaid and surrounded by my sakhis, not wanting to incur any reproach and wanting to keep my father's honour, I thought long about how I could use the secret mantras without sinning.

Finally, I bowed to the Muni in my mind, and from curiosity and childish folly, I spoke the mantras to invoke Surya Deva into my maidenhood, and that is how Karna was born. Why should this child that I held in my virginal womb not obey me, when what I will say to him is both dharma and beneficial to himself and his brothers?'

After reflecting in this way, Kunti makes a decision. She sets out for the sacred Bhagirathi, and arrives on the banks of the Ganga. There she hears her son chanting slokas from the Veda. Karna stands facing the east with his arms raised above his head. Kunti stands behind him and waits for him to complete his prayers. In the noonday heat Kunti begins to wilt, like a faded lotus garland; she comes closer and stands in the shade cast by awesome Karna's great body.

Karna continues his prayers until his back burns from the Sun's heat and his body radiates lustre. At last, he finishes his worship, lowers his arms and turning round, he is startled to see Kunti. He greets her respectfully, folding his hands together; he bows and speaks gently to her."

"Karna says, 'I am Karna, son of Radha and Adhiratha. Devi, what brings you here? What can I do for you?'

Kunti says, 'You are Kunti's son, not Radha's, and Adhiratha is not your father. Karna, you are not a Suta; believe what I say to you.

You were born to me when I was a girl; I carried you in my womb. My son, you were born in Raja Kuntibhoja's palace. Resplendent Surya Deva, who makes everything visible, is your father. You were born in my father's house, wearing ear-rings and armour that were a part of your body, and you were radiantly beautiful. It is not right that you remain ignorant of who your brothers are and serve Duryodhana. It is a sin. The laws of dharma state that a man's highest duty is to obey and please his father and his mother. His mother is the one who most loves her child.

Evil men have, from avarice, taken Yudhishtira's wealth, which Arjuna won for him. Retrieve it from Dhritarashtra's sons and enjoy that prosperity. Let the Kurus see Karna and Arjuna uniting today in brotherly love; and let the evil ones bow to you. Let yours and Arjuna's names be spoken of in the same breath as Krishna's and Balarama's. If you two are united, what is there in this world that is unattainable?

O Karna, surrounded by your brothers, you will blaze in glory, even like Brahma surrounded by the Devas at a mahayagna. Endowed with every virtue, you are my first born. Let the world no more call you a Sutaputra; you are a Partha—a son of Pritha, and you are a great tejasvin.'"

Vaisampayana said, "When Kunti has finished speaking, Karna hears a voice redolent with love coming from the Sun above. The far away voice is Surya Deva's.

The voice says, 'What Pritha says is true. Karna do as your mother tells you; great good will come of it.'

Though his mother and his natural father have spoken to him, Karna's heart is resolute, for he is devoted to the truth.

He says, 'O Kshatriya Devi, I cannot accept what you say, that to obey you is my highest dharma. Mother, you abandoned me as soon as I was born. This grievous injury not only put my life at risk, but has been detrimental to my achievements and fame. If indeed I am a Kshatriya, you have deprived me of all my rightful samskaras. An enemy could not have done me more harm.

You mercilessly robbed me of the rites of passage that are my birthright, and now you come to demand my obedience. Never until now have you cared about my welfare, as a mother should; and you have come to me today only for your own good. Who is there who would not be afraid of Dhananjaya, who has Krishna as his sarathy? If I go to your sons now, everyone would think that I do so because I am afraid. Nobody knows I am their brother. If this becomes known on the eve of battle, and I join the Pandavas, what would all the Kshatriyas say?

Dhritarashtra's sons have given me everything I want, and they have worshipped me purely from a desire to make me happy. How can I make a mockery of this friendship and render it futile? Even though they have initiated hostilities with others, they have always honoured me and bowed to me, even as the Vasus do to Vasava. They base their confidence that they can conquer their enemies on my might. How can I betray their cherished hope? With me as their boat, they would cross the impassable ocean of war. How can I abandon them, when I am their only refuge?

This is the time when all those who have received patronage and support from Dhritarashtra's sons should show their gratitude and loyalty. I, surely, will fight for them, uncaring of even my life. Sinful, faithless men who, at the time to repay the kindness done to them, turn traitors to those who have fed them and met their every need, are like thieves who steal their master's food. They will not prosper in this world or in the next.

I will not lie to you. For Duryodhana's sake I will fight against your sons, putting forth all my strength and might. At the same time, I will be compassionate, and I will observe my dharma. Therefore, however benevolent your words may be, I cannot obey them. Yet, your pleas shall not be in vain. Other than Arjuna, I will not kill your other sons—Yudhishtira, Bhima and the twins; I will spare their lives even when I hold them in the palm of my hand.

Of all the warriors in Yudhishtira's army, it is with Arjuna alone that I will fight. If I kill Arjuna, I will achieve great renown, and if he kills me, I will yet be covered in glory. Devi, you will always have no less than five sons. Five they will number, either including me, or Arjuna, if I am killed.'

Kunti trembles in grief and embraces her son, who remains resolute, and she says, 'Karna, even if what you say is true, the Kauravas will certainly be killed. Destiny rules supreme. You have sworn you will not harm four of your brothers. Remember this oath when you are in the midst of battle. Be blessed with good health, my son.'

Karna says Tathaastu, and they both leave, each in a different direction."

Vaisampayana said, "Krishna returns to Upaplavya from Hastinapura and tells the Pandavas all that has transpired. He confers with them for a long time, and then goes to his own apartments to rest. The Pandavas give leave to Virata and the other kings, and at sunset they say their evening prayers.

With their hearts set on Krishna they think worshipfully of him. At last, they bring Krishna into their midst and deliberate again on what they should do.

Yudhishtira says, 'O you of the eyes like lotus-petals, tell us what you said to Duryodhana in the Kuru sabha when you went to Nagapura.'

Krishna says, 'What I said to Duryodhana in Nagapura was honest, reasonable and benign. But that evil one paid me no heed.'

Yudhishtira says, 'When Duryodhana declared his intention to take the path of sin, what did the Kuru Pitamaha say to the vindictive prince? What did the noble Acharya, the son of Bharadwaja, say? And what did Duryodhana's parents Dhritarashtra and Gandhari say? What did our uncle Vidura, who is the best of all those who know dharma, who grieves for us whom he loves as his own sons, say to Duryodhana? What did all the kings who sat in that ancient court say? Krishna, tell us everything, exactly as it happened.

You have already told us all that Bhishma and Dhritarashtra, as well as the others in that sabha, said to Duryodhana, who believes himself wise, while he is ruled only by lust and greed. But I wish to hear everything again. Lose no time, Krishna, you are our refuge, our lord, our guide.'

Krishna says, 'Rajan, listen to what was said to Duryodhana in the Kuru sabha, and remember the words.

After I had spoken, Duryodhana laughed aloud, at which Bhishma grew incensed and said, "Duryodhana, listen to me for the sake of our vamsa. Then do whatever you think is best for your family.

My father Santanu was famed throughout the world. At first, I was his only son, but he began to wish for another because the wise say that an only son is as good as not having any. He wanted his vamsa to live and his fame to spread. Knowing what he wished for, I made the dark Satyavati my step-mother and swore the most difficult vow, of lifelong celibacy: for my father's sake and for the continuance of our royal line. You know how I could not be king and remain celibate, without breaking my solemn vow. I have no regret; I have lived contentedly, keeping my vrata. My step-mother bore my younger brother Vichitravirya, mighty-armed and handsome supporter of Kuru vamsa.

When my father attained Swarga I installed Vichitravirya as ruler of the kingdom and served him as his subject. Later, I defeated several monarchs at the swayamvara for the daughters of the king of Kasi, and I brought home suitable wives for him. You have heard all this many times.

Sometime after, I fought a duel against my guru Parasurama Bhargava, and my brother fled from fear of Rama and because his subjects deserted him. During this time, he indulged himself entirely in his wives and, because of the time he spent with them, was afflicted by consumption and died. There was anarchy in our kingdom.

Indra did not send us a drop of rain, and the subjects, plagued by fear of hunger, came to me and said, 'Your people are on the point of extinction. Be our king for our good. End this drought, and be blessed, O perpetuator of Santanu's dynasty. Your subjects suffer from fearsome diseases, and very few are left alive. It is incumbent on you to save them, Gangaputra. Put an end to our suffering and rule your subjects with dharma. Let your kingdom not be destroyed even while you live.'

I remained unmoved by their tearful pleas. Remembering dharma, I wanted only to be faithful to my vow. Then, Rajan, the citizens, my stepmother Kali, our servants, priests, acharyas and many learned Brahmanas, all beset with sorrow, begged me to take the throne.

They said, 'While you still live will this ancient kingdom that was once ruled by the illustrious Pratipa go to ruin? Generous one, be the king for our sake.'

I joined my hands together and, filled with anguish, I told them about the vow I had sworn for my father's sake. I told them that it was for the sake of our kingdom, and especially for my step-mother, that I had taken the vow of celibacy and renounced the throne. I begged them not to place the burden of kingship on me.

I joined my hands once more and pacified my step-mother, saying repeatedly, 'Mother, as Santanu's son, and a Kuru, I cannot break my word. I took this vow especially for your sake; and I am your servant and yours to command, my loving mother.'

I placated her and the people, and then she and I begged Mahamuni Vyasa, who was also Satyavati's son from the Rishi Parasara, to father children on my brother's widows. He granted our prayers. The Rishi fathered three sons, Bharatottama: Dhritarashtra, Pandu and Vidura. Your father Dhritarashtra was born blind and he could not be king. Instead, the noble, mighty and celebrated Pandu ruled the Kuru kingdom; he expanded its boundaries immeasurably and the people flourished under his golden reign.

Since Pandu was the king, his sons must rightfully inherit their father's kingdom. Rajan, do not go to war; give them half the kingdom. While I am alive, what other man is fit to reign? Do not disregard what I say. My only wish is for peace amongst you. I make no distinction between you and them, and love all of you equally.

What I have said to you now is also the opinion of your father, Gandhari and Vidura. One must always pay heed to one's elders; do not ignore what I say. Do not destroy all that you have and the very Earth as well.”””

"Krishna says, 'After Bhishma spoke, Drona, always eloquent, says to Duryodhana in the midst of the assembled kings, "May you be blessed, Duryodhana. Pandu was as devoted to the Kuru vamsa as Pratipa's son Santanu was, and as Devavrata Bhishma is. Pandu was devoted to truth, had his senses under control, was virtuous, practised excellent vratas and was attentive to all his duties in dharma. Although he was king and conqueror, that perpetuator of the Kuru vamsa made over the sovereignty to his elder brother Dhritarashtra, of deep wisdom, and to his younger brother Vidura. After installing Dhritarashtra on the throne, Pandu went to live in the forest with his two wives.

Vidura, in great humility, placed himself under Dhritarashtra's command and waited on him like a servant, fanning him with palm leaves. All the subjects of the kingdom took his lead and submitted to Dhritarashtra just as they had to Pandu.

Having handed the kingdom over to Dhritarashtra and Vidura, Pandu, conqueror of hostile cities, wandered the Earth. Vidura, ever devoted to dharma, took charge of the treasury, and of administering the kingdom and the welfare of its subjects. Bhishma, of the mighty tejas, took charge of the army, of making war and peace, and the giving or withholding of gifts to other kings. All the time that Dhritarashtra has sat on the throne, the noble Vidura stayed near him.

How could you, who have been born in Dhritarashtra's dynasty, even think of creating a rift in the family? Unite with your brothers the Pandavas and enjoy every pleasure. Rajan, I do not say this to you from cowardice or for the sake of wealth. Best of kings, the wealth I enjoy is what Bhishma, and not you, gave me. I do not desire any means of sustenance from you. Where Bhishma is, there Drona must be.

Do what Bhishma has told you. Parantapa, give the sons of Pandu half the kingdom. I was their teacher as much as yours. Indeed, Arjuna is as much a son to me as Aswatthama. But, ah, of what use are speeches? Victory and dharma go together."

Now the virtuous Vidura turned to his uncle Bhishma and, looking him in the face, said, "O Devavrata, pay heed to what I say. When Kuru vamsa was threatened with extinction you revived it. That is why you are now indifferent to my pleas. Duryodhana is a blot on our royal house; and you follow his inclinations, although he is evil, ungrateful, and a slave to greed and lust.

Duryodhana disregards his father's command, which is in keeping with dharma and artha, and the Kurus must face the dire consequences of war. O Maharajan, do what needs to be done so entire house of Kuru is not extinguished. Even as an artist creates a painting, you brought Dhritarashtra and me into this world. The Creator creates beings and destroys them; do not do as he does, for you are not Him. Do not turn away in indifference from the coming extinction of your vamsa, which you see plainly before your eyes. If the imminence of a pralaya of blood has robbed even you of your vision, then take sannyasa in the forest, and take Dhritarashtra and me with you. Otherwise, this very day restrain Duryodhana, who uses deceit as wisdom, and rule this kingdom yourself with the sons of Pandu guarding its boundaries.

Relent, O tiger among Kshatriyas. A great slaughter of the Pandavas, the Kurus and of other mighty kings is about to happen," Vidura said, and he stopped and sighed deeply, his heart overflowing with sorrow.

Then, alarmed at the prospect of the destruction of an entire race, King Subala's daughter Gandhari spoke in anger to her sinful son Duryodhana in the Kuru sabha, words of dharma and artha.

She said, "Let all the kings present in this ancient sabha, the twice-born Rishis and others who have gathered here listen to me proclaim your guilt for the sins that you and your companions have committed. The kingdom of the Kurus is inherited in the proper order of succession. This has always been the custom of our royal line, but you, of evil soul and inhuman deeds, seek to destroy the kingdom. The wise Dhritarashtra now rules the kingdom, with the far-sighted Vidura as his advisor. Why do you want the kingdom for yourself? What is your right to pass them by?

Indeed, Dhritarashtra mahatman and Vidura should both be subordinate to Bhishma while he is alive. Gangaputra Bhishma has foresworn sovereignty for the sake of dharma. That is how Pandu became the king. And only his sons are the true kings today. This vast kingdom rightfully belongs to the Pandavas, and to their sons and grandsons, as their inheritance by the laws of succession.

We must all do as Pitamaha Bhishma says, in accord with Kshatriya dharma and for the sake of our kingdom. In obedience to Bhishma's command, Dhritarashtra and Vidura must declare the same thing, as must everyone who wishes us well, setting dharma above all else. I say let Dharmaputra Yudhishtira, guided by Dhritarashtra and with Bhishma for his mentor, rule this kingdom of the Kurus for many long years.'"

"Krishna says, 'Then Dhritarashtra addressed Duryodhana in the midst of the assembled monarchs, saying, "Duryodhana my son, listen to what I say, and may you be blessed. Obey me if you have any respect for your father.

Soma Deva, the lord of creatures, was the original progenitor of the Kuru vamsa. Nahusha's son Yayati was sixth in descent from Soma; and Yayati had five sons who were all Rajarishis. The eldest of them was tejasvin Yadu and the youngest was Puru, from whom we are descended. Puru's mother was Vrishaparva's daughter Sarmishta, and Yadu's mother was Devayani, and thus he was the grandson of Sukra of the immeasurable tejas, who is also called Kavya.

Our ancestor Yadu was mighty, but also arrogant and seized by evil. Intoxicated with his prowess, he humiliated all the Kshatriyas of the world; and disobeyed his father, and insulted his younger brother. Yadu became all-powerful on Earth and, suppressing everyone, he established himself in his capital city, which he named Hastinapura. His enraged father cursed him and expelled him from the kingdom. The furious Yayati cursed his other sons, too, who were obedient to their arrogant eldest brother. He set his youngest son Puru, who was obedient and devoted to him, on the throne. Thus the eldest son may be passed over and deprived of the kingdom, and younger sons may, because of their reverence towards their elders, inherit the kingdom.

Then there was my great-grandfather Pratipa, who was devoted to dharma and celebrated through the three worlds. This narasimha, this virtuous king, had three sons, all of great renown and like three Devas. Devapi was the eldest, Bahlika was second and my grandfather Santanu, of the scintillating intellect, the youngest. Devapi, who suffered from an ailment to his skin, was endowed with prodigious energy; he was virtuous, truthful, and devoted to the service of his father. Respected and popular among his subjects, loved by young and old, in cities and villages, Devapi was generous, firm in his adherence to dharma, devoted to the good of all creatures and obedient to his father and the Brahmanas. His noble brothers Bahlika and Santanu loved him dearly.

In time, in accord with the shastras, Pratipa began to prepare for Devapi to inherit the throne, and all the arrangements he made were auspicious. However, the Brahmanas and the elders in the kingdom forbade him. Hearing this, the voice of the old king became choked with tears and he began to grieve for his son. Thus, though Devapi was liberal, virtuous, devoted to truth and loved by the subjects, he was deprived of his inheritance because of his sickly skin, for the gods do not approve of a king who has a physical disability. Those best of Brahmanas did not allow Pratipa to enthrone his eldest son as king. Devapi saw how his father grieved for him and took sannyasa in the forest.

Bahlika left his father's city and lived with his maternal uncle, whose rich kingdom he inherited. On Pratipa's death, Santanu took Bahlika's leave and became king. That is why, though I am the eldest, wisely, and after much thought, I was excluded from inheriting the Kuru throne, and, though he was younger than me, Pandu became king.

After his death, Parantapa, our kingdom must pass to his sons. When I could not have the kingdom, how can you want it? You are not the son of the true king and you have no right to this kingdom. Despite that, you want to take what rightfully belongs to another. Dharmatma Yudhishtira is the eldest son of the king and this kingdom is his in dharma. This magnanimous soul is the sovereign lord of our Kuru vamsa.

Yudhishtira is devoted to truth, clear thinking, heedful of the advice of his well-wishers, honest, loved by all his subjects, kind-hearted, master of his passions and a chastiser of criminals and sinners. All the kingly attributes dwell in him: forgiveness, renunciation, self-control, a deep knowledge of the scriptures, compassion and the ability to rule with dharma as his sceptre.

You are not the son of a king, and are always inclined to sin against your own blood. How can ever you appropriate this kingdom that lawfully belongs to another? Dispel this delusion and give away half the kingdom with the proper share of wealth, animals and other possessions and treasures. Then, Duryodhana, you can hope to live a long life with your younger brothers.”””

"Krishna says, 'Although Bhishma, Drona, Vidura, Gandhari and Dhritarashtra spoke to him, the evil one could not be made to see sense. Duryodhana ignored them all and left the sabha, his eyes red with anger. All the kings he had called upon followed him, prepared to lay down their lives for his cause.

Duryodhana said to those kings, "Today the Pushya nakshatra rises. Let us march at once to Kurukshetra!" And, inexorably propelled by destiny, those kings gladly set out with their armies, making Bhishma their Senapati, their Commander-in-chief.

Eleven akshauhinis of troops have assembled on the Kaurava side. At the head of that host, Bhishma shines, flying the flag with the palmyra emblem on his chariot.

In view of all that has happened, do what you think proper, Yudhishtira. I have told you everything that Bhishma, Drona, Vidura, Gandhari and Dhritarashtra said in my presence. I did my very best to establish brotherly feelings between yourselves and your cousins: for the preservation of the race of Kuru and for the survival and prosperity of the Earth's people. When conciliation failed, I used the art of dissent by creating disunity amongst his warriors, and I spoke about all your extraordinary powers and feats.

When Duryodhana showed no interest in my attempts at conciliation, I had all the kings gather together and tried to create dissension amongst them. I showed them strange and terrible manifestations. I rebuked those kings and ridiculed Duryodhana; I terrified Karna and upbraided Sakuni for contriving the game of dice. I tried once more to disunite the kings with intrigue; and again, I resorted to diplomacy. To unite the Kurus, and given the uniqueness of the circumstances, I spoke also of charity.

I said, "As subjects of Dhritarashtra, Bhishma and Vidura, the sons of Pandu will sacrifice their pride. You keep the kingdom; let them not have any power; let it all be as Dhritarashtra, Bhishma and Vidura decide. Let the kingdom be yours. Give just five villages to the Pandavas. Best of kings, the Pandavas deserve your father's support and protection."

That malevolent one would still not yield; Duryodhana said he would not give up even land that would cover the point of a needle. The only method one can use against this evil man is danda, punishment. Why, even as we speak, those kings have already marched to Kurukshetra.

I have told you everything that happened in the Kuru sabha. Pandava, they will not give you your kingdom without battle. Death awaits them, and they have chosen to become the cause of an apocalyptic war that will see the very race of Kshatriyas perish.'"

SAINYA NIRYANA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Dharmaraja Yudhishtira now says to his brothers in Krishna's presence, 'You have heard all that happened in the Kuru sabha; you have understood what Krishna said. Purushottamas, array our troops for battle.

Seven akshauhinis of fighting men have gathered to give us victory. Listen to the names of the seven celebrated warriors who will lead these akshauhinis. They are Drupada, Virata, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandin, Satyaki, Chekitana and Bhimasena. These heroes are learned in the Vedas; they are valiant, and they have all practised excellent vratas. They are modest, conversant with politics, Maharathas and masters of mundane weapons and astras of the gods.

Tell us now, Sahadeva, my wise brother, which warrior will be our Senapati? Who will lead our seven akshauhinis in battle, who knows about all the divisions of our forces? And who can withstand Pitamaha Bhishma, who will be an unimaginable fire shooting arrows of flame. Tell us, Narashardula, who you think is capable of being our Commander?'

Sahadeva says, 'Mighty Virata, king of the Matsyas, is closely related to us; he sympathises with our cause; he is powerful, knows dharma, is skilled in weapons and irresistible in battle. We should rely on him to win our kingdom back, for he can surely withstand Bhishma and all the other Maharathas.'

The eloquent Nakula says, ‘There is one, who is an elder, who is learned in the Shastras, whose family and birth are impeccable and who is widely revered. He is blessed with modesty, strength and prosperity; he is deeply-versed in all branches of learning; he has studied the astra shastra under Rishi Bharadvaja; he is invincible; he is steadfast in dharma; he boldly challenges Drona and Bhishma; he belongs to one of the foremost royal houses; he is a renowned leader of armies; he resembles a tree of a hundred branches, so many sons and grandsons surround him. Impelled by wrath, this king, with his wife, performed the most arduous tapasya to effect the death of Drona; this Kshatriya is an ornament of any sabha; this bull among monarchs cherishes us as a father would. I speak of our father-in-law Drupada, and he should have full command of our army.

I believe that he will withstand Drona and Bhishma in battle, for he is Drona’s peer and as much a master of the devastras as the Acharya.’

After the two sons of Madri express their opinions, Indra’s son, Arjuna, his father’s equal, says, ‘There is a mighty-armed, celestial man, who was born from fire through austere tapasya and Rishis being gratified. He emerged full-grown from a sacrificial fire armed with bow and sword, clad in iron mail and mounted on a chariot, yoked to superb horses, the clatter of whose wheels was as deep as the roar of massed thunderclouds. This Kshatriya is endowed with lionish energy and strength, and leonine are his shoulders, arms and chest; even his voice is like the lion’s roar. This splendid hero is handsome with a chiselled face, perfect teeth, round cheeks, long arms, sturdy thighs, large eyes, strong legs and a powerful frame.

This prince, who cannot be pierced by weapons of any kind, and who looks like an elephant with rent temples, is Dhrishtadyumna. He is truthful in speech and has his senses under control; he was born to kill Drona.

It is Dhrishtadyumna who will resist Bhishma’s arrows, which look like snakes with fiery tongues and strike with the fierceness of thunderbolts, which are as swift as Yama’s dutas and which fall like flames consuming everything they touch, and which so far only Parasurama Bhargava could bear in battle. Rajan, I do not see any man other than Dhrishtadyumna who will withstand Devavrata Bhishma.

Blessed with lightness of hand, a master of every vyuha of war, and accoutred in impenetrable mail, this brilliant Kshatriya is like the lord of a great elephant herd. Only Dhrishtadyumna is fit to be our Senapati.’

Bhima says, ‘O king, Rishis and Siddhas have said that Drupada’s son Sikhandin was born to kill Bhishma. On the battlefield, with his devastras, he looks like the illustrious Rama himself. I do not see the man who can cleave Sikhandin’s kavacha when he stands in his chariot ready for battle. No warrior, other than Sikhandin, can kill Bhishma. I think that only Sikhandin is fit to be our Senapati.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Rajan, Krishna knows the strength and weakness of everything in the universe; he knows the mind of every man here. Be he a Maharatha or not, be he old or young, let Krishna choose the man who will lead my forces. Krishna is the bedrock of our victory or defeat. In him our lives rest, our kingdom, our prosperity or adversity, our happiness or sorrow. He is the Ordainer and Creator; in him dwells the fruition of our endeavours. Yes, let Krishna name the leader of our force.

And let him tell us his choice now, for night draws near. Once Krishna has chosen our Senapati, we will worship that man with offerings of weapons, flowers and perfumes, and then under Krishna’s will, we will march into battle.’

The lotus-eyed Krishna looks at Arjuna and says, ‘Rajan, I approve of all the powerful warriors that each of you has named to be your Senapati. All of them can withstand your enemies. They can affright Indra himself in battle, let alone the greedy and evil sons of Dhritarashtra.

Mahabaho, for your sake, I made great efforts to prevent the war and bring about peace. We have discharged our duty to dharma. Even the most critical man cannot fault us. Foolish Duryodhana has lost all good sense; he thinks that he is a great Maharatha, and, though weak with sins, imagines he is strong.

Array your troops quickly, for war is the only way to retrieve your kingdom. When they see Arjuna with Satyaki behind him, when they face Abhimanyu and the five sons of Draupadi, and Virata, Drupada and our other mighty kings, all of them lords of akshauhinis, Dhritarashtra’s sons will not stand their ground.

Our army is great and invincible; it is inexorable. Our forces will raze Dhritarashtra’s legions. And for our Senapati, I name Parantapa Dhrishtadyumna.’” Vaisampayana said, "When Krishna has spoken, all the kings are filled with joy and shout out their delight. The troops swiftly begin to array themselves, calling out Draw up! Draw up! The air is filled with the whinnying of horses, the trumpeting of elephants, the rumble of chariot wheels, the blare of conches and the booming of drums, making a tremendous din. The Pandava host teems with chariots, foot-soldiers, horses and elephants; and the invincible Pandava warriors bustle, putting on their armour and shouting battle-cries; and they look like the turbulent Ganga in spate, churning with fierce eddies and waves.

At the van of the army march Bhimasena, Madri's two sons, Subhadra's son, Draupadi's five sons and Dhrishtadyumna of the Prishata vamsa. Behind Bhimasena march the Prabhadrakas and the Panchalas. The joyous roar made by the marching hosts is like the boom of the sea at high tide on a new moon night. Such is the tumult that it seems to reach the heavens, as those warriors march in joy.

Kuntiputra Yudhishtira marches with them, accompanied by his chariots and other conveyances to transport food, fodder for the animals, tents, carriages, draught animals, treasury-chests, war-machines and weapons, surgeons and physicians, even invalids and weak soldiers, attendants and camp-followers.

Panchali remains in Upaplavya with the noblewomen of the household, and surrounded by her servants and maids. To protect them and safeguard their treasures, soldiers are posted in a circle around them and more men in a vigilant, mobile outer ring. The Pandavas are ready to set out with their awesome host. First they give gifts of cattle and gold to the Brahmanas, who walk around them and utter blessings; and then the sons of Pandu march, riding in jewelled chariots.

Behind Yudhishtira march the Kekaya princes, Dhrishtaketu, the prince of Kasi, Sreniman, Vasudana and the invincible Sikhandin, all men in their prime, wearing shimmering armour, bearing weapons and glittering with rich jewels. Bringing up the rear are Virata, Dhrishtadyumna the son of Yajnasena of the Somakas, Susarman, Kuntibhoja, Dhrishtadyumna's sons, forty-thousand chariots, five times as many horsemen, foot-soldiers numbering ten times as many as those, and sixty-thousand elephants[2]. Anadhrishti, Chekitana, Dhrishtaketu and Satyaki ride in formation around Krishna and Arjuna.

Those warriors arrive at the field of Kurukshetra in battle-array and, like a herd of bellowing bulls, the Parantapas blow their conches; Krishna and Dhananjaya sound theirs as well. The Pandava army hears the thunderous boom of the Panchajanya and rejoices. The Earth, the skies and the oceans resound with the leonine roars of those warriors, mingled with the blare of conches and drum beats.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira orders his troops to set up camp on a part of the field that is flat, cool and rich in fodder and fuel to burn. At this delightful, fertile and auspicious site, where no cemeteries, temples, shrines, asramas or other sanctified places will be violated, Yudhishtira establishes his camp.

After the animals have rested, the Pandava monarch rises and, surrounded by hundreds of thousands of kings, stands forth in joy that this hour is upon them. Krishna and Arjuna range the perimeters of the field, putting to flight hundreds of Dhritarashtra's soldiers posted there as sentries. Dhrishtadyumna and Satyaki supervise the measurement of the camp boundaries. Krishna orders the soldiers to dig a moat around the camp and to fill it by diverting the clear, pure water of the sacred lake Hiranvati, where a holy asrama is located, and whose bed is free of sludge and pebbles. He has soldiers stationed there as guards. Krishna instructs the other kings who are Yudhishtira's allies to establish their camps and erect their tents, exactly as the Pandavas have done.

Lakhs of rich and impregnable tents are put up, separately for each of the kings; and they look like palaces, replete with food, drink and fuel to cook and warm the nights. Hundreds of skilled and experienced workmen are engaged in creating and fortifying the camp; surgeons and physicians, experts in their fields, are provided with everything they might need. In special pavilions, veritable mountains of bows and bow-strings, armour, weapons, honey, ghee, powdered lac, water, cattle-feed, chaff, coal, heavy machines, spears, lances, battleaxes, breast-plates, swords and quivers are heaped. Countless war elephants covered in armour and spiked mail, giant tuskers that can crush lakhs of fighting men, are tethered to iron stakes and pillars.

O Bhaarata, when they learn that the Pandavas have camped on that field, numerous other kings arrive from their respective kingdoms, with their legions and animals, to support the sons of Pandu. Many of the kings who come to ensure the Pandavas' success have practised strict brahmacharya, imbibed consecrated Soma rasa and have given generous gifts to Brahmanas at yagnas."

Janamejaya said, "What measures does Duryodhana take when he hears that Yudhishtira has come with his army and set up camp on Kurukshetra, ready for battle under Krishna's protection, supported by Virata and Drupada with their sons, surrounded by the Kekayas, the Vrishnis and numberless other kings, and by countless mighty Maharathas, and looking like glorious Indra surrounded by the Adityas?

O Mahatman, I want to hear in detail all that happened in Kurujangala on that horrific occasion. The son of Pandu, with Krishna, Virata, Drupada, the Panchala prince Dhrishtadyumna, the Maharatha Sikhandin and the mighty Yudhamanyu, whom even the gods cannot withstand, could strike fear into the hearts of all the Devas with Indra at their head. O you of tapodhana, tell me everything that the Kurus and the Pandavas did, just as it happened."

Vaisampayana said, "When Krishna leaves the Kuru sabha, Duryodhana says to Karna, Dusasana and Sakuni, 'Kesava has gone to the sons of Pritha, without fulfilling his goal. He is furious and will stir up the Pandavas. He is anxious to see a war between me and Pandavas, and Bhimasena and Arjuna are of the same mind. Yudhishtira, who has no animosity, is influenced by Bhimasena and, besides, I have indeed persecuted him and his brothers. Virata and Drupada, against whom I have fought, are obedient to Krishna, and both have become leaders of Yudhishtira's forces. The war will be savage and terrible.

With meticulous care and heedfulness, make preparations for war. Let all the kings who are my allies pitch their thousands of tents on Kurukshetra. Their tents must be large, well protected and within easy reach of plentiful water and fuel; their camps should be in positions where the enemy cannot sever communications and supplies between them; they must be stocked with a plenitude of all kinds of weapons and adorned with streamers and flags. Have the road from our capital levelled in preparation for the march of our armies. Make a proclamation today, at once, that we will set out tomorrow.'

Saying Tathaastu, those great warriors make arrangements for the kings, who hear Duryodhana's command and rise from their thrones, now focusing their Kshatriya wrath on the enemy.

The kings massage and flex their mace-like arms that dazzle with gold bracelets and are smeared with sandalwood paste and daubed with fine perfumes. With their lotus-like hands, they tie their turbans, fasten their upper and lower garments and put on their ornaments. Maharathas supervise the equipping of their chariots; syces harness the horses; mahouts prepare the elephants. The warriors don kavachas made of gold and arm themselves with every sort of weapon. Foot-soldiers pick up their weapons and put on their gold-inlaid armour. And, O Bhaarata, Duryodhana's capital city Hastinapura, filled by these jubilant warlike millions, looks festive.

With the excitement of impending battle, the city swells like the ocean at high tide; the vast crowds of the people are its current; the chariots, elephants and horses are its fish; the tumult of conches and drums is the ocean's roar; the treasure chests are the jewels on the ocean floor; the warriors' ornaments and armour are its waves and their shining weapons are its surf; the rows of houses are the mountains on the shore; and the masses of chariots are the lakes on the sea bed.

His warriors shine on Duryodhana like the Moon over the ocean, making him look like the ocean at moonrise."

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira remembers what Krishna said, and says to him, 'O Krishna, how could Duryodhana say what he did? Ever glorious one, what should we do? How shall we conduct ourselves so we do not swerve from Kshatriya dharma?

You know how Duryodhana, Karna and Sakuni think, and you know my brothers' and my mind as well. You have heard what Vidura and Bhishma said, as well as Kunti's wise message to us. But set all that aside, and you tell us unequivocally, Krishna, what is best for us.'

In a voice that booms as deeply as thunderclouds, or great drumbeats, Krishna says, 'What I said to Duryodhana in his sabha was to his advantage and in keeping with dharma and artha, but I got no response from the Kuru prince, whose wisdom has been replaced by delusion and deceit. That sinner does not pay the slightest heed to Bhishma, Vidura or to me. He relies just on Karna, and assumes he has already won the war.

Black-hearted Duryodhana even wanted to make me his captive, but he did not succeed. Neither Bhishma nor Drona said anything about that; and all, except Vidura, follow Duryodhana's lead.

Subala's son Sakuni, Karna and Dusasana, all equally foolish, constantly give Duryodhana evil counsel about what he should do. Is there any use in my repeating everything that Duryodhana said? Suffice it to say that the wretch bears you nothing but ill will. More sinfulness resides in Duryodhana’s black heart than in all the kings and all the men in your army put together. As for us, we do not want to make peace with the Kauravas at the cost of losing what is ours. Yudhishtira, war is the only course open to you.’

All the kings hear Krishna and wordlessly look at Yudhishtira, who understands their silence and quietly tells Bhima, Arjuna and the twins to see that their forces are arrayed for battle. His command passes around like light, and a great tumult rises in the Pandava host and fills the warriors with joy. Yudhishtira, however, sighs, seeing in his mind’s eye the impending massacre of the undeserving.

He says to Bhima and Arjuna, ‘I went into exile in the forest and suffered to avoid the very calamity that now overtakes us. The thing that we strove for so intensely slips out of our grasp even as if because of our striving for it. Instead, Kali Yuga comes to us uninvited. How are we going to fight against our revered elders, whom we must not kill for any reason whatever? What kind of victory shall we achieve by slaying our acharyas?’

Seeing Yudhishtira’s mood, Arjuna repeats everything Krishna has said, and he says to his brother, ‘Rajan, you know and understand what Kunti and Vidura said, which Krishna also affirms. I am certain that neither Vidura nor Kunti would say anything that is adharma or sinful. Kuntiputra, we cannot turn away from war.’

Krishna vouchsafes what Arjuna says, and then, O Rajan, with their soldiers, Pandu’s sons pass the night in some hope, and even happiness, their minds now resolved on war.”

Vaisampayana said, "When the night has passed, Duryodhana deploys his army of eleven akshauhinis, in proper order. He divides men, elephants, chariots and horses into three classes, superior, medium and inferior, and sets them in the front, middle and rear of his ranks.

Well equipped and cared for is Duryodhana's army: it has timber and wooden planks for repairing damage to the chariots in the battle; large containers of tiger-skins and other stiff leathers to encase the sides of the chariots; and barbed javelins. Elephants and horses carry quivers full of iron spears, and foot soldiers carry heavy wooden clubs. Flagstaffs fly vivid banners; long, heavy arrows for bows are heaped in hillocks, as are all sorts of nooses and lassoes, armour of many kinds and in every size, and short, sharp clubs made of wood. Oil and sand; earthen pots filled with poisonous snakes, pulverised lac and other inflammable materials; short spears with tinkling bells; weapons of iron and machines for hurling hot oil, water and stones; whistling hardwood clubs, wax, heavy mallets, spiked clubs, plough-poles and poisoned arrows: all these are stocked in plenty. Long syringes for spraying hot oil over the enemy, planks of cane, battle-axes, forked lances, spiked gauntlets, axes and pointed iron-spikes; chariots whose sides are covered with tiger- and leopard-skins; razor-sharp discs, horns and every other weapon imaginable; kuthara axes, spades, cloths soaked in oil and ghee: these, too, are stocked in endless store.

Handsome warriors glitter in their gold embroidered battle-dress; they are radiant in jewels and gemstones. Kshatriyas of noble birth, in glittering kavacha, all master horsemen, swordsmen and archers, ride in splendid chariots, which carry stores of potent medicaments for wounds and are drawn by horses that have rows of bells and pearls on their heads; they fly fine banners on towering, richly ornamented flagstaffs; they bear loads of shields, swords, spears, slender javelins that can be flung far and spiked maces. Each ratha is yoked to four pedigreed horses; each carries a hundred bows; and each has one sarathy for the pair of horses in front, and two for the horses yoked to the wheels on either side; and all three charioteers are men of the highest skill. These chariots, numbering thousands, protected even like fortified towns and unassailable, are positioned on all sides.

The elephants, too, are decked with rows of bells, pearls and other ornaments; on their backs each mighty beast carries seven warriors and, so, look like jewelled hills. Two of the warriors are armed with hooks, two are archers, two are expert swordsmen, and one is armed with a lance and trident. Duryodhana's army teems with countless war-elephants, which bear loads of weapons and quivers filled with arrows, and all the great beasts are devastating in battle.

Thousands of richly caparisoned horses fly their heroic riders' flags. Hundreds of thousands of these well-broken and superbly trained steeds stand patient and docile before the war, neither restive nor whinnying in any excitement, though knowing full well why they are here.

Hundreds of thousands of foot-soldiers of diverse races, wearing golden ornaments and armour of diverse hues and kinds, armed with a variety of weapons, have all come as part of the eleven teeming akshauhinis. Every chariot is protected by ten elephants, every elephant by ten horses and every horse by ten foot-soldiers. A large force is kept to regroup broken ranks, and this reserve force has countless chariots each with fifty elephants surrounding it; one hundred horsemen, and seven foot-soldiers follow each horse.

One sena consists of five hundred chariots, five hundred elephants, one thousand five hundred horses and two thousand five hundred foot-soldiers. Ten senas make a pritana, and ten pritanas make a vahini. In common parlance, however, the words sena, vahini, pritana, dhwajini, chamu, akshauhini and varuthini are used in the same sense.

The brilliant Duryodhana arrays his force in this manner, and, between the two sides there are eighteen akshauhinis, with seven in the Pandava army and eleven for the Kauravas.

Two hundred and fifty men make a patti. Three pattis make a senamukha or gulma. Three gulmas make a gana. In Duryodhana's army, there are hundreds and thousands of such ganas of able warriors, all impatient for battle. Duryodhana selects from among them the bravest, most intelligent men and makes these the leaders of his troops. He places an akshauhini of troops under each of those Purushottamas—Kripa, Drona, Salya, Jayadratha the king of the Sindhus, Sudakshina of the Kambojas, Kritavarman, Drona's son Aswatthama, Karna, Bhurisravas, Subala's son Sakuni and the mighty Bahlika. The king summons them every day and at all hours, looks after them himself, talks to them and honours them personally, making them and their followers eager to please him."

Vaisampayana said, “With all his allied kings gathered round, Duryodhana, with folded hands, says to Bhishma, ‘Without a great Senapati, even the mightiest army can be crushed in battle like a swarm of ants. Two intelligent men will have different opinions and are often jealous of each other’s prowess.

Wise one, I have heard the story of how, once, the Brahmanas, fighting under a banner of Kusa grass, clashed with the mighty Kshatriyas of the Haihaya clan. Pitamaha, the Vaisyas and the Sudras followed the Brahmanas, so that three varnas were on one side with the Kshatriyas alone on the other. In the battles that ensued, the Kshatriyas vanquished the combined force of the three varnas. The Brahmanas asked the Kshatriyas to explain how this had happened.

The truthful ones among the Kshatriyas said to them, “In battle we obey the orders of one man blessed with great intelligence, while your forces are not united, but each follow different paths.”

The Brahmanas made one amongst themselves as their Senapati, a man who was brave, a skilled tactician and diplomat, and they vanquished the Kshatriyas. Those who appoint a seasoned, courageous, wise and sinless man, devoted to the good of his men, always win battles.

You are equal to Usanas himself, and always look to my welfare; you are invincible and devoted to dharma. Pitamaha, you be our Senapati. You shine amongst us like the Sun among the planets, like the Moon over fragrant herbs, like Kubera among the Yakshas, like Indra among the Devas, like Meru among mountains, like Suparna among birds, like Kumara among the Devas, like Havyavaha among the Vasus. If you protect us, as Sakra protects the Devas, even the gods will not be able to defeat us. Ride at the head of our forces, as Agni's son Kumara leads the Devas; we will follow you like calves behind a mighty bull.'

Bhishma says, 'Mahabaho, what you say might be true, but the Pandavas are as dear to me as you are and, although I will fight on your side because I have given you my word, I must be mindful of their welfare as well. There is no warrior on Earth who is my equal, except Arjuna. He is brilliant, and is a great master of the devastras, but he will never engage me in open war.

With all the astras I command I can destroy this universe of Devas, Asuras, Rakshasas and Manavas in an instant, but Pandu's sons are invincible, even by me. But every day I will kill ten thousand enemy warriors and denude the Pandava forces, as long as I am not killed in battle.

Then, there is one more condition that you must fulfil before I accept the command of your forces. Either Karna or I shall fight, but not both together. The Sutaputra always boasts and compares his prowess with mine.'

Karna says, 'O king, as long as Gangaputra Bhishma lives I will not fight. After he is killed, I will fight Arjuna.'

Duryodhana makes Bhishma the Senapati of all his army and distributes generous gifts all round. Installed in his command, Bhishma blazes in splendour. The king orders musicians to joyfully beat drums and sound the conches in their hundreds of thousands. Loud roars of soldiers and the sounds of their animals fill the air. From the cloudless sky bloody showers rain down, soaking the ground; whirlwinds and earthquakes shake the Earth; horses whinny in fear, elephants trumpet, and the soldiers' hearts tremble in dread. Ethereal voices are heard, and falling meteors flash across the sky; jackals howl hideously, foretelling a great cataclysm. A hundred other dreadful omens appear at Bhishma's installation as the Senapati of Duryodhana's army.

Duryodhana gives an abundance of cattle and gold to Brahmanas and asks for their blessings. Basking in their benedictions and surrounded by his troops, with Bhishma in front and his brothers alongside him, Duryodhana marches to Kurukshetra with his immense host. He inspects the plain with Karna and decides to camp on a level field, a pleasant and fertile place, rich in grass and firewood, and it dazzles with that awesome force of men, their armour, ornaments, gold and weapons, like Hastinapura."

Janamejaya said, "When Yudhishtira hears that Ganga's mahatman son Bhishma, first among Kshatriyas, Pitamaha of the Bhaaratas, foremost of all regents, and Brihaspati's equal in wisdom, deep as the ocean in character, calm and unshakable as Himavat, like Brahma himself in nobility, like the Sun in tejas; Bhishma who razes whole armies single-handedly, even as Indra does, has been made Senapati of the Kaurava army on the eve of the horrific war to be, the prospect of which makes the hair on men's bodies stand on end, until death strips him of the command, what did Pandu's mighty-armed son, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja say? What did Bhima and Arjuna say? And what did Krishna say?"

Vaisampayana said, "When the news reaches him, Yudhishtira calls his brothers and Krishna to him.

He says calmly, 'Make your rounds among the men and take precautions by putting on your armour. Our first encounter will be with our Pitamaha. Inform the leaders of our seven akshauhinis.'

Krishna says, 'Bharatarishabha, let it be as you say. I approve. Let us summon the seven lords of our akshauhinis'

Yudhishtira summons Drupada, Virata, Satyaki bull of the Sini vamsa, Dhrishtadyumna prince of the Panchalas, Dhrishtaketu, Sikhandin, and Sahadeva lord of the Magadhas, all of whom are eager for battle. Dhrishtadyumna, born from a sacrificial fire, is Senapati of the Pandava forces, the Panchala prince born to kill Drona. Yudhishtira sets Arjuna, of the curly hair, at the head of the other seven commanders, and gives Krishna charge of being Arjuna's sarathy and guide.

Upon learning that the war of the age is at hand, many other kings come to the Pandava encampment to support them: Halayudha with Akrura, Gada, Samba, Uddhava, Rukmini's son Pradyumna, Ahuka's sons, Charudeshna and more. Mighty-armed and handsome Balarama arrives, surrounded by the foremost Vrishni warriors, who resemble a herd of mighty tigers, and he looks like Indra in the midst of the Maruts. He arrives in his lion's gait, wearing his customary blue silken robes, the corners of his eyes red from drink, and looking like the peak of Mount Kailasa.

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, Krishna of matchless effulgence, Vrikodara of terrible deeds, Arjuna wielder of Gandiva and all the other kings there rise from their places and offer worship to Balarama; and Yudhishtira touches his hands lovingly in greeting. Rama, in return, greets them all, with Krishna at their head and, respectfully saluting Virata and Drupada, he sits beside Yudhishtira on the same seat.

After the other kings have resumed their seats, Rohini's son Rama looks at Krishna and begins to speak.

He says, 'This great and brutal slaughter is inevitable. It is fate's decree, and it cannot be averted. I hope to see all of you, with your friends, come safely and uninjured out of this war. Without doubt, all the Kshatriyas of the world who are assembled here have reached the end of their days. This war without precedent, this war like no other will cover the Earth with flesh and blood.

Many times I said to Krishna, "Madhusudana, be impartial to all that are related to us in the same way. As are the Pandavas to us, so is Duryodhana. Give Dhritarashtra's son the same help you do Yudhishtira. Indeed, he always asks for it."

However, for your sake, Krishna ignored what I said. For Arjuna's sake, he has devoted himself entirely to your cause. I am certain that a Pandava victory is what he wants. As for me, I dare not face the world without Krishna by my side. That is why I aspire to whatever Krishna seeks to achieve. However, Bhima and Duryodhana are both my disciples and I love them equally. Hence, I will go to the tirtha of the Saraswati to bathe, for I cannot be indifferent to the slaughter of the Kauravas.'

Mahabaho Balarama takes leave of the Pandavas and, preventing Krishna from following him, sets out on his journey to the sacred river."

Vaisampayana said, “At this time, there comes to the Pandava camp Bhishmaka’s son Rukmi, one of the most truthful men in the world. The Rajarishi Bhishmaka, also named Hiranyaroman, is Indra’s friend; he is the most illustrious of the descendants of Bhoja; and he is the ruler of the whole southern country. Rukmi was a disciple of that lion among the Kimpurushas, Drona, who lived on Gandhamadana Mountain. He learnt the entire astra shastra of four divisions from his guru, and also obtained the celestial bow Vijaya, which once belonged to Indra, and which is as powerful as the Gandiva and Krishna’s Saranga.

Three celestial bows were owned by the lords of heaven: Varuna owned the Gandiva, the Vijaya belonged to Indra, and Vishnu the Saranga; all of them struck fear in the hearts of enemy warriors. Indra’s son Arjuna had the Gandiva from Agni after he burnt down Khandava Vana, and Rukmi had the Vijaya from Drona. Krishna obtained the Saranga when he baffled the Asura Mura’s paasas, deadly nooses, slew that demon, and then vanquished Bhumi’s son Naraka Asura to recover Aditi’s jewelled earrings, sixteen thousand exquisite women and various jewels and gems of beauty and power.

Rukmi, who has the Vijaya, whose twang is like the roar of thunderclouds, comes to the Pandavas, and fills the universe with dread.

The heroic Rukmi was arrogant of his might and, unable to tolerate Krishna's abduction of his sister Rukmini during her swayamvara, he set out in pursuit, swearing that he would not return to his city without killing Krishna. With a large army of four kinds of forces, clad in beautiful mail and armed with every kind of weapon, and looking like the swollen Ganga, Rukmi went after Krishna.

When he overtook Krishna, despite the power of every punya that tapasya can possibly confer, Rukmi was routed. In shame, he did not to return to his capital Kundina, but built a great new city for himself in the very place where Krishna vanquished him, and he called it Bhojataka. He filled the city with innumerable soldiers, elephants and horses, and it became renowned throughout the world.

Now, this great Kshatriya and tejasvin enters the Pandava camp clad in mail, bearing many bows, lances, swords and quivers, and with an akshauhini of troops. He marches with his vast army under a flag as bright as the Sun, and comes haughtily before the Pandavas, expressing his wish to serve under Krishna's command. Yudhishtira comes forward and pays his respects, and the Pandavas worship him and praise him. He salutes them in return and rests for a while with his troops.

Then he addresses Arjuna grandly in the presence of the assembled Kshatriyas, saying 'If, Panduputra, you are afraid, I am here to support you in battle. Your enemies will not withstand me. No man in this world is my equal in prowess. I will slay whichever of your enemies you ask me to. I will kill Drona, Kripa, Bhishma or Karna. Let all the kings who are here step aside; I will annihilate all your enemies myself and make a gift of the Earth to you.'

When Rukmi says this in the presence of Yudhishtira, Krishna, their allied kings and all the others in the camp, Arjuna looks at Krishna and Yudhishtira and replies, smiling, 'Having been born into the Kuru vamsa, and especially being a son of Pandu; having had Drona for my guru and having Krishna for my ally; and having the bow Gandiva for my weapon, how can I be afraid?

O Kshatriya, when I fought the mighty Gandharvas to free Duryodhana, who was there to help me? When countless Devas and Danavas united against me in Khandava vana, who fought by my side? When I fought the Nivatakavachas and the Kalakeyas, who was my ally? When I fought countless Kurus outside Virata's city, who helped me in battle?

I, who have paid due obeisance to Rudra, Sakra, Vaisravana, Yama, Varuna, Pavaka, Kripa, Drona and Krishna before going to war; I, who wield the Gandiva; I, who have twin quivers that well with inexhaustible arrows and all the devastras to command, how can a man like me say to my father Indra, who wields the Vajra, words of shame: that I am afraid? Mahabaho, I am never afraid, nor have I any need of your help. Go away or stay; do as you please.'

Rukmi takes his ocean-like army and goes to Duryodhana. He says the same thing to Duryodhana, but that proud king spurns him scornfully, as the Pandavas did. Thus, two great Kshatriyas take no part in the war on Kurukshetra—Balarama and Rukmi.

After Rohini's son Rama has set out on his tirtha-yatra, after Bhishmaka's son Rukmi has left, the sons of Pandu sit together once more in consultation. Yudhishtira presides over this meeting attended by many kings, and that conclave dazzles like the sky spangled with stars with the Moon in their midst."

Janamejaya said, “O Brahmanarishabha, after the troops have been arrayed on Kurukshetra, what did the Kauravas do, impelled as they were by destiny?

Vaisampayana said, “O Bharatarishabha, when his troops have been arrayed, Dhritarashtra says to Sanjaya, ‘Come, Sanjaya, and tell me in the fullest detail all that is happening in the Kuru and Pandava camps. I am convinced that destiny reigns over effort, for, although I understand that this war will lead only to ruin, I cannot restrain my son, who rejoices in gambling and considers deceit to be wisdom. I understand all this, yet I can do nothing to prevent the slaughter that will be.

O Suta, I clearly see my son’s defects, but when I am with him my mind turns away from dharma. Sanjaya, what will be must be. To sacrifice of one’s body in battle is the duty of every Kshatriya, and it is praiseworthy.’

Sanjaya says, ‘What you say is true, but you cannot blame Duryodhana entirely. Listen to me, O king.

The man who comes to evil because of his own sins can never impute the fault to either time or the gods. The man who perpetrates great evil deserves to die. The sons of Pandu silently bore all the injuries inflicted on them during the game of dice, looking only to you for refuge, which you denied them.

Let me tell you now, Rajan, of the general carnage that stalks us close, the bloody massacre of horses, elephants and kings of measureless tejas. Listen patiently, wise one, to the destruction of the world as we know it that this war of wars will inexorably fetch; and the only conclusion you can come to is that man is never the agent of what he helplessly does, right or wrong.

Like a wooden puppet, man is not the doer. However, there are three differing opinions about this. Some say that God ordains everything; some say that we act out of free will; and some say that all our actions are a result of our past lives. Now hear about the evil that is upon us.'"

ULUKA DUTA GAMANA PARVA

"Sanjaya says, 'Rajan, after the great-souled Pandavas established their camp by the Hiranvati, the Kauravas too set up theirs. Duryodhana deployed his troops; he paid homage to all the kings on his side; he set up outposts and deployed soldiers in these to protect the camp. Then he summoned Karna, Dusasana and Sakuni. First he consulted with Karna and next with his brother Dusasana and Sakuni together. He summoned Uluka and spoke to him privately.

He said to Uluka, "O Uluka, you are the son of a master of dice. Go now to the Pandavas and Somakas and repeat what I say to Yudhishtira, in Krishna's hearing.

Say to him, 'The long awaited war between the Kurus and the Pandavas is at last upon us. The time has come, Kuntiputra, to make good the boasts you roared out with your brothers and Krishna, which Sanjaya repeated to me in the Kuru sabha. Now let us see you actually do everything you so glibly said you would.

How does your virtuous character allow you, with your brothers, the Somakas and the Kekayas, to fix your heart on a sinful war? How can you want the destruction of the very world when you should be the dispeller of all people's fears?

O Bharatarishabha, this is the sloka, which Prahlada chanted when the gods took his kingdom from him: O Devas, the man who always flies the flag of dharma, whose sins are hidden, is like the cat in this story. Listen to that excellent story Narada told my father.

O king, long ago, a wicked cat began to live on the banks of the Ganga, sitting still and with his arms raised above his head in the way of a tapasvin. Wanting to lull the other creatures there into trusting him, he announced that he had indeed begun to practice tapasya and had purified his heart. In time, the birds in that place trusted him and came to praise him. Seeing the feathered ones come to worship him, the cat, bird-eater that he was, considered the reason for his tapasya already accomplished.

Time passed, and mice began to come there as well, and they too saw him as a virtuous creature practising tapasya. Firmly convinced of the cat's virtue, they, who had many enemies, decided to make the cat their matulan, their maternal uncle, and ask his protection for the young and old of their kind.

They went to the cat and said, "With your grace, we want to live our lives happily and without fear. You are our friend, and we place ourselves under your protection. You are devoted to dharma and always engaged in acquiring punya. Wise One, protect us in the same way as Indra Vajradhari does the Devas."

The cat answered the mice, "I do not see how my tapasya and this protection you ask for are connected. However, I am your well-wisher and I cannot refuse what you ask. All of you must obey me and do what I say. My tapasya has weakened me I and cannot move from where I sit. Everyday, you must carry me to the river for my ablutions."

The mice agreed and sent all their old and young ones to attend on the cat. That sinful feline began feeding on the mice and became fat, healthy and strong. The mice reduced in numbers, while the cat grew fatter daily. One day, all the mice met together and remarked that their uncle grew fatter by the day, while their numbers decreased.

A wise mouse called Dindika told his entire tribe to go to the riverside together and said that he would follow with their uncle the cat. They did as Dindika said, for his words seemed grave and important to them. The cat knew nothing of this and ate Dindika that day.

When Dindika did not appear at the river, the worst suspicions of the other mice were confirmed. A very old mouse called Kilika said to them, "Our uncle, the cat, does not really want to acquire punya. He is a hypocrite, and pretends to be our friend while he is really our enemy. The excreta of a creature that lives only on fruit and roots never contains hair or fur; and look how he grows fatter by the day, and our numbers dwindle. We have not seen Dindika for eight days."

The mice fled in all directions and the cat went back to where he had first come from.

Sinful Yudhishtira, you are like that cat. You treat your kinsmen in the same way as the cat did the mice. You have honeyed words of dharma on your lips, but your actions are a sinner's. Your devotion to the shastras and your mildness is only for show. You are no Brahmana. Stop your hypocrisy, O king, and be a Kshatriya; and you might deserve to be called Dharmaraja.

Win the Earth through your prowess and give gifts to Brahmanas and offerings to your Pitrs, as you ought. Look to the welfare of your mother, whom you have distressed for many years; dry her tears and honour her with victory over your enemies in war. You have humbly asked for only five villages, and we refused even that. All we wanted was to anger you sons of Pandu and provoke a war.

Remember that we dismissed the cowardly, treacherous Vidura because of you; remember, also, how we tried to burn you alive in the house of lac; at least now, be a man and fight, as you told Krishna you would when he set out from Upaplavya for the Kuru sabha. You sent a message to us through him, telling us that you are prepared both for peace or for war. The time for war has come, Yudhishtira, and I am ready for it. What better way is there for a Kshatriya to acquire punya than battle?

You were born a Kshatriya; your fame has spread across the world; you have got weapons from Drona and Kripa; why then, Bharatarishabha, do you depend on Krishna, who is not in any way better than you by birth, as a Kshatriya, or in might?"

Uluka, in the presence of the Pandavas say to Krishna, "For your own sake, as well as for the Pandavas, face me in battle as best you can. Use your powers of maya and take the form which you took in the Kuru sabha and, with Arjuna, fight me. A conjuror's tricks can be frightening but only provoke rage in the man who stands ready for war. I, too, can use maya, sorcery, to fly into the sky, to plunge into the bowels of the Earth, to ascend into Indraloka and to assume many forms. However, it is not by terrifying another that a man attains his goal. The Creator brings all creatures under his control by the power of his will alone, and not by conjuring tricks.

You say that you will confer absolute sovereignty on the sons of Pritha by annihilating Dhritarashtra's sons in battle. Sanjaya brought me this message from you. You also said that when we declare war against Arjuna, it will also be against you. Keep your word now and put forth all your might for the Pandavas. Show us that you can be a man.

The man, who knows his enemy's faults and, using his manliness, makes them suffer, is truly a man. Your fame in the world is unjustified. The truth will soon be known that there are those in the world who appear to be manly but are really eunuchs. You were Kansa's slave, and it does not befit me as a king to don armour to fight you."

O Uluka, next give this message to that stupid, ignorant and gluttonous Bhimasena, who is like a bull without horns, a bullock even. Say to him, "Prithaputra, you became a cook and called yourself Ballava in Virata's city, because of what I did to you. Let the vow you swore before me in the Kuru sabha not be a lie. Drink Dusasana's blood if you dare. You have often boasted that you will kill all Dhritarashtra's sons in battle. The time has come to make good that boast. Bhaarata, you always deserve to be plied amply with food and drink, but there is a great difference between cooking food and fighting a war. Fight now; be a man. You will lay down your life and fall on the field, clutching your mace. And all your boasts in the Kuru sabha shall be proved vain, Vrikodara."

Then, Uluka, say to Nakula, "Fight us, Bhaarata; we want to see your manliness, your reverence for Yudhishtira and your hatred for me. Remember all the suffering that Draupadi has endured."

Next, say to Sahadeva in the presence of the assembled monarchs, "Fight now, to the best of your little prowess. Remember all your sorrows and meet us on the field."

Then say to Virata and Drupada, "Since the beginning of time, slaves, however accomplished, have never fully understood their masters; nor have wealthy kings been able to understand their slaves. Possibly, you pit yourselves against me assuming that I have done nothing praiseworthy. Unite now and fight to kill me; do your utmost to accomplish your goal, which is the same as the Pandavas'."

Say to Dhrishtadyumna prince of the Panchalas, "Your time has also come, and your end is near. When you face Drona in battle, you will discover the harsh truth. Yet, fight for your friends, your kinsmen, and die trying to accomplish the impossible."

Next, Uluka, say to Sikhandin, and emphasise these words, “Gangaputra Bhishma, foremost of all bowmen, will not kill you, since you became a woman once. So fight fearlessly and put forth your best in battle. We want to see your prowess.”’

Duryodhana laughs aloud and continues, saying to Uluka, ‘Address Arjuna once more, in Krishna’s hearing. Say to him, “Kshatriya, either vanquish us and rule the world, or submit to us and lay down your life on the field of war. Remember how you suffered when you were banished from the kingdom; recall the sorrows you endured whilst you lived in the forest; remember Krishnaa’s torment; and be a man, Pandava. The time has come to fulfil the purpose for which a Kshatriya woman gives birth to a son.

Display your might in battle; show us your tejas, your courage, your manliness, your dexterity and speed with weapons; appease your wrath. Is there a Kshatriya whose heart would not have broken had he been driven from his kingdom, as you have, tormented with grief and despondent in long exile? Is there a man born into a noble house, who is brave and not covetous of another’s wealth, who would not be enraged when his ancient kingdom, handed down through the generations, is attacked and seized?

Translate your lofty speeches into deeds. Good men regard the man who boasts without doing anything as worthless. Recover your kingdom and your wealth, which are now in the hands of your enemies. These are the twin objectives of a Kshatriya who wants war; so, Dhanajaya, show us your might.

We defeated you at a game of dice and we dragged Krishnaa into the sabha. This alone should have been enough fuel to ignite the wrath of a real warrior. You have spent twelve long years in the forests, exiled from your home; and you have spent a year in Virata’s service. Remember the pangs of banishment, the hardships of your life in the vana, the torment that Draupadi has suffered, and show yourself to be a man. Vent your righteous anger on those who spoke cruel words to you and your brothers, for this is the way of a Kshatriya.

Express your rage; display your might and your knowledge; show us your lightness of hand. Fight, Kaunteya, and prove your manhood. You have invoked your astras; the field of Kurukshetra has been cleared; your horses are strong and fleet; your soldiers have received ample wages. With Krishna as your sarathy, fight us.

Why do you brag even before you have encountered Bhishma in battle? You are like the fool who boasts of scaling the summit of Gandhamadana before beginning to climb it. How can you eye your kingdom without defeating the invincible Karna, or Salya, or Drona that mightiest of Maharathas, our Acharya who is Indra's equal in battle? How vain is your fond desire to conquer the effulgent Drona, commander of armies, teacher of the Vedas and archery, master of both bodies of knowledge, open and hermetic, foremost in the arts of war, unshakeable as a mighty tower, whose strength knows no diminution. It is like dreaming of the wind moving Mount Meru! If what you wish for does come to pass, the wind will blow Sumeru away, heaven will fall to the Earth and the yugas will change their order and duration.

Which man, Arjuna or anyone else, could hope to escape with his life if he dares fight Drona? What man who walks the Earth could escape alive after facing Drona and Bhishma's arrows in battle? Like a frog in a well, you do not see the vastness of the mighty armies of the countless kings who are with me, the armies that look like the celestial host, and which they protect just as the Devas do their forces. This army is ready for war and as difficult to ford as the Ganga; the kings of the East, the West, the South and the North lead it; as do the Kambojas, the Sakas, the Khasas, the Salwas, the Matsyas, the Kurus of the middle country, the Mlechchas, the Pulindas, the Dravidas, the Andhras and the Kanchis.

Foolish Arjuna, how can you dare fight against me when I, Duryodhana, stand in the midst of my elephant legion? We will test your inexhaustible quivers, your chariot that Agni gave you and your ape banner. Do not brag, Arjuna, come and fight. Why so much vaunting? Victory in battle comes from fighting, never from vainglorious boasting. If boastfulness could indeed garner success, all men would achieve their objectives, for who is there that cannot boast?

I know that you have Krishna for your ally. I know that your Gandiva is six cubits long. I know that there is no warrior equal to you. Yet, despite all this, I still hold your kingdom. A man can never win success merely by virtue of his lineage. It is Brahma alone who, if he wills it, can turn the tide of misfortune. For the past thirteen years, I have enjoyed sovereignty while you wept. I will kill you, your brothers and your kinsmen and continue to do so.

Where was your Gandiva when you were put up as a stake in the dice game and we won you for a slave? What happened to Bhima's might then? Your deliverance came neither from Bhimasena armed with his mace, nor from you with your Gandiva, but from the faultless Draupadi. It was the daughter of Prishata's house who rescued you all who had been bound in slavery to work as menials. You were all like de-husked sesame seeds, and covered by nothing but shame.

Partha, did you not later wear a woman's braid whilst living in Virata's city, and was Bhima not exhausted by cooking in Virata's kitchens? Is this what you call manliness or being a Kshatriya? Arjuna, you became a eunuch, covered yourself in hip- and waist-chains, braided your hair and taught young girls to dance. All from fear of fighting us. This is how Kshatriyas punish lesser Kshatriyas.

I will not give up my kingdom out of fear of you or of Krishna. Fight, with Kesava as your ally. Neither deception, nor conjuror's tricks, nor jugglery can frighten the Kshatriya who is armed for battle. Instead, these pretty tricks will only provoke his wrath. A thousand Krishnas and a hundred Arjunas will fly from me in panic and in all directions. Encounter Bhishma in war; you will find it is like butting the hill with your head or swimming across the vast, deep sea.

My army is like the ocean; Saradwata's son is its sharks, Vivimsati its huge snake; Bhishma is its immeasurably powerful tide, Drona as its unconquerable alligator; Karna and Salya are its fish and whirlpools, the king of Kambojas is the badavamukha, the horse-headed creature that spits fire from his mouth; Brihadbala is its fierce waves, Somadatta's son its whale, Yuyutsu and Durmarshana its waters, Bhagadatta its wind; Srutayus and Hridika's son is its gulfs and bays, Dusasana its current; Sushena and Chitrayudha are its hippopotami and crocodiles, Jayadratha its submarine rocks; Purumitra its deeps and Sakuni its shores!

Plunging into this surging ocean with its inexhaustible waves of weapons, you will see all your relatives and friends killed, and you will repent. Then your heart will turn away from the thought of ruling the Earth, like the heart of a sinful man turning away from hope of heaven. Indeed, for you to win a kingdom is as impossible as for one without tapasya punya to attain Swarga," said Duryodhana to Uluka,' says Sanjaya."

"Sanjaya says, 'The gambler's son Uluka went to the Pandava camp and, presenting himself to the Pandavas, addressed Yudhishtira and said, "You know full well the role of envoys and how they speak. So you must not be angry with me for repeating Duryodhana's words exactly as he told me to."

Yudhishtira said, "You have nothing to fear, Uluka. Tell us without any anxiety what the greedy and short-sighted Duryodhana thinks."

In the midst of the illustrious Pandavas, the Srinjayas, of Krishna of the great renown, of Drupada and his sons, of Virata and of all the kings, Uluka delivered Duryodhana's message.

Sakuni's son said, "This is what the noble king Duryodhana, in the presence of all the Kuru heroes, instructed me to tell you. Listen to what he said, O Yudhishtira.

'We beat you at dice and dragged Draupadi into the sabha. Any real Kshatriya would be enraged at this. You were exiled to the forest for twelve years, and then lived for a year in Virata's service. Remember the reasons for your wrath—your exile, and our shaming of Krishnaa—and be a Kshatriya, O Pandava. Despite his weakened state, Bhima made a vow; now let him drink Dusasana's blood. You have worshipped your weapons and invoked the deities who preside over each of them. The field of Kurukshetra is clear; the roads are smooth and your horses are well-fed. Begin the battle tomorrow, with Kesava as your ally.

Why do you boast glibly without having faced Bhishma in battle? Like the fool who brags of his intention to climb Gandhamadana, without having set foot on it, you want sovereignty without having vanquished invincible Karna and Salya the mightiest of men, who is equal to Indra in combat.

Salya is a preceptor of the Vedas and archery, having attained the ultimate levels in both branches of learning. You wish, in vain, to vanquish the illustrious Drona, who fights from the front. He is infinitely strong, unshakeable. We have never heard of the mountains of Sumeru being stirred by the wind! But the wind will blow away Sumeru; Swarga will fall down on Bhumi and the very yugas will be reversed if what you said to me comes to pass. Could any man escape with his life after facing Parantapa Drona in war, even if he fought from on the back of an elephant, a horse, or from a chariot?

What creature that walks on Earth could escape with his life, if Drona and Bhishma attack him in battle and pierce him with their terrible arrows? You are like a frog in a well, that you do not see the awesome massed armies of kings, like the very host of the gods. My legions teem with the kings of the East, West, South and North; with Kambojas, Sakas and Khasas; with Salvas, Matsyas, Kurus of the middle country, Mlechchas, Pulindas, Dravidas, Andhras and Kanchis. Indeed, so many nations ready for battle are uncrossable like the swollen tide of Ganga. O, foolish cousin, how will you fight me when I take the field with my legion of elephants?'"

Having repeated Duryodhana's words to Yudhishtira, Uluka turned to Arjuna and delivered the message Duryodhana sent to him:

"'Arjuna, why do you brag so much? Fight, instead. Victory comes from deeds. A war is never won by boasts. If enterprises could succeed just by boasting, then all men would achieve their goals, for who cannot brag? I know that you have Krishna for your ally. I know that your Gandiva is six cubits long. I know that there is no warrior equal to you. Knowing all this, I still hold your kingdom. A man never wins success merely because of his lineage. It is the Supreme Ordainer alone who, by his will, turns hostility into friendship and subservience.

For the past thirteen years have I enjoyed sovereignty, while you were sunk in grief. And I shall continue to rule, after killing you and your people. Where was your Gandiva when you were made a slave won at dice? Where, Phalguna, was Bhimasena's might then? Your deliverance came neither from Bhimasena with his mace, nor from you with the Gandiva, but from the faultless Krishnaa. It was she, the daughter of Prishata's house, who delivered you all, who were bound to us in slavery. I think of you as husks, sesame seeds without kernels, eunuchs. Did you not wear a braid while living in Virata's city? Bhimasena tired himself out, working as a cook in Virata's kitchens. Is this evidence of your manliness, Kuntiputra? To avoid facing me in battle, you braided your hair and taught girls how to dance. This is how Kshatriyas punish Kshatriyas.

I will not give up the kingdom, Arjuna, from fear of Krishna or of you. Fight us, with him as your ally. Neither deception, nor conjuror's tricks, nor jugglery can affright a Kshatriya armed for battle; on the contrary, these only ignite his wrath. A thousand Krishnas and a hundred Arjunas will fly from me in all directions. Encounter Bhishma in combat; it is like shattering the mountains with your head. Penetrate my army; it is like swimming across the vast and deep ocean. My army is a veritable ocean; Saradwata's son is its large fish, Vivimsati its smaller fish, Brihadbala its waves, Somadatta's son its whale, Bhishma its mighty current, Drona its unconquerable alligator, Karna and Salya its fish and whirlpools, Kamboja its horse's head vomiting fire, Jayadratha its submarine rock, Purumitra its depth, Durmarshana its waters and Sakuni its shores.

When, having plunged into this swelling ocean with its inexhaustible waves of weapons, you wilt from fatigue and have all your relatives and friends slain, then repentance will grip your heart. Then your heart will turn away, Partha, from the thought of ruling the Earth, like the heart of a sinner giving up hope of heaven. Indeed, for you to win a kingdom to rule is as impossible as for a man without any tapasya to attain Swarga,'" said Uluka,' says Sanjaya."

"Sanjaya says, 'O Rajan, Uluka repeated these words to Arjuna, provoking him who is like a venomous snake further. The haughty, scornful message Uluka brought goaded the already incensed Pandavas beyond endurance.

They began to flex their mighty arms and, truly like angry cobras, looked at one another, fire in their eyes. Bhimasena, with his head bent down and his breath hissing like a great hamadryad's, turned his blood-red eyes to look at Krishna. Krishna saw how Bhima suffered and spoke to Uluka.

He said, "Go now, Uluka, and tell Duryodhana that we have heard and understood his words. Let it be as he wishes."

Having said this, Krishna looked once more at the wise Yudhishtira. Then in the presence of all the Srinjayas, of Draupadi, of Drupada and his sons, of Virata and of all the other kings, Uluka yet again repeated what he had already said to Arjuna, like prodding a great and already furious serpent with a stick.

And he repeated the same message again to Krishna and the others.

Arjuna's mighty body quivered with rage, and sweat beaded his brow. The kings saw him like that and were afraid; and the Pandavas' Maharathas were greatly agitated to listen repeatedly to Duryodhana's mocking message. They were all men of firm equanimity, but now they burned with anger. Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandin, Maharatha Satyaki, the five Kekaya brothers, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, the sons of Draupadi, Abhimanyu, Dhrishtaketu, Bhimasena and the twins jumped up from where they sat, their eyes crimson, swinging their splendid arms that were decked with red sandalwood-paste and golden ornaments. Knowing what was in their hearts, as Bhima sprang up he gnashed his teeth and wet the corners of his mouth with his tongue. Beside himself with anger, he clenched his huge fists and, turning his furious gaze on Uluka, spoke to him.

He said menacingly, "Fool, we have heard Duryodhana's vile message, sent to taunt us. Now listen to what I say, and, in the hearing of the Suta's son and your black-hearted father Sakuni, repeat it to Duryodhana, who stands protected in the midst of his many Kshatriyas. Say to that sinner from me:

'We always want to please our elder brother. That is why we tolerated everything you did to us. Do you not see this as being fortunate for you? It was for only the good of our entire vamsa that Yudhishtira Dharmaraja sent Krishna to the Kurus to try and make peace. But fate drives you to long for death. Come, fight us! Tomorrow, there will be war. I have sworn to kill you and your brothers. Sinful fool, do not have the slightest doubt that I will fulfil my vow.

Varuna's abode, the ocean, might suddenly flood the continents; and the mountains might split open, but what my oath will never prove false. Even if Yama, Kubera, or Rudra himself helps you, the Pandavas will still accomplish what they have sworn to do. I will drink Dusasana's blood as I have sworn. I vow that I will kill any Kshatriya who comes to me in anger, even if he comes with Bhishma himself before him. All I have said in the Kuru sabha will come to pass. This I swear by my very soul.'"

When Bhima finishes, Sahadeva, whose eyes have also turned red as plums, spoke before the assembled forces, in the ringing voice of a great, proud Kshatriya.

He said to Uluka, "Listen well, sinner, to what I say, and convey this message to your father:

'No difference would ever have arisen between us and the Kurus, if Dhritarashtra had not befriended you. You were born an embodiment of dissent and to be the instrument of the destruction of Dhritarashtra's vamsa and of the whole world.'

O Uluka, from the time we were born your evil father always tried to do us injury. I will cross the sea of malice and first kill you before his eyes, and then kill him in the sight of all the warriors."

Hearing Bhima and Sahadeva, Arjuna smiled and said to Bhima, "Bhimasena, those who have incited your enmity will not live. Even if they think they are safe in their homes now, they will surely be caught in death's meshes. My brother, Uluka does not deserve to be spoken to harshly. What is his fault, who is only a messenger, and merely repeats what he has been instructed to say?"

Then Arjuna Mahabaho addressed his allies and well-wishers, led by Dhrishtadyumna, saying, "You have heard the foul message of the sinful son of Dhritarashtra, sent to insult Krishna and especially me, and you are full of anger because you wish us well. Before Krishna's might and yours, all the Kshatriyas of the Earth together, count for nothing. With your leave I will give Uluka a response to his message, to take back to Duryodhana:

'When tomorrow comes, I will keep myself at the head of my legions, and answer to your vile message with the Gandiva, for it is only eunuchs who respond in words:'"

And all the kings applauded Dhananjaya. Now Yudhishtira Dharmaraja spoke respectfully to the friendly kings, to each according to his age and as befitted his rank; and, finally, to Uluka he gave this message for Duryodhana.

Yudhishtira said, "No good king should patiently bear an insult. I have heard what you had to say; this is my reply."

Bharatottama, in response to Duryodhana's message Yudhishtira, eyes red with rage, breath hissing like a serpent's, tongue wetting the corners of his mouth, and trembling with anger, looked at Krishna and his brothers and spoke both gently and strongly to Uluka.

Flexing his great arms, he said to the gambler's son, "Go, Uluka, and say to Duryodhana, that ungrateful, evil embodiment of violence, that wretch of his race:

"Malignant one, you always hated us Pandavas and treated us with deceit. The man who relies on his own strength, calls his enemies to battle, displays his prowess and makes good his boasts is a true Kshatriya. Be a Kshatriya and face us in war. Do not come to battle with those whom we revere at your head. Kaurava, rely on your own might and on that of your servants when you summon the sons of Pritha to war; be a Kshatriya in every way. He who declares war on his enemies, counting on the might of others, is a eunuch.

You think highly of yourself, but you rely on the might of others. Being so weak and incapable yourself, why do you roar at us so grandly?”

Krishna said, “O Son of Sakuni, take my words, as well, to Duryodhana:

‘When tomorrow the war dawns on you, show yourself to be a man, O evil one. You are foolish to think Krishna will not fight because the Pandavas have chosen him to be a charioteer; that is why you are fearless. But I say to you that if my anger is ignited, I will consume all the kings whom you have brought together, as fire burns a heap of straw. But since Yudhishtira commands me, I shall be a sarathy to Arjuna, and he alone will actually fight.

But hear me, sinner, even if you hide beyond the three worlds, or deep in the bowels of the Earth, you will, even there, see Arjuna’s chariot flying at you tomorrow. You think that Bhima’s boasts are empty, but know that Dusasana’s blood is already as good as drunk. Know also that, although you have said a lot, and so haughtily and mockingly, not Arjuna, Yudhishtira, Bhimasena or either of the twins thinks much of you.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Arjuna looked at Sakuni's son Uluka with angry red eyes, and then at Krishna and, raising his arms, he said to Uluka, "The man who challenges and fights his enemies fearlessly, relying on his own strength, is a Kshatriya. While the man who summons his enemies to battle, depending on the strength of others, is a disgrace to all Kshatriyas and is considered the lowest of men. Tell Duryodhana from me, again:

'Cowardice makes you use the strength of others as your own, and you depend on them to vanquish your enemies. You have given the command of your forces to Bhishma, who is the eldest of the Kshatriyas, who is devoted to dharma, who has his passions under control and who is wise; and by this you make him face certain death. And then you brag! We know that you assume that we Pandavas will not kill our Pitamaha. But, Duryodhana, Bhishma is the first man that I will kill, and in full view of both armies.'

Uluka, go back to the Bhaaratas and tell Duryodhana that I, Arjuna, say this to him: 'So be it. Tomorrow the great war will begin. Bhishma, of tireless might and devotion to truth, has already said to you that the task of destroying the Srinjaya and Salweya armies is his, and that he can kill anyone on Earth, excepting Drona; and that you need have no fear of the Pandavas. His assurances make you presume that the Pandavas will be easily vanquished and that you will become the undisputed sovereign of the world; and this fills you with pride. But what you will find is your own defeat and death.

First of all, I will slay Pitamaha Bhishma before your very eyes. At sunrise tomorrow come with your chariots and banners to protect your Senapati, who is firm in his resolve; and watch my arrows fell him, who is your refuge. Tomorrow, when you see our Pitamaha covered by my arrows, you will realise the difference between bragging and battle.

Duryodhana, very soon you will see Bhima fulfil the angry oaths he swore in the Kuru sabha to your bestial brother Dusasana. You will reap the terrible consequences of vanity, of wrath and cruelty, of arrogance and boastfulness, of vicious words and deeds, of adharma and sin, of speaking ill of others, of disobedience to elders, of prejudice and of all your vices.

O you scum of the Earth, how can you hope to live or keep the kingdom if I, with Krishna beside me, give rein to my anger? After Bhishma and Drona have been stilled, and after Karna is slain, you will have no hope of any kingdom, of your son's lives or your own worthless one. When you hear of the slaughter of your brothers and sons, and when Bhima strikes you a final, mortal blow, you will remember all your sins.'

Tell him, Uluka, that I make a vow only once. I swear that everything I have said will come to pass."

Now Yudhishtira said, "Repeat my words as well when you go to Duryodhana. Say to him:

'Do not judge me by your own dark nature and ways. We are as different as dharma and adharma. I never wish harm to even the smallest creatures, ants and other insects, let alone desire the massacre of my cousins. That is why I asked for just five villages. Why don't you see the horrific calamity that threatens you? Your soul is overwhelmed by greed and lust, and you boast from being deluded. And you ignore even Krishna's counsel. But the time for words is past; fight us with all your allies.'

Uluka, also say to the pathetic Kuru prince: 'I have heard and understood what you said. Let it be as you wish.'"

Then Bhimasena said, "Uluka, take my message to Duryodhana, who is an embodiment of sin.

Say to him: 'You are destined to find a home either in a vulture's belly or in Hastinapura. I will fulfil the vow I swore in the Kuru sabha. I swear in the name of Truth: I will kill Dusasana in battle and drink his blood. I will kill all your brothers and then smash your manhood, and you will die in agony. Know, Duryodhana—I am the nemesis of all Dhritarashtra's sons, and Abhimanyu will be the scourge of your younger princes. I will gratify you all with my deeds.

Duryodhana, when I have killed you and your brothers, I will kick your stamp on your head with my foot in the sight of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja.'"

Nakula said, "Uluka, tell Duryodhana that I have heard and understood everything he has said. Tell him that I will do exactly as he has asked me to."

Sahadeva said, "Tell Duryodhana for me: 'Your fond hopes will all prove vain. You will repent, with your sons, kinsmen and your friends, that you bragged in joyful anticipation of killing us.'"

The two old kings, Virata and Drupada, said to Uluka, "We are glad to serve a good man. Tomorrow we shall see who is the servant and who the master, and who will prevail in battle."

Now Sikhandin said to Uluka, "You must say to Duryodhana, who is addicted to sin: 'Watch helplessly, O king, my fierce deeds on the field. I will kill your grandfather, on whose prowess you depend for victory. I was created by Brahma to kill Bhishma, and I will do what I was born to in the sight of all your bowmen.'"

Dhrishtadyumna said to Uluka, "Say to Duryodhana: 'I will kill Drona with all his followers; this task is mine and no one else's.'"

Yudhishtira spoke again, noble and compassionate words: "'Rajan, I do not want the slaughter of my kinsmen, and everything that is now sure to happen is your fault. I have no choice but to sanction what all these great men around me will do.'

Now either go from here without delay, Uluka, or stay with our blessings; for we too are your kinsmen."

Uluka took leave of Yudhishtira and went back to Duryodhana, taking with him all that had been said; and when he came before Duryodhana, he repeated everything that Arjuna had told him to say. He faithfully delivered the messages that Krishna, Bhima, Yudhishtira, Nakula, Virata, Drupada, Sahadeva, Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin had given him; and then what Arjuna and Krishna had said later.

Duryodhana listened to Uluka, and he ordered Dusasana, Karna and Sakuni to array their own and the troops of the allied kings for war before dawn broke. At Karna's command, messengers mounted their chariots, camels and horses and rode through the camp, calling out, Into battle formations before sunrise!”

"Sanjaya says, 'After listening to Uluka's messages from Duryodhana, Yudhishtira also deployed his army led by Dhrishtadyumna and the others: the vast army of the four kinds of forces—infantry, elephants, chariots and cavalry—as awesome and immovable as the Earth herself. The Pandava army was protected by mighty Maharathas led by Bhima and Arjuna, and was like the ocean, immense, still and calm.

At the head of that sea-like force was the invincible bowman Dhrishtadyumna, prince of the Panchalas; and he chose Drona as his particular adversary and target. As Senapati, Dhrishtadyumna picked individual warriors from the enemy ranks and told his own warriors which one they would fight. He gave his chariot-warriors battle instructions, each according to his strengths.

He assigned Karna to Arjuna, Duryodhana to Bhima, Salya to Dhrishtaketu, Kripa to Uttamaujas, Kritavarman to Nakula, Jayadratha to Satyaki, and Bhishma to Sikhandin. He pitted Sahadeva against Sakuni, Chekitana against Sala, and the five sons of Draupadi against the Trigartas. He set Abhimanyu against Karna's son Vrishasena as well as against the rest of the kings, for he considered Abhimanyu superior to Arjuna himself in battle. He allocated responsibilities to his warriors, individually and collectively, and finally this Maharatha, brilliant as a blazing fire, reserved Drona for himself.

And having arrayed the Pandava troops and its maharathas, Dhrishtadyumna waited coolly for the war to begin, his mind firmly fixed on victory for the sons of Pandu.'"

RATHATIRATHA SANKHYANA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Dhritarashtra says, 'After Arjuna had sworn to kill Bhishma in battle, what did my evil sons, led by Duryodhana, do? Ah, I can already see the sure-handed Arjuna, with Krishna by his side, killing my uncle Bhishma. And what did that greatest Kshatriya Bhishma, who is immeasurably wise, say when he heard Partha's words? Having accepted the Kaurava command, what did that splendid warrior do?'

Sanjaya tells him everything that Pitamaha Bhishma said.

Sanjaya says, 'Rajan, having been given the command of the Kaurava force, Bhishma spoke words to Duryodhana that pleased him greatly.

Bhishma said, "I bow to Lord Kumara, Velayudha, bearer of the inexorable spear, Senapati of the armies of Devaloka and I gladly accept command of your army. I know about the affairs of state, about every kind of battle formation, and how to inspire fighting men to give their best efforts. I know as much about the deployment of the vyuhas of war and their strategic movements as Brihaspati himself. I know the methods of attack and defence that the Devas, Gandharvas and Manavas use; and with these I will confound the Pandavas. Dispel the fear in your heart. I will fight the enemy, whilst protecting your army, in keeping with the dharma of war. Cool the fever of your mind."

Duryodhana said, "O Gangaputra, Mahabaho, I do not fear the hosts of the Devas and Asuras combined; then how will I fear these Pandavas with you as my Senapati and with Drona beside you, fighting for me? With you both on my side I will surely win this war; why, I could I could even win sovereignty over the gods.

But tell me, Pitama, who amongst our warriors we count as a Ratha and who as an Atiratha. Pitamaha, you know the strengths of every warrior on both sides. I want to hear what you think with all these kings present."

Bhishma said, "Listen, Rajarajan, and I will tell you who the Rathas and Atirathas in your army are. In your legions are many millions of Rathas, but I will name the main ones. Firstly, there is you. Amongst your brothers, including Dusasana, you are the foremost of all the Rathas. All of you are skilled fighters, experts at attacking and destroying chariots. You are all great charioteers when you take the reins of the sarathy, and expert elephant-riders, as well. You are all doughty mace-fighters, excellent archers and swordsmen; you also wield impenetrable shields. You are learned in the astra shastra and ably discharge your duties. You are all Drona's and Kripa's disciples in archery and at others weapons. In the coming war, the mighty sons of Dhritarashtra will put forth their prodigious energy to destroy the irresistible Panchalas.

Next come I, the Senapati of your troops. I will vanquish the Pandavas and extirpate the enemy forces. It does not become me to speak of my own strengths, but I believe you know me well.

One of the finest among all warriors is Raja Kritavarman of the Bhojas. He is an Atiratha, and he will accomplish your goal in battle. No man, not the most skilled warrior, can overcome him. Shooting or hurling his weapons to great distances, and a master swordsman in close combat, he will raze the enemy ranks, just as Indra did the Danava hordes.

The lord of the Madras, the mighty Salya, is an Atiratha. He considers himself equal to Krishna in every battle he fights. He has deserted his sister's sons to take your side. In this war he will decimate the Maharathas of the Pandava army with tidal waves of arrows.

The great archer Bhurisravas, the son of Somadatta, is an Atiratha and one of your sincerest friends. He has overall command of the heads of all our chariot divisions. He will wreak havoc among the enemy and swiftly reduce their numbers.

Jayadratha king of the Sindhus is, in my opinion, equal to two Rathas. That best of chariot-warriors will display his prowess in battle. He still smarts from the humiliation the Pandavas meted out to him when he abducted Draupadi. He practised severe tapasya and obtained a boon most difficult to acquire, one he will use while fighting the Pandavas themselves. Harbouring his old hatred, he will fight, reckless of his life, which is well nigh impossible to take anyway.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "Sudhakshina, king of the Kambojas, is equal to one Ratha. He wants your victory, and he will fight boldly against your enemies; and the Kauravas will see that the prowess of this lion amongst Maharathas as he fights for you is equal to Indra's. His Kamboja force of fierce chariot-warriors will swarm over the battlefield like locusts.

Then there is Nila of Mahishmati, clad in blue mail; he is one Ratha. With his chariot army he will bring bloody havoc to your enemies. He detests Sahadeva and will fight loyally for you. The princes Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti are powerful and seasoned warriors; they are two Rathas. These two will consume the enemy's troops with maces, feathered arrows and swords, with spears and javelins. Lusting for battle, these Kshatriyas will range across the battlefield like bull elephants sporting in the midst of a herd, each of them looking like Yama.

The five princely Trigarta brothers are, in my judgment, the best of Rathas. Pritha's sons provoked enmity with them outside Virata's city. Like great crocodiles churning the stream of the Ganga into high crested waves will they agitate the ranks of the Pandavas in battle. All five are Rathas, with Satyaratha being the first among them. They still remember the shame that Arjuna inflicted on them, many years ago, when he swept through the land with his white horses, on his campaign to subjugate all the kings of the Earth. They will give their all and, having already fought many of the leading Pandava warriors in the past, they will surely slay them now.

Your son Lakshmana and Dusasana's son are both tigers among men and unwavering in battle. In the prime of youth, of lithe limbs, and endowed with powerful energy, these two princes are expert warriors and could well lead all the Kuru chariots. I believe they are our two best Rathas and devoted to Kshatriya dharma. They will achieve great feats.

Dandadhara is equal to a single Ratha. Guarded by his own soldiers, he will fight for you. Raja Brihadbala of the Kosalas, who is blessed with mighty tejas and strength, is equal to one Ratha. A fierce fighter, this great bowman is devoted to the Dhartarashtra cause, and will exert himself powerfully in battle, to the joy of his friends.

Saradwata's son Kripa is a commander of leaders of chariot forces. Uncaring of his life, he will consume your enemies at will. Kripa, who was born in a clump of heath as the son of Mahamuni Saradwata, also called Gautama, is as invincible as Kartikeya. Burning numberless warriors with all kinds of astras, he will rage across the field like a blazing fire.'""

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "Your uncle Sakuni is equal to one Ratha. Being the cause of the hostilities with the sons of Pandu, he will definitely fight. His troops are irresistible when they charge the enemy and are armed with arsenals of all kinds of weapons; and they are as swift as the wind.

Drona's son Aswatthama is superior to all other archers. He is a profound knower of the astra shastra and his weapons are inexorable. He is a great Maharatha. Like Arjuna's arrows shot from the Gandiva, Aswatthama's shafts fly in an unbroken line, touching one another. This best among Rathas, whom I cannot laud enough, can consume the three worlds, if he sets his mind to it. He has performed austere tapasya and augmented his fury and energy. Brilliant is his intellect, and Drona has favoured his son with the gift of devastras.

However, Aswatthama has one great defect, and for that I do not consider him a Ratha or an Atiratha: he loves his life too much, and holds it too dear. Yet, there is not a man amongst the warriors of both armies who is his equal.

From a single chariot he can put the army of the Devas to rout. So powerful is his powerful body, that he can rive mountains merely by slapping his bowstring on the leather sleeve of his arm. Blessed with countless exceptional qualities, Drona's son of fierce effulgence will range over the battlefield, as irresistible as Yama with his mace. Lustrous Aswatthama of the lion's neck will extinguish your enemies like the fires of the pralaya do at the end of a yuga.

His father Drona is endowed with great tejas, though old, he is superior to any younger man. He will perform great deeds in battle; of this I have no doubt. Standing immovable on the field, he will burn Yudhishtira's troops with many fires. The Pandava army will be the dry grass and fuel in which those fires will be sparked, and the power of Drona's weapons will be the wind that fans it into mighty flames. This bull among men is a leader of Maharathas. The son of Bharadwaja will achieve astounding feats for you.

The venerable Acharya Drona, guru of all the royal Kshatriyas, will exterminate the Srinjayas. However, he loves Dhananjaya and, remembering the remarkable virtues Arjuna has acquired, and remembering that Arjuna is his most beloved disciple, he will never be able to bring himself to kill him. Indeed, Drona always prides himself on Arjuna's accomplishments, and looks on him with more affection than on his own son. Otherwise, such is his prowess that he can, from a single chariot, vanquish all the Devas, Gandharvas and Manavas united together, with his devastras.

Narashardula Paurava is one of your finest Maharathas, and he can shatter the ranks of enemy chariots. He will attack the enemy from the front of his own large force and consume the Panchalas like fire burns dry grass.

Satyasravas, the son of Brihadbala, is equal to one Ratha. He will sear through your enemy's troops like Death himself. His men, wearing motley armour and armed with all manner of weapons, will spread across the field, killing all that stand against them.

Karna's son Vrishasena is one of your best chariot-warriors and is a Maharatha. He will devastate your enemy's forces.

Then there is the great tejasvin Jalasandha, and he is among your foremost Rathas. Born in Krishna's vamsa, he is always willing to give his life in battle. He is a true warrior and will scatter the enemy before him, whether from his chariot or elephant back. That best of kings is, in my judgment, a Ratha. He will fight a brutal battle, ready to surrender his life for your sake, and among his mighty legions, expert in all types of warfare, he will be fearless.

Brave and like Yama himself, Bahlika is an Atiratha. He rushes headlong into any encounter and never retreats. He will blow away any enemy in his path even like Vayu Deva.

Another router of hostile chariot divisions, Maharatha of wonderful feats in battle, is Satyavan. He knows no fear of war. He will fall like a blood-storm on those that stand on his way; and in the fierce press of battle he will achieve all that a Kshatriya should.

The lord of Rakshasas, the feral Alambusha, is a Maharatha. Remembering his old hatred of the Pandavas, he will kill a countless enemy fighters. He is the best of Rathas amongst all the Rakshasa warriors and, with his magical powers and his uncompromising enmity, he will be merciless on the field.

The great sovereign of Pragjyotisha, the powerful Bhagadatta, is the best of all elephant-warriors. Once, he and Arjuna fought for days on end, each avid for victory. Then, for the sake of his friendship with Indra, Bhagadatta made a treaty of peace with Indra's son. And during this war, that king will fight from his formidable elephant's back like Indra mounted on Airavata and fighting for the Devas.”””

"'Bhishma said, "The brothers Achala and Vrishaka are Rathas. They are invincible in battle and will raze your enemies. These Naravyaghras are the best of Gandharvas and never relinquish their anger. They are young, handsome and of unworldly prowess.

This brings me to your dearest, most devoted friend Karna, always so proud of his battle skills, and who constantly goads you into fighting the Pandavas. You have taken this braggart as your advisor, guide and friend and elevated him to too high a position. The arrogant fellow is neither a Ratha nor an Atiratha. Yet he is generous and, deprived of good sense, he gave away his natural coat of mail and his divine earrings, which made him invincible. Without his kavacha and kundala, because of his guru Parasurama's curse, as well as that of another Brahmana, he is merely an ardharatha, half a Ratha. When he faces Arjuna in battle, he will not escape with his life."

Hearing this, Drona said, "I agree with Bhishma. Karna boasts on the eve of every battle, and he has fled from every encounter. I judge him to be only half a Ratha because his generosity in giving away his kavacha and kundala was reckless and because of his brash and unrestrained ways."

Karna heard all this and his eyes widened in anger. He glared at Bhishma and said, "O Pitamaha, I am innocent, but your dislike for me makes you malign me as you please, with words like arrows at every step. I tolerate it for Duryodhana's sake. You calling me an ardharatha makes plain how worthless you think I am, why, as if I were a coward!

You, Gangaputra, are an enemy of the whole universe, especially of all the Kurus. But the king is unaware of this. What man but you, Bhishma, would seek to create envy and discord among us, to sap the united purpose and energy of these kings, all equals in rank and courage, as you do from your contempt for their great accomplishments?

Neither years, nor wrinkles, nor wealth, nor possession of friends would entitle a Kshatriya to regard himself as a Maharatha! It has been said that a Kshatriya acquires greatness only through might proven on the field, just as Brahmanas acquire eminence through superiority in their knowledge of mantras, Vaisyas through wealth and Sudras with age. Influenced by hatred and envy, and speaking loosely from malice and ignorance, you list Rathas and Atirathas, capriciously, according to your whim.

May you be blessed, Mahabaho Duryodhana; you be the true judge of this. Abandon the evil Bhishma, who wrongs you. Once seeds of discord are sown it is difficult to reunite warriors who have been divided by cunning comparisons. With some effort, your own army can be reunited in spirit, but it will be far more difficult to do the same with the armies from outside. Look how doubt has already raised its head in the hearts of your warriors. Bhishma subtly weakens us, even as we stand here, before the first arrow has been loosed in war. Besides, judging the true merits of Rathas is beyond Bhishma of the limited intellect.

Alone, I, Karna, will withstand the Pandava army. My every arrow is unerring and deadly; when they face me, the Pandavas and the Panchalas will fly in all directions, like oxen before a tiger.

Bhishma is old and twisted; he is not the one who should speak of battle or the dangers of war; he should not be the one to rely on for sage advice. Indeed, he is fated to be the first victim of destiny. He challenges the whole world, and deludes himself that no one else is a man or a warrior. It is true the shastras teach us to heed the elderly. But they do not mean those who are far too old, for they become children again.

Alone, I would extinguish the Pandava army. However, the fame of that feat will go to Bhishma. You have made him your Senapati, and recognition always belongs to the leader and not to those who fight under him. Rajan, as long as Bhishma lives I will not fight. After Bhishma falls I will fight all the enemy Maharathas together, and kill them all for you.”

Bhishma said, “I am about to assume the onerous burden of fighting Duryodhana’s war against the Pandavas. I have thought of this day for many years and now the time for this dreadful battle is upon us, I still would not have conflict between the Bhaaratas. It is you, Sutaputra, who were born for that vile task. It is fated; otherwise, old though I am and you young, I would quell your lust for war by taking your life.

Your guru, Jamadagni’s son Parasurama, could not do me the least injury with his unearthly astras; so what could you do? Good men do not approve of self-praise. O wretch of your vamsa, I speak like this because I am angry and I am sad.

From my lone chariot, I vanquished all the assembled Kshatriyas of the world at the swayamvara of the king of Kasi’s daughters and carried away those princesses. Alone, on so many fields, I stopped the charge of countless kings with their soldiers.

With you as an embodiment of violence, a great carnage is about to overtake the Kurus. Yes, Karna, strive to vanquish our enemies; be a man and fight Arjuna, whom you envy so much and never tire of challenging. Evil one, I want to see how you come out of that encounter alive.”

Duryodhana said to Bhishma, “Look at me, Gangaputra. The task we have at hand is dire and grave. Think earnestly of what is best for me. Both of you will render me great services. I want to hear now of the best of the enemy’s chariot-warriors, of their Rathas and Atirathas. I want to hear of the strengths and weaknesses of my enemies. When this night is over our great war will begin.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "I have told you who your Rathas, Atirathas and Ardharathas are. Listen now to who the Pandavas' Rathas and Atirathas are. If you truly wish to know, hear, with these kings, of the Rathas in the army of the Pandavas.

Yudhishtira himself, the son of Pandu and Kunti, is a mighty Ratha. Without doubt he will course unimpeded through the battlefield like a blazing fire.

Bhimasena is equal to eight Rathas; none can remotely match him with the mace or with arrows. With the strength of ten thousand elephants, and with his enormous pride, his might and energy are superhuman.

The two sons of Madri are both Rathas. In beauty they are like the twin Aswins, and they are blessed with mighty tejas. Stationed at the head of their divisions, they will remember the torment you inflicted on them and range the field like many Indras.

All the Pandavas have noble souls; they are tall like Sala trees, taller than other men by half a cubit; they are brave as lions and blessed with awesome prowess. Rajan, all of them have practised brahmacharya and other stern austerities; they are modest; they have tigerish strength; in speed, in smiting and crushing foes, they are more than human. During their campaign of universal conquest before the Rajasuya yagna, each of them vanquished many great kings. No other men can wield their weapons; no other men can even string their bows or heft their maces, let alone shoot their arrows.

In speed, in aim, in eating and in every sport they used to excel all of you even when you were all boys. With their prodigious might, they will exterminate this army. War with them is not desirable. Each of them, by himself, can slay all the kings of the Earth. You saw for yourself, Rajan, what happened during the Rajasuya yagna. Now they will remember Draupadi's sufferings and the abusive, vicious words you spoke after the game of dice, and they will come to war like so many Rudras.

As for Arjuna Gudakesa, of the reddish eyes, with Krishna as his sarathy, there is no warrior in either army who is remotely his equal. Let alone men, I have not heard of any among the Devas, Asuras, Uragas, Rakshasas and Yakshas, who has been born already or yet to be born, who can compare with him.

His chariot flies the banner of Hanuman; Krishna is his sarathy; Dhananjaya himself is the Kshatriya who fights from it; his bow is the Gandiva; his horses are as fleet as the wind; his unworldly coat of mail is impenetrable; his two quivers are inexhaustible; he has obtained his astras from Indra, Rudra, Kubera, Yama and Varuna; and his chariot bears maces of dread and all sorts of other astras, including the Vajra.

What warrior can equal Arjuna, who killed a thousand Danavas in Hiranyapura from his lone chariot? Inflamed with wrath, his prowess beyond your imagination, this Mahabaho will raze your army even as he protects his own legions.

Dronacharya and I, with no third warrior, can stand against Dhananjaya's arrow storms for a time. Yet, when this son of Kunti comes to war, with Krishna seated before him, his gales of astras will not cease, but blow like monsoon winds. He is masterly and young, while Drona and I are both old and worn; we will not last against Nara and Narayana."

Listening to Bhishma, and now vividly remembering, with a trembling heart, the valour of Pandu's sons, and thinking of the war as if it was already happening before their eyes, the kings' great arms, decked with bracelets and smeared with sandal-paste, seemed to hang limp, sapped of their strength,' says Sanjaya."

"''Bhishma said, "Draupadi's five sons are Maharathas. Virata's son Uttara is among the best Rathas. The mighty-armed Abhimanyu is a commander of the leaders of their chariot divisions; this youthful Parantapa is Arjuna or Krishna's equal. Gifted with marvellous lightness of hand, and steeped in the ways of the astra shastra and every kind warfare, he has untold energy and is firm in his vratas. He will remember his father's agonies and put forth all his valour.

Brave Satyaki of the Madhu vamsa is also a commander of leaders of chariot divisions. Foremost among the Vrishnis and of towering wrath, of fear he knows nothing. Uttamaujas is also a magnificent chariot-warrior, as is Yudhamanyu. All the kings own many thousands of chariots, elephants and horses, and they will fight, uncaring of their lives, to please Kunti's sons. They will unite with the Pandavas and sweep through your troops like fire and wind, burning through and scything down all warriors that confront them.

Virata and Drupada, bulls among men, are both blessed with awesome prowess. Both are Maharathas. Though old, they are devoted to Kshatriya dharma, and will give their utmost in battle. Because of their relationship to the Pandavas, the energy of these two great bowmen will only swell in tide. Men become heroes or cowards by the righteousness of their cause.

Motivated by a singleness of purpose, both these aged kings will lay down their lives to destroy your troops. Fiery in battle, leading great akshauhinis, these most noble Kshatriyas will accomplish great and terrible feats, and justify both the confidence that the Pandavas have placed in them and their relationship with them.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "Sikhandin, scion of the Panchalas, is a subjugator of hostile cities and is among the foremost of Yudhishtira's Rathas. He will fight your troops to win great fame. He has a vast legion of Panchala and Prabhadraka troops to support him. With his hosts of chariots he will achieve dreadful feats.

Dhrishtadyumna, Senapati of Yudhishtira's army, disciple of Drona, is a Maharatha. He is an Atiratha. He will harry his foes and, by himself, sweep the field clean, as Mahadeva does the worlds with his Pinaka at the Pralaya. Great warriors will speak in awe of his oceanic chariot forces, which are like those of the Devas.

Dhrishtadyumna's son Kshattradharman is young and inexperienced, and so I consider him only half a Ratha. Sisupala's heroic son Dhrishtaketu, who is kin to Pandavas, is a mighty bowman and a Maharatha. This king of Chedis and his son will perform deeds of valour in battle that are difficult even for a Maharatha.

Kshattradharman is a conqueror of enemy cities, and he is devoted to Kshatriya dharma; and his son Kshattradeva is one of the best of the Pandavas' Rathas. Then there are the dauntless Panchala warriors—Jayanta, Amitaujas and the Maharatha Satyajit. They are all noble Maharathas and will fight like angry elephants. Aja and Bhoja are both Maharathas and will fight for the Pandavas. Both are gifted with uncanny lightness of hand; they use every manner of weapon and are exceptional warriors.

Five Kshatriya brothers, related to the Pandavas by blood, are almost impossible to defeat. They, too, fight with diverse weapons, and are skilful, fierce and unshakeable. These five who fly blood-red banners, Kasika, Sukumara, Nila, Sankha, also called Madiraswa, and Suryadatta, are incomparable Rathas.

Vardhakshemi is a Maharatha. Raja Chitrayudha is a superlative Ratha and, besides being an asset in battle, he is utterly devoted to Arjuna. The two Maharathas, Chekitana and Satyadhriti, are tigers among men and two of the Pandavas' unrivalled Rathas, as are Vyaghradatta and Chandrasena.

Senabindu, also named Krodhahantri, is a warrior equal to Krishna and Bhimasena; he will fight with formidable audaciousness. That best of kings is proud of his achievements in battle. You should think of him as you do of Drona, Kripa and me. Then there is Kasya, who is truly praiseworthy for his dexterity with every weapon. This subduer of hostile cities is equal to one Ratha.

Drupada's son Satyajit, though young in years, shows great prowess in battle, and he is equal to eight Rathas. He is Dhrishtadyumna's equal and, thus, an Atiratha. He will also accomplish great and savage deeds in battle in his eagerness to spread the fame of the Pandavas.

Devoted to Pandu's sons and brave beyond common ken is another great Ratha—Pandya, bowman of scintillating tejas. The superb archer Dhridadhanwan is a Maharatha; and Kurusattama Srenimat and Raja Vasudeva are both Atirathas.'''

"“Bhishma said, “Rochamanas is another Maharatha in the Pandava army. He will fight against us like a Deva. Bhima’s uncle Kuntibhoja is an Atiratha. He will fight with the same might as Indra did against the Danavas, and his renowned warriors are all accomplished and fearless. Devoted to his nephews, he will achieve extraordinary feats for their sakes.

Bhima and Hidimba’s son, the Rakshasa prince Ghatotkacha is gifted with powerful magical powers. He is a commander of the leaders of chariot-divisions. He revels in battle and, using maya, he and his feral Rakshasa legion will also fight without fear.

All these and many other kings, with Krishna at their head, have gathered to fight Yudhishtira’s cause. I have listed the main Rathas, Atirathas and Ardharathas of the Pandava army, and these will lead Yudhishtira’s fearsome legions, protected by Kiritin Arjuna. I will confront these warriors in battle, some of whom will fight with sorcery, and all of whom are fired by a consuming will to win the war; and I, too, am prepared for victory or for death.

I will ride against Krishna and Arjuna who, with the Gandiva and the Chakra, are like the Sun and the Moon shining together in the evening sky. I will face Yudhishtira’s other Maharathas and their swarming troops.

Duryodhana, I have named for you, in their order of importance, the Rathas, Atirathas and Ardharathas in your army and theirs. I will fight Arjuna, Krishna and all the other lords of Earth whom I encounter, but I will neither strike nor kill Sikhandin, prince of Panchalas, not if I see him rushing at me with his weapons raised.

The world knows how, to please my father, I renounced the kingdom I inherited and have lived as a brahmachari. I made Chitrangada king of the Kurus and the child Vichitravirya the Yuvaraja. I swore a pledge in the presence of all the kings of the Earth that I will never kill a woman or one who was once a woman. Sikhandin was a woman once. Born as a girl child, he later changed himself into a man. I will not fight against him.

Also, Rajan, although I will strike down all the other kings I meet on the battlefield, I could not kill the sons of Kunti.”””

AMBOPAKHYANA PARVA

"Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana said, "Why will you not kill Sikhandin even if you see him riding at you to take your life? You once told me that you would destroy the Panchalas and the Somakas; why now this reluctance, Gangaputra?"

Bhishma said, "Duryodhana, I will not kill Sikhandin, even if I meet him in battle. Hear why, you and all these other kings.

My father Santanu was renowned throughout the world. When that virtuous king died I crowned my brother Chitrangada king of the vast Kuru kingdom. On Chitrangada's death, in keeping with dharma and with Satyavati's acquiesance, I made Vichitravirya king. Vichitravirya was a mere boy then, and though I had invested him with sovereignty, I ruled in his name and he looked to me in all things.

When the time came, I wanted to him to wed and began to look for princesses from a royal house equal to our own. I heard that the three daughters of the king of Kasi, Amba, Ambika and Ambalika, of unrivalled beauty, were to hold a swayamvara, and that all the kings of the Earth had been invited. Amba was the eldest, Ambika the second and Ambalika the youngest. On a chariot, I rode on my own to the city of Kasi and saw the three girls clad in finery and bejewelled, and I saw all the kings who had been invited there.

Bharatarishabha, I seized the three princesses, lifted them into my chariot and said to the kings, I, Bhishma, son of Santanu, abduct these young women! O kings, do your best to rescue them. I am taking them away by force, with all of you as witnesses.

The kings sprang up and shouted to their sarathies to fetch their chariots. Those Kshatriyas rode after me in their rathas, with weapons unsheathed—chariot warriors looking like dark clouds massed; those mounted on elephants, and others on horseback. They surrounded me with countless chariots, but I vanquished them all, as Indra does Danava hordes.

Laughing, and easily, I cut down the kings' many-coloured flags embroidered with gold thread. I felled their horses, elephants and sarathies, each one with a single arrow. Seeing my lightness of hand, they stopped fighting and yielded. I returned victorious to Hastinapura and brought the young princesses to Satyavati, as brides for my brothers, telling her everything I had done.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "Coming before my mother Satyavati, a daughter of the dasa clan, I saluted her, the mother of heroes.

I said to her, I defeated all the kings and took these daughters of Kasi, who have their beauty as dowry, to be Vichitravirya's brides.

Rajan, Satyavati's eyes streamed tears as she sniffed my head in affection and she was joyous at my triumph. With Satyavati's approval the nuptials approached, when Amba, the Kasi king's eldest daughter spoke bashfully to me.

She said, 'Bhishma, you know dharma well and the shastras. Hear what I have to say and then do what you think is just. I had already chosen the king of the Salvas to be my husband before when you took me away from the swayamvara. He proposed to me privately, without my father's knowledge. Can you, O Bhishma of the Kuru vamsa, go against dharma by forcing someone who longs for another to live in your household? Bear this in mind and decide what you will do.

The king of the Salvas waits for me, and you must let me go to him. Be merciful to me, O most righteous of men. All the world knows of your devotion to dharma.'"'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "I shared what Amba told me with my mother Kali, otherwise called Gandhavati, as well as with our ministers and our priests, and we allowed the eldest princess Amba to leave. She went to the city of the Salva king with an escort of Brahmana elders and her own maid.

She went before the king and said, 'Mahabaho, I have come to you, take me for your wife.'

But the king of Salva laughed and said to her, 'Princess, you have already been taken by another, and I will not marry you. So, go back to Bhishma. He abducted you and I no longer desire you. When he defeated the other kings and took you away, you went happily. He humiliated and vanquished all the kings of the Earth, and I do not want another man's leavings. I am a king and a lawmaker, who knows the shastras; how will I take a woman already given into my home? Devi, go wherever you wish; do not waste your time here.'

Amba, who was struck by Kama Deva's subtle arrows, cried to Salva, 'Ah, do not say this, Rajan, for it is not true. Parantapa, I did not go happily with Bhishma. He seized me by force, defeated all the kings, and I wept the whole time. Accept me; I am innocent.

The shastras do not approve of a man abandoning one who loves him. I told Bhishma about our love, begging him to release me, and I have come to you with his leave. Besides, Bhishma does not want me for himself; it is for his brother that he abducted me. He has given my two sisters Ambika and Ambalika to his younger brother Vichitravirya. O lord of the Salvas, I swear on my very life that I have never thought of any man but you as my husband. I do not come to you as a betrothed woman. I speak the truth, Salva; I swear it on my soul.

Take me as a maiden who comes to you on her own, as one who is not promised to another, as one who asks for your grace.'

Although she spoke in this vein, Salva rejected the princess of Kasi, like a snake sloughing off his old skin. Although she entreated him repeatedly, the king of the Salvas would not relent. Then rage filled Amba and, her eyes streaming, she cried, 'You may have cast me out, Rajan, but righteous people will protect me wherever I may go, for truth is indestructible.'

This is how the lord of the Salvas spurned the princess, who pleaded with him and sobbed so piteously in grief.

The king of Salva said, 'Go, go! I am in terror of Bhishma, you of the lovely hips, and you are Bhishma's prize.'

"'"Bhishma said, "As she left the city, sobbing, Amba thought, 'There is no woman in the world in as miserable a plight as me. Without family or friends and cast out by Salva, I cannot return to Hastinapura after begging Bhishma to let me leave. Who can I blame—myself, or the invincible Bhishma, or my father who held a swayamvara for me?

Perhaps it is my own fault. I could have leapt off Bhishma's chariot when he fought the other kings, and gone to Salva then. My turmoil and anguish are because I did not do that. I curse Bhishma. I curse my own wretched and misguided father, who fixed valour as my bride price, as if I were a commodity to be sold. I curse myself. I curse the king of Salva. I curse my Creator too. I curse them all, who have been the cause of my terrible misery.

Human beings suffer what they are destined to; but the cause of my suffering is Bhishma, and I will avenge myself on him, either through tapasya or by battle. But is there a king who would dare face Bhishma in battle, to fight my cause?'

Deciding that she would have revenge on Bhishma, she set out for an asrama of virtuous Munis, where she stayed the night, protected by them. The once sweet-smiling devi told them all that had happened to her, to the smallest detail, of how Bhishma abducted her and how Salva betrayed her love. She begged their help.

There lived in that asrama a Brahmana of great tapasya called Saikhavatya, who was a teacher of the shastras and aranyakas. This Muni said to the suffering princess, from whom pitiful sighs came like her very breath, 'Princess, how will we Rishis, who perform tapasya in the forest, help you?'

Amba said, 'Be merciful to me. I have renounced the world and wish to live in the forest. I will practise the severest of tapasya. My suffering is the result of the sins I committed in ignorance. I have no desire to return to my family, and grief has its way with me after Salva humiliated me. You are a godly man, who have washed away your sins; teach me how to perform tapasya. Be merciful to me.'

The Muni comforted her with examples and explanations from the scriptures, and he and the other Brahmanas promised to help her."""

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "Those Munis then went about their daily chores, study, penance and worship, thinking all the while about what they could do for that devi.

Some amongst them said that she should be taken back to her father; some said she ought to blame me; some thought that they should go to the king of Salva and persuade him to accept her; some disagreed with this for he had shamed her in his court.

After some time had passed in such deliberations, Saikhavatya Muni said to her, 'Devi, what can sadhus of self-restraint do for you? Do not renounce the world and devote yourself to a life in the forest. Listen to me; I speak for your good. Go from here to your father's palace. Your father, the king, will do what needs to be done. You can live there happily, in luxury. You are a woman and, so, your only protector is your father.

Fair child, a woman's protector is either her father or her husband. Her husband is her protector when she is happy, but when she is plunged in grief it is her father she goes to. A life in the wilds is very difficult, especially for one who is delicate. You are a princess by birth and you are fragile. Devi, a life in the forest entails many hardships and tribulations, none of which you have known in your father's house.'

The other Munis looked at the helpless girl and said, 'Seeing you alone in the deep and lonely forest, wild hunters, bandits or even kings may seek to ravish you. Do not set your heart on a life of sannyasa.'

Amba said, 'I cannot go back to my father's house in Kasi, for I am certain to be shunned by all my relatives. Rishis, I spent my childhood there, but I cannot return to my father's city. With your protection, I want to practise penance, so that someday I can be rid forever of suffering. Maharishis, I want to be a tapasvin.'

Whilst the Brahmanas deliberated on what to do with her, there came to that forest the mighty sage, Rajarishi Hotravahana. The Munis paid their homage to him and welcomed him courteously, offering him padya, arghya and a darbhasana. After he was seated and had rested a while, the Munis began to talk to the devi once more, in his hearing.

Hearing the story of Amba and the king of Kasi, Hotravahana grew distraught. He heard how she spoke and saw how distressed she was, and that Rajarishi was moved to pity. In fact, Hotravahana was her grandfather, and he stood up suddenly, tears springing in his eyes; and, taking her onto his lap, he comforted her lovingly. He asked her in detail about her sorrows from the beginning, and she told him everything that had happened. He was filled with sadness when he had heard it all and decided what she should do.

Trembling in some agitation, he said to the tormented girl, 'Do not go back to your father's house. Devi, I am your mother's father. I will remove your grief; rely on me, child. Your suffering must be great that you are so wan and thin. You must go to Jamadagni's son Parasurama Bhargava. He will rid you of your deep sorrow. He was Devavrata's guru and will kill Bhishma in battle if the Kuru does not obey him. Go to that greatest of all the Bhrigus, whose tejas and urjas are like the flames of the pralaya. That Maharishi will set you on the right path.'

The girl, who wept on while he spoke, bowed her head reverentially to Hotravahana and said to him, 'I will go to that greatest of sages, but will I succeed in even catching a glimpse of Parasurama, whose renown echoes through the world? How will the Bhargava dispel my torment? How will I find him? Tell me, O my grandfather.'

Hotravahana said, 'You will find the mighty Parasurama in the great tapovana on the mountain Mahendra, where he sits in tapasya with many Rishis learned in the Vedas, many Gandharvas and Apsaras. Go with my blessings and tell the Mahamuni what I said, after first bowing your head to him in worship. He is a sage of strict vratas and fathomless ascetic punya.

Tell him whatever you wish for. If you name me, Parasurama will do anything for you, for he is my devoted friend and always wishes me well.'

Even as Hotravahana was speaking to the princess, Akritavrana, a close companion of Parasurama's, arrived there. All the hundreds of Munis and the Srinjaya king Hotravahana rose, and together they performed all the rituals of welcome and hospitality and then sat down around him. Delighted to have him amongst them, they spoke with him on many profound and wonderful subjects. When silence fell on the sacred gathering, Hotravahana asked Akritavrana where Parasurama was at the time.

Akritavrana said, 'Lord, Parasurama always speaks of you as his dear friend, and I believe he will arrive here tomorrow morning, for he comes even to see you.

But why has this maiden come to the forest? Whose is she, and what is she to you? I wish to know all this.'

Hotravahana said, 'She is the favourite daughter of the king of Kasi, and her mother is my daughter. She is Amba, the eldest daughter of the king of Kasi. She and her two younger sisters Ambika and Ambalika were in their swayamvara in Kasi, for which all the Kshatriya kings of the Earth had come. Great festivities were underway there, when Santanu's son, Bhishma of mighty valour, brushed aside all the kings and abducted the three princesses. Bhishma of Bharata vamsa took them to Hastinapura and to Satyavati. He asked his brother Vichitravirya to marry the princesses he had brought.

Seeing arrangements for the wedding being made, this devi Amba said to Bhishma, 'O Kshatriya, in my heart I had already chosen the lord of the Salvas to be my husband. Knowing dharma as you do, you know that your brother must not marry me, when my heart is given to another.'

Bhishma consulted his ministers and after deliberation, and with Satyavati's consent, gave Amba leave to go to Salva. She went to that king and told him that she had come with Bhishma's permission; that she had not done anything to break adharma and that she had chosen him, Salva, for her husband.

But Salva rejected her, suspecting her purity. Now she has come to these sacred forests, fervently wanting a life of tapasya. I recognised her from what she told me of her parentage. She blames Bhishma for her sorrow.'

Then Amba said to Akritavrana, 'Holy one, what my grandfather says is true. I cannot go back to my own city for fear of disgrace and shame. I have decided to obey whatever Parasurama tells me to do.’

Akritavrana said, 'Devi, for which of your two problems do you seek a remedy? Do you wish that the king of Salva should be persuaded to marry you? Parasurama Mahatman will certainly urge him to do so for your sake. Or, if you want to see Gangaputra Bhishma defeated in battle by Parasurama, Bhargava will gratify even that wish of yours. Let us hear what Hotravahana has to say further, and what you say as well, and decide today what should be done for you.'

Amba said, 'Holy one, Bhishma abducted me without knowing that I had given my heart to Salva. Bear this in mind, and dharma, when you decide what I should do. Do what is just, towards both Bhishma and Salva. I have told you honestly about the root of my grief; now you must decide what is best for me.'

Akritavrana said, 'Lovely Devi, what you say is imbued with dharma, and worthy of you. If Bhishma had not taken you to Hastinapura, Salva would have married you on Parasurama's asking him to. It is because Bhishma carried you away by force that Salva is suspicious of you. Bhishma is proud of his valour and is crowned with success. Your vengeance should be directed at him.'

Amba said, 'Dvija, I too dearly want to kill Bhishma in battle. Mahabaho, be it Bhishma or Salva, punish the man you think guilty, the one who has made me suffer.'

With a delicious, balmy breeze blowing, that day passed, and the night as well, while they discussed Amba's plight. In the morning, awesome, splendid Parasurama arrives in that asrama, his matted hair in jata, clad in deer-skin and carrying his bow, sword and battle-axe.

He came to Hotravahana, and that Rajarishi, all the Munis and the distressed princess stood up and waited on him with joined hands. They worshipped Bhargava with offerings of honey and curds, and he sat down in their midst, and Hotravahana and the great Bhargava began to speak of many profound and mysterious matters.

Finally, at an opportune moment, Hotravahana said, 'Rama, this girl is the daughter of my daughter and the king of Kasi. She needs your blessing from you. You are the lord of all things; I beg you, listen to what she has to say.'

Now Parasurama asked the princess to tell him what she wanted to say. Amba approached Parasurama, who blazed with tejas, like a fire. She laid her head at his feet in worship, touched them with her two lotus-like hands, and then stood silently before him. Overwhelmed by grief, and her eyes bathed in tears, she asked for his protection, for he was the refuge of all those in distress.

Parasurama said, 'Tell me what grief you hold in your heart, and I will do what needs to be done.'

Encouraged, Amba said, 'O holy one of the great vratas, I seek refuge with you. Free me from my suffering and raise me out of this ocean of sorrow.'

Seeing her beauty and her youthful, tender body, Parasurama sat silently in thought for a time, filled with pity, wondering what she would ask. Then he asked Amba to tell him everything, and she told him all that had happened.

Parasurama heard her out and, having first resolved what he should do, said to the exquisite girl, 'Beautiful devi, I will send word to Kurusattama Bhishma. He will do whatever I ask, and if he does not, I will consume him in battle. Or, if you prefer, I can speak to the heroic king of the Salvas and tell him to marry you.'

Amba said, 'O Bhargava, Bhishma allowed me to leave Hastinapura as soon as he heard that I had already given my heart to the lord of the Salvas. I went to Salva and spoke to him in forthright words. Doubtful of my purity, he refused to accept me. O great one, reflect on all this, and in your wisdom, do what you think is best.

However, Bhishma is the root cause of my distress, for he assumed control over my life by carrying me away in his chariot. Ah, kill Bhishma for me, Mahabaho; it is because of him that I suffer so grievously. Bhishma is covetous, mean and proud of his victory. Anagha, you must punish him. In my heart I wished for Devavrata Bhishma's death even while he was abducting me. Sinless Parasurama, gratify this desire of mine; slay Bhishma, as Purandara slew Vritra.'""

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "O Rajan, Parasurama said to the weeping girl, who repeatedly urged him to kill Bhishma, 'Daughter of Kasi, I do not take up arms on any account now except on behalf of Brahmanas. Tell me what else I might do for you.

Both Bhishma and Salva are implicitly obedient to me. Do not grieve, I will accomplish what you wish for. But I will not take up arms, unless I am asked to by a Brahmana, for this is the law I live by.'

Amba said, 'Ah, holy one, somehow dispel my misery, which Bhishma has caused. Do not delay, kill him!'

Parasurama said, 'Princess of Kasi, you have only to ask and I will have Bhishma set your feet on his head.'

Amba said, 'Parasurama, slay Bhishma, who roars like an Asura. If you want to allay my torment, let him call you to a duel and kill him there. You have given me your word that you will help now; you must not break it.'

Now Rishi Akritavrana intervened, 'Mahabaho, you should not break your word to this child, who seeks your protection. If, when you summon Bhishma, he comes and does what you ask, or you humble him in battle, if he does not, Amba's wish will be fulfilled and you will not forswear yourself.

Mahamuni, you swore an oath that after you have conquered all the Kshatriyas, you would kill any man, be he a Brahmana, a Kshatriya, a Vaisya or a Sudra, who is an enemy of us Brahmanas. You also swore that as long as you lived you would not forsake anyone who sought your protection in fear. You also said that you would slay the arrogant warrior who vanquished all the Kshatriyas of the Earth.

Lord, Bhishma, scion of Kuru vamsa, has achieved such a victory. Go to him now, O Bhargava, and humble him.'

Parasurama said, 'Best of Rishis, I remember that vow I once took. However, in this instance, I must first use the way of conciliation as best I can. What the princess of Kasi wants is grave indeed, Brahmana. I will take her with me and go to Bhishma. If he does not do what I ask, I will kill that arrogant one. The arrows I shoot do not glance off the bodies of my enemies, but pass through them. You know this when I fought the Kshatriyas of the Earth and spilled their blood in rivers.'

Parasurama and the Brahmanas decided to set out from the asrama. They spent the night there and duly performed their homas and recited their prayers the next morning; then they set out, intending to kill me.

Rajan, Parasurama came to Kurukshetra with the young princess and his followers. With the Bhargava at their head, those great Munis arrived on the banks of the Saraswati," said Bhishma.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma continued, "On the third day, Parasurama sent a message to say that he had come to help me.

Hearing that this Rishi of tejas, vast as the ocean had entered our kingdom, I went to him at once, and in joy. A cow led my retinue, and many of our family priests went with me, as also other great Brahmanas, whom we employed for special occasions such as this.

Parasurama accepted the worship that I offered and said to me, 'Bhishma, having cleansed yourself of desire, what were you thinking when you abducted the king of Kasi's daughter during her swayamvara, and then later when you let her leave? You have sullied her virtue; and, since you have touched her who will marry her now? Salva spurned her because you abducted her. Take her for yourself, Narapumgava, and let this princess fulfil a woman's dharma. It is not dharma that she be humiliated like this.'

I saw Parasurama's anguish at the princess' plight and said to him, 'O my guru, there was no way that I could bestow this girl on my brother once she herself told me that she belonged to Salva; and so I let her go to him. As for me, I cannot break my vrata and abandon Kshatriya dharma; not for fear, pity, wealth or lust.'

Parasurama's eyes rolled, and he said to me, 'Bharatarishabha, if you do not do as I say, I will kill you and all your followers this very day,' and he repeated this again and again in his fury.

I pleaded with him, but to no avail. I bowed my head before that Brahmanottama and asked him why he wanted to fight me.

I said, 'When I was a child it was you who instructed me in all four parts of the Dhanurveda. I am your sishya, O Bhargava.'

His eyes still red, he retorted, 'Bhishma, you acknowledge me as your guru, but you refuse to please me by taking this princess of Kasi for your wife. I will not be satisfied unless you do what I ask. Take this devi and safeguard the dharma of your vamsa; you abducted her forcibly from her swayamvara, and now she cannot find a husband. You must marry her yourself.'

I said, 'That I cannot do. I am eager to please you because you were once my guru. I refused this princess before I was aware of the great evil that the frailties of women can bring. No man will welcome into his household a woman whose heart belongs to another, and who is, thus like a venomous snake. I would never forsake my dharma by breaking my solemn oath, not even for fear of Indra. Be gracious, or do to me now what you think is just.

There is a sloka from the Puranas, which Maruta Mahatman once told me of: A man may disobey the command of even a guru who is filled with vanity, who does not know right from wrong and who walks a path of adharma.

You are my guru and I have revered you out of my love for you. However, you do not know the dharma of a guru, and I would fight you. But I could never kill a guru in battle, especially if he is Brahmana, and more so, one who is blessed with boundless tapasya. And so I forgive you.

It is a well known scriptural truth that no guilt attaches to a man who kills a Brahmana who has taken up arms as if he were a Kshatriya, and who fights in anger without trying to escape. I am a Kshatriya, and I am devoted to my dharma. One does not sin, neither does one do any harm, by treating a person as he deserves. When a man, who is aware of the timeliness of things, and versed in dharma and artha, is doubtful about anything, he should, without misgivings, follow his svadharma, for that will give him the most punya.

O Bhargava, you have violated dharma by asking me to break my vow, and I have no qualms about fighting you. You know that my prowess is superhuman, and I will give my all when I face you on the field of Kurukshetra. Effulgent one, prepare yourself for single combat; take your position.

My arrows will purify you and you will attain the regions to which your tapasya has entitled you. I will come to fight you, who so love battle, on Kurukshetra, where long ago you propitiated your ancestors with sea-like offerings of Kshatriya blood. There, Bhargava, I will propitiate those slain Kshatriyas by killing you.

Come, do not delay. On Kurukshetra I will curb your pride, of which the Brahmanas speak. For long years you have boasted that you single-handedly slew all the Kshatriyas in the world. And well you could boast, for in those days Bhishma was not yet born, nor were there any Kshatriyas like him. Only later did the truly valiant Kshatriyas come into this world.

All your vaunted conquests were against men of straw. The man who can quell your pride has since been born. I, Bhishma, am that man: the conqueror of enemy kingdoms. I will crush your pride of old conquests.'

Parasurama said to me, laughing, 'I am glad that you will do battle with me, Bhishma. I will come to Kurukshetra with you even now. Yes, I will do what you want. Come there, and let your mother Jahnavi see you lying dead on the battlefield, pierced by my arrows and become carrion for vultures, crows and jackals. Let that Devi, whom the Siddhas and Charanas worship, Bhagiratha's blessed daughter who took the form of a holy river and who gave birth to you, weep today when she sees you lying lifeless on Kurukshetra, although she does not deserve the grief of such a sight.

Come, Bhishma; follow me, arrogant Kshatriya always hungry for battle, and bring your chariot and weapons.'

I worshipped Parasurama with my head bent and answered him by saying Tathaastu.

He strode away toward Kurukshetra, and I went to our city to inform Satyavati of what had happened. I performed propitiatory rites for victory, took my mother's blessings, and made the Brahmanas utter their blessings over me. I mounted a superb silver chariot yoked to white horses. It was finely crafted, spacious and covered on all sides with tiger-skin; it had many great weapons in it. My sarathy was a brave nobleman, an expert horseman and charioteer, and one who had seen many battles.

I wore a white coat of mail and carried my white bow; and I set out, Bharatottama. A royal white parasol was held over my head and white chamaras waved over me. Clad in white silk and with white head-gear, all my adornments were also white. I rode out of Hastinapura to songs of praise and to the sound of Brahmanas wishing me victory, and I rode to Kurukshetra.

Spurred by my sarathy, the steeds, fleet as the wind or the mind, bore me swiftly to the great encounter. Upon Kurukshetra, Parasurama and I, both keened for battle, would display our prowess. When I came within sight of Parasurama I blew a loud blast on my conch. Many Brahmanas and sadhus who lived in the forest had come to watch our duel. Divine garlands, celestial music and canopies of clouds were all around and above us, and the Rishis who had come with Bhargava stood on the periphery of the field.

Suddenly, my divine mother Ganga, who washes the sins of men in her sacred waters, appeared before me in her human form and said, 'What is this that you are about to do? I will go to Jamadagni's son and beg him not to fight Bhishma, who is his disciple. My son, you are a Kshatriya; you must not fight Parasurama; he is a Brahmana.'

She continued to reproach me, 'My son, Parasurama Bhargava is as powerful as Mahadeva himself; he once exterminated the entire Kshatriya varna. You do not know this as I do, who saw it all, and you want to face him in battle!'

I saluted the Devi reverentially and with folded hands recounted the events that had taken place at the swayamvara; I told her everything that happened with the princess of Kasi, and how I had tried to dissuade Parasurama from fighting me.

My mother Ganga went to Parasurama and beseeched him to desist since I was his disciple. He said to her that she ought to urge me to obey him, and that he had challenged me because I refused to do what he wanted."

Out of her love for him, Ganga came back to persuade Bhishma to relent, but the angry Bhishma refused. And just then, Parasurama of the Bhrigu vamsa came to Bhishma and said they should begin their duel,' says Sanjaya."

'''Bhishma said, "Smiling, I said to Parasurama, 'You stand on the ground and I do not want to fight you from my chariot. Mount a chariot and put on a coat of mail, if you wish to fight me.'

He also smiled and said, 'The Earth is my chariot and the Vedas are the steeds that pull me; the wind is my sarathy and the mothers of the Vedas are my coat of mail—Gayatri, Savitri and Saraswati. With their protection, I will fight.'

With that, he covered me with a barrage of arrows; and indeed I saw him, standing on a supernal chariot equipped with weapons of every kind. Wondrous was his chariot, created by his will, and great and beautiful, like a town. Celestial horses were yoked to it, and it was armoured on all sides. It was decked with ornaments of gold, covered with tough skins, and it bore the symbols of the Sun and the Moon. Parasurama was armed with a bow and quiver of arrows, and his fingers were encased in leather gloves. His friend Akritavrana was his sarathy.

Parasurama repeatedly summoned me to battle, crying, Come, come, make me a happy man! And so that invincible exterminator of Kshatriya kind, resplendent like the rising Sun, became my adversary in battle.

He showered me with three bursts of arrows, curbing my horses; I alighted from my chariot, set aside my bow and walked up to him. I paid reverent homage to him.

I said, 'My lord, whether you are equal or superior to me, I will fight you, my virtuous guru. Bless me and wish me victory.'

He said, 'The man who desires victory should do as you have. Those who fight with warriors elder and more eminent than themselves must perform such homage. Kshatriya, I would have cursed you if you had not come to me in this way. Go; fight carefully and call on all your patience. I cannot, however, wish you victory, for I am here to vanquish you. Go, fight in dharma. I am pleased with you.'

Bowing to him, I quickly returned and, climbing onto my chariot once more, I blew my conch. The fervid duel between us began. It lasted many days. Parasurama drew first blood, striking me with nine hundred and sixty vulture-feather-winged arrows, which covered my horses and my sarathy, although I myself was unscathed in my coat of mail.

Bowing to the Devas, and especially to the Brahmanas, I said to Parasurama, 'Although you have shown scant respect for me, I have paid you full reverence as my guru. There is another auspicious duty to be discharged if you want to earn punya. I do not loose my arrows at the Vedas you have absorbed, or at you as a Brahmana or at your great tapasya. I take aim at the Kshatriya warrior you have chosen to become. When a Brahmana takes up weapons he becomes a Kshatriya. Now witness the power of my bow and the might of my arms. Look how I sever your bow with my single arrow!'

I shot a sharp broad-headed arrow at him and cut off one of the horns of his bow, which fell on the ground. I then shot a hundred arrows at his chariot. They flew through the air like serpents and pierced him. Blood covered his body and poured out. And he shone in battle, like Mount Sumeru with molten lava flowing down its sides, or like an asoka tree in spring when it is covered with red flowers, or the kinsuka tree in bloom.

Angrily, he took up another bow and inundated me with keen, golden-winged arrows and, like snakes, fire or venom, these vicious barbs of terrific impetus flashed at me from all sides, piercing me deep and making me tremble. I gathered myself, and struck Parasurama with a hundred shafts that were like fire, or the Sun, and which also looked like snakes spitting venom, and he seemed to swoon away.

Pity surged in me and I lowered my bow, in disgust of battle and Kshatriya dharma. Grief quite overwhelmed me and I kept saying to myself, Ah, great is the sin I have committed by observing my dharma. I have sorely wounded my own guru, who is a virtuous Brahmana, with arrows!

Thousand-rayed Surya, having warmed the Earth, now sank away to his abode in the west at the close of day; and the duel between the Bhargava and me ceased.”””

"'"Bhishma said, "After the day's battle ended, my sarathy skilfully drew out the arrows embedded in his own body, from the bodies of our horses and from mine as well. The next morning, at sunrise, we resumed battle.

My horses had been bathed, fed, given water and had rested, rolling luxuriantly in the grass, and they were re-invigorated. Seeing me come, in my coat of mail, Parasurama refitted his chariot with care. And when I saw him ride towards me, eager to fight, I put down my bow and got down from my chariot. I paid him worship, before climbing back on, and now stood fearlessly before him, ready for battle.

I overwhelmed him with a thick shower of arrows, and he mantled me with a barrage of shafts in return. His rage mounting, my guru loosed a storm of serpentine shafts with blazing mouths. I retaliated with lakhs of arrows, cutting off his barbs before they could reach me.

He now invoked devastras against me, which I repelled with greater astras of my own; the spirit of war risen in us absorbed both of us entirely. The thunder of astra fusing with astra rose into the sky. I cast the Vayavyastra at him, but he quelled it with his Varunastra. And so we fought, each of us subduing the astras of the other.

Suddenly, he wheeled to my right and struck me squarely through the chest, and I fainted in my chariot. My sarathy quickly bore me away from the field. Great was the joy of Akritavrana, Amba and all Parasurama's followers, who began to shout with joy when they saw me being borne away unconscious.

Regaining my senses, I ordered my sarathy to take me back into battle, for I was recovered. He flicked his reins over the superb wind-swift horses, which seemed to dance as they flew across the plain, and we were soon there.

In fury, and now determined to vanquish my adversary, I covered him with a deluge of arrows that fell from the sky. But the Bhargava shot three missiles for every one of mine and bisected my arrows in the air. His followers were joyous again, seeing my countless arrows cloven by his.

Now the urge to kill him seized me. I struck him with an arrow of blazing effulgence, with Death sitting at its head. He fell unconscious from his chariot. Exclamations of Oh! and Alas! arose on all sides, and everywhere was confusion and alarm, as might have been if the Sun were to fall from the sky.

All the gathered ascetics and the princess of Kasi rushed, in great anxiety, to where he lay. They embraced him and soothed him with the soft touch of hands cooled by having been dipped in water, and with assurances of victory.

Parasurama rose, fixed an arrow to his bow and roared at me, Stay, Bhishma. You are slain!

The arrow he shot at me pierced my left side and I began to tremble like a young tree in a gale. Calmly, he killed my horses and, with unearthly lightness of hand, shot locust-like swarms of winged arrows which enveloped me in darkness. I, too, loosed arrows beyond count to stem his tide. Our arrow clouds covered the sky, suspended there interlocked and not falling down. The Sun's rays could not penetrate them and the wind could not pass through them. From their vast friction a conflagration flared up in the sky. Every arrow burst into flames and fell to the Earth as ashes. Beside himself with fury, Parasurama loosed crores and crores of deadly barbs at me; and I shot them into fragments and they fell around us like snakes chopped up.

Finally, when the shadows of evening fell, my guru withdrew from the field."""

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "The next day, the duel was no less frightful. Day by day, that Mahatman, master of celestial weapons, invoked more devastras, of diverse kinds. With no thought for my life, so difficult to sacrifice, in the ferocity of that duel, I baffled all his weapons with astras of my own. And, Bhaarata, when his astras proved ineffectual, Jamadagni's mighty son cast a fierce and sorcerous lance at me, blazing like a meteor, with a flaming mouth, filling the whole world with its effulgence, and like Yama's very dart. But I cut that missile in three, that occult weapon which shone like the Sun that rises at end of the yuga.

At this, fragrant breezes began to blow around me. His anger burning higher, Bhargava loosed a ferocious astra at me. Their forms, Bhaarata, I cannot describe, but terrible was their lustre and speed. I saw those missiles flare at me from all sides, interminable tongues of flame, truly like the twelve suns that arise at the pralaya, and I was filled with fear. Holding my nerve, I doused the fire of those missiles with a great astra of water, and never pausing, shot down the twelve with twelve arrows of my own.

Undeterred, Parasurama showered a fusillade of golden-winged darts over me, with variegated handles chased with gold, which were like comets afire. I warded them off with my shield and sword so they fell impotent on the ground. I covered Parasurama's horses and charioteer with clouds of gold-shafted arrows. His wrath mounted further to see my barbs like snakes coming out of their nests, and once more he summoned the devastras.

Locust-like swarms of missiles overwhelmed me, my steeds, my charioteer and my chariot. Indeed, Duryodhana, my ratha, horses and sarathy were completely enmeshed by those arrow nets. The yoke, shaft, wheels and the wheel-spokes of my chariot broke.

When his arrow storm ceased, I, too, covered my guru with a heavy shower of weapons. That sage of Brahmic punya began to bleed copiously. I was also densely pierced by his barbs.

When, at last, the Sun set behind the western hills, our savage duel ended for the day.”””

"''Bhishma said, 'The next morning, Bhargava and I resumed our contention. From his chariot, he rained a downpour of arrows on me, as clouds do on a mountain. My sarathy was struck and fell unconscious to the ground; to my great grief, he succumbed to his injuries.

Rajan, fear gripped my heart, and while I was still numb Parasurama shot me with an arrow that pierced deep into my chest, and I fell to the ground with the arrow. Presuming that I was dead, Parasurama roared in triumph, like a thundercloud. All his followers rejoiced loudly with him, while the Kurus who had followed me, and all the rest who were watching, were stricken.

As I lay there, I saw eight ethereal Brahmanas, who shone like the Sun. They surrounded me and picked me up in their arms. My breathing was laboured as they held me; and, sprinkling me with water and still carrying me, they blessed and reassured me repeatedly. Soothed by their words, I got up, and I saw my mother Ganga standing embodied on my chariot.

O king of the Kurus, it was that great Devi who had held my horses' reins after my sarathy fell. I worshipped my mother's feet and my Pitrs, and I climbed onto my chariot with my weapons. I begged my mother to leave and took the reins myself and, restraining those steeds gifted with the speed of the wind, I resumed my duel with Parasurama and we fought until that day ended.

I shot him with an arrow that pierced his breast, so he lost his grip on his bow and fell onto his knees, and then out of his chariot, unconscious. Masses of clouds filled the sky and rained blood. Hundreds of meteors fell and thunder rolled across the sky, making everything tremble. Rahu covered the Sun, and violent winds blew. The Earth herself trembled, and vultures, crows and cranes began to alight in joy, in anticipation of a feast. The points of the horizon seemed to be on fire, and jackals howled. Drums rang out spontaneously in cacophony. When the great Parasurama embraced the Earth all these frightful omens of evil appeared.

All of a sudden, he arose and came towards me, more furious than ever and ready to fight again. That Mahabaho took up his bow of immeasurable power and shot a deadly arrow at me; but I struck it down in flight. The Rishis who watched were filled with horror and pity, but Bhargava felt only rage. I shot an arrow fulgurant as the fires of the pralaya, but Parasurama of the fathomless soul baffled my weapon. Clouds of dust obscured the splendour of the Sun as it moved to the western sky. Night came with its cool breezes, and both of us suspended our duel till the morrow.

In this way, stopping when dusk came and resuming at daybreak, we fought relentlessly for twenty-three days.'''

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "That night, after paying my respects to the Brahmanas, the Rishis, the Devas, the creatures of the night and the kings of the Earth, I lay down on my bed, and in the solitude of my chamber I began to reflect.

I thought to myself, The battle between Bhargava and me has gone on for many days without my being able to defeat this tejasvin. If indeed I am going to overcome Parasurama, then let the gods appear before me tonight.

As I lay asleep on my right side, my body fairly mangled by arrows, the same Brahmanas who had lifted me up when I fell from my chariot on the field, and who reassured me then, appeared in a dawn dream. They stood around me and said:

'Rise, Kurupravira. Gangaputra, have no fear; we will protect you, for you are our own body. Jamadagni's son Parasurama can never vanquish you in battle. Instead, you will conquer him. In another life you commanded the matchless Praswapastra, which belongs to the Lord of all creatures, and which Tvashtri forged; it shall be yours again to invoke. Neither Parasurama nor anyone else but you knows it. Think hard of it, Mahabaho, and it will come to you on its own.

With the Praswapa, you can vanquish the greatest tejasvins of the world. But you will not be able to kill Parasurama, so you will not sin by using it against him. Overpowered by the mighty astra, Parasurama will fall into sleep, and you will awaken him with the Sambodhanastra.

In the morning, from your chariot, do what we have said. We think of sleep and death as being the same; Parasurama will not actually die, but fall into a deathlike slumber. At the right moment, invoke the Praswapastra gladly and use it against the Bhargava.'

Saying this, those eight lustrous and identical Brahmanas vanished.”””

"'Bhishma said, "When the night passed, I awoke and, thinking of my dream, was filled with joy. Then, Bhaarata, we took to the field again and fought with so far unprecedented ferocity, so the hairs of all those who watched stood on end.

Bhargava unleashed a deluge of arrows over me, but I checked it with a rising shower of my own. Then, filled with wrath at what he had seen the day before and what he now saw, he hurled an occult spear at me, as hard and as brilliant as Indra's Vajra, like Yama's very mace. It flew towards me, flaming, hungrily consuming the whole battlefield, before falling on my shoulder like a bolt of lightning.

Blood gushed from me like streams bubbling down a mountain after rain. Shaken, stung, I shot a naracha like a venomous snake at him. It struck him on the brow, ah, turning him so handsome, like a crested hill. He assumed a fresh archer's stance, drew his bowstring taut and shot a deathly shaft at me. It streaked through the air and took me in the chest. I fell on the ground, covered in blood.

Coming quickly awake, I cast a dazzling missile, another veritable thunderbolt, which pierced his breast, so he trembled and, his eyes glazing over, swooned. Akritavrana held him close and comforted him. Waking, his eyes now turned red as plums, and Parasurama invoked the Brahmastra. I called upon the same astra myself, and the two weapons fused high above us and broke into a conflagration that occurs only at the end of a yuga.

The sky was on fire; all the Earth's creatures were terrified; the Rishis, the Gandharvas and the Devas panicked; the Earth, her mountains, seas and trees shook violently; and every living being burned in the energy the fused astras radiated. As the sky blazed, all ten points of the horizon billowed with smoke, and sky creatures fell helplessly to the ground.

The whole world with the Devas, the Asuras and the Rakshasas cried out in terror, and I thought that the time had come for me to invoke the Praswapastra. At my very thought, the mantras for the astra flashed into my mind.”””

"'"Bhishma said, "A tumult of unearthly voices sounded in the sky, begging me not to invoke the Praswapastra. When I still aimed the astra at the Bhargava, Narada appeared there and said to me, 'In the sky, O Kaurava, are the Devas. They forbid you from what you are about to do. Do not loose the Praswapastra. Parasurama is a tapasvin of Brahma punya, and he is also your guru. Never humiliate him.'

As Narada spoke, I saw those eight Brahmanas in the sky. Smiling, they said to me, 'Bharatottama, do as Narada says, for it will benefit the whole world.'

I recalled that astra and invoked, instead, the Brahmastra. When Parasurama saw the Praswapastra being withdrawn, he exclaimed, Bhishma, you have vanquished this wretch!

Then he saw before him his father and his grandfathers. They stood around him and spoke words of consolation to him, 'Never again challenge Bhishma or any Kshatriya to a fight, Bhargava, for it is their dharma to fight and not yours. The study of the Vedas and practice of vratas are a Brahmana's greatest wealth. Once, we did indeed command you to take up arms, and you annihilated all the Kshatriyas of the world. Let this battle with Bhishma be your last, for you have done enough already. Retreat from battle, Mahabaho. Our blessings be upon you. Let this be the last time you pick up a bow. Throw your weapon away and return to your tapasya.

See how the Devas forbid Bhishma. They try to pacify him and make him desist from this battle; they try to prevent him from fighting against you, who are his guru, for, they say, it is not proper that he vanquishes you in battle. They tell him to do you every honour on the field. As his superiors they forbid him to humiliate you.

Bhishma is the greatest of the Vasus. You are fortunate to be alive. How can you defeat this son of Santanu and Ganga? Stop, Bhargava. Brahma has ordained that Indra's mighty son Arjuna will be the one to slay Bhishma.'

Parasurama answered his Pitrs, 'I cannot abandon a battle; that is my solemn vow. I have never yet given up a fight or left any battlefield. Pitamahas, if you so wish, tell Bhishma to stop, for I cannot.'

Hearing him, the Rishis with Richika at their head came to me with Narada and said, 'Bhishma, desist from battle. Honour your guru the Bhargava.'

I replied, 'In keeping with Kshatriya dharma I have sworn never to yield in battle, or turn my back, or allow arrows to strike me in the back. Not from temptation, distress, fear, or for any gain or wealth, renounce my dharma. In this I am resolved.'

All those tapasvins and Narada, as well as my mother Bhagirathi, stood on the battlefield before me. I stood quietly, with my bow and arrows as before, determined to fight on.

They turned towards Rama once more and said to him, 'The hearts of Brahmanas are soft like butter. Be pacified, Bhargava, give up this battle. You cannot kill Bhishma; and neither can he kill you.'

They stood between us as they spoke and made Bhargava set aside his weapons. Just then I saw those eight Brahmanas once more, irradiant, and like bright stars in the sky.

They said to me gently, with great love, 'Mahabaho, Parasurama is your guru; you must go to him first. Do what is good for the world.'

When I saw that the Bhargava restrained himself, I too, set aside my weapons, for the weal of the world. Although I was sorely wounded, I came before Parasurama and worshipped him.

The Maharishi smiled and, with great affection, said to me, 'There is no Kshatriya equal to you on Earth. Go now, Bhishma, for you have pleased me greatly in battle.'

He summoned the princess of Kasi into our presence and spoke to her with some regret in the midst of all those Mahatmans.”'”

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "Parasurama said, 'Devi, in the presence of all these great ones, I put forth all my prowess and fought as hard as I could. Even by using the most formidable astras I could not prevail over Bhishma. Beautiful Amba, go wherever you wish, unless there is something else you want from me. Seek refuge with Bhishma, for you have no other now. He has vanquished me in battle.' The Bhargava sighed and fell silent.

Amba said, 'Holy one, it is true what you say: Bhishma of the great intellect cannot be vanquished, even by the Devas. You have done what I asked, as best you could. You used tejas that cannot be dimmed and weapons of all kinds. Yet, you could not conquer Bhishma. As for myself, I will not go to Bhishma a second time. Instead, I will go to the place where I might acquire the means to kill Bhishma in battle myself.'

Saying this, Amba left, wild-eyed in anger, my death her sole aim, and resolved to devote herself to tapasya. Bhargava bid me farewell and, with the tapasvins, departed for the mountains from where they had come. I also left on my chariot, praised by the Brahmanas, and when I entered Hastinapura I told my mother Satyavati everything that had taken place; and she invoked blessings on me.

I sent forth trusted agents to discover where Amba had gone and what she did, and these loyal spies brought me regular reports of her, from day to day. When Amba went into the forest, resolved to perform tapasya, melancholy and heartache gripped me and I became unwell. No Kshatriya can vanquish me in battle, other than one who knows Brahman, and who observes perfectly austere and praiseworthy vratas.

O king, I humbly told Narada and Vyasa all about Amba, and they both said to me, 'Bhishma, do not yield to sorrow because of the princess of Kasi. Who would try to avert destiny by his own efforts?'

Meanwhile, Amba went to live near some asramas and began practising tapasya so stern that it was beyond human endurance and belief. Without food, emaciated, dry, with matted-locks and grimy, for six months she lived only on air, and stood immobile like a post. After this, that devi, now rich in tapasya, fasted for a year, standing in the waters of the Yamuna. The whole of the next year, her anger unabated, she stood on her toes, having eaten only one fallen leaf. In this way, for twelve years, she scalded heaven with her austerities, and though her relatives tried to dissuade her, she would not be moved.

She then went to Vatsabhumi tirtha, the retreat of lofty, pious Rishis, and where Siddhas and Charanas lived. There she bathed frequently in the sacred waters and wandered about as she pleased. In this way she went to many tirthas, one after the other. She went to Narada's asrama, then to Uluka's, then to Chyavana's, then to the place most sacred to Brahmanas, then to Prayaga the yagnashala of the gods, then to that forest sacred to the gods, then to Bhogavati, then to the Viswamitra's asrama, to Mandavya's, to Dilipa's, then to the sacred lake Ramahrida, and then to the hermitage of Garga. In the sacred waters of all these places the princess of Kasi performed ablutions, while constantly observing the most difficult of vratas.

One day, from the waters my mother Ganga asked her, 'Blessed devi, why do you torture yourself like this? Tell me truly.'

That faultless princess answered with folded hands, 'O you of the beautiful eyes, Bhishma vanquished Parasurama. What other Kshatriya king would venture to face Bhishma in battle when he has his weapons raised? I am performing the severest tapasya in order to kill Bhishma. I wander over the Earth with just one purpose—that I obtain the means to kill that Kshatriya. Devi, in everything I do this is my only goal.'

Ganga said, 'Devi, what you do is not wise. Weak girl, you will never achieve your end. If you observe these vratas for Bhishma's death, and if you lose your own life whilst doing so, you will become a river in your next birth, sourceless, its course crooked and filled only by rain water. All the bathing ghats along your course will be difficult to reach and filled only during the rainy season. You will be dry for eight months of the year. You will be full of terrible crocodiles and other frightful monsters. ‘

Speaking to Amba in this way, my mother Ganga, the thrice-blessed Devi, sent the princess of Kasi away. Amba renewed her tapasya, going without food and water, sometimes for eight months and sometimes for ten. She wandered here and there in her passionate quest of holy tirthas until she came back once more to Vatsabhumi. It is here that she became a river, filling only during the monsoon, abounding with crocodiles, her waters flowing a crooked course, and difficult to find or ford. But, O king, because of her tapasya only half of her turned into this river in Vatsabhumi, while her other half remained a woman.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "All the Rishis living in Vatsabhumi saw how intent the princess of Kasi was in her tapasya, and they tried to dissuade her from it. The aged ascetics asked her what she wanted, to which Amba responded, 'Bhishma cast me out and deprived me of the dharma of living with a husband. I keep these vratas for his destruction, and not to gain Swarga. O you of tapasyadhana, I will find peace only with Bhishma's death.

I will not rest until I kill the son of Ganga in battle. All my grief is because of him; he has robbed me of the punya I would have gained by having a husband; because of him I am neither man nor woman. As a woman, I no longer have any desire. I want to be a man, for then I can take my revenge on Bhishma. So, you should not try to keep me from my penance.' And she kept repeating this to the munis.

Soon, the divine lord of Uma, the Trisulin, appeared before that tapasvini who lived amongst the Maharishis. Mahadeva Siva told her to ask for a boon; she begged for my death.

You shall slay him, were the words Siva said to that devi of the great strength of mind.

Amba was reassured but said again to him, 'How can I, a woman, defeat mighty Bhishma in battle? Umapati, as a woman, my heart is perfectly calm. However, you have promised me Bhishma's death. Vrishabdhvaja, do what you must to keep your word that I will kill Santanu's son in battle.'

The Devadeva said to Amba, 'The words I have uttered cannot be false. Blessed Amba, they will prove true. You will become a man and slay Bhishma. You will also remember everything about this life even when you inhabit a new body. You will be born in Drupada's house and become a Maharatha. You will be swift in the use of astras, and a fierce warrior; and you will be skilled in battle. O princess, all that I have said will be come to pass, in time.'

The god of gods, the Kapardin, who has the bull for his emblem, vanished while the Brahmanas looked on in awe. Without delay, that faultless and lovely princess, eldest daughter of the king of Kasi, gathered wood from the forest and, in the presence of those Maharishis, heaped a large funeral pyre on the banks of the Yamuna. She lit it, and eagerly entered the blaze, her heart yet another fire. As she walked into the flames, she repeatedly reminded herself of her purpose, This I do for Bhishma's death."'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana said, "Tell me, Pitamaha, how Amba, having been a woman, later became a man."

Bhishma said, 'Duryodhana, the eldest and beloved queen of king Drupada of the Panchalas was at first childless. Drupada went into the vana and worshipped Lord Sankara with a fervid tapasya for the sake of sons, for he wanted to have a son who would kill me.

He begged Mahadeva, 'Let a son, and not a daughter, be born to me. I want a son to take revenge on Bhishma.'

Mahadeva said to him, 'You shall have a child who will be both female and male. Stop your penance, king, it will not be otherwise.'

Returning to his capital, Drupada said to his wife, 'Devi, I worshipped Siva and He said to me that my child would be a daughter first and then become a man.

And though I asked him repeatedly, all Siva said was, 'This is fate's decree. It will not be otherwise; that which is destined must come to be.'

Drupada's queen came to Drupada as her fertile time drew near. Purifying herself, she came to him and in due time she conceived. Narada told me this. And that lady, of eyes like lotus-petals, held the embryo in her womb, and Mahababo Drupada saw to his beloved dear wife's every comfort. Kaurava, the queen of that childless lord of the Earth had all her wishes granted when she gave birth to a beautiful daughter.

The strong-minded queen announced that she had given birth to a son. King Drupada had all the samskaras prescribed for a male child to be performed for his daughter, as if she were a son. Drupada's queen guarded her secret closely; nobody in the city other than she and Drupada knew the sex of the child. With faith in what the ever-glorious Siva had said, the Panchala king also kept the secret, saying, It is a son.

Drupada named the child Sikhandin. But, through my spies and from Narada's news, I knew the truth, for I knew from my spies about Amba's tapasya and what Siva had promised her."''

"""Bhishma said, "O Parantapa, Drupada paid careful attention to the education of his daughter. He taught her writing, painting and all the arts. In the astra shastra the child became a disciple of Drona. And when the time came, Sikhandin's lovely mother urged her husband to find a wife for their daughter, as if she were a son.

When the king saw that his daughter had reached puberty and her femininity become apparent, he spoke to his queen.

Drupada said, 'Our daughter, who fills me with sorrow, has attained maturity. On the strength of Mahadeva's word, I have so far kept the truth secret.'

The queen said, 'Great king, what Siva says can never be untrue! Why would the Lord of the three worlds say something that will not happen? If it pleases you, my husband, listen to what I have to say and then follow your own heart. Have our child married to a young woman, for Siva words can never prove false. Of this I am certain.'

The royal couple chose the daughter of the king of the Dasarnakas to be Sikhandin's wife. Drupada, lion among kings, made inquiries from all the kings of the world about the purity of her lineage before he chose this maiden. And Hiranyavarman of the Dasarnakas gave his daughter to Sikhandin.

Hiranyavarman was a powerful king, not easy to vanquish. He himself was irresistible and he had a large army. A while after the wedding, Hiranyavarman's daughter attained puberty. Sikhandin returned to Kampilya and his wife soon knew that her husband was a woman like herself. Shyly, Hiranyavarman's daughter told her sakhis and servant-maids about Sikhandin's secret.

The women who had come to Kampilya with the Dasarnaka princess were aghast and sent word to Hiranyavarman. When he heard about the fraud that had been perpetrated against him, Hiranyavarman was beside himself, and sent a messenger to Drupada's palace.

The king's messenger approached Drupada and said to him in private, 'Rajan, the king of the Dasarnakas is outraged at the deceit you have shown him. Sinless one, he is furious and he said these words to you:

Foolish Drupada, you have humiliated me by making my daughter your daughter's wife. Now reap the consequence of your vile deception; wait just awhile, and I will kill you with all your relatives and advisors!'" said Bhishma.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma said, "Drupada, found out, was numbed by Hiranyavarman's message. He made every effort to pacify the Dasarnaka king; he sent messengers to him with instructions to speak sweetly and persuasively. King Hiranyavarman, however, having confirmed that the child of the Panchala king was really a daughter, left Kampilya immediately.

He sent messages to all his powerful friends about what Drupada had done. That best of kings mustered a great army to march against Drupada. Hiranyavarman consulted his ministers, and it was decided that they should bind Drupada and drag him out of his city; and after installing another king to rule over the Panchalas, they would kill both Drupada and Sikhandin.

Hiranyavarman again sent a duta to Drupada with the same message, I will kill you, just wait.

King Drupada was not naturally brave and, because he was guilty, he was filled with fear. He sent his own messenger again to Hiranyavarman to placate him; and panic-stricken by now, he went to his wife to discuss the matter with her.

The terrified king said to his favourite wife, Sikhandin's mother, 'The powerful Hiranyavarman has gathered a large force and is coming here in rage. My queen, we have both been fools; what are we to do now about Sikhandin? Hiranyavarman and his allies want to kill me for deceiving him.

O you of the beautiful hips, tell me what you think, and I will decide what to do. I am in grave peril and so is Sikhandin. Why, my queen, you are also in danger. For all our sakes, tell me where you think dharma lies.

Although you misled me about my duty towards our son, who is no son at all, I show you both mercy. So have no fear, and do not let our daughter be afraid either.

I have indeed deceived the king of the Dasarnakas. Tell me what I must do now so that everything turns out well?'

Drupada had always known the truth about Sikhandin, but now he spoke to his wife in the presence of others in this way, to proclaim his own innocence. And his queen answered him.”””

"''Bhishma said, "Sikhandin's mother openly declared the truth about her daughter, keeping up the pretence that Drupada had not known the truth.

She said, 'I was childless, Rajan, and it was from fear of your other wives that, when she was born, I pretended that our daughter was a son. Out of your love for me, you did not question me and had all the samskaras for a son performed, for our Sikhandin. You had her married to the daughter of the king of Dasarnakas, and, remembering the words of Mahadeva, I approved of the wedding. I did not try to stop the marriage because Siva said*, She will be born a daughter, and she will become a son*.

Thus, subtly, Drupada Yajnasena informed all his counsellors of the truth, and sought their advice on how to protect his subjects from Hiranyavarman's invasion. Although he had himself deceived the king of the Dasarnakas, he made it seem as if he had not known about Sikhandin's sex; and then he turned his undivided attention to the looming threat from Hiranyavarman.

King Drupada's city was already well-protected, but he now bolstered its fortifications. The king and his queen were, however, consumed by the thought of how to avoid a war. Drupada began to pay fervent homage and adoration to the gods, and his wife did as well.

Then she said to him, 'Paying homage to the gods has its benefits and is approved of by the righteous. What shall I say of those that are plunged in an ocean of distress? Pay homage to your elders and superiors and worship all the gods; making bounteous gifts to Brahmanas; pour oblations on the fire to pacify the ruler of the Dasarnakas. My lord, think of a way of pacifying Hiranyavarman without a war. The grace of the gods will help you make peace with him.

Take the counsel of your ministers for the protection of our city. Do everything they advise, for reliance on the gods, when supported by human effort, always leads to success. These two must go hand-in-hand; one by itself cannot be successful. So, consult your advisors and make every arrangement to defend our city, and also worship the gods.'

While husband and wife were conversing, both full of grief and fear, their hapless daughter Sikhandin was full of shame and guilt. Thinking that it was because of her that her parents were in such anguish, she decided to end her life. She left Kampilya, her heart breaking, and went into a dense and lonely forest that was the haunt of a formidable Yaksha called Sthunakarna, for fear of whom no-one ever entered that forest.

In that vana stood a mansion with high walls; it was plastered with clay and rich with smoke that bore the fragrance of roasted paddy. Sikhandini entered that mansion and began to emaciate herself by fasting for many days. The Yaksha named Sthuna, who was a kindly being, appeared before her.

He said to her, 'What is the purpose of your endeavour? I will accomplish it for you; tell me what it is.'

Sikhandini replied, 'You cannot.'

The Yaksha retorted, smiling, 'Accomplish it I will! I am a follower of the Lord of treasures and I can grant boons, princess. I will grant you even the impossible. Tell me what you want.'

Now Sikhandini told Sthunakarna everything that had happened, in detail. She said, 'O Yaksha, my father will soon meet his end. The king of the Dasarnakas marches against him in rage. Hiranyavarman in his golden armour is mighty and invincible. Yaksha, save me, my mother and my father! You have already said you will give me what I want. Through your grace, Yaksha, I want to become a man in all my parts. Be gracious to me, great Yaksha."'

"''Bhishma said, "Bharatarishabha, the Yaksha heard Sikhandin's strange story and saw it was fraught with destiny, when she said, 'It was all pre-ordained, and it was ordained for my grief.'

The Yaksha said, 'Blessed princess, I will do what you wish. Listen, however, to the condition I have. For a specified time, I will give you my own manhood, and take your womanhood upon myself. But you must come back to me at the specified time. Promise me this, and you shall become a man. I am a ranger of the skies and wander at my pleasure; I have great powers and I can accomplish whatever I want. Take my boon, and save your city and all your kin. Swear in truth to return my manhood to me, and I will do what you want.'

Sikhandin said to him, 'Holy one of most excellent vows, I will return your manhood to you. Wanderer of the night, bear my womanhood for a short time only. After the king of the Dasarnakas, who wears golden mail, has left my city, I will become a woman once more and you will be a man again.'

Thus, the two made a pact with each other and exchanged their genders. The Yaksha Sthuna became a female, while Sikhandin obtained the resplendent form of the Yaksha.

Sikhandin of the Panchala vamsa entered Kampilya in great joy and approached his father. He told Drupada everything that had happened and Drupada heard it and was very glad; and the king and his wife remembered Mahadeva's words.

Forthwith, Drupada sent a messenger to Hiranyavarman saying that his Sikhandin was indeed a son. Meanwhile, the king of the Dasarnakas arrived suddenly outside Kampilya and despatched a messenger to the Panchala king, a man who was one of the foremost of Vedic scholars.

The king of the Dasarnakas said to his messenger, 'O duta, say to that worst of kings, the ruler of the Panchalas:

O evil-minded one, you chose my daughter as a wife for your daughter. Today, you will taste the fruit of deception.'

The Brahmana messenger went before Drupada. The king of the Panchalas, with Sikhandin, offered the duta a cow and honey. However, without accepting that worship, the Brahmana delivered Hiranyavarman's rough message.

The duta said, 'My lord Hiranyavarman says: O vile Drupada, you have deceived me. I will kill you and all your counsellors, sons and kin!'

Forced to listen to King Hiranyavarman's censure in the midst of his counsellors, Drupada assumed a mild and friendly manner and said, "My reply to my brother's words I will send to him with my duta."

Drupada sent a Brahmana, learned in the Vedas, to Hiranyavarman.

The messenger delivered this message: "Sikhandin is my son, you can have him examined. Somebody has lied to you; do not believe the liar."

King Hiranyavarman of the Dasarnakas was filled with sorrow. He sent some beautiful virgins to ascertain the truth about Sikhandin's sex. These maidens returned and told the king that Sikhandin was a powerfully built man. The king of the Dasarnakas was filled with great joy. He accepted Drupada's hospitality and stayed happily with him for a while.

In his joy, he gave Sikhandin much wealth, many elephants, horses, cows and bulls. For as long as he was there, Drupada treated him worshipfully, and, before leaving, Hiranyavarman rebuked his daughter for what she had done. Sikhandin rejoiced that Hiranyavarman left in joy and with his anger pacified.

Meanwhile, a while after Sikhandin became a man, Kubera, in the course of his wanderings over the world, borne as always on the shoulders of men, arrived at the home of the Yaksha Sthuna. From the sky, he looked down at the Yaksha Sthuna's palace and saw that it was adorned with beautiful garlands of flowers, and perfumed with fragrant extracts of fine grass and other sweet scents. It was decked with canopies, and incense wafted in the air. Beautiful flags and banners adorned the palace, which was filled with food and drink of every kind.

Kubera, lord of the Yakshas, saw Sthuna's glorious abode filled also with strings of jewels and gems, perfumed with the fragrance of many different kinds of flowers, well-watered and swept.

He said to the Yakshas in his train, "My mighty ones, grand indeed is this mansion of Sthuna's, but why does the wicked one not come out to greet me, though he knows I am here? He deserves some stern punishment."

The Yakshas said, "Lord, the king Drupada had a daughter born to him, named Sikhandini. Sthuna has given her his own manhood and become a woman in her place. He remains inside his palace because he is ashamed to come before you. Now do what you think is right."

Kubera ordered his chariot to stop there and Sthuna brought before him, still repeatedly vowing to punish Sthuna. Summoned by the lord of Yakshas, Sthuna came out and stood before his Lord, head bent in shame.

The Lord of treasures cursed him in anger, "Guhyakas, let this wretched Yaksha remain a woman!

Sinner, you have shamed all Yakshas by giving your manhood to Sikhandini and becoming a woman. You have done what no one has ever done before, and from this day you shall remain a woman and she a man."

Now all the Yakshas tried to pacify him for Sthunakarna's sake and begged him to limit his curse.

Kubera relented, "After Sikhandin's death, O Yakshas, this one will regain his own form. So, let the noble Sthuna not worry."

And the illustrious lord of the Yakshas received worship and departed with his colourful and wild people, who could travel great distances in short time. And, thus cursed, Sthuna continued living in his fine sanctuary.

When Hiranyavarman left, Sikhandin came at once to the Yaksha Sthuna, as he had promised. Sthuna was pleased that the prince had kept his word, and he told Sikhandin everything that had happened.

The Yaksha said equably, "O Kshatriya, because of you, Vaisravana cursed me. Go now and live happily amongst men as you please. Both your arrival and Kubera's visit were fated, and they could not be avoided."

Sikhandin went back to his city, full of joy. He worshipped the gods, the Brahmanas, the great ancestral trees and the crossroads with all kinds of garlands and costly gifts. Drupada, king of the Panchalas, his son Sikhandin whose wish had been crowned with success, and his kinsmen, all rejoiced. The king sent his son Sikhandin, who had once been a woman, to Acharya Drona as a sishya. With all of you, Sikhandin mastered all four parts of the astra shastra, as did his brother Dhrishtadyumna.

Rajan, I gathered all this information through my spies whom I set on Drupada, disguised as fools or blind men.

This is how Maharatha Sikhandin of the Panchalas was born as a girl, and later became a man. And it was the king of Kasi's eldest daughter, Amba, who was born into Drupada's royal house as Sikhandin.

If Sikhandin comes to fight me, bow in hand, I will not so much as look at him, let alone attack that prince. The world knows that I have vowed never to take up arms against a woman, or one who was once a woman, or one who has a woman's name, or one who looks like a woman. I will not kill Sikhandin. Now that I know about this prince's past, I will not slay him in battle even if he rides at me with his weapon raised. If I, Bhishma, kill a woman, the righteous will speak ill of me." When he heard this, Duryodhana, after a moment's reflection, agreed with Bhishma.'

Sanjaya says, 'When night passed and morning broke, your sons, standing in the midst of their vast legions, asked their Pitamaha, "O Gangaputra, Yudhishtira's army is ready for war; it teems with men, elephants and horses; Maharathas throng its ranks and protected by these mighty bowmen—Bhima, Arjuna and others headed by Dhrishtadyumna, who are all like the rulers of the world—that great force is impregnable, invincible; it resembles the endless sea. Even the gods cannot perturb it in battle; how long will it take you to raze Yudhishtira's army? How long will Acharya Drona need, and Kripa, and Karna who loves battle? How long will that Brahmanottama, Aswatthama son of Drona, need? My army has you all, who have devastras at your command.

I am beset by curiosity. Mahabaho, tell me what I want to know."

Bhishma said, "First among Kurus, your question about the strength and weakness of your enemy is worthy. I will tell you of my prowess in battle, of my own strength and the power of my weapons. One should fight common soldiers in a simple, straightforward way, but one must use cunning with those who resort to deception. This is the dharma of a Kshatriya.

I can indeed raze the Pandava army. Every morning, I can mark ten thousand common warriors and a thousand chariot-warriors to kill, and accomplish my task by dusk. So, given time, donning my impenetrable kavacha and putting forth my tireless urjas, I can entirely destroy the vast enemy forces. However, if I loose my devastras, which consume thousands in moments, I can complete the massacre in a month."

Duryodhana then asked Drona, "Acharya, in how much time can you annihilate the legions of Pandu's son?"

Drona said, smiling, "I am old, Mahabaho. My tejas and urjas have both waned, but with the fire of my astras I can, like Santanu's son Bhishma, consume the Pandava army in a month."

Then Kripa declared that he could finish the enemy in two months. Drona's son Aswatthama swore that he would do the same in ten nights; and Karna, who commanded the most potent astras, claimed he would achieve that feat in five days.

Bhishma laughed aloud to listen to Karna, "Radheya, your vainglory will last until you encounter Arjuna, flying into battle on his chariot, with his conch, bows and arrows, and with Krishna beside him. You can say anything you like, for talk is cheap."'

Vaisampayana said, "When Yudhishtira hears what the Kuru commanders said, he summons his brothers and speaks privately to them.

Yudhishtira says, 'The spies I sent into Duryodhana's army brought me news this morning.

They told me that Duryodhana asked Bhishma how long it would take him to raze our army and Bhishma said he could do it in a month. Drona declared that he could achieve the same thing in the same time; Kripa indicated twice that period; so we have heard. Aswatthama, who has powerful astras, said he would take only ten nights; and Karna, who, also, can summon the most devastating astras, declared that he could complete the slaughter in five days.

Arjuna, I want to hear what you have to say. How long will you take to vanquish the enemy?'

Dhananjaya, of the curly hair, glances at Krishna and says, 'Bhishma and all these other warriors are Mahatmans, masters of arms and all the methods and vyuhas of war. They can, doubtlessly, destroy our forces as they have said. But, my lord, dispel the anxiety in your heart. With Krishna beside me, from a single chariot, I, Arjuna, can incinerate the three worlds, with even the gods, and indeed all living creatures that were, are and will be in the blink of an eye. This is my belief.

I still command the awesome astra which Mahadeva, Lord of all creatures, gave me when I fought him hand-to-hand, when he came as a Vetala; the Pasupatastra is still mine. O Naravyaghra, I have, besides, the astra that Mahadeva uses to destroy creation during the Pralaya at the end of a Yuga. Bhishma knows nothing of that astra, nor do Drona, Kripa and Drona's son. How can the Sutaputra Karna have any knowledge of it? However, it is adharma, and a great sin, to use such devastras against ordinary mortals in war. We will vanquish our enemies in a fair contention.

Then, Rajan, look at all these mighty kings, your allies. They are all masters of devastras and all eager for battle. After their initiation into the Vedas, they have all performed the final ritual bath in great yagnas. All of them are undefeated, and they can vanquish even the host of the Devas in battle.

You have for your allies these incomparable Kshatriyas: Sikhandin and Yuyudhana; Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata vamsa; Bhimasena and Madri's twins; Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas; and Virata and Drupada who are Bhishma and Drona's equals in battle; Mahabaho Sankha, Hidimba's mighty son and his son Anjanaparva, whose strength and prowess defy description; Sini's descendant, Mahabahu Satyaki; and Abhimanyu and Draupadi's five sons.

And then, you, by yourself, Dharmaraja, can destroy the three worlds. O you who are blessed with the effulgence of Indra himself, I know, for it is manifest, that you can turn any man, whom you look upon in anger, to ashes.'"

Vaisampayana said, "The next morning, under a cloudless sky, led by Duryodhana, all the kings in his army, prepare themselves for the great war, what will be the Mahabharata yuddha, against the Pandavas. They leave Hastinapura and go forth to Kurukshetra like a sea leaving its bed.

They take ritual baths of purification; they put on royal white robes and drape garlands around their necks. They pour ritual offerings onto sacred fires, and when they have received the blessings of their Brahmanas they take up their weapons and raise their standards. All these kings are knowers of the Vedas; they are courageous without exception, and have observed stern vratas. They are great warriors, and men of kingly generosity. Those mighty lords of the Earth, all of them equally confident of their own prowess and that of their companions, share the single-minded desire to attain mukti through battle: the greatest goal of any Kshatriya.

First, the Avantis, Vinda and Anuvinda, the Kekayas and the Bahlikas go forth with Bharadwaja's son, Drona, at their head.

Then come Aswatthama, Bhishma and Jayadratha of the Sindhus; the kings of the southern and the western countries and of the mountainous regions; Sakuni, king of the Gandharas, all the chiefs of the eastern and the northern regions, the Sakas, the Kiratas, the Yavanas, the Sibis and the Vasatis with their Maharathas at the heads of their respective divisions: all these great chariot-warriors ride in the second legion.

And next: Kritavarman, at the head of his swarming troops; that Maharatha—the king of the Trigartas; Raja Duryodhana surrounded by his brothers; Sala, Bhurisravas, Salya and Brihadratha the king of the Kosalas. All these, with Dhritarashtra's sons at their head, make up the rear; they are magnificent warriors, without exception, and, uniting together in immaculate formations, their armour shimmering like some vast lake of lustre, they make camp on one side of the hallowed field of Kurukshetra.

Duryodhana has his encampment adorned to look like a second Hastinapura. Indeed, even the citizens of Hastinapura could hardly distinguish their city from the sprawling cantonment. By order of the Kaurava king, there are hundreds of thousands of inaccessible pavilions, each one as grand as his own, for every king in his army. The tents for the troops occupy five yojanas of the field, and the lords of the Earth and their fighting men enter those countless pavilions and tents, all richly appointed and replete with every excellent manner of provender and comfort, even like some unimaginable pride of lions.

Rare and of the finest quality are the supplies and comforts Duryodhana orders for the kings, their footsoldiers, elephants and horses, and all their followers. He makes more than ample provisions for the engineers, bards, singers and panegyrists loyal to him, for the vendors and traders, for prostitutes, spies and the people who have come to witness the great war."

Vaisampayana said, "Like Duryodhana, Yudhishtira, too, commands his heroic legions and warriors led by Dhrishtadyumna. He does this through his Senapati the Panchala prince, through Dhrishtaketu of the Chedis, Kasis and Karushas, as well as through Virata, Drupada, Yuyudhana and Sikhandin, and the two other Panchala princes, the peerless bowmen Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas.

These warriors in their shining kavachas, adorned with golden kundalas, blaze like flames in a ghrita-fed yagna fire and are as resplendent as the great planets in the sky. Yudhishtira Dharmaraja honours all his warriors and then commands them to take the field. He, also, provides the best of food and drink for the Mahatman kings, as also for their footsoldiers, elephants and horses, their camp followers and engineers.

Yudhishtira first has Abhimanyu, Brihanta and Draupadi's five sons set, with Dhrishtadyumna at their head; he then sends Bhima and Arjuna with the second division of his forces. The din that the men make as they harness their horses and elephants and load the chariots with weapons and other battle equipment, and the excited shouts of the soldiers, rises into the heavens. And last of all, the king himself sets out, with Virata, Drupada and all the other kings come to fight for him.

And the army of fierce bowmen that Dhrishtadyumna leads, which until now was gathered in one place, now streams into interminable columns, and looks like the wide and turbulent Ganga. Yudhishtira sends forth his divisions in formations calculated to bewilder Duryodhana; and at this, he succeeds.

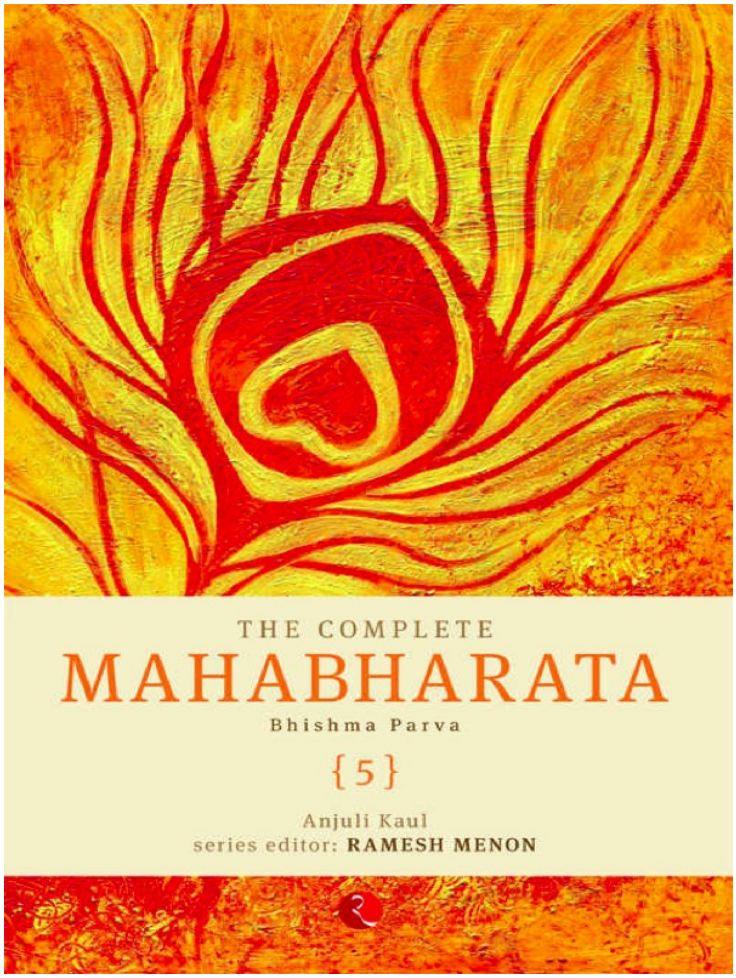
In Yudhishtira's first division ride the five sons of Draupadi, Maharathas; Abhimanyu, Nakula, Sahadeva and all the Prabhadrakas are part of this vast complement of warriors, as are ten thousand horses, two thousand elephants, ten thousand foot-soldiers and five hundred chariots. And Yudhishtira gives charge of this force to Bhimasena.

In the middle division of his army he places Virata and Jayatsena; the two Maharathas Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, those noble Panchala princes, both of great prowess and both armed with maces and bows; and Krishna and Arjuna, as well as countless other master warriors who seethe with rage and warlust. Countless are the valiant horsemen, five thousand the elephants, all these surrounded by fleets of chariots. A thousand fearless footsoldiers, armed with bows, swords and maces, march behind them and a thousand before them, all united in spirit and purpose like a single terrible Being.

In the oceanic division, in which Yudhishtira himself is, numberless great kings ride, along with thousands of elephants, tens of thousands of horses, and thousands upon thousands of chariots and footsoldiers.

Chekitana and the Chedi king Dhrishtaketu march with their own immense akshauhinis; with them rides the most brilliant Satyaki, best of the Vrishni Maharathas, whom hundreds of thousands of chariots surround. The Purusharishabhas Kshattradharma and Kshattradeva bring up the rear, where, also, are carts, stalls, wagons laden with battle-fatigues, other conveyances for immense stores of weapons and provisions, and draught animals, as well; here go thousands of elephants and tens of thousands of horses.



Yudhishtira goes forth slowly, majestically, his elephant divisions bringing all the sickly and women, all the emaciated and the weak to watch the great war; pack animals carry the Pandava king's treasures, and the contents of his granaries. The ever truthful and invincible Sauchitti follows him; and Srenimat, Vasudeva and the king of Kasi's son Vibhu, as well, with twenty-thousand chariots, and a hundred million mettlesome horses with bells on their legs. Twenty-thousand fighting elephants with curved tusks as long as plough-shares, all of the highest pedigree, and looking like dark, rolling cloud masses, bring up the rear, ambling behind the kings, in lordly gait.

Besides these twenty-thousand war-elephants in Yudhishtira's division, are seventy-thousand more, in his army of seven akshauhinis. The juice of musth trickles down their trunks and spills out of their mouths, and they are like moving mountains with spring water flowing down them.

Thus does Yudhishtira array his awesome army, upon which he relies in the war against his cousin Duryodhana. Besides these that I have named, there are others: lakhs of smaller legions of free men, who follow the main body of Pandava army, roaring as they march. Thousands of warriors infused with the joy of imminent battle upon them beat thousands of drums and sound tens of thousands of booming conches," said Vaisampayana.

THE COMPLETE
MAHABHARATA
Bhishma Parva

series editor: RAMESH MENON

THE MAHABHARATA of Veda Vyasa is the longest recorded epic of the world. With almost 100,000 verses, it is many times as long as the Iliad and the Odyssey combined and has deeply influenced every aspect of the Indian ethos for some 4,000 years.

The main theme is the Great War in Kurukshetra, but the epic teems with smaller stories, and other stories within these, all woven together with a genius that defies comparison. As its heart, it contains Krishna's immortal Bhagavad Gita, the Song of God.

The Mahabharata embodies the ancient and sacred Indian tradition, in all its earthy and spiritual immensity. Famously, 'What is found here may be found elsewhere. What is not found here will not be found elsewhere.'

Many believe this most magnificent epic to be the greatest story ever told. Yet, the only full Indian translation of the Mahabharata into English is the 19th century one by Kisari Mohan Ganguli. More than a hundred years have passed since Ganguli accomplished his task, and the language he used is now, sadly, archaic.

THIS NEW TWELVE VOLUME SERIES RETELLS THE GREAT EPIC, LINE BY LINE, IN FRESH, EASILY READABLE ENGLISH PROSE. WITH IT, WE HOPE TO BRING THE MAHABHARATA ALIVE AGAIN, FOR THE CONTEMPORARY AND THE FUTURE READER.

JAMBU-KHANDA NIRAMAN PARVA

AUM! Having bowed down to Narayana, and Nara, the most exalted of Purushas, and also to the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Janamejaya asked, “How did those heroes, the Kurus, the Pandavas and the Somakas, and the great kings assembled together from various countries, fight?”

Vaisampayana replied, “O lord of the earth, hear now how those heroes, the Kurus, the Pandavas, and the Somakas fought on the sacred plain of Kurukshetra. Seeking victory, the mighty Pandavas, along with the Somakas, advance against the Kauravas. Accomplished masters of the Vedas, they take great delight in battle. Eager for success, they and their legions face the war.

Approaching the army of Dhritarashtra’s son, those invincible warriors and their troops station on the western part of the plain, facing the east. Yudhishtira, the son of Kunti, has thousands of tents erected beyond Samantapanchaka. The whole earth seems then to be empty, divested of horses and men, destitute of chariots and elephants, with only the children and the old left at home.

That immense force has come from all of Jambudwipa over which the sun sheds his rays. Men of all races assemble together and occupy an area of many yojanas over plains, rivers, hills and forests. That bull among men, king Yudhishtira, orders excellent food and other things of enjoyment for all of them and their animals. He fixes diverse code-words for them so that anyone saying these would be known as belonging to the Pandavas, and also gives names and badges to all of them for recognition during the war.

Seeing the standard-top of Pritha’s son, the great son of Dhritarashtra, with a white royal parasol held over his head, in the midst of a thousand elephants, surrounded by his ninety-nine brothers and allied kings, begins to dispose his troops against the son of Pandu. Seeing Duryodhana, the Panchalas, who take delight in battle, are filled with joy and blow on their booming conches and clash cymbals of sweet sounds.

Watching the happy troops, the hearts of Pandu's son and Vasudeva fill with joy. And those tigers among men, Krishna and Arjuna, seated together in one chariot, blow their celestial conches. And hearing the blast of the Panchajanya and the echoing blast of the Devadatta, the enemy soldiers are terrified, even as other animals are filled with fear on hearing the roar of the lion; many helplessly urinate and even defecate.

A frightful pall of dust arises and nothing can be seen, for, suddenly enveloped by it, the sun himself seems to have set. A black cloud pours a shower of flesh and blood over the troops all around. All this seems macabre and extraordinary. A wind rises, blowing along the earth numberless tiny stones, and harries the hundreds and thousands of fighting men.

Despite that, O king, both armies, filled with joy, stand keen for battle on Kurukshetra like two stormy seas. Indeed, that encounter of the two armies is wonderful, like that of two oceans when the end of the Yuga has arrived. The whole world is empty, having only the children and the old left at home, from that vast army having been mustered by the Kauravas.

O Bharatarishabha, then the Kurus, the Pandavas, and the Somakas make certain covenants, and agree on the laws governing the different kinds of combat. In order to fight fairly, men equally circumstanced must encounter each other. And if, having fought fairly, the combatants withdraw, they should be able to do so without fear of being attacked. Those who engage in contests of words should be fought with words. Those that leave the ranks should never be killed.

A warrior in a chariot should be opposed by another such warrior; one on the neck of an elephant should have a similar adversary; a horseman should be met by a horseman, and a foot-soldier, O Bhaarata, should be met by a foot-soldier.

Guided by considerations of fitness, willingness, daring and strength, one fighting man should strike another, after giving notice. An unprepared or panic-stricken opponent must not be attacked. A soldier who is engaged with another, or is seeking refuge, or retreating, or one whose weapon is broken, or one unprotected by armour, should never be shot at or struck. Charioteers, animals yoked to chariots or bearing weapons, men engaged in the transport of weapons, drummers and blowers of conches, must never be assaulted.

Having decided on these rubrics of battle, the Kurus, and the Pandavas, and the Somakas gaze at each other in awe. After positioning their troops, the exhilaration felt by these powerful and high-souled men is reflected in their faces, which shine.”

Vaisampayana said, "Seeing the two armies standing on the east and the west for the fierce and imminent war, the holy Rishi Vyasa, the son of Satyavati, learned in the Vedas, that grandfather of the Bhaaratas, trikalagyani, knower of the past, the present and the future, seeing everything every time as if they were before his eyes, says these words in private to the royal son of Vichitravirya, who is distressed and dejected, thinking of the evil policy of his own sons.

Vyasa says, 'Dhritarashtra, the day of reckoning for your sons and the other kings has arrived. Assembled for battle they will kill one another. O Bhaarata, their hour having come, they will all perish. Bearing in mind the changes brought on by time, do not grieve. O king, if you wish to see them fighting, I will grant you vision. Behold the war.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'O Maharishi, I would not like to watch the slaughter of kinsmen. I will, however, through your powers, listen to the details of this battle.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Upon his not wanting to see the battle but wishing to hear of it, Vyasa, that lord of boons, gives a boon to Sanjaya and says to Dhritarashtra, 'O Rajan, Sanjaya will describe the war to you. Nothing in the war will be hidden from his eyes. Endowed with celestial vision, Sanjaya will describe the fighting to you. He will have knowledge of everything.

Sanjaya will know everything: that which is manifest or concealed, occurring by day or by night, even that which is thought of in the mind. Weapons will not hurt him and exertion will not fatigue him. This son of Gavalgani will come out of the battle alive.

As for myself, I will spread the fame of these Kurus, and of the Pandavas. Do not grieve. This is destiny, O tiger among men. It does not become you to give way to grief. The war cannot be prevented. As for victory, it lies with the righteous.

There will be great slaughter in this war. I see numerous omens of terror. Hawks and vultures, crows and herons, together with cranes, alight on the tops of trees and gather in swarms. Delighted at the prospect of battle, these birds look down on the field before them. Carnivorous beasts will feed on the flesh of elephants and horses. Fierce herons, foreboding terror, and uttering merciless cries, circle across the centre of the field towards the south.

In both the twilights of every day, I see, O Bhaarata, the sun, while rising and setting, covered by headless trunks. Tri-coloured clouds with their white and red ends and black necks, charged with lightning, and shaped like maces, envelop the sun at both dawn and dusk. I see the sun, the moon and the stars to be all ablaze, with no difference in their appearance at nightfall. I have seen this all day and all night. All of it forebodes fear.

On even the full moon night of the month of Kartika, the moon becomes invisible, or turns the colour of fire, the sky being of the hue of a lotus. Many heroic kings and princes, with arms like maces, will be slain and strewn upon the earth. Every night, in the sky I hear the fierce cries of battling boars and cats. The idols of the Devas and Devis sometimes laugh, sometimes tremble; sometimes they vomit blood through their mouths, sometimes they sweat and sometimes fall down.

Drums, without being beaten, sound, and the great chariots of Kshatriyas move without being drawn by yoked horses. Kokilas, wood-peckers, water-cocks, parrots, crows, and peacocks utter fell cries. Here and there, cavalry soldiers, encased in mail, armed with weapons, shout fiercely. At sunrise, millions of insects fly everywhere in thick swarms. At both dawn and dusk, the four quarters of the earth seem to be on fire, and the clouds, Bhaarata, shower down dirt and flesh.

Arundhati, who is celebrated over the three worlds and applauded by the righteous, keeps her lord Vasistha at her back. The planet Sani appears to afflict the constellation Rohini. The sign of the deer in the moon has shifted from its usual position. A great terror is indicated. A dreadful roaring can be heard in the cloudless sky. The animals are all weeping, their tears falling fast.'"

"Vyasa says, 'Cows are giving birth to asses. Men desire sexual pleasure with their mothers. The trees in the forests exhibit unseasonal flowers and fruit. Pregnant women, and even those who are not, are giving birth to monsters. Carnivorous beasts and birds live and feed together. Ill-omened beasts, some with three horns, some with four eyes, some with five legs, some with two sexual organs, some with two heads, some with two tails, some with fierce fangs, are being born, and maws agape, utter unholy cries. Horses with three legs and strange crests, with four rows of teeth and horns, are also being born.

O Rajan! Strange sights are seen in your city: the wives of many Brahmavadis are giving birth to eagles and peacocks, the mare is bringing forth a calf and the bitch jackals and cocks, while deer and parrots all screech inauspiciously.

Some women give birth to four or five daughters together, who begin to dance, sing and laugh as soon as they are born. The coarse laughing, dancing and singing of the lowest born portend dire events. Infants, as if drawn by death, fight each other with clubs and break down the little towns they built while playing.

Many kinds of lotuses and lilies grow on trees. Fierce winds blow and dust flies everywhere.

The earth trembles frequently and Rahu approaches the Sun. The white Ketu stays still, having passed beyond the asterism of Chitra. All these prophesy the destruction of the Kurus. A fierce comet rises, afflicting the constellation of Pusya. This great thing will bring calamity on both the armies.

Mars spins towards Magha and Brihaspati towards Sravana. Sani approaches the nakshatra Bhaga, afflicting it. Sukra, ascending towards Purva Bhadra, shines brilliantly, and wheels towards and faces the Uttara Bhadra arranging itself next to a smaller planet. Ketu, blazing like fire mixed with smoke, is stationary, having attacked the bright star of Jyeshta so sacred to Indra.

Dhruva burns strongly and turns to his right. Both the Moon and the Sun afflict Rohini. Ferocious Rahu has taken up his position between the constellations of Chitra and Swati. The red-bodied, fiery Mars orbits circuitously, staying aligned with the nakshatra of Sravana over-ridden by Brihaspati.

The Earth that produces crops each in their season is now covered with crops of every season. Every barley-stalk is graced with five ears, and every paddy-stalk with a hundred. When milked after their calves have suckled, cows, those best of creatures upon whom the universe depends, flow only blood.

Radiant beams of light emerge from bows, and swords shine brightly. It appears that the weapons can already see the war before them, as if it is already being fought. The weapons, the water, and the coats of armour all assume the colour of fire.

A great slaughter will take place. In this battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas, O Bhaarata, the earth will be a river of blood and the standards of warriors its rafts. The wild cries of animals and birds with blazing mouths are evil omens of dreadful outcomes. A fierce bird with but one wing, one eye, and one leg, hovering over the sky in the night, screams in such great anger, so as to make its hearers vomit blood.

It seems, O great king, that all weapons are now shining radiantly. The lustre of the Saptarishi mandala has been dimmed. Having approached the asterism of Visakha, Brihaspati and Sani, ablaze, have been still there for a whole year.

Three lunations twice meeting together in the course of the same lunar fortnight, the duration of the latter is shortened by two days. On the thirteenth day, therefore, from the first lunation, according to whether it is the day of the full moon or the new moon, the Moon and the Sun are afflicted by Rahu. Such strange eclipses, both lunar and solar, forebode a great carnage.

Overwhelmed by showers of dust, all the quarters of the earth look inauspicious. Predicting danger, angry clouds rain bloody showers during the night. Rahu of fierce deeds also balefully impacts the constellation of Krittika. Rough winds of evil omen are constantly blowing. All these will beget a war of numberless sorrows and untold grief.

The Nakshatras are of three types: the Deva, the Asura and the Manushya. A malignant planet casts its influence upon at least one of each, foreshadowing terrifying dangers. A lunar fortnight usually consists of fourteen, fifteen or sixteen days. Never have I known the day of new moon to fall on the thirteenth day from the first lunation, or the day of full moon on the thirteenth day from the same. And yet, in the course of the same month both the moon and the sun have undergone eclipses on the thirteenth days from the day of the first lunation. These will result in a great massacre of the earth's creatures.

Though drinking blood in mouthfuls, the rakshasas are not satiated. The great rivers are flowing back to their sources, and their waters have become bloody. The wells are frothing and bellowing like bulls. Meteors, effulgent like Indra's thunderbolt, fall in showers with loud hisses. This night will be followed by direst evil.

People will have to light torches when they emerge from their houses to assemble and still be enveloped in the encircling thick gloom. Great Rishis have said that in such circumstances the earth drinks the blood of thousands of kings.

From the peaks of Kailasa, Mandara and Himavat, thousands of explosions are heard and hundreds of great crags and peaks come crashing off their summits. Earthquakes swell the four oceans, which threaten to break their banks and sweep over the continents to drown the land.

Violent winds filled with sharp pebbles blow and mighty trees fall. In villages and towns both sacred and ordinary trees are struck by lightning and felled by savage winds. When Brahmanas pour libations onto the sacrificial fire, it burns blue, or red, or yellow. Its flames bend towards the left, giving off a vile stench and loud reports.

Touch, smell and taste, O king, have changed their very nature.

The flagstaffs of warriors tremble continually and emit smoke. Drums and cymbals shower coal-dust. And from the tops of tall trees all around, crows, wheeling in circles from the left, utter fierce cries of paka! paka! and perch upon the tops of standards for the destruction of the kings.

Demented wild elephants, their great bodies shaking in fear, dash here and there, spraying urine and dung. The horses in our stables are all melancholy, while our elephants wade into water. O Bhaarata, pay heed to all these omens, and do what needs to be done so that the world may not be completely destroyed.'"

Vaisampayana continued, “Hearing these words of his father, Dhritarashtra says, ‘I think all this has been preordained. A great slaughter of men will indeed take place. If the kings die in battle observing Kshatriya dharma, they will be assured a place in those blessed regions where heroes go when they die and will find only happiness there. These great Purushavyaghras, who give up their lives in this battle, will win fame in this world and great bliss in the next.’

O great king, thus addressed by his son Dhritarashtra, that prince of poets, the Muni Vyasa concentrates his mind in supreme dhyana. After meditating for a short time, Vyasa says, ‘Without doubt, O king of kings, it is Time that destroys the universe. It is Time also that creates the worlds. Nothing here is eternal. Show the path of dharma to the Kurus, to your kinsmen, relatives and friends. You have the power to restrain them. The slaughter of kinsmen has been declared sinful. Do not do that which is disagreeable to me.

Rajan, Death himself has been born in the guise of your son. Killing is never praised in the Vedas. It can never be beneficial. The members of one’s race are as the limbs and organs of one’s own body. Those limbs slay him that destroys them. Although you can well walk the righteous path of dharma, it is for the destruction of this race and of those kings of the earth that Time makes you deviate onto the evil path like one in distress.

O Rajan, your kingdom brings calamity upon you. Your virtue has been greatly diminished. Show your sons the meaning of dharma. You invincible one, of what value is that kingdom which brings sin upon you? Protect your good name, your virtue, and your fame. Then alone can you win heaven. Let the Pandavas have their kingdom, and let the Kauravas have peace.’

While Vyasa Brahmanottama is speaking, sadly, Dhritarashtra, the eloquent son of Ambika, once more addresses him, ‘My knowledge of life and death is similar to yours and I know the truth of these things. Yet when a man’s own interests are involved, he loses his discernment.

Father, I am like any ordinary man. I ask you to extend your boundless power to us. As a self-controlled soul you are our refuge and our guru. My sons do not obey me, great Rishi. I too am not inclined to commit this enormous sin. You are the cause of the fame, the achievements, and the inclination for virtue, of the Bhaaratas. You are the revered grandfather of both the Kurus and the Pandavas.’

Vyasa says, ‘Royal son of Vichitravirya, tell me openly what is in your mind and I will remove your doubts.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Holy one, tell me about all that happens to those that will be victorious in battle.’

Vyasa says, ‘The sacred fire glows and its light ascends upwards. Its flame bends towards the right. It blazes up without being smoky. The offerings poured on it give out a sweet fragrance. It is said that these are the indications of future victory. The conches and cymbals emit deep, sweet sounds. The Sun and the Moon emanate pure rays. It is said that these are the signs of future success.

Crows, whether stationary or in flight, utter agreeable cries. Those that are behind them, encourage the warriors to advance; while they that are ahead forbid all advance. Where vultures, swans, parrots, cranes and woodpeckers utter delighted cries, and turn towards the right, the Brahmanas say that victory in war is certain there. Those armies whose ornaments, armour and standards shine so brightly that one cannot gaze upon them, and whose horses neigh melodiously, will always defeat their enemies.

The warriors who utter cheerful, energetic shouts, O Bhaarata, and whose garlands do not fade, always win in battle. Having penetrated the legions of their adversaries with cheerful cries, they who utter kind words, even to the enemy, and warn them before attacking, are victorious. The objects of the senses, not changing for the worse, become auspicious. Another indication of a victorious army is the joy among the soldiers at all times. Other signs of success include favourable winds, clouds and birds, while clouds and the rainbows bring beneficial rain.

This, O king, is what happens to the armies about to be crowned with victory, while the opposite happens to those that are about to be destroyed. Whether the army is small or large, the morale of the combatants is said to be a sure indication of victory.

One panic stricken soldier can cause even a vast army to take flight. And when this happens, it frightens even heroic warriors. If such an army is once broken and put to flight, it cannot be stopped, even like a frightened herd of deer or a powerful wave of water.

It is impossible to rally a mighty army once routed; why, seeing this, even those best fighters lose heart. Watching frightened and fleeing soldiers makes the panic spread in other directions, and soon the whole army is demoralised and scatters in all directions. And when an army is routed, even brave leaders cannot rally them.

Always exerting himself with activity, an intelligent man should strive to win success using peaceful means. It is said that the noblest success is that which is won through negotiation. That which is achieved by creating dissension in the enemy ranks is undistinguished. But the victory which is won by war is the worst.

There are many evils in battle, the first and greatest one being killing. Even fifty brave men who know one another, who are calm and determined, and free from family ties, can crush a large army. Even five, six, or seven men, who are unyielding, can achieve victory.

Vinata's son Garuda, O Bhaarata, did not ask for the help of many followers to defeat a great flight of birds. The numerical strength of an army is not always the reason for its victory. Victory is uncertain. It depends on chance. Even those who are victorious have to sustain losses.'"

Vaisampayana said, “Having spoken thus to Dhritarashtra, Vyasa departs. And Dhritarashtra, having heard those words, reflects in silence and soon begins to sigh repeatedly.

And then, Bharatarishabha, he tells the noble-souled Sanjaya, ‘O Sanjaya, these kings, these lords of the earth, so brave and taking pleasure in battle, are in favour of striking one another with a variety of weapons. They are prepared to lay down their lives for the sake of owning the earth. Impossible to restrain, they are, indeed, killing one another to increase the population of Yama’s kingdom. They are incapable of tolerating each other because of their desire to possess the earth and be prosperous.

Therefore, I believe that the earth must have many wondrous qualities. Tell me about these, O Sanjaya. Many thousands, millions, tens of millions, many hundreds of millions of heroic men have come together at Kurujangala. I want to hear in accurate detail about the locations and sizes of their countries and cities. Through the power of Vyasa’s boundless tejas, you are endowed with the light of divine vision and knowledge.’

Sanjaya says, ‘Wise king, I will describe to you the merits of the earth according to my knowledge. You can see them with your eye of wisdom. I bow to you, O bull of Bharata’s race.

Creatures in this world are of two kinds, mobile and immobile. By birth mobile creatures are oviparous, viviparous, and those engendered by heat and damp. Of these the foremost are the viviparous of which the leading ones are men and animals. There are fourteen species of animals, O king. Seven live in forests, and seven are domestic. Lions, tigers, boars, buffaloes, elephants, bears and monkeys are regarded as wild. Cows, goats, sheep, horses, mules, asses and men are the seven animals regarded as domestic by the learned.

These fourteen species of domestic and wild animals are mentioned in the Vedas, and sacrifices rest upon them. Of creatures that are domestic, men are foremost, while lions are the foremost of those that live in forests. All creatures support themselves by living upon one another.

Vegetables are said to be immobile; their five species include trees, shrubs, creepers, creeping plants living for only a year, and all stemless grasses. Thus there are a total of nineteen species of mobile and immobile creatures, and there are five of their universal constituents, the panchabhutas.

These twenty-four are described as Gayatri Brahman as everyone knows. He who truly knows these to be the sacred Gayatri, having every virtue, cannot be annihilated in this world. Everything comes from the Earth and everything, when destroyed, merges back into the Earth. Bhumi is the home and refuge of all creatures, and it is eternal. He who has the Earth, controls the entire universe with its mobile and immobile creatures. It is for this desire to possess the Earth, that kings kill one another.'"

Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, so knowing of all things on the earth, the names of rivers and mountains, and its forests, and their dimensions, give me a detailed description of them all.'

Sanjaya says, 'Great king, since everything in the universe possesses the five elements, the wise deem all of them equal. These panchabhutas are space, air, fire, water, and earth. Their respective attributes are sound, touch, sight, taste, and smell. In addition to what is notably its own quality, each of these elements has the attribute or attributes of that or those coming before it.

The earth, say the Rishis, is the first among them all, possessing as it does the qualities of the other four, besides what is specially its own. Water has four attributes but not scent. Fire has three, sound, touch, and sight. Sound and touch belong to air, while space, akasa, has sound alone.

The existence of all living things depends, O king, on these qualities of the panchabhutas.

When the universe is held in balance, they exist in their natural state, separate and independent. When, however, they exist in conjunction with one another, then creatures with bodies spring into life. This is the unchanging order of things.

The elements are destroyed and the one succeeding merges into the one that precedes; and so also do they spring into existence, one arising from the one before it. All these are immeasurable, their forms being Brahman itself. In the world creatures consisting of the five elements can be seen. Men strive to discover their forms by using reason. However, inconceivable matters should never be sought to be understood by reason. That which is beyond human nature is an indication of the inconceivable.

But, O Kurunandana, I will describe to you the island of Sudarsana. This dwipa, Rajan, is formed like a wheel. Rivers and lakes cover it and its mountains look like a blur of massed clouds; it has many cities and delightful regions. It is also full of blossoming trees, which bear sweet fruit, varied crops, and other kinds of wealth. The ocean of salt surrounds it on all sides.

As a man can see his own face in a mirror, even so is the island called Sudarsana seen in the lunar disc. Two of its parts seem to look like a pipal tree, while two others appear like a large hare. It is surrounded on all sides with an assortment of deciduous plants. Besides these, the rest is covered by water. I will describe more to you in brief, and the rest later. Now listen to what I describe in brief.'

"Dhritarashtra says, 'You are intelligent, O Sanjaya, and know the truth about everything. You have described the dwipa in brief. Now tell us about the island in detail. Tell me about the size of the expanse of land that looks like a hare. Then speak of the part resembling the pipal tree.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Sanjaya says, 'Stretching from east to west, between the two oceans, are six mountains of equal majesty. These are Himavat, Hemakuta, that most excellent mountain named Nishadha, Nila abundant with lapis lazuli, Sweta as white as the moon, and the mountain Sringavat made of many metals.

These six mountains are always the abodes of Siddhas and Charanas. A thousand yojanas lie between each of them, and many delightful kingdoms are situated there.

These divisions are called Varshas, O Bhaarata. Creatures of diverse species live in those kingdoms. The land where we are is in the Varsha named after Bharata. Moving northwards, the next is the Himavatvarsha. The land beyond Hemakuta is called Harivarsha. South of the Nila range and north of the Nishadha is a mountain called Malyavat that extends from east to west. Beyond Malyavat to the north is the mountain Gandhamadana.

Between these two lies the greatest mountain, called Meru, made of gold. Effulgent as the morning sun, it is like fire without smoke. Both its height and its depth measure eighty-four thousand yojanas. It stands bearing the worlds above, below and across.

Four islands are located near Meru: Bhadraswa, Ketumala, Jambudwipa otherwise called Bharatavarsha, and Uttara-Kuru which is the abode of men of dharma. The bird Sumukha, the son of Suparna, seeing that all the birds on Meru had golden plumage, thought that he should leave that mountain since no distinction could be made between the good, average and lowly birds. The luminous Sun, the Moon with its attendant nakshatras and Vayu the Wind-god all circle Meru.

The mountain, O king, is abundant in celestial fruits and flowers, and it is dotted with sparkling golden mansions. There, on that mountain, the heavenly beings, the Gandharvas, the Asuras, and the Rakshasas, accompanied by the Apsaras, frolic and play.

There Brahma and Rudra and also Sakra the king of the Devas, assemble to perform many kinds of sacrifices with bountiful gifts. Tumburu, and Narada and Viswavasu, and the Hahas and the Huhus, go there to praise them with sublime hymns.

The great-souled Saptarishis and Kasyapa, the lord of creatures, go there on every parva day. Upon its peak, Usanas, Sukra otherwise called the Kavi, sports with his disciples, the Daityas.

All the jewels and gemstones that we see and all the mountains abounding in precious stones are of Meru. A fourth part of this is enjoyed by the holy Kubera. Only a sixteenth part of that wealth is given to men. On the northern side of Meru is the lovely forest of karnikaras, extending over a range of hills and covered with the flowers of every season.

There the illustrious Pasupati himself, the creator of all things, resplendent with his three sun-like eyes, surrounded by his celestial ganas and accompanied by Uma, wears a chain of karnikara flowers on his neck, which reach down to his feet. Only the ascetic Siddhas can gaze upon him for they are truthful, steadfast and practise austere tapasya. Indeed, Maheswara cannot even be seen by evil men.

From the summit of that mountain, like a stream of milk, O ruler of men, the sacred and auspicious Ganga, Bhagirathi adored by the most righteous, gushes like a cataract, with a tremendous sound, falling headlong into the delightful lake Chandramas.

Indeed that sea-like sacred lake was formed by Ganga herself. While leaping from the mountains, Ganga, too turbulent to be supported by even the mountains, was held for a hundred thousand years by Siva, the bearer of the Pinaka, on his head.

On the western side of Meru, lie Ketumala and Jambu-khanda, both great seats of humanity. There, O Bhaarata, the span of human life is ten thousand years. The men all have golden complexions, and the women are like Apsaras. They dwell in happiness without sickness or sorrow. The men born there are of the radiance of liquid gold.

On the summits of Gandhamadana, Kubera, the lord of the Guhyakas, with many Rakshasas and Apsaras, passes his time in joy. Besides Gandhamadana there are many smaller mountains and hills. The measure of human life there is eleven thousand years. There, O king, the men are most energetic, strong and full of good cheer; the women are all very beautiful, with the complexion of lotus flowers.

Beyond Nila is the Varsha called Sweta, beyond Sweta is Hiranyakavarsha, and beyond that lies Airavatavarsha, the vast. The last Varsha in the extreme north and Bharata's Varsha in the extreme south are both shaped in the form of a bow.

The five Varshas of Sweta, Hiranyaka, Elavrita, Harivarsha, and Himavatvarsha lie in the middle, and Elavrita is at the very heart of them all. Amongst these seven Varshas, the five already mentioned and Airavata and Bharata that which is further north surpasses the one to its immediate south in respect of the lifespan, stature, health, dharma, kama and artha of its inhabitants.

In these Varshas, O Bhaarata, creatures of diverse species co-exist.

Thus is Earth covered with mountains. The majestic mountains of Hemakuta are otherwise called Kailasa where Vaisravana passes his time joyfully with his Guhyakas. Immediately to the north of Kailasa and near the mountains of Mainaka there is a large and beautiful mountain called Manimaya with golden peaks. Beside this mountain is a great, splendid lake with crystal-clear waters called Bindusaras with a beach of golden sand on its shores. There seeing Ganga, since called Bhagirathi after his own name, the Rajarishi Bhagiratha lived for many years in an awesome tapasya.

Numberless sacrificial stakes made of gems and the Chaitya tree made of gold can be seen there. It was there that Indra of a thousand eyes and great fame gained spiritual triumph by performing a thousand sacrifices.

There the Lord of all creatures, the eternal Creator of all the worlds, Siva of supreme tejas, surrounded by his ghostly attendants, the ganas, is adored. There Nara and Narayana, Brahma and Manu, and Sthanu are ever present.

And there the celestial Ganga of three streams, issues out of Brahmaloka, and first shows herself; she then divides herself into seven streams, and becomes Vaswokasara, Nalini, the sin-cleansing Saraswati, Jambunadi, Sita, Ganga and Sindhu. The Supreme Lord himself arranged for the divine river, beyond human understanding, to flow from that place down into this world. It is there that since the beginning of creation, on thousands of occasions, the Devas and Rishis have performed sacrifices, after every pralaya, when creation begins afresh.

As for the Saraswati, in some parts of her course she becomes visible and in some parts remains hidden. This celestial seven-fold Ganga is renowned across the three worlds.

Rakshasas live on Himavat, Guhyakas on Hemakuta, and serpents and Nagas on Nishadha, while Rishis dwell on Gokarna. The Sweta mountains are said to be the abode of the Devas and the Asuras. The Gandharvas always stay on Nishadha, and the regenerate Rishis on Nila. The mountains of Sringavat also are regarded as the resort of the gods.

Thus, O great king, is the world divided into the seven Varshas. Diverse creatures, moving and unmoving, are found in all of them. Both providential and human prosperity are seen in these realms. They cannot be counted. Those who want their wellbeing believe what I have now told you about this delightful land in the form of a hare about which you asked.

At the edges of that region are the northernmost and southernmost Varshas. I have described these as well. The two islands Naga-dwipa and Kasyapa-dwipa are the two ears of this great land shaped like a hare.

The beautiful mountains of Malaya, whose rocks look like plates of copper, are another prominent part of Jambudwipa whose shape resembles a hare.'"

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me in detail, O wise Sanjaya, about the regions to the north and the east of Meru, as also of the mountains of Malyavat.'

Sanjaya continues, 'To the south of the Nila mountain and the northern side of Meru are the sacred Northern Kurus, O king, which are the home of the Siddhas. The trees there are always covered with sweet fruits and flowers. All the flowers are fragrant, and the fruits delicious. Indeed, some of the trees bear fruits according to the desire of the plucker.

Some other trees are described as milk-yielding. These produce milk and the six different kinds of food that taste of Amrita. They also provide cloth and in their fruits lie ornaments to be used by men.

The entire land is covered in fine golden sand. A part of the region has the radiance of gemstones like rubies or diamonds, or of the lapis lazuli. All the seasons there are pleasant and the land has no swamps.

The tanks are charming and full of delicious pellucid water. The men born there have descended from the Devas. All are of pure birth and extremely handsome. Of the fraternal twins the women resemble Apsaras in beauty. They drink the milk, sweet as Amrita, from those milk-yielding trees. Of the twins born there, both men and women possess equal beauty, both are endowed with similar virtues, and both equally resplendent, grow up in love, like a couple of chakravakas.

The people of that province are always happy and free from illness. They live for tens of thousands of years and never abandon one another. A species of birds called bharunda, who have sharp beaks and great strength, lift them up when they die and throw them into mountain caves. I have just described to you, O king, the Northern Kurus briefly.

I will now describe to you the eastern side of Meru. Of all the regions there, the best is called Bhadraswa, where there is a large forest of Bhadrasalas, and a huge tree called Kalamra which always bears flowers and fruit. That tree is a yojana in height and is adored by the Siddhas and the Charanas.

The men there are fair in complexion, and possess great energy and strength. The women have the colour of lilies, and are very beautiful to behold. White and radiant, their faces resemble the full moon; their bodies are as cool as its rays. All of them are skilled in singing and dancing. The life span of humans there, O Bharatarishabha, is ten thousand years. They remain young by drinking the juice of the Kalamra.

To the south of Nila and the north of Nishadha, stands a gigantic Jambu tree that is eternal. Adored by the Siddhas and Charanas, that sacred tree grants every wish. This realm has been named Jambudwipa after this tree. That prince among trees, a thousand and a hundred yojanas tall, touches the very heavens. The circumference of its fruit measures two thousand five hundred cubits, and it bursts open when ripe.

These fruit fall on the earth with a loud sound, and then pour out a silvery juice. That juice of the Jambu becomes a river, and encircling Meru, reaches the land of the Northern Kurus. If the juice of that fruit is drunk, it produces peace of mind. After drinking it, no thirst is ever felt again, nor the weakening effect of ageing.

A type of dazzling gold of the colour of Indragopaka insects called Jambunada, used for celestial ornaments, is found there. The men born there look like the morning sun.

On the summit of Malyavat, the fire called Samvartaka can always be seen, which blazes forth to destroy the universe at the end of the yuga. There are many small mountains towards the east on its peak, and Malyavat, itself, measures eleven thousand yojanas. The men born there have golden-coloured skins and these Brahmavadis are descended from the world of Brahma.

They perform the severest tapasya, drawing their vital seed up into their bodies. For the protection of creatures they all enter the Sun. Numbering sixty-six thousand, they fly before Aruna, surrounding the Sun’s chariot. Heated by the sun’s rays for sixty-six thousand years, they then enter the Moon.’

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me, O Sanjaya, the names of all the Varshas, and of all the mountains, and also about all those that live on those mountains.'

Sanjaya says, 'To the south of Sweta and the north of Nishadha, is the Varsha called Romanaka. The men that are born there are fair in complexion, of good parentage, and handsome. These men also do not have any enemies. And they live joyfully for eleven thousand and five hundred years.

To the south of Nishadha lies the Hiranmayavarsha where the river Hiranvati flows. There, O king, lives that great bird named Garuda. And the people there are all followers of the Yakshas, wealthy, and attractive in appearance. These men are endowed with great strength and happy dispositions. And they live for twelve thousand and five hundred years.

The mountains of Sringavat, O ruler of men, have three beautiful summits. One of these is made of jewels and gemstones; another, also made of all kinds of gems, is adorned with palatial mansions. There lives the self-luminous lady named Sandili.

From the north of Sringavat upto the sea is the Airavatavarsha, the most excellent of them all because of the presence of this jewelled mountain. The Sun gives no heat to this land and men do not age or decay. The Moon and the stars in the sky are the only source of light.

The men born there have the radiance, complexion and fragrance of the lotus; even their eyes resemble lotus-petals. With unblinking eyes, and an agreeable scent, they live without food and have mastery over their senses. Descended from the heavens, they are all without any sin. They live for thirteen thousand years.

To the north of the milky ocean, the Lord Hari of unlimited strength lives in his golden chariot. That vimana, with the speed of the mind, has eight wheels, with many supernatural creatures in it. It is the colour of fire, covered with Jambunada gold, and has a powerful energy.

Lord Hari is the lord of all creatures, and enjoys great wealth. The universe merges into him at the moment of Pralaya, and it again emanates from him when the desire to create takes him once more. He is the principal actor, and the One who directs the actions of others. He, O monarch, is earth, water, space, air, and fire. He is Yagna embodied for all creatures, and Agni is his mouth.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "When Sanjaya says this, the great Dhritarashtra becomes absorbed in thought about his sons. Having thought deeply, and filled with energy, he says, 'Without doubt, O Suta's son, it is Time that ends the universe. And it is Time that again creates everything. Nothing here is eternal. It is the all-knowing Nara and Narayana that destroy all creatures. The gods speak of him as Vaikuntha, of immeasurable might, while men call him Vishnu, one that pervades the Universe!'"

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me Sanjaya about this Varsha that is named after Bharata, where this senseless force has been collected, a land which I know both my son Duryodhana and the sons of Pandu want to possess. Tell me about this place; you are all-knowing.'

Sanjaya says, 'Listen to me, O king. The sons of Pandu do not covet this earth. It is Duryodhana who is greedy, and Sakuni, the son of Subala, and many other Kshatriya rulers who are inimical towards one another.

I will now tell you about Bharatavarsha. This land is loved by Indra, and also by Manu, the son of Vivaswar. It is the beloved of Prithu, of Vainya, of the high-souled Ikshvaku, of Yayati, of Ambarisha, of Mandhatri, of Nahusha, of Muchukunda, of Sibi, the son of Usinara, of Rishava, of Ila, of King Nriga, of Kusika, of the great Gadhi, of Somaka, and of Dilipa, and also of many other mighty Kshatriyas.

Let me describe to you that land as I heard of it. Listen to me, Rajan, as I tell you about what you have asked me. Mahendra, Malaya, Sahya, Suktimat, Rakshavat, Vindhya, and Paripatra, these seven are the Kala-mountains of Bharatvarsha. Besides these there are thousands of unknown mountains that are tall and mighty cloven with wondrous valleys. There are also many other smaller mountains inhabited by barbarous tribes.

These they drink from, and many other great rivers, like the Sadonirmaya and Krishna, and Mandaga, and Mandavahini; and Mahagouri, and Durga, O Bhaarata; and Chitropala. Chitraratha, and Manjula, and Vahini; and Mandakini, and Vaitarani, and Kosa, and Mahanadi; and Suktimati, and Ananga, and Pushpaveni, and Utpalavati; and Lohitya, Karatoya, and Vrishasabhya; and Kumari, and Rishikulya and Marisha, and Saraswati; and Mandakini, and Supunya, Sarvasanga.

These rivers, O Bhaarata, are all mothers of the universe and confer deep punya. Besides these, there are hundreds and thousands of rivers whose names are not known. I have now recounted to you all the rivers I remember.

Now listen to the names of the peoples of the various kingdoms. They are the Kuru-Panchalas, the Salwas, the Madreyas, the Jangalas, the Surasena, the Kalingas, the Bodhas, the Malas, the Matsyas, the Saubalyas, the Kuntalas, the Kasi-kosalas, the Chedis, the Karushas, the Bhojas, the Sindhus, the Pulindakas, the Uttamas, the Dasarnas, the Mekalas, the Utkalas; the Panchalas, the Kausijas, the Nikarprishthas, Dhurandharas; the

These and other kingdoms are on the east and on the north. My Lord, alluding to them briefly, I have told you all.

If the Earth's resources are properly used according to their qualities and nature, Bhumi is like an ever-yielding cow, which may be milked for its fruits of dharma, artha and kama.

Powerful kings who know of dharma and artha have become greedy for the Earth. They are restless in their craving for this wealth, for which they are willing to sacrifice their very lives in battle.

Bhumi is the home of both creatures with heavenly bodies and those with human ones. Wanting to enjoy the pleasures of Earth, the kings have become like dogs that snatch meat from one another. Their unbounded ambition cannot be satisfied.

It is for this that the Kurus and the Pandavas are striving for possession of Earth, by negotiation, creation of discord, bribery, and battle. If Earth is well nurtured, it becomes the father, mother, children, sky and heaven of all creatures, O Purusharishabha.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me, Sanjaya, in detail, about the lifespan, the strength, the virtues and vices, the future, past and present, of the people of Bharatavarsha, of Himavatvarsha, and also of Harivarsha.'

Sanjaya says, 'Bharatarishabha, the four yugas set in Bharata's Varsha are Krita, Treta, Dwapara and Kali. The yuga that comes first is Krita; next comes Treta; after Treta comes Dwapara; and at the very end, the Kali.

In the Krita Yuga, men live for four thousand years, while in the age of Treta they live three thousand years. At present in Dwapara, men live on Earth for two thousand years. In the Kali, however, there is no fixed measure of life, so much so that men sometimes die while still in the womb, or soon after birth.

In the Krita Yuga, men are born and have children, in hundreds and thousands. They have great strength and power, and are endowed with great wisdom, wealth and beauty. In that age Munis are born with the knowledge of asceticism and are naturally capable of great tapasya. They have great souls, are virtuous and truthful in speech.

The Kshatriyas born in that age are agreeable in appearance and able-bodied. Having great tejas, they are accomplished in the use of the bow, highly skilled in battle and brave.

In the Treta Yuga, all the Kshatriya kings are emperors ruling vast lands, which extend from sea to sea. They give birth to invincible warriors, who enjoy long lives, are heroic, and wield the bow in battle with great skill.

When the Dwapara sets in, all the four varnas born are energetic and ambitious, wishing to conquer one another.

The men born in the Kali Yuga have little energy, and are given to anger, greed and dishonesty. Jealousy, pride, anger, deception, malice and covetousness, O Bhaarata, are the qualities of the creatures in this age. A small part of the Dwapara Yuga remains before the advent of Kali.

With respect to all qualities the Varsha known as Himavat is superior to Bharatavarsha, while Harivarsha is more excellent than Himavatvarsha.’

BHUMI PARVA

Dhritarashtra says, 'Sanjaya, you have described Jambu-khanda to me. Now tell me of its size and expanse. Tell me also, in detail and without omission, about the extent of the ocean of Sakadwipa, and Kusadwipa, of Salmalidwipa and Kraunchadwipa. Tell me also of Rahu, Soma and Surya.'

Sanjaya says, 'There are many islands, over which the Earth extends. I will speak of only seven islands to you, and of the Moon, and the Sun, and the planet Rahu.

The Jambu mountain spreads across eighteen thousand six hundred yojanas. The extent of the ocean of salt is said to be twice this size. That ocean is dotted with many kingdoms, and is adorned with precious stones and corals. It is also covered with mountains made of many metals. Thickly peopled by Siddhas and Charanas, the ocean is circular in form.

I will now speak to you of Sakadwipa; listen to me, O Bhaarata, as I describe it. That island is twice the size of Jambudwipa and the ocean is twice the extent of that island. Indeed, Sakadwipa is surrounded by the ocean on all sides. The kingdoms there are infused with dharma, and the men there live eternal lives. How can famine occur there? The people are all full of forgiveness and great tejas.

I have now briefly described Sakadwipa to you. What else, O king, do you wish to know?'

Dhritarashtra says, 'You have given me, wise Sanjaya, a brief description of Sakadwipa; now tell me everything in detail.'

Sanjaya says, 'On that island, there are seven mountains strewn with jewels and have mines of gemstones. There are also many rivers whose names I will recount to you. Everything there is excellent and delightful.

The first mountain is named Meru. It is the home of the Devas, Rishis, and Gandharvas. The next mountain is called Malaya, stretching towards the east. It is there that clouds arise, and from there they scatter in all directions. The next one is Jaladhara from where Indra daily draws the finest water. It is from this water that we get seasonal rain.

Over the next high mountain called Raivataka, the constellation of Revati has been fixed in the sky. Brahma himself has done this.

To the north of this is the lofty mountain Syama. Its beautiful bright body is made brilliant by ascending clouds. And since those mountains are dark, the people living there are all dark in complexion.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'A great doubt arises in my mind because of what you say. Why do the people there have dark complexions?'

Sanjaya says, 'On all islands, there are fair and dark men, and those produced by a union of the fair and the dark races. But that mountain is called the Dark Mountain because all its people are dark. Beyond this lies the great mountain called Durgasaila, and the next one is called Kesari. The breezes that blow from that mountain carry sweet fragrances. The height of each mountain is twice that of the one mentioned immediately before it.

O Kurunandana, the wise say that there are seven Varshas in that island. The Varsha of Meru is called Mahakasa; that of the water-giving Malaya is called Kumudottara. The Varsha of Jaladhara is called Sukumara: while that of Raivataka is called Kaumara; and of Syama, Manikanchana. The Varsha of Kesara is called Mandaki, and that named after the next mountain is called Mahapuman.

At the heart of that Dwipa is a mighty tree called Saka equal in height and breadth to the Jambu tree in Jambudwipa and the people there always worship the Saka.

In the many delightful provinces of that island, Siva is worshipped, and it is there that the Siddhas, the Charanas, and the unearthly beings find rest and rejuvenation. The people are virtuous, and all the four varnas devote themselves to their svadharma. There is no theft. Freed from decay and death and gifted with long lives, the people grow as rivers during the monsoon rains.

The rivers there are full of holy water. Ganga herself, divided into many streams, is there, as are Sukumari, Kumari, Seta, Keveraka, and Mahanadi; so also are the rivers Manijala, Chakshus, and Vardhanika, O Bharatottama. There are other innumerable sacred rivers, from which Indra draws water for showering rain. It is impossible to recount the names and lengths of all these rivers. All of them are awesome and sin-cleansing.

There are four sacred provinces known to men on the island of Saka. They are the Mrigas, the Masakas, the Manasas, and the Mandagas. The Mrigas are largely inhabited by Brahmanas devoted to their svadharma.

Amongst the Masakas are virtuous Kshatriyas who grant the Brahmanas their every wish.

The Manasas live by following the duties of the Vaisya order. They, too, have all their desires fulfilled; they are brave and steadfast in their devotion to dharma and artha. The Mandagas are all brave and upright Sudras.

In these lands there is no king, no punishment, indeed no person that deserves to be punished. They are all conversant with and diligently engaged in the practice of their respective duties and protect one another. This is what can be said about Sakadwipa.

To listen to the description of this great island also confers merit on the listener.'

Sanjaya says, 'O Bhaarata, I will tell you about what is known of the islands in the north. Listen to me. In the north, the first ocean has waters of ghee. Then is the ocean whose waters are curds. Next comes the ocean whose waters are wine, and then is another ocean of water. The islands double in area as we proceed further north and these oceans surround them.

In the centremost island is a lofty mountain called Goura made of red arsenic; on the western island is the mountain Krishna, the favourite abode of Vishnu. There celestial gemstones are found in abundance, guarded by Kesava who, inclined to grace, bestows happiness on all creatures.

Along with the kingdoms there, a field of divine Kusa grass in Kusadwipa and the Salmali tree in Salmalika are adored.

In the Kraunchadwipa the mountain called Maha-krauncha is a mine of precious stones and is worshipped by all the varnas. On the mighty Gomanta, rich in all kinds of precious metals, lives the mighty Narayana, endowed with wealth and eyes like lotus leaves, with those who have attained moksha.

In Kusadwipa there is another mountain mottled with varicoloured corals and named after that island itself. This mountain is inaccessible and made of gold. O Kauravya, there is another splendid mountain there called Sumida. The sixth is called Harigiri.

These are the six principal mountains. The intervening space between these mountains doubles, moving further and further towards the north.

The first Varsha is called Audhido; the second is Venumandala; the third is called Suratha; the fourth is known by the name Kamvala; the fifth Varsha is called Dhritimat; and the sixth is Prabhakara; the seventh Varsha is called Kapila. These are the seven successive Varshas.

In these, Devas and Gandharvas, and other beings of the universe, sport and find their delight. The inhabitants of these Varshas are immortal. There are no robbers, nor any tribes of Mlecchas. All those who live there are almost white in complexion and very delicate.

As for the rest of the Dwipas, I will tell you all that I have heard. Listen with an attentive mind. In the Kraunchadwipa there is a towering mountain called Krauncha. Next to Krauncha is Vamanaka; and next to Vamanaka stands Andhakara. And next to Andhakara is that excellent massif Mainaka. After Mainaka lies the most wonderful of mountains called Govinda; and after Govinda is the mountain called Nivida.

Rajan, the spaces between these mountains increase twofold. I will now tell you about the lands that lie there. Listen to me.

The land near Krauncha is called Kusala; that near Vamanaka is Manonuga; that next to Manonuga is Ushna. After Ushna is Pravaraka; and after Pravaraka is Andhakaraka. The country after Andhakaraka is Munidesa. After Munidesa, in the land called Dundubhiswana live Siddhas and Charanas. The people there are almost white in complexion.

All these lands are inhabited by Devas and Gandharvas. In the island of Pushkara is a mountain by the same name, rich in jewels and gemstones. There dwells Prajapati himself praised and worshipped by all the Devas and Maharishis. A variety of precious stones from Jambudwipa is found there, and used for diverse purposes.

In all these islands the celibacy, honesty, discipline, health and lifespan of the inhabitants doubles as one moves northwards.

The land in those Dwipas, O Bhaarata, comprises but one country in which but one religion prevails. The Supreme Prajapati himself lives there; he holds the danda of chastisement and protects those islands. He is the king and the source of their bliss. He is the father, and the grandfather; he protects all creatures there, mobile or immobile. Cooked food appears by itself and is enjoyed by the people.

Mahabaho, after these vast lands can be seen Sama, a starshaped land with four corners, and thirty-three mandalas. There, O Kauravya, live four grand elephants adored by all. They are Vamana, Airavata, Supratika and Sarvabhauma. All efforts to calculate the proportions of these four Diggajas are fruitless. Their length, breadth and width remain unknown.

In those regions winds blow irregularly from all directions and are caught by those elephants with the tips of their splendid trunks that have the colour of lotuses and can draw up everything in their path. They then exhale to release these winds which then arrive on Earth thus allowing all creatures to breathe and live.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘You have, Sanjaya, told me everything about the first subject in detail. You have also indicated the positions of the islands. Speak to me now about what remains.’

Sanjaya says, ‘Indeed, O great king, the Dwipas have all been described to you. Listen now to what I tell you about the heavenly bodies and about the size of Swarbhanu. The planet Swarbhanu is large and round with a diameter of twelve thousand yojanas, and a circumference of forty-two thousand yojanas, according to the learned of ancient times.

The diameter of the moon is said to be eleven thousand yojanas while its circumference is declared to be thirty-eight thousand nine hundred yojanas of the illustrious planet of cool rays.

Anagha, sinless, it has been said that the great, swift, beneficent, and luminous Sun, is ten thousand yojanas across, and thirty-five thousand eight hundred around. These are the dimensions estimated here, O Rajan, of Arka.

The planet Rahu, on account of his great size, eclipses both the Sun and the Moon at regular intervals. I recount this to you briefly. I have now given you answers to all your questions. Let peace be yours. I have told you about the construction of the universe as indicated in the Shastras. Therefore, O Kauravya, pacify your son Duryodhana.

Having listened to this charming Bhumi Parva, a Kshatriya is endowed with prosperity, obtains the fruit of his desires, and wins the approval of the righteous. The king who listens to this on days of the full moon or the new moon, while carefully observing vows, finds enhancement in his lifespan, his fame and energy. The spirits of his ancestors are appeased. You have now heard of all the merits that flow from Bharatavarsha!’

BHAGAVAT-GITA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Knowing the past, the present and the future, and seeing all things as if present before his eyes, Sanjaya rushes grief stricken into court from the battlefield. To Dhritarashtra, who sits lost in thought, he announces that Bhishma the grandfather of the Bhaaratas has been killed.

Sanjaya says, 'I am Sanjaya, O great king. I bow to you. Bhishma, the son of Shantanu and the grandsire of the Bhaaratas, has been cut down in battle. That foremost of all warriors, that Pitamaha of the Bhaaratas, is fallen. That greatest Kshatriya, who embodied the urjas of all archers, that grandfather of the Kurus, lies today on a bed of arrows.

That Bhishma, on whose strength your son relied as he played the game of dice, now lies on the battlefield felled by Sikhandin. That Maharathika who defeated all the kings of the Earth gathered together in a fierce contention at the city of Kasi, he who fearlessly fought Rama, the son of Jamadagni, oh, even he has today fallen to Sikhandin.

Resembling the great Indra himself in courage, and Himavat in firmness, like the ocean in gravity, and the Earth herself in patience, that invincible warrior with arrows for teeth, a bow for his mouth, and a sword for his tongue, that lion among men, has been brought to grief by the prince of Panchala.

That Parantapa, on seeing whom in battledress even the mighty army of the fearless Pandavas would tremble like a herd of cows facing a lion, having protected your army for ten nights and having accomplished mighty and well-nigh impossible feats, has set like the Sun.

He, who like Sakra himself, calmly shot arrows by the thousands, killed ten thousand soldiers every day for ten days: even he, slain by the enemy, lies, undeserving on the bare ground like a mighty tree felled by the wind, as a consequence, Rajan, of your evil counsels.'"

Dhritarashtra says, 'How has Bhishma been cut down by Sikhandin? How has my father, who resembled Vasava himself, fallen from his chariot? What has become of my sons, O Sanjaya, deprived of the support of mighty Bhishma, he who was like a divine being, and who led the life of Brahmacharya for the sake of his father? How do our warriors feel about the loss of that tiger among men who was filled with great wisdom, great power and great energy?

Hearing that that great leader of men, that unfaltering Kshatriya, is fallen, a terrible sadness pierces my heart. While advancing against the enemy, who followed him and who marched ahead? Who stayed by his side? Who moved alongside? What brave fighters followed protecting the rear of that Maharathika, that wonderful archer, that bull among Kshatriyas, while he penetrated into the ranks of the foe?

While attacking the enemy's divisions, which warriors opposed that great luminary of a thousand rays, who spread fear and destruction among their ranks like the Sun destroying darkness, and who accomplished near impossible feats in battle among the ranks of Pandu's sons?

How, indeed, Sanjaya, did the Pandavas stand up to the son of Shantanu, that invincible Kshatriya, when he attacked them? How did Kunti's son conquer the unconquerable one, who, though modest, was a tiger among men slaughtering the enemy's ranks with great ferocity, having arrows for his teeth, a bow for his mouth, and a terrible sword for his tongue?

Oh, how undeserving is he of such a fate, that fierce archer shooting raging arrows, mounted on this chariot, beheading his foes, that irresistible hero, irresistible as the fires at the end of the yugas, seeing who in readiness for battle made the great army of the Pandavas falter in its advance.

Having achieved great feats on the battlefield, destroying the hostile armies for ten nights, alas, that greatest of Kshatriyas has set like the Sun. He who, like Sakra himself, loosed an unending stream of arrows, and killed millions of soldiers in ten days, that descendant of Bharata's race, now lies on the bare ground, on the field of battle, a mighty tree uprooted by the winds, as a result of my evil counsels!

Seeing Shantanu's son, how could the army of the Pandavas succeed in striking him down? How did the sons of Pandu fight Bhishma? How is it that Bhishma fell when Drona lives? When Kripa was near him, and Drona's son Aswatthaman also, how could Bhishma, that foremost of destroyers be himself destroyed?

How could Bhishma who was an Atiratha and who could not be vanquished by the very gods, be defeated by Sikhandin, the prince of Panchala? He, who always regarded himself equal to the mighty son of Jamadagni in battle, he whom Jamadagni's son himself could not quell, he who resembled Indra in valour, alas, O Sanjaya, tell me how that hero, Bhishma, born in the race of Maharathas, was brought down, for without knowing all the details I cannot regain my composure.

Which great archers of my army did not desert that glorious hero? What heroic warriors, at Duryodhana's command, stood protecting him? When all the Pandavas with Sikhandin in the vanguard moved against Bhishma, did not all the Kurus stay by his side?

Hard as my heart is, surely it is not unbreakable, for why does it not break on hearing the news of the fall of Bhishma! In him lay boundless truth, intelligence, and political acumen. Alas, how was he slain in battle?

Like an imposing cloud, the twang of his bowstring, its roar, his arrows its raindrops, and the sound of his bow for thunder, that Kshatriya shot his arrows at the Pandavas and the Panchalas and the Srinjayas who stood at their side; he struck hostile charioteers like the slayer of Bala smiting the Danavas.

Who were the heroes that resisted, like the shores of the surging sea, him that punished enemies, who was a terrible ocean of weapons, an ocean in which arrows were inexorable crocodiles and bows were the waves? Who resisted this limitless ocean, without an island, agitated and with no raft to cross it, in which maces and swords were like sharks, and horses and elephants like eddies, foot-soldiers like fishes in abundance, and the sound of conches and drums like its roar?

Who resisted this Kshatriya, this ocean that swallowed horses and elephants and foot-soldiers, an ocean that devoured enemy heroes and that seethed with wrath that constituted its Yadava-fire?

When, in Duryodhana's interests, Bhishma achieved great feats in battle, who were in his vanguard? Who were they that protected the right wheel of that tremendous warrior? Who were they that resisted hostile heroes who came from behind him with patience and vigour?

Who positioned themselves to guard him from the front? Who protected the fore-wheel as he battled the adversary? Who struck at the Srinjayas from beside his left wheel? Who were they that defended the irresistible advance troops? Who protected the flanks of that warrior who has made his last painful journey? And who, O Sanjaya, fought the enemy heroes in the general conflict?

If he was protected by our heroes, and if they were protected by him, why could he not then swiftly humble the army of the Pandavas, invincible though it may be? Indeed, how could the Pandavas succeed even in striking Bhishma who was like Siva Parameshti himself, that Lord and creator of all creatures?

Sanjaya, you speak of the fall of Bhishma; that tiger among men, that mighty warrior, our refuge upon whom the Kurus were relying to fight the Pandavas, how was he slain by the enemy? In ancient times, all the Devas sought that Kshatriya's assistance to annihilate the Danavas. That foremost of sons filled with great tejas, on whose birth the famous Shantanu cast aside all grief, despair, and sorrows, how can you tell me that that celebrated hero, that great refuge of all, that wise and holy man who was devoted to his dharma and conversant with the truths of Vedic knowledge, has been slain?

Accomplished in the use of every weapon and imbued with humility, if the son of Shantanu, gentle, restrained, yet so intrepid, has been felled, then I regard the rest of my army as already destroyed. In my judgment, immorality has now become stronger than righteousness, for the sons of Pandu desire sovereignty even by killing their venerable elder! In olden days, Jamadagni's son Rama, who was acquainted with every weapon and who was superior to all, when fighting on behalf of Amvya, was defeated by Bhishma in combat.

You tell me that Bhishma, that greatest of warriors who resembled Indra himself in his feats, has been vanquished. What can bring greater despair to me than this? Suffused with great intelligence, he who was not slain even by that destroyer of hostile heroes, that Rama, the son of Jamadagni, who repeatedly defeated hordes of Kshatriyas in battle, he has now been laid low by Sikhandin. Surely then, Drupada's son Sikhandin, who has quelled that bravest and most skilful Kshatriya, who commanded the most powerful weapons, must be superior in energy and strength to the mighty Bhishma!

In that encounter, who were the heroes that accompanied that destroyer of enemies? Tell me how the battle was fought between Bhishma and the Pandavas. The army of my son, O Sanjaya, bereft of its hero, is like an unprotected woman. Indeed, that army of mine is like a panic stricken herd of cows lost without its herdsman. When he, who was braver than anyone else, was vanquished, what was the state of mind of my army? What power remains in our lives, when we have killed our all-powerful father, the most righteous of men in the world?

Like a man who wishes to cross the sea as he watches his boat sink in deep waters, my sons, I imagine, are weeping grievously on Bhishma's death. My heart must surely be hard that it does not tear apart even on hearing of Bhishma's fall. Endowed with vast weapons, intelligence, and insight, how could that invincible warrior have been quelled?

A man cannot free himself from death using weapons or courage, ascetic merit or intelligence, firmness or offerings. Indeed, time cannot be transgressed by anything in the world, when you tell me that Shantanu's son Bhishma is fallen. Consumed by grief because of my sons, indeed overwhelmed with great sorrow, I had hoped for relief from Bhishma. When he saw Shantanu's son lying on earth like the Sun fallen from the sky, what other refuge did Duryodhana seek?

Reflecting on this, I cannot foresee how this will all end, both for our allies and for our enemies as they range themselves in opposition to each other.

Sadly the duties of the Kshatriya varna as laid down by the Rishis are cruel; the Pandavas desire sovereignty even at the cost of the death of Shantanu's son, and we too crave it by offering up in sacrifice that great hero. The sons of Pritha and mine do all observe their Kshatriya dharma and, thus, incur no sin. This is the path of a righteous man in times of terrible calamity. The display of valour and great strength has been laid down among the duties of Kshatriyas.

How, indeed, did the sons of Pandu oppose my father Bhishma in battle? How were the troops arrayed, and how did he fight against those high-souled adversaries? How, O Sanjaya, was my father Bhishma cut down, and what did Duryodhana, Karna, the deceitful Sakuni, the son of Subala, and Dussasana say when Bhishma fell?

In the house of death that is war, where the chessboard is made up of the bodies of men, elephants, and horses, where arrows and javelins, mighty swords and darts kill and maim, who were those wretched gamblers, who staked their very lives? Who won in this game, who were defeated, who cast the dice successfully, and who have been killed, besides Bhishma, the son of Shantanu?

Tell me all, Sanjaya, for I am not at peace, hearing that Devavrata has been slain, that father of mine, of great and terrible deeds, that jewel of battle, Bhishma! Anguish like a blade pierces my heart, born of the thought that all my children will die. As a fire blazes brighter when ghee is poured on it, you do deepen my sorrow.

My sons must even now be grieving, seeing Bhishma fallen, that great Bhishma celebrated in all worlds and who took upon himself a heavy burden. I will listen to all those sad outcomes of Duryodhana's terrible folly. Therefore, tell me everything that happened there, everything that happened in the battle, born of the folly of my wicked son. Confused or clear, tell me everything, Sanjaya.

Whatever was achieved in the war by the tejas of the great Bhishma who desired victory; tell me everything and in complete detail of how each battle between the armies of the Kurus took place.'

Sanjaya says, 'You are deserving and this is a noble question. However, it does not befit you to blame Duryodhana. The man who incurs evil as the consequence of his own misdeeds, should not attribute the blame to others.

Great king, the man who injures others deserves to be killed for his sins. The upright and blameless Pandavas, along with their friends and counsellors, look up to you; they have endured their injuries, forgiven them, and lived peaceably in the forest.

Do not grieve as you listen to the grim stories of horses and elephants, and powerful kings I have seen by Yoga-shakti. For all this was pre-destined.

I have bowed before your wise and high-souled father, the Mahatman Vyasa, who has bestowed upon me the boon of divine understanding, a sight beyond the vision of the eyes, heightened hearing from a great distance, a knowledge of other people's thoughts and of the past and the future, a knowledge also of the origin of all those who transgress the sacred ordinances, the delightful power of coursing through the skies, and protection from all weapons in battle.

Now listen to me carefully as I narrate the romantic and awesome battle between the Bhaaratas, a battle that makes one's hair stand on end.

When the combatants were ready and arrayed by the rules of war, Duryodhana says to Dussasana, 'O Dussasana, let chariots be moved swiftly to protect Bhishma, and order our akshauhinis to advance.

I now recollect what I have been thinking for many years about the war between the forces of the Pandavas and the Kauravas. For us, nothing is more important than keeping Bhishma safe. If protected he will annihilate the Pandavas, the Somakas and the Srinjayas.

That pure-souled Kshatriya has said that he will not slay Sikhandin. Sikhandin was a woman in an earlier birth, and so Bhishma refuses to fight him. For this, Bhishma should be particularly well protected.

Let all my soldiers take up their positions, and be determined to kill Sikhandin. Also let the troops from all cardinal directions, skilled in the use of every kind of weapon, watch over the Pitamaha. Even the mighty lion, if left unprotected, may be slain by the wolf. We must not allow Bhishma to be slain by Sikhandin like the lion by the jackal.

Yudhamanyu guards the left wheel and Uttamauja the right wheel of Arjuna, and thus shielded, Phalguni himself safeguards Sikhandin. O Dussasana, ensure that Sikhandin, who is protected by Arjuna, and whom Bhishma will not attack, does not kill Ganga's son.'

Vaisampayana said, "Sanjaya says, 'When the night passed, loud exclamations of the kings rend the air. The blast of conches and the sound of drums resembling the roars of lions, the neigh of horses and the clatter of chariot wheels, the noise of raucous elephants and the shouts, clapping of arm-pits, and cries of roaring combatants, all raise a thunderous noise.

The teeming armies of the Kauravas and the Pandavas, rising before dawn, complete all their deployments. When the Sun rises, the fierce weapons of attack and defence, the armour of your sons and the Pandavas, and the great splendid armies of both sides, are fully seen. Elephants and chariots, adorned with gold, look radiant like clouds streaked with lightning. The arrays of chariots look like cities.

Standing there, your father shines brilliantly like the full moon. And the warriors armed with bows and swords, scimitars and maces, javelins and spears, and other bright weapons of many kinds, take up their positions in the ranks. Resplendent standards, belonging to us and the enemy, are seen, hoisted by the thousands. Thousands of golden banners decorated with gemstones blaze like fire. They look beautiful even like the armoured heroes longing for battle.

Countless great Kshatriya commanders, wearing quivers, and with eyes big as those of bulls, and with hands cased in leather gloves, stand at the heads of their divisions, with shining weapons raised.

Subala's son Sakuni, and Salya, Jayadratha and the two princes of Avanti, Vinda and Anuvinda, the Kekaya brothers, Sudakshina the ruler of the Kambojas and Srutayudha the lord of the Kalingas, and king Jayatsena, Brihadbala, king of the Kosalas, and Kritavarman of the Satwata vamsa—these ten powerful tigers among men, whose arms resemble maces, these performers of sacrifices and givers of gifts to Brahmanas, stand each one at the head of an akshauhini of troops.

These and many other kings and princes, maharathikas all, knowers of statecraft, obedient to the commands of Duryodhana, all sheathed in mail, are seen at the head of their legions. All of them, wearing black deerskin, imbued with great strength, accomplished in battle, and cheerfully prepared, for Duryodhana’s sake, to give up their lives and attain Brahmaloka, stand there commanding ten powerful akshauhinis.

The eleventh great division of the Kauravas, consisting of the Dhartarashtra troops, are positioned in front of the great army.

There in the vanguard of that division is Shantanu’s son. With his helmet, royal parasol, and armour, all in white, we see the unfailingly mighty Bhishma looking like the risen moon. His standard bears the sign of a golden palmyra; he himself is mounted on a silver ratha. Both the Kauravas and the Pandavas gaze upon that hero, looking like the full moon encircled by white clouds.

On seeing Bhishma, the great archers amongst the Srinjayas, led by Dhrishtadyumna, appear like little lesser animals looking at a mighty yawning lion. Indeed, all the warriors led by Dhrishtadyumna tremble in fear.

These, O Rajan, are the eleven splendid divisions of your army.

So also the seven akshauhinis belonging to the Pandavas are protected by the greatest Kshatriyas. Indeed, the two armies facing each other look like two oceans at the end of the Yuga agitated by fierce makaras, teeming with monstrous crocodiles. Never before did we see or hear of two such armies encountering each other like these of the Kurus.’”

Sanjaya says, 'Just as predicted by the holy Krishna-Dwaipayana Vyasa, the kings of the Earth gather in that manner for the great contention. On the day the battle begins, Soma approaches the region of the Pitris. The seven great planets are ablaze as they appear in the sky.

The Sun, as he rises, seems to be split in two, and bursts into flames. Carnivorous jackals and crows, expecting to feed upon the dead, call out fiercely from all burning directions.

Every day the Pitamaha of the Kurus, and the son of Bharadwaja, rising from their beds in the morning, say with dhyana, "Victory to the sons of Pandu", while those mighty warriors are pledged yet to fight for your cause. Your father Devavrata, aware of varna dharma, summons all the kings and speaks to them.

"Kshatriyas, the broad door into heaven is open to you. Pass through it to the region of Sakra and Brahma. The ancient Rishis have shown you this eternal path. Bring honour upon yourselves by fighting with alert minds. Nabhaga and Yayati, and Mandhatri, and Nahusha and Nriga, were triumphant in battle and attained bliss. It is a sin for a Kshatriya to die of sickness at home; to die in battle is his eternal duty."

Thus addressed by Bhishma, the magnificent kings, in their majestic chariots, move to the heads of their respective akshauhinis. Only Vikartana's son Karna, with his friends and relatives, puts aside his weapons for the sake of Bhishma. Without Karna then, your sons and their allies forge ahead, to the ten points of the horizon which reverberate with their leonine roars.

And their legions shine brightly with white sovereign parasols, banners, standards, elephants, horses, chariots, and foot-soldiers. And the Earth fills with the sounds of drums and cymbals, and the clatter of chariot wheels. And the maharathas, bedecked with golden ornaments and with their bows streaked with gold, look as resplendent as hills of fire.

And with his large palmyra-standard, bearing five stars, Bhishma, the Senapati of the Kaurava army, looks like the radiant Sun himself. He orders your noble archers to take up their positions, which they do with alacrity.

King Saibya of the country of the Govasanas, accompanied by all the others, goes forth on a royal elephant graced with a banner on its back. And the lotus-complexioned Aswatthaman rides out prepared for every contingency, stationing himself at the very head of all the divisions, with his standard bearing the emblem of the lion's tail.

And Srutayudha and Chitrasena, and Purumitra and Vivimsati, and Salya and Bhurisravas, and that mighty maharathika Vikarna—these seven great archers mounted on their chariots and encased in excellent mail, follow Drona's son with Bhishma behind them. The lofty golden standards adorning their chariots shine brilliantly.

The standard of Drona, that most excellent of acharyas, bears the emblem of a golden shrine ornamented with a kalasha and a bow. That of Duryodhana, bearing a jewel-encrusted elephant, guides many hundreds and thousands of divisions. The rathas of Paurava, the king of the Kalingas, and Salya, are positioned in Duryodhana's vanguard.

The king of the Magadhas guides his akshauhini against the enemy on a bejewelled chariot with his standard bearing the image of a bull. The great force of the Eastern Kingdoms, protected by the chief of the Angas, Karna's son Vrishaketu, and the powerful Kripa, appears like the soft white clouds of approaching winter.

Stationed in front of his troops, with his silver standard bearing the emblem of the boar, is the splendid Jayadratha. A hundred thousand rathas, eight thousand elephants, and sixty thousand cavalry are under his command.

Commanded by the king of the Sindhus, that vast akshauhini in the forefront of the army with countless chariots, elephants and horses, is truly magnificent. With sixty thousand chariots and ten thousand elephants, the ruler of the Kalingas, accompanied by Ketumat, advances. His majestic elephants, looking like hills, and adorned with yantras, lances, quivers and standards, are strikingly beautiful.

The ruler of the Kalingas blazes forth with his lofty standard effulgent as fire, his royal parasol, golden cuirass, and the chamaras which fan him, all shining. Ketumat, riding on an elephant and holding a wonderful and beautiful goad, is also stationed in battle, O king, like the Sun in the midst of dark clouds.

And king Bhagadatta, fiery with energy and riding on his legendary elephant, goes out like the wielder of the thunder. And the two princes of Avanti, Vinda and Anuvinda, regarded as equal to Bhagadatta, follow Ketumat, riding on the necks of their elephants.

Thus arrayed by Drona and Bhishma, and by Drona's son, and by Bahlika and Kripa, the Kaurava vyuha, of numberless divisions of chariots, appears as if elephants form its body, the kings, its head; and the horses, its wings. Facing all sides, that fearsome vyuha seems to smile in readiness to spring upon the enemy.'

Sanjaya says, 'A loud uproar made by the fighting men in readiness for battle causes the heart to tremble. Indeed, the Earth seems to split into two with the sounds of conches and drums, the bellows of elephants and the clatter of chariot wheels. Soon the Sky and the Earth are filled with the neighing of chargers and the shouts of warriors.

O great Rajan, the troops of your sons and of the Pandavas both tremble when they face each other. There on that battlefield, elephants and chariots, decked in gold, are as beautiful as clouds flecked with lightning. And the standards of your allies, adorned with golden rings, glow like fire. And those standards of your side and theirs resemble the banners of Indra in his celestial mansions.

And the heroic warriors, all fitted out in golden coats of mail with the brilliance of the blazing Sun, themselves look like Agni or Surya. All the leading Kshatriyas amongst the Kurus, with magnificent bows, and other weapons ready, with leather gloves on their hands, and with standards, those mighty bull-eyed archers, stand lordly at the heads of their akshauhinis.

Protecting Bhishma from behind, among your sons are Dussasana, and Durvishaha, Durmukha and Dussaha and Vivimsati, and Chitrasena, and that maharatha Vikarna; also amongst them are Satyavrata and Purumitra, Jaya, Bhurisravas and Sala.

And twenty thousand maharathas follow them. The Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Sibis, and the Vasatis, the Swalyas, the Matsyas, the Ambashtas, the Trigartas, and the Kekayas, the Sauviras, the Kitavas, and the dwellers of the Eastern, Western, and the Northern kingdoms, these twelve brave races are resolute in their determination to fight, heedless of their lives.

These protect the Pitamaha with an awesome array of chariots. And with a division of ten thousand war elephants, the king of Magadha follows that akshauhini. They who guard the wheels of the chariots, and they who protect the elephants, number a stupendous six million.

And the foot-soldiers that march ahead, armed with bows, swords, and shields, number many hundreds of thousands. And they fight using also their nails and bearded barbs. And the eleven akshauhinis of your son, O Bhaarata, look like Ganga separated from Yamuna.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Seeing our eleven akshauhinis laid out in battle formation, how does Yudhishtira, the son of Pandu, with his smaller number of legions, make his counter-array? How does Kunti's son, Sanjaya, create his battle formation against that Bhishma who was a master of all kinds of vyuhas, Manushya, Deva, Gandharva, and Asura?'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Dhritarashtra's legions arrayed, Pandu's son of virtuous soul, Yudhishtira Dharmatma, says to Arjuna, "We have long known the wise words of Maharishi Brihaspati, that a small army must be made to fight by compressing its troops, while the large army may be stretched out at will. In encounters of the few with the many, the vyuha to be formed is the suchimukha, the needle-mouthed one. Our troops compared with the enemy's are few. Deploy our troops, Arjuna, in accordance with the precept of the great Rishi."

Arjuna answers Yudhishtira, "I will create for you an unshakeable and invincible vyuha known as the Vajra, designed by the very wielder of the thunder-bolt himself. He who is like the bursting tempest, he who cannot be defeated by the enemy in battle, Bhima that greatest of smiters, will fight at our head. That foremost of men, knower of all ayudhas, will be our leader at the front destroying our adversaries, shattering their very confidence.

Seeing Bhima, awesome in battle, all the enemy soldiers led by Duryodhana will retreat in panic like smaller animals upon seeing the lion; Bhima will protect us like a wall and dispel our fears like Indra who gives refuge to all heavenly beings. There is no living man who can even look upon Vrikodara of fierce deeds when he is angry."

Having said this, Dhananjaya moves to form his vyuha. He swiftly orders his troops into battle-array and advances against the enemy. And the mighty army of the Pandavas, seeing the Kuru army move, appears itself to look like the swelling, rushing and powerful current of Ganga. And Bhima, and Dhrishtadyumna blessed with great tejas, and Nakula, and Sahadeva, and king Dhrishtaketu, become the leaders of that force.

And king Virata, surrounded by this akshauhini, along with his brothers and sons, marches in the rear, protecting them from behind. The two radiant sons of Madri become the guardians of Bhima's wheels, while the five sons of Draupadi and the son of Subhadra, all blessed with tejas, protect Bhima from behind. And that maharathika, Dhrishtadyumna the prince of Panchala, with the valiant Prabhadrakas, protects those princes from the rear.

And behind him is Sikhandin, who in turn is guarded by Arjuna, and who advances with dhyana for the destruction of Bhishma. Behind Arjuna, to guard his wheels, rides the powerful Yuyudhana and the two princes of Panchala, Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, along with the intrepid Kekaya brothers, and Dhrishtaketu, and Chekitana.

Bhima, wielding his mace made of the sternest metal, moving with fierce speed on the battlefield, can dry up the very ocean. And there the sons of Dhritarashtra with their counsellors, stand looking at him. This, O Rajan, is what Bibhatsu says pointing out the mighty Bhima to Yudhishtira; while Arjuna speaks, all the gathered troops bow to praise and worship him.

King Yudhishtira, the son of Kunti, takes up his position at the heart of his army, surrounded by vigorous overpowering elephants which resemble moving hills. The high-souled and valorous Drupada, lord of the Panchalas, stations himself behind Virata with an akshauhini to fight for the Pandavas. And on the chariots of those kings are high standards bearing diverse emblems, decorated with beautiful ornaments of gold, and with the radiance of the Sun and the Moon.

Moving those kings to make space for himself, Maharatha Dhrishtadyumna, his brothers and sons around him, watches over Yudhishtira from behind. Transcending the lofty standards on all the chariots, yours and those of your opponents, is the gigantic Vanara on Arjuna's chariot.

Hundreds and thousands of foot-soldiers, armed with swords, spears and scimitars, advance in front to safeguard Bhima. And ten thousand dauntless elephants, big as hills, emblazoned with golden armour follow the king like moving mountains. With temporal juice trickling down their faces, they resemble great rain clouds, and emit the fragrance of lotus flowers.

And the unconquerable Bhimasena, Mahatman, swinging his fierce mace that resembles a parigha surely looks as if he can easily crush the sprawling army of your son. Appearing like the Sun himself, and scorching the hostile army like fire, it is impossible for the warriors to even look at him.

This fierce and fearless Vajravyuha, facing all sides, and having bows for its lightning sign, is protected by the wielder of the Gandiva himself. Deploying their legions in this manner against your army, the Pandavas await battle. And protected by the Pandavas, that vyuha is veritably invincible in the world of men.

And as both armies stand waiting for sunrise, a wind begins to blow, gentle rain falls with no clouds in sight, and the roll of thunder is heard. Dry winds blow showering the ground with sharp stones and a thick dust arises covering the world with darkness. Meteors begin to fall towards the east and, striking against the rising Sun, shatter loudly into fragments.

As the troops stand ready for battle the Sun rises without his customary splendour, and the Earth trembles and cracks open reverberantly in many places. The sound of thunder, O king, can be heard frequently on all sides and so thick is the billowing dust that nothing can be seen.

And the towering standards of the warriors, furnished with strings of bells, decked with golden ornaments, garlands of flowers, and rich cloths, graced with banners and like the Sun in splendour, are shaken by the wind, and jingle loudly like a forest of palmyra trees with a gale blowing lustily through.

Thus stand those tigers amongst men, the sons of Pandu, joyful in battle, having arrayed their legions against the army of your son, sucking as it were, the marrow of our warriors, with Bhima, mace in hand, stationed at their head.’

Dhritarashtra says, 'When the Sun rises, O Sanjaya, of my army led by Bhishma and the Pandava army led by Bhima, which, in joyful readiness for battle, approaches the other first? To which side are the Sun, the Moon and the Wind hostile, and against whom do the beasts of prey utter inauspicious cries? Who are those beautiful and daring young men? Tell me everything and in detail.'

Sanjaya says, 'Both armies look equally joyful and equally beautiful like blooming forests. Both armies abound in elephants, chariots and horses. Both are vast and terrible to behold, and hostile to each other. Both of them teem with outstanding warriors organised to conquer the very heavens.

The Kauravas stand facing the west, while the Pandavas face the east, ready to fight. The troops of the Kauravas appear like the army of the Danavas, while those of the Pandavas look like the army of the Devas. The wind begins to blow from behind the Pandavas against the face of the Dhartarashtras, and the predators howl against your son's legions. The elephants of your sons cannot bear the strong odour of the temporal juice emitted by the majestic elephants of the Pandavas.

And Duryodhana rides on a lotus coloured elephant, with rent temples, graced with a golden kaksha on its back, and protected by netted steel armour. He is at the very heart of the Kurus and is extolled by bards and singers. And a white sovereign parasol with a golden chain and moon-like brilliance is held over his head.

Sakuni, the lord of the Gandharas, follows, surrounded by his mountain men. And the revered Bhishma is at the head of all the troops, with another royal white parasol over him, armed with bow and sword, with a white helmet, a white banner atop his chariot yoked to white horses, looking altogether like a white mountain.

In Bhishma's legion are all the sons of Dhritarashtra, and also Sala of the Bahlikas; there are also all those Kshatriyas called Amvastas and Sindhus, and also the Sauviras, and the heroic people of the land of the five rivers.

And on a golden chariot drawn by red horses stands the valiant Mahatman Drona, bow in hand, the Acharya of almost all the kings, who remains behind all the troops, protecting them like Indra. And Saradwat's son Gautama, that frontline fighter, that high-souled and mighty archer familiar with all manner of warfare, accompanied by the Sakas, the Kiratas, the Yavanas and the Pahlavas, takes up his position at the northern point of the army.

That immense force which is well guarded by maharathas of the Vrishni and the Bhoja vamsas, as also by the fighting men of Surashtra, well-armed and masters of weapons, and which is led by Kritavarman, goes towards the south of the army. Ten thousand chariots of the Samsaptakas, masterful warriors all, who were created for either the death or the fame of Arjuna, and who intend to stay close to and hunt Arjuna, all advance along with the brave Trigartas.

In your army, O Bhaarata, are a thousand magnificent war elephants to each of which are assigned a hundred chariots. A hundred horsemen are given to each chariot; each horseman has ten archers, each of whom is accompanied by ten foot-soldiers armed with sword and shield. Thus does Bhishma lay out your legions.

As each day dawns, your great Senapati, Bhishma the son of Shantanu, sometimes moves your troops in the Manava vyuha, sometimes in the Deva, sometimes in the Gandharva, and at others in the Asura. Thronged with a large number of maharathas, and roaring like the very ocean, the Dhartarashtra army, disposed by Bhishma, stands facing the west for battle. Unbounded and dreadful as your army is, the army of the Pandavas, though smaller, appears to me to be colossal and invincible since Krishna and Arjuna lead it.'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the vast Dhartarashtra army ready for battle, king Yudhishtira, the son of Kunti, gives way to grief. Seeing that formidable vyuha formed by Bhishma and knowing it to be impenetrable, the king grows pale and says to Arjuna, "Dhananjaya, how will we fight the Dhartarashtras who have the Pitamaha as their Senapati?

How will we withstand the unshakeable and invincible vyuha which has been designed by that destroyer of foes Bhishma of transcendent glory, by the directions laid down in the scriptures? Parantapa, given the numbers of our troops we are doubtful of success. How, indeed, will we obtain victory in the face of this mighty formation?"

Arjuna answers Yudhishtira who is troubled by grief at the sight of your army, "Listen, O king, to how a few soldiers may defeat a vast army having many strengths. Since you are without malice, I will tell you the means by which we can triumph.

The Rishi Narada knows it, as do both Bhishma and Drona. Brahma himself in olden days during the battle between the Devas and the Asuras said to Indra and the other celestials, 'They who desire victory do not conquer by might and force so much as by truth, compassion, righteousness and vitality.'

Discriminating then between dharma and adharma, and understanding what covetousness is and what it is to fight without arrogance, victory lies with righteousness. Know, O Rajan, that victory is already assured to us in this war.

Indeed, as Narada says, 'Where Krishna is, there is victory. Victory is inherent to Krishna, indeed it follows him. And as victory is one of his attributes, so is humility. Govinda possesses infinite energy. Even in the midst of uncountable enemies, he is without pain. He is the most eternal of Purushas. And victory surely lies where Krishna is.'

Even he, indestructible and impossible to conquer with weapons, appearing as Hari in olden days, said clearly to the Devas and the Asuras, 'Who amongst you would be victorious?' Even the conquered Devas replied, ‘With Krishna to lead us we will prevail.’ And it was through Hari’s grace that the three worlds were conquered by the gods led by Sakra.

I do not, therefore, see any reason for you to be dejected, you who have the Sovereign of the Universe and the Divine Lord of the gods himself wishing you triumph.”’

Sanjaya says, 'Then king Yudhishtira, laying out his own troops against the legions of Bhishma, urges them on, saying, "The Pandavas have now deployed their forces in counter array in keeping with the scriptures. Fight fairly, you sinless ones, who wish to enter the highest heaven!"

In the midst of the Pandava army is Sikhandin, and his troops are protected by Arjuna. And Dhrishtadyumna advances in the vanguard, protected by Bhima. The southern akshauhinis are guarded by that mighty archer, the handsome Yuyudhana of the Satwatas, who resembles Indra himself.

Yudhishtira is stationed on a chariot that is worthy of bearing Mahendra himself, adorned with an excellent standard, mottled with gold and glittering gemstones, and furnished with golden reins for the horses, in the midst of his war elephants. His sovereign white parasol with an ivory handle, unfurled over his head, is resplendent; and many great Rishis walk around him singing his praises.

Many priests, and regenerate Rishis and Siddhas, chant laudatory hymns, praying for the destruction of his enemies, with the help of japas and mantras, potent drugs, and a variety of propitiatory ceremonies. That Mahatman king of the Kurus, showering the Brahmanas with gifts of cows and fruit, flowers and gold, along with rich cloths, advances like Sakra, king of the Devas.

The chariot of Arjuna, with a hundred bells, the best Jambunada gold, having excellent wheels, possessing the effulgence of fire, and pulled by white horses, shines brilliant as a thousand suns. And on that chariot whose banner bears the Vanara emblem, whose reins are held by Krishna, stands Arjuna with the Gandiva and arrows in hand, peerless archer whom none can ever equal.

For crushing your sons' troops, the mighty Bhimasena Vrikodara, who assumes the most terrifying aspect, who without weapons and with his mere bare hands pounds men, horses, and elephants into the dust, that Mahabaho accompanied by the twins, is the protector of the heroic maharathikas of the Pandava army.

Seeing indomitable Vrikodara, like the towering leader of a herd of elephants, an enraged prince of sprightly lions, or like great Indra himself in earthly form, at the forefront of the army, the strength of your fighting men turns weak with fear, and they begin to tremble like elephants in mire.

And Krishna says to the valiant Arjuna standing in the midst of his troops, “There is the banner of Kuru’s race, Bhishma, who scorches us with his wrath and stands rocklike in the midst of his forces. He who will attack our men like a lion, he who has performed three hundred Aswamedha yagnas, stands surrounded by great Kshatriyas who envelop his brilliance like clouds. Great Kshatriya, Purushottama, kill those troops and seek out that greatest of warriors, Bhishma Bharatarishabha!”’

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the Dhartarashtra army approach ready for battle, Krishna says these words to Arjuna.

The Holy One says, "Purifying yourself, O Arjuna, on the eve of the battle, recite the hymn to Durga to achieve the enemy's defeat."

Thus addressed on the eve of battle by Krishna of fathomless intellect, Pritha's son Arjuna, alighting from his chariot, recites this hymn with folded hands.

Arjuna says, "I bow to you, O Mahayoginis, you who are Brahman, you who dwell in the forest of Mandara, free from decay and dissolution, O Kali, wife of Kapala, of a black and dusky hue, I bow to you! I submit to you, Mahakali, wife of Siva, the destroyer of the universe, you who bestow blessings on your devotees.

O exalted Durga, you who rescue us from danger, you who are blessed with every auspicious attribute, which has sprung from the Katas, you who deserve the most devoted worship, fierce one, giver of victory, victory's own self, you who bear a banner of peacock plumes, decked with every ornament, bear a terrible spear, hold a sword and shield, you who are the younger sister of the lord of cowherds, O Eldest, born amongst the Nanda cowherds, always fond of buffalo's blood, born in the race of Kusika, O Pitambara, you who, assuming the face of a wolf, have devoured Asuras, I bow to you who take delight in battle!

O Uma, Sakambhari, you who are white in hue, you who are also black, you who slew the Asura Kaitabha, O tawny-eyed and many-eyed, you who have eyes the colour of smoke, I venerate you!

You are the Vedas, the Srutis, and the highest virtue; you are auspicious to Brahmanas performing yagnas. O you who know the past, you who are ever present in the sacred shrines erected for you in the cities of Jambudwipa, I bow to you!

You are the Brahmavidya among sciences, and you are that slumber from which there is no waking. Mother of Skanda, who possesses the six noblest qualities, Durga, you dwell in the remotest corners of the Earth, and are described as Swaha and Swadha, as Kala, as Kashta, and as Saraswati, as Savitri, the mother of the Vedas, and as the Vedanta.

With inner soul cleansed, I praise you. Mahadevi, let me always be victorious on the battlefield, always minister to me through your grace on the field of war. You dwell in remote regions, where there is fear, in places of hardship, in the homes of your worshippers and in Patala. You always vanquish the Danavas. You are the mahanidra, the great sleep, the illusion, the modesty and the beauty of all creatures.

You are the twilight and the day, you are Savitri, and you are the Mother. You are contentment, you are sustenance, and you are light. It is you who supports the Sun and the Moon and make them shine. You are the wealth of the prosperous. The Siddhas and the Charanas look upon you in dhyana."'

Sanjaya continues, 'Understanding the depth of Arjuna's devotion, Durga, who is always graciously inclined towards mankind, appears in the sky, and in the presence of Krishna, the Devi says, "You will swiftly defeat your enemies, O Pandava. Invincible one, you have Narayana on your side. You cannot be vanquished even by the Vajradhari Indra himself."

The boon-granting Goddess disappears. Having that boon from her, the son of Kunti now regards himself as already victorious and mounts his magnificent chariot. And then Krishna and Arjuna, seated on the same chariot, blow their celestial conches.

The man who recites this hymn rising at dawn, does not fear Yakshas, Rakshasas or Pisachas. He can have no enemies; he does not fear snakes and any animal with fangs and teeth; nor does he fear kings. He is certain to be victorious in all battles, and if bound, he is freed from his shackles. He is sure to overcome all obstacles, is free from thieves, ever victorious in battle and has the blessings of Lakshmi Devi for eternity. In health and strength, he lives for a hundred years.

I know all this through the grace of Vyasa imbued with great wisdom. However, your evil sons, all entangled out of ignorance in the snare of death, do not recognise them as Nara and Narayana. Nor do they, ensnared by death, know that the hour of the end of this kingdom has arrived. Dwaipayana and Narada, Kanwa and the sinless Rama have all warned your son. But he does not accept what they say.

Where dharma is, there lie glory and beauty. Where modesty is, prosperity and intelligence are to be found. And in righteousness, there is Krishna; and where Krishna is, there is victory.'

Vaisampayana said, "Dhritarashtra says, 'There on that field, Sanjaya, which army first advances gladly into battle? Whose hearts are filled with confidence, and who are dispirited and downcast? In that war which makes the hearts of men tremble, who strikes the first blow, my forces or those belonging to the Pandavas? Tell me all this, Sanjaya. Among whose troops do the flowery garlands and balms emit fragrant scents? And whose troops, roaring fiercely, speak merciful words?'

Sanjaya says, 'The fighters of both armies are joyful and the flowery garlands and perfumes of both armies emit equal fragrance. Fierce is the collision that takes place when the tightly compacted ranks arrayed for battle encounter each other.

And the sound of musical instruments, mingled with the blast of conches and the noise of drums, and the shouts of brave warriors roaring fiercely at one another, reverberate all around. Terrible is the impact of the encounter of the warriors of both armies, filled with assurance and staring at one another, with the elephants uttering boisterous grunts.'"

Arjuna vishada yoga: The despair of Arjuna

"Dhritarashtra says:
'Upon the field of dharma,[2] field of Kuru, gathered keened for war, my force and the sons of Pandu, what did they do, Sanjaya?'
Sanjaya says:
'Seeing the Pandava army arrayed, Duryodhana then his honoured master approaches; the king says these words:
"Behold this immense army, master, of the sons of Pandu, deployed by Drupada's son, your brilliant pupil.
Here, heroes, mighty bowmen, of Bhima and Arjuna equals in war—
Yuyudhana and Virata, and Drupada maharatha;[3]
Dhrishtaketu, Chekitana, and the valiant Kasiraja, Purujit and Kuntibhoja, and the Saibya, bull among men.
And Yuddhamanyu the brave and the intrepid Uttamaujas, Subhadra's son[4] and Draupadi's princes—surely, maharathas all.

Be aware, also, of the distinguished amongst us, O best of dvijas[5], the commanders of my army—let me name them for you to know.
Yourself and Bhishma and Karna, and Kripa winner of wars;
Aswatthaman and Vikarna, and the son of Somadatta, as well.
And so many other heroes, too, willing to give their lives for me;
myriad weapons they wield, all of them masters of war.

Our army is invincible, defended comprehensively by the might of Bhishma; their force is inferior, guarded by Bhima's strength all around.

And positioned at every ingress, each at your station,
Bhishma alone you must all perfectly protect, surely, from every side."

To hearten him, the mighty Kuru ancient,[6] the grandsire, a lion's roar lets out and blows his conch reverberantly.
Then, conches and bugles and trumpets, kettledrums, horns resound suddenly, all together: that sound was tumultuary.

When, from a magnificent chariot, white horses yoked to it, Madhava[7] and the Pandava,[8] also, their divine conches sound.
The Panchajanya, Hrishikesa;[9] the Devadatta, Dhananjaya;[10] the great conch Paundra blows Vrikodara[11] of awesome deeds.
The Anantavijayam, the king, Kunti's son Yudhishtira; Nakula and Sahadeva: the Sughosha, the Manipushpaka.
And the Kaasi, supreme archer, and Sikhandi, maharatha;
Dhrishtadyumna and Virata and Satyaki, the unvanquished.
Drupada and all the sons of Draupadi, O lord of the earth, and Subhadra's mighty-armed son sound their conches, every one.
That clamour Dhritarashtra's sons' hearts pierces;
and sky and earth, also, that fierce uproar shakes.

Now, watching in formation the sons of Dhritarashtra, the monkey-bannered[12] Pandava, when weapons are about to be loosed, raises his bow.
Then, to Hrishikesa he speaks these words, lord of the earth.

Arjuna says:
"Between the two armies, set my chariot, Achyuta.[13]
So I can look at those arrayed against us, seeking war, against whom I must fight—before battle begins.
The warriors let me see, that have come together here, wanting to please Dhritarashtra's evil-minded son with war."'

Sanjaya says:
'Asked this by Gudakesa,[14] Hrishikesa, O Bhaarata,[15]
drawing up that fine chariot between the two armies, before Bhishma, Drona and all the rulers of the earth, says, "Partha,[16] look at these massed Kurus."

Then Partha sees standing there fathers and grandfathers, masters, uncles,[17] brothers, sons, grandsons and friends, fathers-in-law and well-wishers—and in both armies, besides;
the son of Kunti looks closely at all those kinsmen deployed there.
By great pity overcome, stricken, he says this.

Arjuna says:
"I see my kinsmen, Krishna, gathered avid for war.
My limbs turn weak, my mouth is parched;
and my body trembles, and my hair stands on end.
The Gandiva slips from my hands and my skin burns;
and my anxiety I cannot control and the fierce whirling of my mind;
and omens I see, evil, Kesava, and nor do I see what good can come from killing my kinsmen in battle.
I do not want victory, Krishna, neither kingdom nor happiness;
for what a kingdom, Govinda, what for pleasures or even life?
Those for whose sake we want a kingdom, pleasures or happiness, they are here for war, leaving their lives and wealth.
Masters, fathers, sons, and grandsires, too;
uncles, fathers-in-law, grandsons, brothers-in-law and other kinsmen;

I do not want to kill them even if they kill me, Madhusudana:[18] not for lordship over the three worlds,[19] what then of this earth?
Killing Dhritarashtra's sons, what joy will we get, Janardana?[20]
We will only find sin ourselves if we slay these sinners.
So we must not kill the sons of Dhritarashtra, who are our kin;
for, after killing our own, how can we be happy, Madhava?[21]
Even if these, their hearts ruined by greed, see no atrocity in destroying the clan and no crime in harming friends, why don't we realise that we must desist from this sin, when we see clearly how heinous it is to exterminate one's race, Janardana?

With the destruction of the clan, ancient family traditions are lost forever;
when dharma is no more, evil takes all that race.

When adharma rules, Krishna, the women of the clan become loose; when the women are depraved, Vaarshaneya,[22] the varnas[23] become mixed.
Crossbreeding only casts into hell those that ruin the clan, and the clan, itself; their manes surely fall, for the ritual of the offering of rice-balls and holy water having disappeared.
Through the sins of these clan-destroyers, defilers of the varnas, lost are sacred traditions[24] of caste and family, forever.
Men whose kuladharma has been destroyed, Janardana, will live forever in hell, as I have heard.

Ah, what a great sin we have decided to commit:
that from greed for the pleasures of kingdom, we are ready to kill our kinsmen.
While I am unarmed and unresisting, let Dhritarashtra's sons kill me on the field of war—that I could still bear."'

Sanjaya says:
'Saying this, Arjuna sits down in the back of that chariot, in war;
he casts aside his arrows and bow, his heart plunged in profound anguish.'

Samkhya yoga: The way of Samkhya[25]

Sanjaya says:
'Seeing him so, in the grip of pity, tearful, agitated, grief-stricken, these words to him speaks Madhusudana.

The Gracious Lord says:
"From where has this stain come over you at this critical time?
This is the way of the base; it does not lead to heaven but fetches infamy, Arjuna.
Do not go this cowardly way, Partha; it is beneath you; abandon this vile faint-heartedness, and arise, O bane of your enemies!"

Arjuna says:
"How will I attack Bhishma and Drona in battle, Madhusudana, with arrows, when they are worthy of worship, Arisudana?[26]
Surely, without killing one's masters and noble elders, it is better to live by begging alms in this world; else, by killing our masters, if we enjoy wealth and pleasures we shall enjoy blood-stained spoils.
We do not know which of these would be better for us:
that we conquer them or that they vanquish us!
They whom killing, we would not wish to live—standing before us, the sons of Dhritarashtra.
The weakness of pity besieges my nature; my mind confounded about what dharma is, I ask you—tell me what is unquestionably best for me. I am your disciple; teach me, I submit to you.
Because I cannot see what can exorcise this anguish that withers my senses, not if I gained a thriving and unrivalled kingdom on earth, and even lordship over the gods of light.[27]"'

Sanjaya says:
'Speaking thus to Hrishikesa, Gudakesa, scourge of his enemies, says "I will not fight" and falls silent.

Then, Hrishikesa speaks smilingly, Bhaarata, between two armies, to him who sorrowed, these words.

The Gracious Lord says:
"You grieve for those not worth grieving over, and argue as if you were a wise man discoursing;
not for the dead or for the living do the wise grieve.
Surely, at no time ever did I not exist, or you, or all these kings; and for sure, not in any future to come will any of us cease to exist.
Just as the indweller passes, in the body, through childhood, youth and old age, the soul also assumes new bodies; the wise are not perplexed by this.
Contact between the elements alone, son of Kunti, causes cold and heat, pleasure and pain;
these come and go, they are evanescent; endure them, Bhaarata.
Whom these cannot perturb, the wise man, O bull among men; who is the same in sorrow and joy, steadfast, is fit for immortality.
Never does the unreal exists, and the real never ceases to be;
of both these, surely, the end has been seen by seers of truth.
But, know, what pervades all this is immortal;
that everlasting being no one can destroy.
Mortal these bodies; eternal, it is said, the embodied soul;
It is immortal, ineffable—so, fight Bhaarata!

He that thinks of it as being a killer and he who thinks This is slain:
both do not know—it neither kills nor is slain.
This is not born nor ever dies, not in the past, present or future;
un-born, changeless, eternal it is, primeval; it is not killed when the body is slain.
Knowing this is indestructible, constant, un-born, immutable, how does a man kill anyone, Partha, whom does he kill?

Even as a man abandons old, tattered clothes and puts on other fresh ones, the indweller leaves old, worn bodies and enters other new ones.
Weapons cannot pierce it; fire cannot burn it;
water does not wet it, nor dry it, the wind.
Not pierceable, not burnable, not wettable, and also not dryable—permanent, ubiquitous, abiding, invariable, eternal.
unmanifest, it; inconceivable, it; changeless, it, they say;
So, knowing it is such, you must not despair.
and if you think that it is constantly being born and continually dying, even then, mighty-armed, you ought not to despair.
For he who is born death is certain, and birth is certain for who dies;
so, over what you believe to be ineluctable, you should not despair.
Unmanifest the source of beings, manifest their interim, Bhaarata; unmanifest, too, their end; so why grieve for them?

As a miracle, some see it; and others say it is marvellous; and others learn that it is ineffable; and some, after having learnt,[28] still do not know it.
This eternal spirit is unkillable, in every body, Bhaarata;
so, you must not grieve for any of the living.
And also, looking at your svadharma[29] you must not falter;
for, there is nothing higher for a Kshatriya than a war for truth.
Fortuitous and just, an open portal to heaven—joyful are Kshatriyas, Partha, who find such a war!

But if you do not fight this battle of dharma, then, forsaking your svadharma and your fame, you will find sin.
Besides, of your ignominy all men will tell forever, and for the honoured, infamy is worse than death.
That out of fear you quit the battle these maharathas will think;
and in those that once held you in great esteem, you will find contempt.
And your enemies will malign you with vile slander, scoffing at your prowess; what can be more painful than that?
Either being killed you will attain heaven, or, victorious, enjoy the earth;
so arise, Kaunteya, resolved to fight!

Pleasure and pain equally treat: gain, loss: victory, defeat; then join battle—you will no sin incur.

I have told you about samkhya;[30] to the yoga of buddhi[31] now listen; yoke[32] your intellect with this, Partha, the bonds of karma put to sword.
In battle, with this,[33] there is no-one killed, no sin to consider;
even the least bit of this dharma preserves from great fear.
In the resolute soul, the mind is one, joy of the Kurus;
many-branched and unending are the thoughts of the irresolute.
With these memorised flowery words those of small vision eulogise the panegyrics of the Veda, Partha, saying nothing else[34] exists.
Their hearts of desire, swarga their ideal, the rewards of births and rites they seek;
frequent, unvarying rituals, to have pleasure and power, they perform.
To pleasure and power attached, their thoughts beguiled by these;
with devoted mind to attain samadhi[35] they do not strive.
With matters of the three gunas[36] the Vedas deal; be without the three gunas, Arjuna:
free from duality; always established in sattva,[37] unattached, serene.

As much use as in a well to a deluge of water everywhere:
so much in all the Vedas to a Brahmana of enlightenment.
You surely have the right to do your karma,[38] not to its fruit, at any time;
the fruit of karma should not become your motive, nor be attached to sloth.
Steadfast in yoga, do your duty, renouncing attachment, Dhananjaya; success and failure becoming the same: that equanimity is called yoga.
Far inferior is ritual to the yoked mind, Dhananjaya;
in wisdom seek refuge: pitiful are those driven by gain.
Mind yoked, you can be free here[39] of both good and evil;
so, to yoga devote yourself; yoga is genius at karma.

Performing karma, mind devoted, but its fruit renouncing, wise men, from the bondage of birth entirely freed,[40] come to the place of no sickness.
When beyond this chaos of illusions your mind passes, then you will arrive at indifference to what you have heard and what you will hear.[41]

By the srutis confused:[42] when your mind becomes still, unmoving, in samadhi permanently, then you will find yoga."

Arjuna says:
"How can you tell a man of resolution, who is founded in samadhi, Kesava?[43]
How does a realised one speak? How does he sit, how walk?"
The Gracious Lord says:
"When a man abandons all desires, Partha, which spring in the mind, and gratifies himself in just his soul, a man of unshakeable wisdom he is said to be.
Unaffected by adversity, whose mind, in fortune unmoved to desire;
free of passion, fear and anger, a true muni is called.
Who everywhere is without affection; who, upon finding fortune or misfortune, neither exults nor feels aversion, his wisdom is founded.
And when, like a tortoise completely retracts all its limbs, a man does his senses from their objects of desire, his wisdom is founded.
Through restraint the embodied can refrain from indulging the senses, but not from desire; even his desires disappear at the vision of God.

Of even, son of Kunti, a restrained man, his turbid senses forcibly ravish his mind.
All the senses restraining, the sage sits intent on me;
for, one whose senses are tamed, his wisdom is established.
Dwelling on the objects of desire,[44] a man becomes attached to these;
from attachment is born desire; from desire anger arises.
From rage comes upheaval;[45] from turmoil, the wavering memory;
after the loss of memory, destruction of the mind; when the mind is destroyed, he dies.

Emancipated from attraction and revulsion, but going among the objects of the senses, tamed by the Atman, ruled by the soul, he attains grace.
With grace, of all suffering the end comes;

the tranquil one's wisdom, surely, is quickly constant.
No wisdom for the wilful, and not for the reckless, faith;
and for the faithless, there is no peace; for the peaceless, from where joy?
Which ever of the ever-roving senses the mind yields to, that bears his wisdom away, as the wind a boat on the sea.

So, he, Mahabaho, who withdraws completely the senses from the objects of sensuality, his wisdom is profound.
When night comes for all creatures, is when the ascetic awakes;
what is waking for the rest, that is night for the visionary.
Always still, the ocean, though being filled by water entering into it;
equally, he who contains all desires entering him, acquires peace, not he who submits to desire.
Leaving the things of desire, who roams the earth, unattached, without 'mine', without 'I', he attains peace.
This is the Brahmi state,[46] Partha; attaining to this, he is no more tempted; abiding in this at his final hour, as well, he goes to Brahmanirvana."[47]

Karma yoga: The way of action

Arjuna says:
"If you think knowledge superior to action, Janardana, then why to this ghastly deed do you commit me, Kesava?
With your seemingly ambiguous words, you only confuse my mind;
say one thing, decidedly, by which I can attain felicity."

The Gracious Lord says:
"In this world, two kinds of devotion were of old ordained by me, O sinless—
the yoga of knowledge for samkhyas, the way of deeds for yogis.

By not doing his duty a man does not achieve freedom from karma;
nor by mere abstention is transcendent perfection attained.
Nor, certainly, can anyone even momentarily ever stay inactive;
because all are helplessly made to act by the Prakriti-born gunas.
He that restrains the organs of karma but continues to dwell in his mind on the objects of sensuality, that foolish soul is deemed a hypocrite.
But he who, restraining the senses with the mind, Arjuna, engages the organs of action in karma yoga, dispassionately—he excels.
You must always do your duty; because action is higher than inactivity;
besides, you will not succeed even in keeping your body through inertia.
All karma other than that done as an offering binds this world in rebirth;
for that, act, Kaunteya, free from attachment, consummately.

Together with sacrifice, creating men, of old Prajapati[48] said,
'By this, you will generate and multiply; let this be the yielder of your wishes.
Adore the Devas by this; let the Devas succour you;

by each other nourished, supreme felicity you will have.
Bound by the nurture of sacrifice, the gods will surely give you the pleasures you desire;
one who enjoys these gifts, without giving to them, he is certainly a thief.'

The saintly who eat the leftovers of a sacrifice are liberated from all sins; but the sinful eat sin, who cook food just for themselves.
From food are born beings; from rain, food grows;
from sacrifice, come the rains; sacrifice from karma[49] springs.
Karma from Brahma arises, know; Brahma of the Imperishable is born;
so, ubiquitous Brahma always abides in sacrifice.
Hence, this turning wheel, who does not live by it here,[50] lives in sin, indulging the senses—in vain, Partha, he lives.
But for him who is devoted only to the Atman,[51] and remains absorbed in the Atman, the man who, also, is fulfilled only in the soul—for him no duty is ordained.
He surely has nothing to gain here, either by doing or by not doing;
nor does he, among all the living, seek any gain.
Thus, without attachment, always do your duty consummately;
for, by performing karma without attachment man attains the Supreme.
Indeed, only through karma did in absolute perfection abide Janaka[52] and others;
besides, also considering the good of the world, you must act.
Whatever a great man does: all that other men also do;
whatever norm he sets, that all the world follows.

Not for me, Partha, is there any duty in the three worlds, nor anything to attain that is unattained; and I am always at work.
Surely, if ever I am not at my work, tirelessly,
my path would be followed by men, Partha, of every walk.
Plunged into ruin these worlds, if I did not do my work;
and I would be the cause of crossbreeding,[53] diminishing these generations.
As the ignorant perform karma with desire, attachment, Bhaarata, so must the knowing act, unattached, wanting the weal of the world.
Not creating confusion in the minds of the unknowing attached to karma, silently the wise man does all his work, yoked, absorbed.
Nature's essences perform karma, in every way;

he who is beguiled by egoism thinks, 'I am the doer'.
But he who knows the truth, Mahabaho, about the difference between guna and karma—the gunas act upon the gunas—so knowing, is not attached.
Those deluded by the gunas of nature become enmeshed in karma born of the gunas;
those dull ones that do not know the All[54], a knower of everything must not agitate.

To me all karma consigning, to the Atman your thought; becoming desireless, dispassionate, do battle, leaving panic.
This my teaching, those men who always follow, with faith, without derision, are also liberated from karma.
But they who slight this, do not follow my precept, fools to all knowledge, are, know, lost, insensate.
In concord with his nature, acts even the wise man; nature, beings obey—what can inhibition achieve?
For the senses, attraction and revulsion towards the objects of sensuality are inexorable;
no man must come under their sway, for they are his enemies.
Better in one's own dharma, flawed, than another's dharma immaculately done; death in one's own dharma is auspicious; another's dharma is dangerous."

Arjuna says:
"Then what makes a man to commit sin, even unwillingly, Vaarshaneya, with force as if coerced?"
The Gracious Lord says:
"It is desire, it is anger, arisen from the rajoguna[55]— voracious, direly sinful, know this, here, for an enemy.
As fire is obscured by smoke and a mirror by dust, as the womb hides an embryo, so is it hidden by that.
Shrouded, wisdom by this, of the wise the constant enemy, with lust's form, Kaunteya, and an insatiable fire.
Senses, mind, intellect, its abode, it is said;
by these confounding, it shrouds the wisdom of the embodied.
So, your senses first control, Bharatarishabha; kill this malignant thing, for this is the ruiner of knowledge and wisdom.

The senses are lofty, they say; higher than the senses is mind; and beyond mind is intellect; but past intellect is He.
So, knowing what is beyond the intellect, stilling the self with the soul, vanquish, Mahabaho, the enemy, lust-formed, unassailable."

Gyana yoga: The way of knowledge

The Gracious Lord says:
"This yoga to Vivaswat[56] I revealed, immortal;
Vivaswan to Manu[57] taught it; Manu to Ikshavaku[58] imparted it.
So, by lineal tradition received, this the Rajarishis[59] knew;
after great time, here, the yoga was lost, Parantapa.
That very same have I to you today revealed, the ancient yoga:
for you are my devotee and my friend, because this is the secret supreme."
Arjuna says:
"Recent your birth, earlier the birth of Vivasvat;
so how do I comprehend this—you first taught him?"

The Gracious Lord says:
"Myriad births of mine are past, and yours, Arjuna;
these I know, every one; you do not know, Parantapa.
Though un-born, my soul immortal, the Lord of creatures though being, abiding in my own nature, I incarnate through my soul's maya.[60]
Whenever there is a decline of dharma, Bhaarata, an ascendancy of adharma, then myself I manifest.
For the deliverance of the good and for the destruction of sinners;
in order to establish dharma, I come from age to age.
So, who my divine birth and deeds knows truly, after leaving the body does not find rebirth; he finds me, Arjuna.
Gone, passion, fear, anger; absorbed in me, sheltering in me, many, purified by wisdom's penance, have come to my being.
As they come to me, so do I cherish them;
my path men walk, Partha, on every path.

Those who wish for gain from karma sacrifice here to the gods;

for, speedily in the world of men gain attends on ritual.
The four varnas, my creation: by gunas, karma, divided;
its creator, also, know that I am act-less, immutable.
I am not by karma tainted; I do not desire the fruit of karma;
one who recognises me to be thus, he is not bound to karma.
This knowing, the ancients, too, performed karma, the seekers after mukti;[61] so must you do your duty, as the ancients did of old.

What is karma, what is akarma? By this even the seers are baffled; of that karma I will tell you, knowing which you will be saved from every ill.
What karma is must also be understood, and what is forbidden karma; and what is not karma be known—deep is the way of karma.
Who in work repose sees, and in inactivity ado,
he is wise among men; he is a sage, all his duty done.
Whose every endeavour is without desire's intent;
whose deeds are burnt in wisdom's fire, him the wise call a sage.
Renouncing attachment for the fruit of work, always contented, independent, though incessantly at work, he does nothing at all.
Desireless, he of restrained mind, leaving all possessions, just the body doing work, finds no sin.
With whatever chance gives contented, beyond duality, without envy, and equable in success, failure—though doing, he is not bound.
Whose attachments are gone, who is free, mind founded in wisdom;
who acts only as a sacrifice—all his karma dissolves entirely.

Brahman the sacrifice, Brahman the oblation;
Brahman the fire into which Brahman makes the offering;
Brahman he surely attains through the devotion of Brahmakarma.[62]

Only with sacrifices to the Devas, some yogis worship; into the fire of Brahman others sacrifice itself as sacrifice offer.
Hearing, the other senses, some into restraint's fire offer;
sound, the other objects of sensuality, others into the fire of the senses offer.
All the senses' karma and the karma of life, others offer into self-restraint's yogic fire, kindled by wisdom.

Material sacrifice; penance as sacrifice; with yoga, too, others sacrifice;
sacred study and knowledge, sacrifice the ascetics of stern vows.
Inhaling they offer into exhalation; exhaling into in-breath, as well, others:
prana, apana's, movement stilling, those devoted to pranayama.
Others curb what they eat, into prana, prana offer;
all these, also, knowers of sacrifice: by sacrifice, their sins expelled.
Eating sacrificial remains, ambrosia, they go to eternal Brahman; not this world is for the unsacrificing, much less any other, best of Kurus.

So, many kinds of sacrifice are spread across Brahman's face;
karma-born, know, all these; so knowing, you will become free.
Better than sacrifice of wealth, the devotion of wisdom, Parantapa;
all karma, in entirety, Partha, culminates in wisdom.
That learn, through homage, by inquiry and service:
the wise, seers of truth, will teach you wisdom.
Which knowing, not again will delusion so torment you, Pandava;
with this, all creatures, without exception, you will see in yourself, and in me.
Even if you, of sinners, of them all, are the greatest sinner, all distress, by wisdom's boat, you will surely cross.
Just as its fuel of wood a fire makes ashes, Arjuna, wisdom's fire all karma to ashes turns, as surely.
Nothing to equal wisdom in purity exists here;
that, of himself, one evolved in yoga, in time, within himself attains.
He of faith attains wisdom: absorbed, senses restrained; wisdom gained, to supreme peace, also, he quickly comes.

The ignorant and the faithless and the doubting soul perishes;
not this world, not the next, nor happiness for the doubting soul.
Through yoga renouncing karma, with wisdom severing doubt,
a self-possessed one no karma binds, Dhananjaya.
So, cut away ignorance-born doubt seated in your heart, with wisdom's soul sword;
turn to yoga—arise, Bhaarata!"

Sannyasa yoga: The way of renunciation

Arjuna says:
“Renunciation of karma, Krishna, then again, yoga you extol; which one of the two is better for me, say for certain.”

The Gracious Lord says:
“Sannyasa and karma yoga effect liberation, both;
but of the two, doing karma is superior to inaction.

Know him as a constant renunciate, who neither dislikes nor desires;
for, detached from duality, Mahabaho, he is easily freed from bondage.
The callow say that samkhya and yoga are different, not the wise;
for, who is absorbed in one, of both enjoys the fruit.
The condition the samkhyas achieve, that yogis also attain;
and as one, who samkhya and yoga sees, he sees.
But sannyasa, mighty-armed, is difficult to attain without yoga;
the sage yoked to yoga, to Brahman swiftly comes.
Who is absorbed in yoga, pure soul, master of his mind, subduer of the senses, who is the soul of all souls—though he does, he is not tainted.
‘I do nothing’ a yukta[63] thinks, a knower of truth:
while seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, eating, moving, sleeping, breathing, speaking, emitting, ingesting, staring and blinking:
the senses in sensuality are engaged—in this awareness.

Resigning his karma to Brahman, without attachment, who works:
he is not stained by sin, as a lotus leaf by water.
With the body, with the mind, with the intellect, or merely with the senses, yogis perform karma, leaving attachment—to purify the soul.

The yoked, sacrificing the fruit of karma, attains profound peace;
the unyoked, moved by desire, devoted to the fruit, is bound.
All karma with the mind relinquishing, dwells the restrained one, at ease, in the city of nine doors,[64] the embodied—surely, neither doing nor causing.[65] Neither doer nor deed for the world, the Lord creates; not union of work with its fruit; only nature acts.

Neither anybody's sin nor, indeed, their virtue does God assume;
wisdom is shrouded by ignorance; by this the living are deluded.
But whose ignorance is destroyed by knowledge of the Atman, their sunlike wisdom illumines that, highest.
That their mind, that their soul, that their faith, that their devotion—they go to non-return, by wisdom their sins destroyed.

A Brahmana endowed with learning, humility; a cow, an elephant, and even a dog and a dog-eater,[66] the wise see as equal.
Even here, they conquer nature, whose minds are founded in equalness;
because Brahman is immaculate, equal, so they abide in Brahman.
Not elated at getting the agreeable and not dejected upon finding the unpleasant;
mind calm, undeluded, the knower of Brahman in Brahman dwells.
Who is detached from the outward touch,[67] finds the bliss in the Atman;
the one yoked in Brahman through yoga, he immortal bliss enjoys.
Surely, the pleasures of the touch of the senses, they are only wombs of sorrow;
they begin and end, Kaunteya; not in them dwells a wise man.
Who can, even here, before leaving the body, endure the lust- and anger-born rush, he is a yukta; he is the happy man.
Who joy within, rest within, and also light only within finds;
that yogi dissolution in Brahman, union with Brahman, attains.
Those rishis find Brahmanirvana, whose sins are exhausted, doubts scattered, minds restrained: to the felicity of all beings devoted.
Freed from lust, anger, yatis, with minds restrained, live subsumed in Brahmanirvana, those who know the Atman.

Outward objects of sensuality shutting out, and gaze fixed between the brows; making equal outward and inward breath, moving within the nose;
with restrained senses, mind and intellect, the sage devoted to liberation, who has departed desire, fear and anger, he is surely always free.
Enjoyer of sacrifices and penance, great Lord of all worlds, friend to all beings—me, knowing, he comes to peace."

Dhyana yoga: The way of meditation

The Gracious Lord says:
"Not seeking karma's fruit, who does his ordained work, he is the sannyasi and the yogi; and not one without the fire,[68] and not him without ritual.
So, what they call sannyasa, know that is yoga, Pandava;
for, without renouncing desire, no one becomes a yogi.
For the sage who aspires to yoga, karma is the way, it is told;
who has attained yoga, only for him is quiescence the way, they say.
Only when neither to the objects of sensuality attached, he who renounces all desire is said to have attained yoga.
Raise yourself through the Atman; never abase yourself;
for, only you are your own friend; you alone, your own enemy.
His Atman is his friend only to him who has mastered himself;
for the uncontrolled, his very soul is hostile like an enemy.

Who has conquered himself, who is tranquil, his soul is entirely composed, in heat and cold, joy and sorrow, also, in honour and ignominy.
In knowledge and wisdom, fulfilled, unshakeable, master of his senses;
that yogi is said to be yoked for whom the clod of earth, a stone and gold are the same.
With the friend, the companion, an enemy, a stranger, an arbiter, an odious man, a relative, as well as a saint and a sinner, he who is equal-minded, excels.

The yogi should constantly yoke himself: in seclusion, alone, heart and mind controlled, without desire and possession.
In a clean place, setting his seat firm, himself, neither too high nor too low, with kusa grass, cloth and deerskin, one over the other.

There, making his mind one-pointed, controlling his thought and senses, sitting upon the seat, he should absorb himself in yoga, to purify his heart.
Aligning body, head and neck, keeping still and steady;
fixing his gaze on the tip of his nose, and not looking around;
serene, fearless, steadfast in the vow of celibacy;
mind controlled, intent on me, yoked, he sits devoted to me.
Thus yoking himself always, the yogi of subdued mind to peace, supreme nirvana which abides in me, attains.

Not for one who eats too much is yoga, nor for him who overly fasts;
and not for him given to too much sleep, nor yet for the overly wakeful, Arjuna.
Who is restrained in food and pleasure, devoted in thought and deed;
moderate in sleep and waking, attains yoga, leaving sorrow.
When the restrained mind is founded exclusively in the Atman, indifferent to every desire, then he is said to be a yukta.

As a lamp in a windless place does not flicker: similar, it is recorded, is a yogi of restrained thought, engaged in the yoga of the Atman.
Where thought ceases, curbed by the practice of yoga;
and where, also, the mind sees the soul, and is fulfilled in the Atman;
in which infinite joy, through the intellect experienced, beyond the senses, he knows; and in which established, he surely does not move from truth; and gaining which, no other gain he considers as greater than that;
wherein founded, no grief, even the heaviest, shakes him:
that, know—the disunion from union with pain—to be absorption in yoga;
this, with conviction, practise: yoga, with an undismayed heart.

Will-spawned desires, all, renouncing entirely;
with the mind, the host of senses surely restraining, on every side;
by degrees growing still, through firmly restraining the intellect;
in the soul having established the mind, let him not think of anything.
Wherever the restless and fickle mind strays, from there it must be restrained, brought back under the sway of just the Atman.

Who is of serene mind, only to this yogi the highest bliss comes, his passion stilled, his spirit in Brahman, sinless.
Thus constantly devoting himself, the yogi, delivered from sin, easily communes with Brahman, enjoys infinite bliss.

In all beings the Atman, and all beings in the soul:
the one absorbed in yoga sees everywhere the same.
Who sees me everywhere, and everything sees in me, to him I am never lost, and he is not lost to me.

As abiding in all beings, who worships me, founded in oneness, whatever his life, he is a yogi and lives in me.
In the image of himself, who everywhere sees the same, Arjuna, be it in pleasure or in pain, he is deemed the highest yogi."

Arjuna says:
"This yoga you have said to be sameness, Madhusudana, for this I see no enduring stability—out of restlessness.[69]
Fickle, surely, is the mind, Krishna, turbulent, strong, obstinate; to control it, I think, is so difficult—like[70] the wind."

The Gracious Lord says:
"Doubtless, Mahabaho, the mind is difficult to control, unsteady;
but with practice, Kaunteya, and dispassion, it is restrained.
For the unrestrained, yoga is difficult to attain, I agree;
but the restrained soul, striving expediently, can attain it."

Arjuna says:
"Who cannot control himself, though he has faith, whose mind strays from yoga, without attaining consummation in yoga, to what end, Krishna, does he come?
Does he not, from both fallen,[71] and like a rent cloud, surely perish, unstable, Mahabaho, confounded along the path of Brahman?
This my doubt, Krishna, you must dispel entirely;
none but you, for sure, can effect the undoing of this doubt."

The Gracious Lord says:
“Partha, neither here nor hereafter, does he find harm;
for never does any good man, my friend, come to evil.
Having attained worlds of the righteous, living there for countless years, into a home of the pious and the prosperous, the one fallen from yoga is nobly born.
Else, born even into a family of yogis of wisdom;
though rare indeed in the world is such a birth.
Thereupon, the evolution of his past life he recovers;
and, with that, strives again for perfection, Kurunandana.[72]
Also, that same previous practice bears him away, inexorably;
even a seeker after yoga transcends the Veda.[73]
But the yogi who strives with zealous mind, purified of all sin, through many lives perfected, then comes to the supreme.
Than the tapasvin[74] greater the yogi; also greater than the gyani,[75] regarded;
Than the karmi[76] greater the yogi—so a yogi become, Arjuna.
Of all yogis, even, who abides in me in his inmost soul, who devotedly worships me, him I consider the foremost yukta.”

Gyana Vigyana yoga: The way of knowledge and realisation.

The Gracious Lord says:
"To me the mind cleaving, Partha, devoted in yoga, taking refuge in me, without doubt, you will know me in full—listen how.
This knowledge to you, I, together with wisdom, will tell in full, which knowing, nothing else here will remain to be known.
Among thousands of men scarcely one strives for perfection;
among these seekers, even among sages,[77] hardly one knows me in truth.

Earth, water, fire, air, ether, mind, intellect and also ego—this my differentiated nature, eight-fold.
This is my lower nature; know my other transcendent nature—the Living Spirit, Mahabaho, which supports this world.
These two are the womb of all beings, know;
I am all the world's source and its dissolution, as well.
Than me higher nothing else at all exists, Dhananjaya;
in[78] me all this is strung like so many jewels on a thread.

Taste am I in water, Kaunteya; light I am in moon and sun;
Aum in all the Vedas, sound in ether, manliness in men.
The pure fragrance in the earth I am, and brilliance in fire;
life in all beings am I, and austerity in ascetics.
The seed am I of all creatures, know, Partha—eternal;
the intelligence of the intelligent I am; the splendour of the splendid, I.
And I am the strength of the strong; of lust, passion devoid;
in beings, legitimate desire am I, Bharatarishabha.
And whatever sattvik existences, of rajas and tamas there are:
from me alone they are, know—I am not in them; they are in me.

By all these, the three gunas' manifestations, this whole world, deluded, does not know me, transcendent, supreme, immutable.
For, this divine, guna-comprised maya of mine is impenetrable;
only who in me refuge, they cross over this maya.
Not in me evil-doers, fools, refuge, lowest of men;
robbed by maya of wisdom, they yield to demonic ways.

Four kinds of men worship me, virtuous ones, Arjuna:
the distressed, the aspirant,[79] the material seeker,[80] and the wise man, Bharatarishabha.
Of these the wise man, always in communion, of singular devotion, is the best;
for, most dear to the wise man I am, and he is dear to me.
Noble are all these, surely, but the gyani I regard as my own self;
Because he, the yoked soul, is absorbed just in me, as his highest refuge.
At the end of many lives, the wise man resorts to me:
'Because Vasudeva is all'—such a great soul is exceedingly rare.

Through desire they whose wisdom is swayed, worship other gods, a myriad of rites observing, by their own natures compelled.
Whatever form, however, any devotee wishes to worship with faith, in just that his faith I make firm.
He, to this faith yoked, that[81] to propitiate seeks;
and through that, obtains his wishes, which in truth by me alone are granted.
But they have an end, the fruits of these small-minded ones;
to the Devas, the worshippers of Devas go; and my devotees come to me.
The Unmanifest as reduced into manifestation: the ignorant regard me;
my supreme nature not knowing—imperishable, unsurpassed.
I am not plain to all, being cloaked by my yogamaya;
this foolish world does not know me: un-born, immortal.
I know equally, Arjuna, past and present and future beings; but me no one knows.
By desire- and aversion-arisen duality seduced, Bhaarata, all creatures are born to ignorance, Parantapa.
But whose sins have come to an end, men of virtuous deeds:
they, from duality's delusion freed, worship me with unswerving devotion.

For liberation from decay, death, who strive, sheltering in me, they the Brahman truly know, the Atman entirely, and all about karma.
As the Lord of creatures,[82] master of gods, the support of sacrifice, me who know, with absorbed minds they also know me even at the hour of death."

Akshara Brahma yoga: The way of immortal Brahman
Arjuna says:
"What is that Brahman, what Adhyatma,[83] what karma, Purushottama?
and what is called Adhibhutam, what said to be Adhidaivam?
Who is the Adhiyagna, and how: here in this body, Madhusudana?
And at the hour of death how are you known by the restrained soul?"

The Gracious Lord says:
"Deathless Brahman is supreme; nature is called Adhyatmam;
beings, souls, that which creates, sends forth, is named karma.
Adhibhutam is mortal forms, and Purusha,[84] Adhidaivatam;
Adhiyagna even I am, in this body, O most excellent of the living.
And at the time of the end, only me remembering, while leaving the body, who departs, he comes to mybeing: of this there is no doubt.
Or else, of whatever thinking he gives up the body, even to that he surely attains, Kaunteya, being ever absorbed in that thought.
So, at all times, think of me, and fight; to me your heart and mind offered, to me you will surely come, without doubt.
Mind engaged in absorption in yoga, not straying, who meditates, Partha, the supreme Purusha, divine, attains.
Who meditates on the Seer, the Ancient, the Ruler, smaller than the smallest, the support of everything, of inconceivable form, Sun-coloured, beyond darkness, at the hour of death, mind stilled, with devotion, yoked, and also, with the power of yoga, prana fixed firmly between the brows—he, that supreme Purusha attains, divine.

That Immortal of which Veda knowers speak, which passionless sages enter; wanting which, they practice brahmacharya—that condition to you briefly I will tell.

All inlets[85] restrained, and the mind confined in the heart;
in the head fixing the soul's life-breath, founded firm in yoga, AUM, the one-syllabled Brahman, uttering, remembering me, who departs, leaving the body, he goes to the highest destination.
Of nothing else aware, who ever remembers me, with constancy, to him I am attainable, Partha, to the always yoked yogi.
Attaining me, to rebirth, house of sorrow, impermanent, great souls do not return—the highest perfection they have reached.
Up to Brahma's realm, all worlds are subject to rebirth, Arjuna;
but upon me attaining, Kaunteya, there is no experiencing birth again.

A thousand yugas lasts Brahma's day, who know, that his night lasts a thousand yugas, they are knowers of day and night.
From the Unmanifest all the manifest come forth at the advent of day;[86] at the coming of night, they then dissolve into that same, called the Unmanifest.
The host of beings, they the same which recur, dissolves, when night comes, helplessly, Partha, comes forth, when day arrives.
But beyond this existence is another unmanifest unmanisfestation eternal:
He who, when all beings perish, is not destroyed.
This Unmanifest is said to be imperishable: this, which is called the supreme condition, whom attaining, they do not return—that is my supreme abode.
He is the supreme Purusha, Partha, but through singular devotion can be attained—in whom all beings dwell, by whom all this is pervaded.

Now the times of yogis not returning, and also returning, when departing hence—those times I will tell you, Bharatarishabha.
Fire, light, day, the bright fortnight,[87] the northern course:[88]
by these departing, those who know Brahman to Brahman go.
Smoke, night, also the dark fortnight, the six months of the southern course:

there, the lunar light, the yogi, obtaining, returns.

The bright, the dark: surely these paths of the world are considered eternal; going by one, he does not return; by the other he comes back again.
Not, these paths, Partha, knowing, is the yogi deluded, ever;
so, at all times, yoked in yoga be, Arjuna.
By the Veda, by sacrifice, through penance, and also from charity what good fruits accrue—the yogi transcends all that, and, this knowing, the supreme place attains, the primeval."

Rajavidyarajaguhya yoga: The way of royal knowledge, the royal secret

The Gracious Lord says:
“Now to you, this deep secret I will reveal, O unenvious, along with knowledge, wisdom—knowing which, you will be delivered from evil.
The sovereign knowledge, sovereign secret, sacred, this, supreme, directly perceived, righteous, most easily practised, immortal.
Men who are faithless in this teaching, Parantapa, not attaining me, return to the path of this world of death.[89]

By me is pervaded all this world: in unmanifest form;
in me are all creatures, and not I in them situated.
And not in me are the creatures founded—behold my divine yoga!
The support of beings and not founded in the beings, my soul the beings’ source.
As in akasa[90] is founded, ever, the great wind going everywhere, even so do all beings in me abide, reflect.
All beings, Kaunteya, into Prakriti pass, mine, at kalpa’s[91] end;
again, these, at kalpa’s beginning, I send forth.
In my own nature resting, I emit, again and again, this entire host of beings, helpless, in Prakriti’s sway.
And not me do these acts bind, Dhananjaya;
as one indifferent I remain, unattached amidst these works.
Under my rule, nature gives birth to all the moving and the immobile;
because of this, Kaunteya, the world revolves.

Fools mock me, who have assumed a human body:
my supreme nature not knowing—the Great Lord of beings.

Of vain hopes, of vain deeds, of vain knowledge, witless;
and also of Rakshasas' and Asuras' deluded nature partaking.[92]
But great souls, Partha, abiding in divine nature, me worship, single-mindedly, knowing[93] the source of beings, imperishable.
Always hymning me, and striving, with stern vows;
venerating me with devotion, ever yoked, they worship.
And through the ritual of wisdom yet others sacrifice, worship me:
as one, as apart, as many, universe-faced.

I am the ritual; I am sacrifice; the ancestral oblation, I; I, the herb;
the mantra, I; I alone the clarified butter; I, the fire; I, the offering.
the father, I, of this world, the mother, supporter, grandsire;
That which is to be known, the purifier, Aum, Rik, Sama and Yajus, also.
The goal, sustainer, lord, witness, abode, refuge, friend;
the origin, dissolution, the ground, the receptacle, the seed eternal.
I give heat; I withhold and send forth rain;
immortality and death, also, and reality and unreality—I, Arjuna.

Veda-knowers[94] who drink soma and are cleansed of sin, worshipping me with sacrifices, pray for the passage to heaven;[95] they attain the holy world of Indra, enjoy in heaven divine pleasures of the gods.
They that enjoy the vast world of swarga, when their merit is exhausted enter the mortal world;
thus, followers of the triune faith, seekers after pleasure, come and go.

With no other thought, they who worship me:
constantly, assiduously, their welfare I support.

Those, too, other gods' devotees, who sacrifice with faith, they, also, only to me, Kaunteya, sacrifice;[96] not by ancient law.
For, I of all sacrifices am the enjoyer, and the lord, as well;
but they do not know me truly; so, they fall.
Deva worshippers go to the Devas; to the manes go adorers of the Pitris;
To spirits go spirit worshippers; and my worshippers come to me.
A leaf, flower, fruit, water, who, to me, with devotion offers:

that devout offering, of a pious soul, I accept.
Whatever you do, what you eat, that which you sacrifice;
whatever penance you perform, Kaunteya—that make an offering to me.

Thus from good and bad consequences you will be free, the bondage of karma; to renunciation and yoga mind yoked, liberated, me you will attain.
The same, I, to all beings: none to me is hateful, none dear;
but those who worship me with devotion, they are in me and I, too, in them.
If even a most sinful one worships me, single-mindedly, a saint he must be considered, for he has rightly resolved.
Quickly he becomes a righteous soul, eternal peace attains;
Kaunteya, know for certain, never does my bhakta perish.
For, in me, Partha, those who refuge, even they of sinful birth, women, vaishyas and sudras, they also attain the supreme goal.

How much more then, pure Brahmanas and devout Rajarishis;
this impermanent, unhappy world having found—worship me.
Your mind on me; be my devotee; to mesacrifice; to mebow;
to me you will surely come, thus devoted, your mind on me intent."

Vibhutih yoga: The way of Brahman

The Gracious Lord says:
“Yet again, Mahabaho, hear my supreme word, which to you, I, holding you dear, will tell, wishing your weal.
Neither the hosts of Devas my origin know, nor the Maharishis;
for I am the source of the Devas and the Maharishis, in every way.
Who me, un-born and beginningless, Great God of the world, knows—undeluded, he, among mortals, from all sin liberated.
Intelligence, knowledge, clarity, patience, truth, self-control, calm;
joy, sorrow; being, non-being; and fear and also fearlessness;
non-violence, equanimity, contentment, austerity, charity, fame, infamy—born, these dispositions of beings, from me alone, of different kinds.

The great sages, the seven,[97] and the earlier four;[98] the Manus, also:
of my being, mind, born—from these, this world’s progeny.
This power and work of mine who knows in truth,
he to unfaltering communion is joined—of this, no doubt.
I, of all the source; from me everything begins;
this knowing, me the wise worship, with devotion.
In me their thought, to me given their life, awakening one another;
and speaking of me always; and contented and joyful.
To them, always devoted, worshipping with love,
I give buddhi yoga, by which to me they come.
For these, out of tenderness alone, I their darkness of ignorance, dwelling in my Self, dispel—with the lamp of wisdom, resplendent.”

Arjuna says:
“The supreme Brahman, the highest abode, absolutely pure, you are, the Purusha eternal, divine, the primeval God, un-born, immanent, say all the sages, Devarishi Narada, too,

Asita, Devala, Vyasa; and you yourself tell me so.
All this I hold true, which to me you say, Kesava;
not, surely, Lord, your origin the Devas know, nor the Danavas.[99]
Only you yourself your soul, with your soul, know, Purushottama, Source of beings, Lord of beings, God of gods, Lord of the world.
Surely, you alone can tell fully of the divine powers, with which glories these worlds, you, pervading, abide.
How can I know, O Yogin, you, with constant contemplation?
And in which various forms are you, Lord, to be thought of by me?
Expatiate again on your power and might, Janardana;
for, I am not satiated hearing your words, like nectar."

The Gracious Lord says:
"Yes, I will tell you my divine manifestations, only those which are main, best of the Kurus—there is no end to my extent.
I, the soul, Gudakesa, in all beings' hearts dwelling, and I the beginning and middle, and, also, the end of beings.

Marichi of the Maruts I am; of stars I am the Moon.
Of Vedas, the Sama Veda am I; of Devas, I am Vasavah;[100] and of senses the mind, I; in beings I am consciousness.
Of Rudras, Sankara I am; Vittesha[101] among Yakshas and Rakshasas; and of Vasus I am fire; Meru among mountains, I.
And of priests, the chief, I, know, Partha: Brihaspati;
of generals, I am Skanda; of lakes, I am the ocean.
of Maharishis, Bhrigu, I; of speech, the single syllable;[102] of sacrifices the Japa yagna[103] I am; of mountains, Himalaya.

of Gandharvas, Chitraratha; among Siddhas, Kapila muni.
Ucchaisravas among horses, know me to be, nectar-born;
Airavata among elephant lords, and among men, the king.
Of weapons, I, the Vajra; of cows am I Kamadhenu; and among progenitors, I am Kandarpa;[104] of serpents I am Vasuki. and Ananta I am among Nagas; Varuna of ocean-dwellers, I; and of beasts, the king of beasts, I, and Vainata[106] of birds.

The wind among purifiers I am; Rama of weapon-bearers, I; and among fish the crocodile I am; among rivers I am Jaahnavi.[107]
Of creations, the beginning and end, also the middle, I, Arjuna;
metaphysics of sciences, the dialectic of debaters, I.
Of alphabets, the a am I and of compounds, the dual;
I alone, eternal Time; the Creator, I, facing everywhere.
And death, taking all, I, and the source of what is to be;

Of Vrishnis, Vaasudeva[109] I am; of the Pandavas, Dhananjaya;

The rod[111] of punishers I am; the strategy I am of conquest seekers; and the silence, also, I am, of secrets; the wisdom of the wise, I.
And, further, what is the seed of all beings—that, I, Arjuna; which can exist without me: there can be no being, moving or unmoving.
No end is there to my divine manifestations, Parantapa;
All this that I have said are[112] illustrative of my infinite glories.
Whatever existence is glorious, graceful or powerful, surely,

Arjuna says:
"To bless me, the supreme, secret, Adhyatmam, you revealed;
with these words that you spoke, my bewilderment has gone.
Indeed, of the appearance and passing of beings, I have heard extensively from you, Lotus-eyed; and also your greatness, imperishable.
It is just so: what you have said about yourself, Parameswara—
I want to see your Form Divine, Purushottama!
If you think That can be seen by me, Lord,
Yogeswara, then, to me show your Self Eternal."

The Gracious Lord says:
"Behold, Partha, my forms, hundreds and thousands, of many kinds, divine, vari-coloured and -shaped.
Behold the Adityas, Vasus, Rudras, the two Asvins, also the Maruts;
many previously unseen wonders, behold, Bhaarata.
Here, as one, the Universe, whole, see now, moving and immobile, in my body, Gudakesa; and whatever else you wish to see.

But you cannot see me with just these your eyes;
I give you divine sight—behold my Sovereign Yoga."'

Sanjaya says:
'So saying, then, my king, the Great Lord of yoga, Hari, shows Partha his supreme Form Divine.

Countless mouths, eyes; countless amazing visions;
countless divine ornaments; countless divine weapons raised;
divine garlands, raiment, wearing; with divine perfumes anointed;
of all wonders, refulgent; infinite, faces everywhere.

In the sky, if a thousand suns were together risen, light like that might perhaps compare with the splendour of that Great Being.

There, as one, the Universe, whole, of divisions manifold, sees, in the God of gods' body, then, the Pandava.
Then, he, wonderstruck, horripilating, Dhananjaya, bowing his head before God, with hands folded, speaks.

Arjuna says:
"I see the Devas, O God, in your body, and also all the myriad hosts of beings, Brahma, the Lord upon lotus-throne seated, and all the Rishis and Uragas[113] divine.

With countless arms, bellies, mouths, eyes: I see your infinite form everywhere;
neither your end nor middle, nor again your beginning, do I see, crying, the Maharishi, Siddha hosts
With crowns, maces, and chakras, a mass of light, everywhere shining,
I see you, hard to look at, on all sides with irradiance of fire, blazing sun—immeasurable.
You, the imperishable, the supreme,[114] to be known; you are the universe's ultimate basis;
you, the changeless guardian of everlasting dharma; the eternal Purusha, you, I believe.
Without beginning, middle, end; of infinite power; endless armed; the Sun, Moon, your eyes,
I see you, burning fire your faces, with your refulgence this universe searing.
This space between heaven and earth, surely, is pervaded by just you, and the dishas all;[115] seeing this your astounding, dreadful form, the three worlds are terrified, Mahatman.
Ah, you these hosts of Suras enter; some, in fear, hands folded, give praise;
Svasti!,[116] so crying, the Maharishi, Siddha hosts adore youwith hymns of mighty praise.

The Rudras, Adityas, Vasus, and these Sadhyas; the Viswas, the two Asvins and the Maruts, and the Usmapas;[117] the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Asuras, Siddha hosts gaze at you in wonder, also, surely, all.
Your great Form, many-mouthed, -eyed, Mahabaho, of many arms, thighs, feet, many bellies, many fangs, horrible, seeing, the worlds tremble, as also I.
Sky-touching, ablaze, countless-hued, mouth agape, huge blazing eyes:
seeing only you, my inmost soul quails; no stability do I find, nor peace, O Vishnu.
And seeing your fearful, fanged mouths, like time's fire flaming, the directions I do not know, nor find joy—be merciful, Lord of gods, abode of the universe!

And Dhritarashtra's sons, all, with the hosts of kings;
Bhishma, Drona, and that Sutaputra,[118] also, with our side's main warriors, too, into your fearful jaws, terrible with fangs, rush;
some stick between the teeth; are seen, heads crushed.
As many rivers' swift waters just towards the ocean flow, even so, those heroes of the world of men enter your fiery mouths.
As a burning fire moths enter, to perish swiftly, even so, to perish, these men, also, fly into your mouths at great speed.

You lick,[119] devouring on all sides the worlds, entirely, with mouths aflame; your brilliance covers all the universe, you lustre terrible, searing, O Vishnu.
Tell me who you are, of dreadful form; salutations to you, best of gods, have mercy!
I want to know you, the first, for I do not understand what you do."

The Gracious Lord says:
"Time I am, world-waster, ancient—the world to annihilate, here, my mission;
even without you,[120] no future have all these, arrayed hostile, the warriors.
So, arise, glory gain: defeating your enemies, enjoy a thriving kingdom;

by me alone these have been killed already—the instrument, only, become, Savyasachin.[121]
Drona and Bhishma and Jayadratha and Karna, as also other warrior heroes, by me slain already, you raze; do not be afraid—fight, you will conquer in battle, the enemies."'

Sanjaya says:
'Hearing these words of Kesava, hands folded, trembling, Kiriti[122] bows, again, speaks to Krishna, falteringly, in terror, prostrating.

Arjuna says:
"Rightly, Hrishikesa, by your praises is the world enraptured and fascinated;
Rakshasas, terrified, flee in all directions, and the Siddha hosts pay homage.
And why not worship you, Mahatman, who are greater than Brahma even, the first creator;
O Infinite, Lord of gods, Abode of the universe, you are deathless; real, unreal; and what is beyond that.
You, the first God, the ancient Purusha; you are the supreme home of the universe;
you are the knower and the known[123] and the final resort—by you the universe is pervaded, infinite-formed!
Vayu, Yama, Agni, Varuna, Sashanka, and Prajapati,[124] the great Grandsire—you.

Hail, hail to you, a thousand times, and again, yet again, hail, hail to you!
Obeisance in front, also from behind, to you; obeisance to you on every side, O All!
Of endless prowess, boundless compass, you; everything you suffuse, so you are all.
'My friend', so thinking, rashly, whatever I said, 'O Krishna', 'O Yadava', 'O friend', thus, not knowing This your greatness, out of my carelessness or out of love, and whatever slight, in jest, was shown, at sport, lying down, seated, while eating, alone or, Achyuta, in the presence of others—all that forgive me, O Incomprehensible.

The father you are of this world, of the moving, the unmoving; you are its adored and loftiest guru;
none is your equal, how then any greater, in the three worlds, as well, O unequalled power?

So, bowing, prostrating my body, I worship you, Lord adorable; as a father his son, a friend his friend, a lover his beloved, you must, Lord, suffer me.

The never-before-seen, seeing, I rejoice, and with fear my heart is shaken so;
so, Lord, your other form show me—be merciful, God of gods, home of the universe!
crowned, with mace, disc in your hands—I want to see you, just as before; that same form, four-armed, assume, O thousand-armed, universe-bodied!"

The Gracious Lord says:
"By my grace, to you, Arjuna, this Form Supreme was shown, through my divine yoga—resplendent, universal, infinite, primal, which none but you has seen before.
Not by the Veda, sacrifice, learning, not by charity, and not by rituals, not by fierce penance, in this form can I, in the world of men, be seen by anyone but you, O Kurupravira.[125]
Do not be afraid, nor confounded, seeing this terrible Form, like this, of mine; free from fear, with a glad heart, again, then, the same, this my form, see."'

Sanjaya says:
'Thus to Arjuna saying, Vaasudeva his own form shows again, and comforts that terrified, becoming once more the gentle, beautiful Mahatman.

Arjuna says:
"Seeing this human form of yours, gracious, Janardana, now, I become calm, return to myself."

The Gracious Lord says:
"Most difficult to see, this form which you have seen, of mine;
the Devas, even, always, this form to see are keen.
Not through the Veda, not by tapasya, not through daana, nor yet by yagnas, can I like this be seen, as you have seen me.
But through devotion, singular, can I like this, Arjuna, be known, seen, and, in truth, also entered into, Parantapa.

Who for me does work; I his supreme; my devotee, of attachment rid;
without hostility towards any of the living, he comes to me, Pandava."

Bhakti yoga: The way of devotion.

Arjuna says:
"Thus, always yoked, those devotees who worship you, and, again, those who do the Imperishable, the Unmanifest—of these, which have yoga?"

The Gracious Lord says:
"On me fixing the mind, who, ever absorbed, me worship, with devotion supreme endowed, them, I the best yogis consider.
But who the Imperishable, ineffable, unmanifest, worship, the ubiquitous and inconceivable, highest, unmoving, permanent, restraining all the senses, everywhere even-minded, they attain me, surely—to the weal of all beings devoted.
The travail greater of them, on the Unmanifest whose minds are set; for, the way of the Unmanifest is painfully by the embodied attained.
But who all karma to me renounce, on me intent, with singular yoga, me, through meditation, worship:
of them, I, the deliverer from death, samsara's[126] sea, become, quickly, Partha—on me whose minds are set.

On me alone your heart set; in me let your mind dwell:
you will live in me, surely, thereafter, beyond doubt.

If your mind you cannot fix on me, steadily, through the practice of yoga, then, me seek to attain, Dhananjaya.
Abhyasa,[127] even, if you cannot do, let my work your highest be;
for my sake, even, work doing, perfection you will find.
If even this you cannot do, in performing yoga for me refuge;
all karma's fruit renounce, then, with subdued mind.

Better, surely, knowledge than routine; than knowledge meditation is superior; than meditation, the sacrifice of karma's fruit—upon renunciation, peace follows.

Without aversion towards any creature, friendly and compassionate, only, without 'mine', without 'I'; equal in pain, pleasure; forgiving; contended always, the yogi, self-controlled, of firm resolve, to me given heart, mind—who is my devotee, he is dear to me.
By whom the world is not disturbed; and the world does not disturb him;
from exultation, anger, fear, agitation who is free, he, too, is dear to me.
Independent, pure, competent, indifferent, free from pain;
who all endeavour has abandoned—my devotee, he is dear to me.

Who neither exults nor dislikes; neither grieves nor desires;
good, evil, abandons—that devotee, he is dear to me.
And alike with enemy and friend; also, to honour, dishonour;
in heat, cold, joy, sorrow, the same; free from attachment;
equal in blame, praise; quiet, contented with anything;[128]
Homeless, of firm resolve—my devotee, a man dear to me.
But who this immortal dharma, as told, follow,

Kshetra Kshetrajna vibhaga yoga: The way of discernment between the field and its knower.

Arjuna says:[130]
"Prakriti and Purusha, also; kshetra and kshetrajna, too:
these, I wish to know; knowledge and the known, Kesava."

The Gracious Lord says:
"This body, Kaunteya, the field it is called;
this who knows, he is called kshetrajna,[131] by those who know.
And the kshetrajna, also, me in every field, Bhaarata; of kshetra, kshetrajna,[132] the knowledge: that, true knowledge, in my view.
and what that field is, and what its nature, and what its transformations, whence arisen, and what He[133] is, and of what origin—that, in brief, from me hear.
By the rishis, variously, sung, in chhandas,[134] diversely, distinctly; and also in Brahma sutra[135] passages, logical, decisive.
The mahabhutas,[136] ego, intelligence, and also the unmanifest;
the senses, ten, and the one,[137] and five sense pastures; desire, aversion; pleasure, pain; the organism, consciousness, fortitude—thus, the field, in brief, is described, with examples.

Humility, integrity, non-violence, patience, uprightness;
serving the guru, purity, stability, self-control;
for the objects of sensuality, aversion; lack of egotism; and also,
in birth, death, old age, sickness—pain, evil, seeing;
detachment, no clinging to son, wife, home, the likes;
and, always, even-mindedness to desired,[138] unwanted happenings;
and for me, through exclusive yoga, devotion abiding;
to solitary places resorting; distaste for gatherings of men;

in spiritual wisdom, constancy; the knowledge of truth's end seeing—all this gyana is called; ignorance, what is other than this.

That which is known, I will tell you, which knowing immortality is gained;
beginningless, It, supreme Brahman; neither being, That, nor un-being, it is told.
Everywhere, hands, feet: that; everywhere, eyes, heads, faces;
everywhere, ears—in the world everything enveloping, it dwells.
all the senses' qualities reflecting, of all the senses devoid;
unattached and also all-supporting; without gunas and experiencing the gunas.

Outside and within the living, mobile and unmoving, too;
being subtle, that, imperceptible; and far and near, that.
And undivided, in beings, also, seemingly, divided, exists;
and as beings' support that is known, devourer and creator.
Of lights, also, that the light, beyond darkness, said to be;
knowledge, the known, gained through knowledge, in the hearts of all seated.
Thus, the field and also knowledge and the known, told in brief;
my devotee, this knowing, to my being attains.

Prakriti[139] and also Purusha,[140] know, are beginningless, both;
and transformations and also gunas, know—of Prakriti born.
Effect, cause, instrument, agency—Prakriti, it is told;
Purusha, of joy, sorrow's, experience, the cause, it is said.
For, the Purusha, dwelling in Prakriti, enjoys the Prakriti-born gunas;
the cause, attachment to the gunas: of its birth in good, evil wombs.
Witness and sanctioner, lord, experiencer, great God, and also the supreme soul, it's told—in this body, the Purusha transcendent.
Who thus knows Purusha and Prakriti, with the gunas, whatever his life, he is not born again.

Through meditation, the Atman see, some, in the Atman, with the Atman;
others, through samkhya yoga, and by karma yoga, others.
Yet others, not thus knowing, hearing from others, worship; and they also, surely, transcend death by devotion to what they hear.[141]

Whatever being is born, motionless or mobile—from kshetra and kshetrajna's union: that know, Bharatarishabha.

Equally in all creatures abiding, the Supreme God, amidst the perishing, imperishable, who sees, he sees.
For, the same God seeing, everywhere, omnipresent, he injures not the Atman with the Atman, so attains the final goal.
And only by Prakriti, karma is done, in every way, who sees, also that the Atman is act-less, he sees.
When the diversity of beings as situated in the one, he sees, and also, therefrom, their spread, the Brahman he then becomes.
Beginningless, without attributes, this Paramatman, immortal, though dwelling in the body, Kaunteya, neither acts nor is tainted.
As, being subtle, the ubiquitous ether is not tainted, so also, everywhere located, in the body, the Atman is not stained.
As one sun illumines this whole world, so, too, the kshetri[142] illumines this entire kshetra,[143] Bhaarata.

Between kshetra, kshetrajna, thus, the distinction, with eye of wisdom, and the deliverance of beings from Prakriti, who know, they attain the Supreme."

Gunatrai vibhaga yoga: The way of the division of the three gunas.

The Gracious Lord says:
"Again, the highest I will tell you, of wisdoms the best wisdom;
this knowing, the sages, all, to final perfection from here passed.
This wisdom resorting to, my nature attaining, at creation, even, they are not born, and not during the dissolution disquieted.
My womb great Brahma, into which the seed cast I;
to birth all beings, from that, come, Bhaarata.
In all the species, Kaunteya, whatever forms take birth, of them, great Brahma the womb, I the seed-giving father.
Sattva, rajas, tamas, these gunas, Prakriti-born, bind, Mahabaho, into the body the dweller imperishable.

Of these, sattva, being pure, is illumining, health-giving, through attachment to happiness binds, and through attachment to knowledge, O sinless.
Rajas has passion's nature, know, from craving, attachment, sprung;
it binds, Kaunteya, with addiction to action, the embodied.
But tamas, ignorance-born, know, deludes all the living;
through rashness, sloth, stupor, it binds fast, Bhaarata.
Sattva to happiness binds; rajas to activity, Bhaarata;
but, wisdom shrouding, tamas to rashness, it is told.

Rajas and tamas subduing, sattva prevails, Bhaarata;
Rajas, the same, over sattva and tamas; tamas, even so, over sattva and rajas.

When through all doors[144] of this body, light radiates, knowledge: then, know, sattva surely waxes.

Greed, activity, undertaking karma, disquiet, desire—when rajas increases, these prevail, Bharatarishabha.
Darkness and inactivity, neglect and also delusion:
when tamas increases, these prevail, joy of the Kurus.

Now, while sattva waxes, if to dissolution[145] the embodied goes, then, worlds of the highest sages, taintless, it gains.
In rajas, death finding, among those addicted to karma it is born;
and if dissolved during tamas, in dark wombs it is born.
Of virtuous karma, it is told, sattvik and pure the fruit;
while rajas' fruit is sorrow, and darkness the fruit of tamas.

From sattva arises knowledge; and from rajas only greed;
heedlessness, delusion, from tamas come, and also ignorance.
Upwards go those founded in sattva; midway remain the rajasas;
those steeped in the vile guna, go downwards, the tamasas.

No other agent than the gunas, when the seer sees, and what is beyond the gunas knows, to my being he attains.
These gunas transcending, triune, which spring from the body, the embodied, from birth, death, old age, pain, is liberated, immortality gains."

Arjuna says:
"What signs of one who these three gunas has transcended, Lord?
what his deportment, and how does he the three gunas transcend?"

The Gracious Lord says:
"Light and activity and, even, delusion, Pandava, he does not shun, when they arise, nor, when they cease, long for.
As if indifferent seated, by the gunas who is not moved;
the gunas act: this knowing, who is still, unwavering.
The same in joy, sorrow, contented; equal[146] a clod, stone, gold;
the same to the pleasant, unpleasant; calm; equal to blame of himself, to praise.
In honour, disgrace, the same; equal to a friend, an enemy;

all endeavours who has renounced—gone beyond the gunas, he is said to have.
And me who, with unfailing yoga of devotion, serves,
he, these gunas transcends, for becoming Brahman is fit.
For, Brahman’s abode I, immortal and imperishable;
and of eternal dharma, and absolute bliss.”

Purushottama yoga: The way of the Supreme Person.

"Root above, branches below, the Aswattha,[147] they tell of, imperishable, of which the chhandas are the leaves; who knows this, he is a Veda knower.

Below and above, extend its branches, guna-nourished, sense-objects for twigs;
and below its roots stretch, binding in karma the world of men.
Not its form,[148] either, is here perceived, not its end, nor beginning, and neither its foundation.
This aswattha, deep-rooted, with the mighty sword detachment severing, then, let that condition be sought, going where, there is no returning again;
only to that original Purusha surrender, from whom this ancient world came.
Without pride, delusion; quelled, the sin attachment; spiritual always; rid of desire; liberated from the dualities, called pleasure, pain—the undeluded go to that state eternal.

Not that, the sun illumines, not moon, not fire;
who go there do not return—that abode supreme, mine.

A mere particle of myself, a living spirit, eternal,[149] into the world of jivas the senses, mind the sixth, founded in nature, draws.[150]
A body when assuming, and also when leaving it, the Lord takes all these, leaving, even as the wind scents from their places.

Ears, eyes, and touch, taste, and also smell dwelling in, and mind, he the sense-objects enjoys.

Departing or dwelling, as also experiencing, while associated with the gunas, the deluded do not see;[151] they see who have wisdom's eye.
Striving yogis also, That see, in themselves situated;
even striving, the unrestrained do not see it, unawakened ones.

That lustre of the sun, which the whole world illumines, that in the moon, and that in fire—that light, know, is mine.
And the earth entering, creatures I support with energy;
and nourish all plants, the moon becoming, sapful.
I the fire become, in creatures' bodies dwell; prana, apana,[152] uniting with, digest food, the four kinds.
And, of all, I in their hearts am lodged; from me, memory, wisdom, and their loss;
and in all the Vedas, I alone, the known; Vedanta's author, and also the Veda-knower, I.

And two persons in this world: the mortal, and also the immortal; mortal, all creatures; the unchanging, the immortal called.
But the highest being, another, Paramatman called, who the three worlds enters, sustains them, imperishable God.

Because the mortal I transcend, and even the immortal surpass, so, I am, in the world and in the Veda, known as Purushottama.[153]
Who, thus, undeluded, knows me, Purushottamam, he, knowing everything, worships me with all his being, Bhaarata.

Thus, this most secret Shastra has been taught by me, O sinless;
this, understanding, wise he becomes; and all his duty done, Bhaarata."

Daivaasurasampad vibhaga yoga: The way of the distinction between the divine and the demonic qualities.

The Gracious Lord says:
“Fearlessness, essential purity, in wisdom’s yoga steadfastness, charity and self-control and sacrifices, sacred study, austerity, rectitude;
non-violence, honesty, without anger, renunciation, not critical, mercy for the living, non-covetousness, gentleness, modesty, free of caprice; vitality, forgiveness, fortitude, purity, without malice, without hubris—the wealth of one with divine nature born, Bhaarata.
Ostentation, arrogance and great conceit, anger, and also violence, and ignorance—the endowments of those born, Partha, demonic.

The divine inheritance liberates, the demonic binds, it is thought;
grieve not: you to wealth divine are born, Pandava.

Two kinds of being in the world, the divine and also the demonic;
the divine at length have been spoken of; of the demonic, Partha, from me hear.

Neither what to do nor what not to, they know, the demonic;
no purity and neither conduct, no truth, in them found.
Unreal, un-founded, they say, the world, God-less,
of continuing origin, nothing other than lust-begotten.
To this view cleaving, lost souls, of small minds, come forth, of savage deeds, for the destruction of the world, its enemies.
To lust surrendered, insatiable; by hypocrisy, arrogance, conceit, possessed; through delusion seizing fell designs, they act, sworn to evil.
And to cares boundless, ending in death, surrendered;
sensual enjoyment the highest:[154] that this is all convinced;

by desire's bonds, hundreds, bound; to lust, anger, yielded;
they strive, in order to gratify their desires, unscrupulously, great wealth to amass.
'This, today, by me gained; this heart's desire I will satisfy;
this there is, and this, too, I will have:[155] more wealth.
By me[156] slain that enemy; and I will kill others, too;
the lord, I; I, the enjoyer; successful, I, strong, happy;
rich, well-born I am; who else is[157] like me?
I will sacrifice, give charity, rejoice!'—thus, by ignorance deluded.

By countless fancies confounded, in delusion's net ensnared;
addicted to satisfying lusts, they fall into foetid hell.

Smug with conceit, obdurate, with wealth's pride intoxicated, they sacrifice,[158] in name sacrifice, with ostentation, disregarding precept.
To egotism, force, pride, lust and rage given:
me, in their own and other's bodies, hating, these envious ones.
These, haters vicious, vilest of men, in samsara,
I cast repeatedly only into inauspicious, demon wombs.
Fiendish wombs finding, the deluded, birth after birth, me far from attaining, Kaunteya, then devolve to the basest state.

Triune, of this hell, the gates, which destroy the soul—lust, anger and greed; so, these three abandon.
From these the man who is liberated, Kaunteya, gates to darkness, three, does what is good for his soul, then reaches the supreme condition.

Who scriptural law forsakes, acts by desire's dictates, he does not perfection attain, not happiness, not the highest goal.
So, let the Shastras[159] be your authority: what may be done, what is forbidden, to determine;
knowing what the scripture's laws declare, your karma you must do, here."[160]

Sraddhatrai vibhaga yoga: The way of the divisions of the three kinds of faith.

Arjuna says:
"Who scriptural laws forsake, but worship, with faith—what is their condition, Krishna, sattva, rajas or tamas?"

The Gracious Lord says:
"Threefold is the faith of the embodied, of their nature born—sattvik, rajasik and also tamasik; and hear about it.

In concord with his nature everyone's faith is, Bhaarata:
of his faith's nature, man—what his faith is, that indeed is he.

The sattvikas worship the Devas; the rajasas do yakshas and rakshasas; pretas and other kinds of bhutas, tamasik men worship.

Not ordained by the Shastras, violent austerities those men perform, to pride, egotism yoked, by lust, passion's force possessed.
Torturing the elements in the body, the senseless, and me, also, dwelling in the body—these, know, of demonic resolve.

The food, too, by all liked, is of three kinds; sacrifice, austerity, charity, as well; of the divisions of these, hear.
Longevity, vitality, strength, health, happiness, love, which augment; succulent, soft, nourishing, tasty—foods dear to the sattvik.
Bitter, sour, salty, hot, pungent, harsh, burning—foods by the rajasika liked: pain, grief, disease causing.
Cold, insipid, putrid, stale and what is refuse and also unclean—food to tamasas dear.

By those expecting no reward, the sacrifice which by scriptural decree is offered, exclusively as a duty, mind absorbed, that is sattvik.
But aiming for its fruit, and also for display, what is offered, best of Bhaaratas, that sacrifice, know, is rajasik.
Against law,[161] where no food is given, without mantras, without dakshina,[162] of faith devoid, the yagna is tamasik, they say.

Of the gods, the twice-born, gurus, the wise, worship; purity, rectitude, continence and non-violence—bodily austerity is called.
Speech which no offence causes, and which is truthful, pleasant and benign, and also regular recitation of the Veda—verbal austerity is called.

Mental calm, gentleness, silence, self-control, purity of feeling, all these—austerity of mind are called.
With faith transcendent undertaken, this three-fold penance, by men who wish for no gain, devoted—sattvik is called.

For respect, honour, reverence, the austerity, and which with ostentation is performed, that, here, is deemed rajasik: fleeting, impermanent.
From foolish belief, the self-torturing, the penance that is practised, or to others meaning harm—that tamasik is said to be.

'To give is a duty': thus,[163] to give charity, without[164] obligation, and at a proper time and place—that charity is sattvik regarded.

But that which to be reciprocated, or aiming for its fruit, in future, and given grudgingly—that charity rajasik is considered.
at the wrong place, time: that charity given, and to the undeserving, without respect, contemptuously—that tamasic is told.

Aum tat sat—this is declared Brahman's triad name:
Brahmanas, by this, and the Veda and Sacrifice, were created of old.
So, Aum, thus uttering, acts of sacrifice, charity, austerity are performed, scripture-enjoined, always by Brahmavadis.[165] Tat: thus,[166] without desiring their fruit, acts of sacrifice, penance and various deeds of charity are performed, by liberation seekers.

Reality and goodness, sat for these is used;
for laudable deeds, as well, the word sat, Partha, is used.
In sacrifice, austerity and charity, constancy—sat is called;
and also karma done for that, sat, indeed, is named.

Without faith, oblation,[167] gifts,[168] austerity performed, and whatever[169] done—
Asat it is called, Partha, and is of no account hereafter nor here."

Moksha Sannyasa yoga: The way of renunciation, liberation.

Arjuna says:
“Of sannyasa[170], Mahabaho, the truth I wish to know, and about tyaga,[171] Hrishikesa,[172] separately, Kesinisudana.[173]

The Gracious Lord says:
“Desire-impelled karma abandoning, as sannyasa the seers understand;
all karma’s fruit sacrificing, call tyaga, the knowing.

‘Renounced as an evil, all karma,’ say some thinkers;
‘Acts of sacrifice, charity, austerity must not be abandoned,’ and so say others.

Decisively hear from me about this tyaga, best of the Bhaaratas; for, relinquishment, Purushavyaghra,[174] of three kinds is declared.

Works of sacrifice, charity, these are not be relinquished but surely performed; sacrifice, charity and also austerity are purifiers of the wise.
But even these works done, attachment leaving and fruit, as duty—this, Partha, my decided view, the best.
But with religious duty, the renunciation of[175] karma is not proper;
through delusion its abandonment, tamasik is declared.
Painful: so being, a duty; bodily suffering fearing, if it is abandoned—he, performing merely a rajasik relinquishment, surely does not relinquishment’s fruit gain.

When just because it ought to be, a prescribed duty is done, Arjuna, leaving attachment, and also its fruit, that relinquishment is considered sattvik.

Neither averse to unpleasant karma, nor to pleasant work attached—the tyagi: of sattva possessed, intelligent, doubts dispelled.

Surely, impossible, for the embodied to renounce karma entirely;
but who the fruit of karma relinquishes, he a tyagi is said to be.

Unpleasant, pleasant and mixed: of three kinds karma's fruit, accruing to non-relinquishers after death, but not to sannyasis, ever.

These five, Mahabaho, causes, learn from me, in the samkhya doctrine mentioned, for the accomplishment of all karma.

The place and also the doer; and the various actions;
the many and different endeavours; and also destiny, the fifth of these.
With body, speech, mind, whatever karma a man undertakes, whether just or the opposite, these five are its causes.
This being so, who, yet, as the only doer himself sees, from ignorance, he does not see: a foolish one.

Who no egotism has, whose intellect is not defiled, though he kills these men, he neither slays nor is bound.[176]

Knowledge, the known, the knower: the triple impulse to karma;
the instrument, action, the agent, these the three-fold conjunction of karma.
Knowledge and action and agent, of three kinds only, the distinctions of the gunas, said to be, in the philosophy of the gunas; respectively, hear, of these, also.

In all beings, the knowledge by which the One, imperishable, is seen, undivided in the divided, that wisdom, know, is sattvik.
But separately, which knowledge, diverse entities, of various kinds, perceives, in all creatures—that knowledge, know, is rajasik.
But what, as the whole, to one effect clings, illogically:
The unreal and trivial, that tamasik is said to be.

Which, ordained, without attachment, without attraction or aversion is done, by one not desiring its fruit, that karma is sattvik called.
But that karma, prompted by desire, or again, with egotistical motives, done, with great strain, that is rajasik called.
For consequence, loss, violence: disregard, and for capability;
through delusion the karma undertaken, that tamasik is called.

Free from attachment, not egotistical, of fortitude, zeal, possessed; by success, failure, unmoved—that doer is sattvik called.
Passionate, keenly wanting karma's fruit, greedy, violent-minded, impure;
by elation, dejection moved—that agent rajasik is deemed.
Unstable, feral, obstinate, deceitful, spiteful, lazy; morose and procrastinating—that doer tamasik is said to be.

To the divisions of intellect and also fortitude, according to the gunas, threefold, listen, told fully, separately, Dhananjaya.

Action and inactivity and what to do, what not to do, fear, fearlessness, bondage and liberation the intellect which knows, that, Partha, is sattvik.
By which dharma and adharma, and what to do and also what not to,
is erroneously known—that intellect, Partha, rajasik.
Adharma as dharma that which regards, in darkness shrouded, and all things perversely—that intellect, Partha, tamasik.

The fortitude by which one rules mind, life breaths, senses' functions, through yoga unwavering—that firmness, Partha, sattvik.
But the fortitude by which to dharma, kama, artha one clings, Arjuna, through attachment to the desire for gain[177]—that firmness, Partha, rajasik.
By which sleep, fear, sorrow, dejection and also arrogance a fool does not leave—that obduracy, Partha, tamasik.

But of happiness, now, the three kinds, hear from me, Bharatarishabha—long practice through which enjoyed, and sorrow's end attained.
That which at first like poison, at the end like amrita,[178] that joy sattvika, it's told, of the soul's intelligence,[179] serene, born.

From contact between objects of sensuality,[180] the senses, which arises, at first like amrita, but at the end is like poison—that joy rajasik is called.
And which joy, both at first and at the end, binding in delusion the soul, and which from sleep, sloth, heedlessness arises—that tamasik is deemed.

There is not on earth or, again, in heaven among the gods, a being that is free from these Prakriti-born three gunas.
Of Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Sudras, Parantapa, their duties are divided, by their innate qualities.
Serenity, self-control, austerity, purity, forbearance, and also uprightness; knowledge, wisdom, belief in God—a Brahmana's duties, of his nature born.
Valour, boldness, fortitude, skill, and even in war not fleeing;
generosity and lordliness—a Kshatriya's duties, of his nature born.
Farming, tending the cow, commerce—a Vaishya's karma, nature born;
karma of the essence of service, a Sudra's, also of his nature born.

Each to his own duty devoted, man attains perfection;
in his own karma absorbed, how perfection one attains, that hear.
From Whom beings arise; Who all this pervades:
through one's own karma Him worshipping, perfection a man achieves.

Better in one's own dharma, imperfectly, than in another's dharma, immaculately;
by one's naturally ordained karma doing, one incurs no sin.
The karma one is born to, Kaunteya, though flawed, one must not abandon;
for, all endeavours by faults, even as fire by smoke, are clouded.

Unattached, his intelligence, everywhere; mind conquered; desire gone; to inaction's perfection supreme, through renunciation, he comes.
Finding this perfection, Brahman, also, how he finds learn from me, in brief, Kaunteya, that consummation of knowledge, transcendent.
With intellect, pure, endowed, and firmly the mind restraining, sound and objects of sensuality leaving, and likes, dislikes, rejecting;
living in solitude, eating little, controlling speech, body, mind;
in dhyana yoga[181] absorbed, always, in dispassion sheltering;

egotism, force, arrogance, lust, anger, possessions, forsaking, without 'mine', peaceful—to become Brahman, he is fit.

Becoming Brahman, clear-souled, he neither sorrows nor desires;
alike to all beings, for me devotion he finds, supreme.
Through devotion, me, he knows, how much and what I am, in truth;
then, me truly knowing, he enters into me.

Even[182] all karma always doing, in me sheltering, through my grace, he attains the eternal state, immutable.
Through thought, all karma to me renouncing; me the ultimate;
to buddhi yoga resorting, on me your heart constantly fix.

On me your thought,[183] all difficulties by my grace you will cross;
but if you, from pride, do not listen, you will perish.
If, ego indulging, 'I will not fight', you think:
Vain this resolve of yours—your nature will compel you.
By your own nature-born karma, Kaunteya, bound, what you do not want to do—being deluded—even that you will do, helplessly.

God in all beings' hearts, Arjuna, dwells, deluding[184] all creatures, as[185] upon a contrivance, with maya.
To Him alone for refuge go, with all your heart, Bhaarata;
by his grace, supreme peace you will find, the place eternal.

Thus, to you, has the wisdom, more secret than secrets, been told by me; reflect on it fully, and do as you wish.

Of all the most secret, again, hear: my supreme word;
since dearly loved you are by me, so I tell you, for your good.
Mind[186] on me; to me be devoted; to me sacrifice; to me prostrate;
to me you will surely come—truly, I promise you, who are dear to me.

All duty abandoning, to me, the sole refuge, come;
I will liberate you from every sin, do not grieve.

This, you must not to the in-austere, nor the devotionless, ever, nor one who has no wish to listen, tell, nor me who derides.
Who this supreme secret to my devotees teaches, the highest devotion to me performs, to me surely comes, without doubt.
Nor is there among men anyone who to me does dearer service than he;
nor will there be than he, to me, another, dearer on earth.
And who studies this sacred conversation of ours, through knowledge's sacrifice, by him, I adored will be—this, my view.
Faithful and without cavil, who just listens, that man:
he, too, liberated, to blessed worlds attains, of those of virtuous deeds.

Has this been heard, Partha, by you, with singular thought?
has your ignorant delusion been dispelled, Dhananjaya?"

Arjuna says:
"Dispelled my delusion, understanding gained, through your grace, Achyuta;
I stand firm, doubts gone; I will do as you say.[187]"

Sanjaya says:
'So, I, between Vaasudeva and Partha, great souls,
this converse heard, wondrous, making my hair stand on end.
Through Vyasa's grace heard I this secret, supreme yoga, from the Lord of yoga, Krishna, directly, as he told it himself.

O king, I remember, again and again, this wonderful conversation of Kesava, Arjuna, sacred, and thrill with joy, over and over.
And as I repeatedly recall that Form, most awesome, of Hari, great my astonishment, O king, and I tremble with joy again and again.

Where the Lord of yoga, Krishna, where Partha the bowman: there, fortune, victory, prosperity, eternal justice—this, my belief!'"

BHISHMA VADHA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Sanjaya says, 'Upon seeing Dhananjaya once again take up his arrows and Gandiva, the mighty Pandava maharathas utter a tremendous shout. And those heroes, the Pandavas and the Somakas, and those who followed them, filled with joy, blow their sea-born conches. And drums, and pesis, and krakachas, and cow-horns are beaten and blown together, to make a loud uproar.

And then there come the Devas, with Gandharvas and the Pitris, and the hosts of Siddhas and Charanas, wanting to witness the sight; and a host of most blessed Rishis accompany Indra of a hundred sacrifices leading them, to witness that great slaughter.

Then, seeing the two armies, that look like two oceans, ready for the encounter and restlessly moving, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja takes off his coat of mail and puts aside his excellent bow, and quickly alighting from his chariot, with joined hands, goes quietly on foot towards his Pitamaha Bhishma, facing the east, towards the direction where the enemy army stands.

Seeing this, Arjuna hastily alights from his chariot and follows Yudhishtira, accompanied by his brothers. And Krishna also follows; and the chief kings of his army, filled with anxiety, also follow Yudhishtira.

Arjuna says, "What are you doing, O king, that abandoning your brothers, you go on foot, facing east, towards the enemy?"

Bhima says, "Where are you going, O king of kings, having cast off your armour and weapons, towards the enemy warriors, leaving your brothers?"

Nakula says, "You are my eldest brother, O Bhaarata; seeing you go this way, I am afraid. Tell us, where do you go?"

Sahadeva says, "When these vast and powerful forces are by our side ready to fight, where do you go, O king, in the direction of our enemies?"'

Sanjaya continues, 'Yudhishtira of restrained speech says nothing but walks on towards the enemy army. The high-souled, wise Krishna smilingly says to them, "I know his purpose. He will fight the enemy only after having paid his respects to all his superiors: Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and Salya.

It is heard in histories of olden times that he who fights against those that are his superiors, after having paid his respects, according to dharma, to his preceptors, those revered in years, and his kinsmen, is sure to be victorious in battle. This is my view as well."

When Krishna says this, loud exclamations can be heard among the ranks of Dhritarashtra's son, but the Pandava army remains perfectly still. Seeing Yudhishtira, the heroic warriors of Dhritarashtra's son speak among one another, "This one is a wretch of his race. It is clear that he is coming in cowardly terror to Bhishma's side. Yudhishtira, with his brothers, is seeking Bhishma's protection.

When Dhananjaya protects him, and Bhima, and Nakula, and Sahadeva also, why does the eldest son of Pandu come here in fear? Though renowned through the world, he could never have been born in the Kshatriya varna, for he is weak and his heart is filled with fear at the prospect of battle."

Then those soldiers all praise the Kauravas. Rejoicing with cheerful hearts, all of them wave their cloths. All the fighting men there then censure Yudhishtira and his brothers and Krishna too. The Kaurava army, having disdained Yudhishtira, becomes perfectly still. What would this king say? What would Bhishma say in reply? What would proud Bhima say, and what Krishna and Arjuna? What, indeed, has Yudhishtira to say?

Both the armies are filled with great curiosity. Meanwhile, penetrating the hostile vyuha bristling with arrows and spears, Yudhishtira, surrounded by his brothers, walks quickly towards Bhishma. Seizing his feet with his two hands, the royal son of Pandu speaks to Shantanu's son who stands there ready for battle.

Yudhishtira says, "I salute you, O invincible one. We will wage war against you. Grant us your leave to do so. Give us also your blessing."

Bhishma says, "Had you not thus come to me in this battle, I would have cursed you, O Bhaarata, to bring about your defeat. I am gratified, my son. Fight then and let victory be yours. O son of Pandu, whatever else you desire, may you obtain it in battle. Ask us also for any boon you want and if it is in my power to give, then you will not be defeated.

A man is the slave of wealth, but wealth is no one's slave. This is the truth and I have been bound by the Kauravas with their wealth. It is for this reason, Kurunandana, that I speak these words like a eunuch. Bound am I by the Kauravas with wealth. Beyond battle, what do you desire?"

Yudhishtira says, "Wise Pitamaha, keeping my welfare in mind, from day to day, look after my interests. Do battle, however, for the Kauravas. This is my prayer to you."

Bhishma says, "Rajan, what help can I give you in this? I shall, of course, fight for your adversaries. Tell me plainly what you have to say."

Yudhishtira says, "Bowing to you, I ask you, O Pitamaha, how shall we vanquish you who are invincible in battle? Tell me this for my benefit, if you see any good in it."

Bhishma says, "I do not, O son of Kunti, see the warrior who, even if he were the Lord of the Devas himself, can defeat me in battle when I fight."

Yudhishtira says, "My salutations to you, Pitamaha! And that is why I ask you this. Tell us how your own death may be achieved by your enemies in battle."

Bhishma says, "I do not see the man who can quell me in battle. The time of my death has also not yet arrived."'

Sanjaya continues, 'Saluting him again, Yudhishtira accepts Bhishma's words with a bow of his head. And that Mahabaho, along with his brothers, goes towards the chariot of Acharya Drona amidst all the soldiers who watch him. Saluting Drona and walking around him in pradakshina, the king speaks to that invincible warrior.

Yudhishtira says, "With your leave, Acharya, I will fight with dharma, and thus permitted by you, O sinless one, I will defeat all my enemies."

He now goes to get the blessings of Acharya Kripa, who says, "If, having resolved to fight, you had not come to me, I would have cursed you, O king, for your complete overthrow. A man is the slave of wealth, but wealth is no one's slave. This is so true. Since I have been bound with wealth by the Kauravas, I must fight for them. I therefore speak like a eunuch in asking you: besides battle, what do you desire?"

Yudhishtira says, "Sorrowfully, I ask you, Acharya, to listen to what I say." Saying this, the king, greatly troubled and confused, stood silent.'

Sanjaya continues, 'Understanding, however, what he intended to say, Gautama Kripa says, "I cannot be killed, Rajan. Fight and triumph. I am gratified by your coming. Rising every morning I will pray for your victory. I say this to you sincerely."

Hearing Kripa's words, and paying him due respect, Yudhishtira goes to where the ruler of the Madras stands. Saluting Salya and walking around him in pradakshina he says to that invincible warrior, words that are for his own benefit.

Yudhishtira says, "With your leave, invincible one, I will fight without incurring sin, and so defeat my valiant enemies."

Salya says, "If, having resolved to fight, you had not come to me thus, I would have cursed you to be routed in battle. I am gratified and honoured by you. Let it be as you wish. I grant you leave: fight and be victorious. Speak, O Kshatriya, what do you need? What shall I give you?

Under these circumstances, beyond battle, what do you wish? A man is the slave of wealth but wealth is no one's slave. This is the truth. I have been bound with wealth by the Kauravas, and so I speak to you like a eunuch: I will grant you your cherished desire. Besides battle, what do you wish?"

Yudhishtira says, "Think daily of what is for my greatest good. Fight, according to your pleasure, for the sake of my enemy. This is the boon that I seek."

Salya says, "Given these circumstances, tell me how I can support you? I must, of course, fight for your enemy, having been bound by the Kauravas with their wealth."

Yudhishtira says, "O Salya, the boon I want is the one I sought during the preparations for the war: that you must weaken the energy of the Suta's son Karna during battle."

Salya says, "I grant you your wish, son of Kunti. Go, fight at your pleasure. I shall ensure your victory."'

Sanjaya continues, 'Having obtained the permission of his maternal uncle, the ruler of the Madras, Yudhishtira, surrounded by his brothers, comes out of that vast army.

Krishna goes up to Radha's son on the battlefield. And on behalf of the Pandavas, Krishna says to Karna, "I have heard, Karna, that because of your hatred of Bhishma you will not fight. Come to our side, O Radheya, and remain with us as long as Bhishma is not slain. After Bhishma is killed, you can fight for Duryodhana, if you have no preference for any of the sides."

Karna says, "I will not do anything that is offensive to Dhritarashtra's son, Kesava. Devoted to Duryodhana's good, know that I have offered up my life for him." Krishna stays silent, and rejoins the Pandavas.

Amidst all the fighting men, Yudhishtira loudly exclaims, "He who will choose us now shall be our ally!"

Seeing them, Yuyutsu says cheerfully to Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, "I will fight under your banner in war, against the sons of Dhritarashtra, if you will accept me, sinless one!"

Yudhishtira says, "Come, all of us will fight against your foolish brothers, Yuyutsu. Krishna and we all say to you: we accept you, Mahabaho, fight for my cause. It appears that both the thread of Dhritarashtra's line as also his funeral rites rest upon you. Splendid prince, accept us who receive you. The wrathful and evil-minded Duryodhana will cease to live."'

Sanjaya continues, 'Yuyutsu, abandoning the Kauravas, your sons, crosses over to the army of the Pandavas, to the beating of drums and cymbals. Yudhishtira, again joyfully puts on his radiant coat of armour.

Those bulls among men mount their respective chariots and they organise their troops in battle formation as before. They cause hundreds of drums and cymbals to be sounded. They roar like lions. Seeing those tigers among men, the sons of Pandu, on their chariots, the allied kings, with Dhrishtadyumna and others, once more set up shouts of joy.

Observing the nobility of the Pandavas, who had paid due honour to those that were deserving of it, all the gathered kings praise them. And the kings talk with one another about the friendship, the compassion, and the kindness to kinsmen, displayed at the proper time by those high-souled ones. Excellent! Excellent! These are the words spoken everywhere, together with eulogies about those famed heroes.

As a result of this, the minds and hearts of everyone present are drawn to them. The Mlechchas and the Aryas there, who saw or heard of what the Pandavas had done, all weep, deeply moved. Those great warriors, of terrific tejas, cause large drums and pushkaras by the hundreds and thousands to be sounded; they blow their milk-white conches.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'When the legions of both my side and that of the enemy are thus arrayed, who strikes first, the Kauravas or the Pandavas?'

Sanjaya says, 'Hearing the words of his elder brother, your son Dussasana advances with his troops, with Bhishma at their head. The Pandavas, led by Bhima, also advance with joyful hearts, wanting battle with Bhishma. Leonine shouts, the noise of krakachas and the blare of cow-horns, and the sound of drums and cymbals, rise on all sides. The fighting men of the enemy assail us, and we too charge against them with loud shouts. The ensuing uproar is deafening.

In that terrible encounter, the vast armies of the Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras shudder for that reverberance of conches and cymbals, like forests shaken by the wind. The clamour of the hordes of kings, elephants and horses, rushing against one another in that evil hour, is as loud as that of tempestuous oceans.

And when that din, making one's hair stand on end, arose, Mahabaho Bhima begins to roar like a bull. Bhima's roars resound above the clamour of conches and drums, the grunts of elephants, and the leonine shouts of the warriors. Indeed, the shouts of Bhima transcend the neighing of the thousands of horses in both armies.

Hearing Bhima roaring like thunderclouds, his voice like the report of Sakra's thunder, your warriors are terrified. At those roars of that Kshatriya, the horses and elephants all urinate and excrete as other animals do at the roar of the lion. Thundering like a deep mass of clouds, and assuming an awful form, Bhima falls upon your sons.

Duryodhana, Durmukha and Dussaha, and that maharathika Dussasana, and Durmarshana, and Vivimsati, and Chitrasena, and the mighty maharatha Vikarna and also Purumitra, and Jaya, and Bhoja, and the valiant son of Somadatta, shake their splendid bows like masses of clouds streaked with flashes of lightning.

Drawing from their quivers long arrows resembling snakes that have just cast off their skins, they surround that mighty archer charging towards them, covering him with flights of arrows like the clouds shrouding the sun.

The five sons of Draupadi, and the majestic warrior Saubhadra, and Nakula, and Sahadeva, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race, attack those Dhartarashtras, rending them with arrows like mountain peaks with bolts of lightning. In that first encounter of the awe-inspiring twang of bowstrings and their flapping against the leather gloves of the fighting men, no warrior, on either side, retreats.

Bharatarishabha, I saw the lightness of hand of Drona's disciples, in particular those who, shooting countless arrows, always succeed in finding their target. And the sound of bowstrings is unceasing, and the blazing arrows flare through the air like meteors falling from the sky.

All the other kings stand as silent spectators witnessing that dread encounter of kinsmen. Those maharathikas remember the old injuries sustained at one another's hands, and wrathfully strive in battle, Bhaarata, always challenging each other aloud.

The two armies, of the Kauravas and the Pandavas, teeming with elephants, horses and chariots, look exceedingly beautiful on the battlefield like figures in a painting. The other kings all take up their bows. And the Sun himself is veiled by the dust raised by the soldiers.

They attack one another, at the heads of their respective troops, at the command of your son. The uproar of the elephants and the horses of those kings dashing into battle mingles with the leonine shouts of the warriors and the blast of conches and the sounds of drums. The tumult of that ocean, having arrows for its crocodiles, bows for its snakes, swords for its tortoises, and the bounding leaps of warriors for its gale, resembles a real surging sea. And kings in thousands, commanded by Yudhishtira, along with their forces, fall upon your son's legions.

The encounter between the warriors of the two armies is intense, and no difference can be seen between the men of the two warring sides, whether battling, or retreating in disarray, or rallying again to the fight. In that terrific and dreadful melee, Pitamaha Bhishma is most radiant, dominating that teeming host.'

Sanjaya says, 'On the morning of that fateful day, the war that mangled the bodies of many kings begins. And the deafening shouts, the leonine roars of the Kauravas and the Srinjayas, both wanting victory in battle, resound through earth and sky. And a tumultuous pandemonium is heard mingled with the flaps of leather gloves and the blast of conches. Like roaring tigers, the men shout against one another.

The sound of bowstrings stretched by gloved hands, the heavy tread of foot-soldiers, the furious neighing of horses, the falling of sticks and iron hooks on the heads of elephants, the clash of weapons, the jangle of the bells of elephants as they rush against one another, and the rumble of chariots like thunderclouds, mix to produce a clamour that makes one's hair stand on end.

And all the Kaurava warriors, reckless of their very lives and their intentions cruel, charge, with standards raised, against the Pandavas. Bhishma himself, taking up a bow that resembles the rod of Yama, charges Dhananjaya on the field. Arjuna of flaming tejas, seizes up the celebrated Gandiva, and rushes against Ganga's son. Both these tigers among the Kurus are determined to kill each other.

The mighty son of Ganga, despite a searing attack on the son of Pritha, cannot make him falter. And so also Arjuna cannot make Bhishma waver in battle.

The great archer Satyaki rides against Kritavarman. The battle duel these two is fierce and makes the hair of onlookers stand on end. With loud yells, Satyaki strikes Kritavarman, and Kritavarman smites Satyaki, and each weakens the other. Pierced all over with arrows, these maharathas shine like two blossoming kimsukas in spring bedecked with blood flowers.

The awesome young Abhimanyu battles Brihadbala. Soon, however, the ruler of Kosala cuts off the standard and kills the sarathy of Subhadra's son. Abhimanyu wrathfully pierces Brihadbala with nine arrows, and with two more that parantapa cuts down Brihadbala's standard, and with yet another, kills one of the protectors of his chariot wheels, and his charioteer as well. And the two continue to exhaust each other with vicious arrows.

Bhima faces your son Duryodhana, that maharathika, proud and pompous, who had so harmed the Pandavas. Both princes are tigers among men and maharathas. And on the battlefield, they cover each other with showers of arrows. And seeing these high-souled warriors fight, all are amazed.

Dussasana charges maharathika Nakula and pierces him with countless barbs which can pierce an enemy's very vital organs. Laughing, the son of Madri severs his adversary's standard and bow, and strikes him with twenty-five fine arrows. In the ferocious encounter, your powerful son kills Nakula's horses and cuts down his standard.

Durmukha assails the mighty Sahadeva, covering him with a storm of shafts. The heroic Sahadeva fells Durmukha's charioteer with a razor-tipped arrow. Both men, irrepressible in fight, attempt to strike terror into each other with vigorous shafts.

King Yudhishtira himself faces the ruler of the Madras, who breaks Yudhishtira's bow in his hands. Throwing aside the riven bow, Kunti's son takes up a stronger bow and one that can loose arrows more swiftly. With wrathful cries and unerring aim, he covers the Madra king with deadly shafts.

Dhrishtadyumna, O Bhaarata, rushes against Drona in wrath, and the great Drona breaks the unyielding bow of the high-souled prince of Panchala that always finds its deadly mark. He looses a terrible shaft that is like the rod of Yama; this barb pierces the body of the Panchala prince. Swiftly snatching up another bow and fourteen arrows, the son of Drupada stabs Drona with a fluent volley. In high rage, they battle fiercely on.

The impetuous Sankha encounters Somadatta's son who is equally impulsive in battle and, asking him to stop and fight, shoots him in his right arm. The son of Somadatta strikes Sankha through the shoulders. The duel that follows between these two proud Kshatriyas soon becomes as ferocious as an encounter between the Devas and the Danavas.

Maharatha Dhrishtaketu of immeasurable soul and great wrath storms against Bahlika, himself an embodiment of rage. With a leonine roar, Bahlika draws blood from Dhrishtaketu with a shower of keen shafts. The king of the Chedis swiftly pierces Bahlika with nine savage arrows. Like two incensed elephants, they duel in thunderous rage.

They confront each other, appearing even like the planets Angaraka and Sukra.

The feral Ghatotkacha encounters the brutal and mighty rakshasa Alambusha like Sakra facing Bala in battle. And Ghatotkacha, O Bhaarata, pierces the rakshasa with ninety keen shafts.

Alambusha strikes Bhima’s son copiously with his straight and wild wooden barbs. Lacerated, they shine like the mighty Sakra and the powerful Bala during the ancient Devasura yuddha.

Sikhandin rides against Drona’s son Aswatthaman, only to be deeply wounded with a long arrow, making him tremble. Sikhandin also strikes Drona’s son deep with an elegant shaft, and they continue in this vein with various kinds of barbs, plain and exotic.

Virata, the Senapati of a vast legion, swiftly advances to face Bhagadatta in battle, and covers Bhagadatta with a shower of arrows like the clouds showering rain upon a mountain breast. But Bhagadatta, that lord of the earth, swiftly envelops Virata with his own arrow cloud like thunderheads might the risen sun.

Kripa, son of Saradwat, rushes against Brihadkshatra, king of the Kaikeyas, and shrouds him in a barrage of arrows. Brihadkshatra also rains arrows down on the incensed son of Gautama. And having killed each other’s horses and cloven off each other’s bows, those two soon find themselves deprived of their chariots. In rage, they approach each other to fight with swords. And dreadful and unparalleled is the duel which ensues between them.

King Drupada wrathfully attacks Jayadratha, king of the Sindhus, who is cheerfully awaiting battle. Jayadratha stabs Drupada with three arrows and Drupada pierces him with a brace of barbs in return. And the battle between them, also, is awesome and fierce, and brings great satisfaction to all onlookers for it resembles a conflict between Sukra and Angaraka.’

Sanjaya says, 'Bhaarata, I will now describe to you the clashes between hundreds and thousands of foot-soldiers, who abandon all restraint. Here the son does not recognise the father, or the father the son of his loins; the brother does not acknowledge the brother, nor the sister's son his maternal uncle. The maternal uncle does not acknowledge the sister's son, the friend not the friend.

The Pandavas and the Kauravas fight as if possessed by demons. Some mighty warriors fall with their chariots shattered. The axle rods of chariots break as they clash against shafts, and the spikes of chariot yokes against spikes of chariot yokes.

And some warriors unite together to fight others that are similarly together, all wanting to kill. Some chariots, obstructed by other rathas, cannot move. Lofty elephants with rent temples fall upon other elephants, rending one another in many places with their tusks. Others encountering massive tuskers with arched howdahs and standards on their backs, and trained to fight with their tusks, scream in agony.

Disciplined by training and goaded by pikes and hooks, elephants not in rut attack those in demented musth. And some leviathans, encountering those in rut, run in all directions, screeching like cranes. Many towering mastodons, well-trained, and with juice trickling down from rent temples and mouth, lacerated by swords, spears and arrows in their vital parts, trumpet awfully and fall dead, shaking the earth. Some utter frightful cries and run in all directions.

The broad-chested, powerful foot-soldiers that protect the elephants are armed with pikes and bows, and bright battle-axes, and with maces and clubs mounted with iron spikes, and short arrows, and lances, and brightly polished swords; they, too, charge in all directions seeming determined to kill each other. And the swords of brave fighters, steeped in human blood, shine brightly.

And the sound of the swords of Kshatriyas as they whirl and fall upon the vital parts of enemies is sickening. The heartrending wails of the hosts of fighting men, crushed with maces and clubs, and cut down with well-tempered swords, and pierced with the tusks of elephants, and grained by tuskers, calling upon one another, can be heard, Bhaarata, ah, like the cries of those cursed to hell.

Horsemen, on flying chargers with outstretched tails resembling the plumage of swans, dash against one another. And hurled by the riders, long-bearded golden barbs, polished and sharp, fall like snakes. Some heroic horsemen, on agile coursers, leaping high, hew off the heads of warriors in their chariots.

Here and there a maharatha, finding a host of cavalry within range, decimates them with arrows. Many incensed elephants bedecked with trappings of gold, and looking like newly-risen clouds, trample the horses underfoot to bloody pulp. Some elephants, struck on their frontal globes and flanks, and mangled by spears, scream horribly.

Massive tuskers, in the bewildering commotion, fling down and crush horses along with their riders; and some, overthrowing horses and riders with the points of their tusks, roam about smashing chariots with their standards.

Some majestic bull elephants, bursting with a surfeit of energy and gushing temporal juice, kill horses and their riders with trunks and legs. Nimble arrows, polished and pointed, so like snakes, fall upon the heads, the temples, the flanks, and the limbs of these great beasts.

And polished javelins, meteoric, hurled by noble arms, fall on all sides, piercing coats of mail in scarlet bursts and penetrating the bodies of men and horses. Many, drawing polished swords from sheaths made of the skins of leopards and tigers, cut down the enemy with fell strokes. Others, though themselves attacked and with gashed bodies, angrily fall upon their foes with swords, shields and axes.

Some tuskers, dragging down and hurling chariots and their horses with their trunks, begin to wander in all directions, exhorted by the cries of those behind them. The men, some pierced by spears, some dismembered by battle-axes, and some crushed by elephants and others trodden down by horses, and some slashed by chariot wheels, and others by axes, cry out plaintively to their kinsmen.

Some call out to their sons, and some to their fathers, and some to brothers and other kinsmen. Some call to their maternal uncles, and some to their sister's sons. And some call out to others, on this frightful battlefield.

Countless warriors lose their weapons, or have their thighs broken. Others with arms torn off or with gaping wounds, wail loudly, desperately wanting to live. And some, with a little remaining strength, tortured by thirst, and lying gasping on the field of battle, on the bare ground, beg for water. And some, soaking in pools of blood, O Bhaarata, censure themselves and your sons gathered for battle.

Brave Kshatriyas, who having injured one another, do not abandon their duels or cry out. Instead, lying on the battlefield, they roar with joyful hearts, and in great fury, they bite their own lips. They glower at one another with faces rendered fierce by the furrowing of their brows. And still others, enduring the pain caused by arrows and ghastly wounds, with strength and tenacity, remain perfectly still and silent.

Other maharathikas, deprived of their own chariots, and flung down and wounded by elephants, ask to be taken up on to the chariots of others. Many look glorious with their wounds like blooming kinsukas. In all the legions, countless cries can be heard, rising into the heavens.

And in this awful war that destroys Kshatriyas, the father kills the son, the son kills the father, the sister's son cuts down the maternal uncle, and the uncle the sister's son. Friend fells friend, and all kinsmen one another. Such is the slaughter in this conflict of the Kauravas with the Pandavas.

In that monstrous war of no mercy, the forces of the Pandavas, approaching Bhishma, begin to waver.

Mahabaho Bhishma, with his silver standard graced with the sign of the palmyra with five stars, sitting on his majestic chariot, shines like the full moon under Meru's peak.'

Sanjaya says, 'After most of the morning of that terrible day passes in that awesome engagement, so destructive of the most magnificent men, Durmukha and Kritavarman, and Kripa, and Salya, and Vivimsati, urged by your son, ride to Bhishma to protect him. Shielded by those five maharathas Bhishma penetrates the Pandava host.

The palmyra standard of Bhishma glides through the Chedis, the Kasis, the Karushas, and the Panchalas. With broad-tipped arrows, that Kshatriya razes the enemy, cutting off heads, and shattering chariots with their yokes and standards. Bhishma seems to veritably dance on his chariot as it courses along its path.

Elephants, struck by him in their vital parts, shriek dismally. Abhimanyu, mounted on his chariot yoked to excellent tawny steeds, charges at Bhishma's chariot in fury. With his standard adorned with a golden karnikara tree, he draws near Bhishma and the five maharathas who protect him. Abhimanyu strikes the standard of the palmyra-bannered warrior with a keen shaft, and hotly engages Bhishma and his defenders.

Piercing Kritavarman with one arrow, and Salya with five, Abhimanyu draws blood from the great patriarch with nine more. And with one shaft brilliantly shot from his bow drawn to its fullest stretch, he cuts off his adversary's gold standard.

With another barb, piercing through every defence, he severs the head of Durmukha's sarathy from his body; with another, he breaks Kripa's gold bedecked bow. With a flurry of jagged shafts, this young maharatha strikes so furiously, he also appearing to dance the while.

And seeing the lightness of his hand, the Devas are gratified. The deadly accuracy of Abhimanyu makes the other maharathas, headed by Bhishma, look upon him as being as much an archer as Arjuna himself. Sounding a twang even like that of the Gandiva, while stretched and re-stretched, his bow seems to revolve like a circle of fire.

Bhishma charges forward and pierces Arjuna's son with nine seething barbs; in turn, Abhimanyu burns the standard of that warrior of great tejas, while Bhishma strikes Abhimanyu's charioteer.

And Kritavarman, and Kripa, and Salya also, shoot Abhimanyu, but he stands before them like the Mainaka mountain. Though surrounded by these maharathas of the Dhartarashtra army, he continues to rain a ceaseless storm of arrows upon them.

He obstructs their mighty weapons with his tumult of arrows, and showering Bhishma with them, he sends up a joyful roar. And in this battle with Bhishma, the strength of Abhimanyu's handsome young arms is wonderful to see. Despite this prowess, Bhishma also looses his arrows at him. But Subhadra's son wards them off, and fells Bhishma's standard with nine arrows. And seeing that wondrous feat, the soldiers there set up a loud shout.

Bedecked with jewels, Bhishma's lofty silver standard, bearing the device of the palmyra, falls to the ground. Seeing this, the proud Bhima sets up a great roar to cheer on the son of Subhadra.

The irresistible Bhishma now invokes powerful devastras to appear. The Pitamaha of immeasurable soul envelops Abhimanyu with thousands of mystic arrows. Ten great archers and maharathas of the Pandavas swiftly advance in their chariots to protect the youthful hero Virata with his son, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race, and Bhima, the five Kekaya brothers, and Satyaki.

As they recklessly fall upon him, Bhishma pierces the prince of Panchala with three sizzling shafts, and Satyaki with ten. And with one winged, razor like arrow, shot from his bow fully drawn bow, he cuts off Bhima's standard. That standard made of gold and bearing the device of a lion, plunges from Bhima's chariot. Bhima enraged stabs Bhishma with three arrows, Kripa with one, and Kritavarman with eight.

And Uttara, the son of Virata, seated on a tusker with upraised trunk, attacks the king of the Madras. Salya, however, succeeds in checking the unparalleled speed of that prince of elephants racing towards his chariot. Uttara wrathfully sets his leg upon the yoke of Salya's chariot, and kills his four magnificent horses.

Salya remains in that chariot, and hurls an iron spear like a venomous snake at Uttara. The lance pierces Uttara's coat of mail and he falls dead from his elephant's neck, with the hook and the lance loosened from his grasp. And Salya takes up his sword and, leaping down from his chariot, severs the enormous trunk of that mighty elephant. His coat of mail pierced all over with a torrent of arrows, and his trunk hacked, the elephant cries out and falls dead.

Salya hastily climbs into Kritavarman's splendid chariot. Seeing his brother Uttara slain and seeing Salya with Kritavarman, Virata's son Sweta blazes up in fury, like a fire on which ghee is poured. Stretching his majestic bow that resembles the bow of Sakra himself, the mighty Sweta rushes forward to kill Salya.

Surrounded on all sides by a host of chariots, Sweta moves towards Salya's chariot raining arrows at him. And seeing him charging like an incensed elephant, seven of your maharathas, Rajan, surround him on all sides, to save the king of the Madras from a certain death.

Those seven warriors are Brihadbala king of the Kosalas, and Jayatsena of Magadha, and Rukmaratha, the gallant son of Salya, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and Sudakshina, king of the Kambojas, and Jayadratha, lord of the Sindhus and the kinsman of Brihadkshatra. The stretched bows of these high warriors, decorated with many colours, look like flashes of lightning in the clouds. And they all rain unceasing arrows on Sweta's head like the clouds tossed by the wind that pour rain on the mountain breast at the end of summer.

That brilliant Kshatriya, enraged, strikes their bows with seven swift broad-headed arrows, and continues to assail them. And in the same moment as their bows are riven, they all instantly take up other bows. And they shoot seven arrows at Sweta.

And again that Mahabaho of immeasurable soul breaks these other bows with seven shafts. Their anger mounting, the maharathas whose bows have been riven, seize seven lances, roar loudly, and cast those seven javelins at Sweta's chariot. Those fiery spears, which course through the air like comets, with the sound of thunder, are all cleaved by seven uncanny shafts before they can reach that most excellent warrior, master of the most fearful astras.

Taking up a missile which can pierce every part of the body, he unleashes it at Rukmaratha. And this powerful weapon, with a force greater than that of a thunderbolt, pierces Rukmartha's body and he falls unconscious in his chariot. His charioteer fearlessly carries him away, unconscious, before the eyes of all.

Taking up six other arrows adorned with gold, Mahabaho Sweta cuts off the standard-tops of his six adversaries. That chastiser of enemies, piercing their horses and charioteers, and raining ceaseless barbs upon these six fighting men, moves towards the chariot of Salya. And seeing that commander of the Pandava forces moving swiftly towards Salya's chariot, a loud uproar of anxious cries rises up in your army, O Bhaarata.

Your valiant son, with Bhishma at the head of his forces, and supported by noble Kshatriyas and vast troops, advances towards Sweta's ratha, and rescues the Madra king from the jaws of death. A hair-raising battle erupts between your soldiers and those of the enemy, one in which chariots and elephants are all embroiled in bedlam. The old Kuru Pitamaha rains a flurry of arrows upon Abhimanyu and Bhima, and the maharathika Satyaki, and upon the ruler of the Kekayas, and Virata, and Dhrishtadyumna, and upon the Chedi troops.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'When that brilliant archer Sweta advances towards Salya's chariot, what do the Kauravas and the Pandavas do, Sanjaya? And also what does Bhishma do? Tell me, I entreat you.'

Sanjaya says, 'Rajan, hundreds and thousands of noble Kshatriyas, all brave maharathas, placing Sikhandin in the vanguard, and displaying their strength to your royal son, want to rescue Sweta. And they move swiftly towards Bhishma's chariot, bedecked with gold, to kill that meridian warrior. The battle that follows is hair raising to watch.

I will describe to you that astonishing and chilling battle between your troops and those of the enemy. Bhishma empties many chariots of their maharathas by sloughing off their heads with a barrage of arrows. Imbued with energy equal to that of the sun, he shrouds the very sun with his shafts; he eliminates his enemies that encircle him, like the rising sun dispels the surrounding darkness.

The son of Shantanu shoots hundreds of thousands of arrows that claim the lives of countless Kshatriyas. He cleaves the heads of countless valiant fighting men. Elephants cased in spiked armour fall like mountains peaks struck by lightning.

Chariots are seen entangled with one another. One chariot lies upon another chariot, and one horse upon another. And reckless chargers bear the corpses of daring young riders, hanging from their saddles with their bows still in their lifeless hands.

With swords and quivers as yet attached to their bodies, and loosened coats of mail, hundreds of men lie dead on the ground, sleeping on beds worthy of heroes. Charging against one another, falling down and rising up again, and charging once again, they fight hand to hand. Wounded deep by each other, they reel on the battlefield.

Incensed elephants rush in all directions, and hundreds of maharathas are slaughtered. Chariots and their riders are crushed on all sides. And they fall upon each others' chariots, and are killed by the arrows of another. A maharatha can be seen to plunge from a height, his charioteer also having been slain.

A thick pall of dust rises, and it is only by the twang of a hostile bow that the presence of an opponent is known to an embattled fighter. From the pressure upon their bodies, warriors gauge their enemies. And they fight on with arrows, guided only by the sound of bowstrings.

The very hiss of the arrows shot by the fighting men at one another cannot be heard. And so loud is the sound of drums that it seems to pierce the ears. In that tumultuous uproar making the hair stand on end, the name of the warrior called out as he shows his prowess, cannot be heard. The father does not recognise the son of his loins.

As a wheel breaks, or the yoke is torn off, or a horse killed, the maharatha is flung from his chariot, along with his sarathy. Many daring fighters, deprived of their rathas, are seen to take flight. Some are killed, while others are struck in their very vitals: but none escape unscathed, when dreadful Bhishma attacks the enemy.

In that burning, awesome fray, Sweta slaughters a vast number of the Kauravas. And he kills hundreds upon hundreds of noble princes with his inexorable arrows; in every direction, he smashes the bows and cuts off the heads of hundreds of great warriors, their arms decked with angadas.

Sweta annihilates maharathas and splinters chariot wheels, the chariots themselves, and shreds standards both small and large and precious, and numerous horses, and a multitude of men. As for me, fearing Sweta, and abandoning the magnificent Bhishma, I retreated from the battle and now stand before you, Rajan.

And all the Kauravas, though armed for war, desert Bhishma, and stand like spectators beyond the range of arrows. Joyful in the hour of widespread gloom, that tiger among men, Bhishma, alone stands unshakeable like Meru.

Melting the enemy, like the sun at winter's end, he stands in the shining radiance of his chariot like the irradiant sun. And that great archer shoots a tempest of arrows and mows down the enemy.

And being slaughtered by Bhishma in that fierce fight, the enemy warriors break ranks and flee from him, as if from a dire inferno. Encountering the prodigious Sweta, Bhishma alone stands calm and undaunted. Devoted to the cause of Duryodhana, he begins to ravage the Pandava warriors. Uncaring for his life, which is so precious to all men, he fearlessly destroys the Pandava army.

Seeing Sweta strike down the Dhartarashtra legions, your father Bhishma charges him. Sweta covers Bhishma with a fusillade of arrows. And Bhishma also cloaks Sweta in a shroud of shafts. And roaring like two bulls, they fall upon each other, like colossal maddened elephants or two raging tigers.

Thwarting each other's weapons with their own, those bulls among men, Bhishma and Sweta, fight, each to kill the other. In a single day the angry Bhishma can obliterate the Pandava army, if Sweta did not protect it.

Seeing Sweta holding off the Pitamaha, the Pandavas are filled with joy, while your son becomes despondent. Supported by his allies, Duryodhana garners his troops and wrathfully attacks the Pandava host.

Momentarily turning away from the son of Ganga, Sweta begins to energetically slaughter your son's forces like a violent wind uprooting trees. Beside himself with wrath, having routed your army, the son of Virata advances again towards Bhishma.

And those two high-souled maharathas, both blazing arrows, battle each other like Vritra and Vasava of old. Drawing his bow to the fullest stretch, Sweta pierces Bhishma with seven shafts. Bhishma swiftly checks his adversary like an incensed elephant curbing an angered rival.

Sweta, who delights the Kshatriyas with his prowess, strikes Bhishma, who in return stabs him with ten shining barbs. Yet that glorious warrior stands still like a mountain. Sweta gores Shantanu's son with twenty-five shafts, filling all those around them with wonder.

Smiling and licking the corners of his mouth, Sweta shatters Bhishma's bow into ten pieces with ten perfect arrows. Then aiming a plumed iron barb, he cleaves the palmyra on top of Bhishma's standard.

Seeing the standard of Bhishma cut down, your sons think that Sweta has killed the Pitamaha. The elated Pandavas, thinking the same, blow their conches. Seeing the palmyra standard of the great Bhishma laid low, a furious Duryodhana urges his troops into battle. And they all converge to protect Bhishma who was in danger.

To both his forces and to bystanders, the king says, "Either Sweta will die today, or Bhishma!"

Hearing Duryodhana, his maharathas swiftly advance to protect the son of Ganga. With great alacrity, Bahlika and Kritavarman, and Kripa, and Salya also, O Bhaarata, and the son of Jarasandha, and Vikarna, and Chitrasena, and Vivimsati surround Bhishma, and shower Sweta with a high storm of arrows.

That celebrated Kshatriya adroitly checks those angry opponents, displaying his own dexterity. Stopping them like a lion might a herd of elephants, Sweta smashes Bhishma's bow with a singing cloud of arrows.

Bhishma takes up another bow and pierces Sweta, Rajan, with feathered barbs. Sweta animatedly strikes Bhishma with numerous shafts before everyone's eyes.

Duryodhana is distraught seeing Bhishma, that most excellent Kshatriya, thwarted in battle by Sweta, and your whole army is alarmed. And all who see great Bhishma, mangled by Sweta's arrows, believe him to be dead.

Enraged, seeing his standard fallen and the Dhartarashtra army checked, Bhishma looses a refulgent volley at Sweta. But Sweta, magnificent maharatha, wards off Bhishma's arrows, and once again rives the Pitamaha's bow with a thick and heavy shaft.

Beside himself, Bhishma flings aside that bow and takes up another bigger and stronger one. Aiming seven flat, whetted arrows, he kills Sweta's four horses with four, cuts down his standard with two, and with the seventh, provoked beyond all measure, cuts off his charioteer's head.

The stricken Sweta jumps down from his chariot. Bhishma attacks him from all sides with dense, relentless broadsides of arrows. Bleeding from many wounds, Sweta leaves his bow on his abandoned chariot and seizes up an occult golden lance.

Taking up that fierce astra which resembles the rod of Yama and could slay Death itself, Sweta furiously cries to Bhishma, "Stop and watch me, best of men!" And that great young hero hurls the serpentine lance, displaying his valour on behalf of the Pandavas. Loud exclamations arise among your sons, as they see that awesome missile in all its splendour. And launched by Sweta's arm, that ayudha like a snake that has just cast off its skin, falls like a meteor from the sky. Without the slightest quiver of fear, Bhishma cuts the shining thing that blazes through the air into nine fragments with eight winged arrows.

All your forces roar in jubilation. The son of Virata, seeing his lance of power desiccated, stands shocked, trembling suddenly, uncertain like one touched by the arrival of his final hour. But his rage still high, Sweta masters himself, and smiling, takes up a recondite mace to kill Bhishma.

His eyes ruby red, and even more like a second Yama now, he assails Bhishma like a swollen river dashing against rocks.

So knowing of the strengths of others, knowing that Sweta's gada is impossible to thwart, Bhishma leaps down from his chariot to escape that sorcerous weapon. Sweta whirls the heavy mace in fury and casts it at Bhishma's chariot like Siva himself. And the mace, intended for Bhishma's destruction, reduces his chariot, its standard and its charioteer, its horses and its shaft, all to ashes. On seeing great Bhishma reduced to fighting on foot, many maharathas like Salya rush to his rescue.

Mounting another chariot and rather dejectedly stretching his bow, Bhishma slowly advances towards Sweta; he hears a celestial voice, an asariri in the skies, fraught with his own good, which says, "Mahabaho Bhishma, strive without losing a moment. This is the hour fixed by Brahma for your victory over this one."

Hearing those words spoken by the celestial voice, Bhishma joyfully moves towards Sweta to kill him. Seeing maharatha Sweta fighting on foot, many great Pandava warriors rush to his rescue: Satyaki, and Bhimasena, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race; and the five Kekaya brothers, and Dhrishtaketu and Abhimanyu of great energy.

And seeing them, Bhishma, along with Drona and Salya and Kripa, arrests them all like a mountain stopping the force of the wind. When all the high-souled warriors of the Pandava side are thwarted, Sweta cleaves Bhishma's bow with a sword. Throwing aside that bow, the Pitamaha, having heard the celestial message, decides it is time to slay Sweta.

Though baffled by Sweta's genius, maharatha Bhishma seizes up another bow, as splendid as that of Sakra himself, and instantly strings it. He advances towards Sweta alone, though the prince is surrounded by those tigers among men with Bhima at their head.

Seeing Bhishma near, Bhima pierces him with sixty shafts. But Bhishma checks Bhima, Abhimanyu and the other maharathas with awesome astras. He also strikes Satyaki with a hundred arrows, Dhrishtadyumna with twenty and the Kekaya brothers with five.

Holding up all those great archers with his own deadly fire, the Pitamaha advances purposefully towards Sweta. Invoking an inexorable weapon of Death, Bhishma sets it to his bowstring. And that winged shaft, imbued with the force of the Brahmastra, is watched by the Devas and Gandharvas, and Pisachas and Uragas, and Rakshasas at the moment Bhishma releases it.

In an eruption of blood, that blazing ayudha plunges cleanly through Sweta's coat of mail and his body and passes into the earth, with a flash akin to lightning. Like the setting sun that divests the earth of light, the astra passes through Sweta, carrying away his life. Thus slain in battle by Bhishma, we see that young tiger among men fall to the ground like a crumpled mountain peak.

And all the maharathas of the Kshatriya race on the Pandava side lament. Your sons and all the Kauravas are elated. Seeing Sweta slain, Dussasana dances in joy on the battlefield to the loud music of conches and drums.

When that magnificent archer, that jewel of battle, is killed by Bhishma the other Pandava archers led by Sikhandin tremble in fear. Arjuna and Krishna slowly withdraw the men for the nightly rest. Bhaarata, the forces of both sides withdraw with frequent roars. And the Partha maharathas enter their quarters downcast, thinking of the dreadful slaughter of their splendid commander.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'When Sweta is killed, how do the Panchalas, those mighty archers, on the Pandava side, respond? Hearing that Sweta has been slain, what transpires between his comrades and his opponents that retreat before them?

Sanjaya, hearing of our victory, your words please me. My heart feels no shame in remembering our wrongdoing. The Pitamaha of Kuru's race is ever triumphant and devoted to us.

As for Duryodhana, having provoked war with that intelligent son of his uncle, on one occasion he looked for the protection of the sons of Pandu as he was anxious and afraid of Yudhishtira. At that time, abandoning everything, he was despondent. In view of the skill of the Pandavas, and thwarted and ensnared on all sides, Duryodhana for some time showed honourable behaviour, and placed himself under their protection.

Why, therefore, Sanjaya, has Sweta, who was loyal to Yudhishtira, been killed? Indeed, this magnificent prince has been hurled down to patala by a number of these despicable enemies of ours.

Bhishma does not support the war, nor does Acharya Drona; neither Kripa nor Gandhari likes it. Sanjaya, nor do I like it; neither does Krishna of Vrishni's race, nor Yudhishtira; nor Bhima, nor Arjuna, nor the twins, Nakula and Sahadeva, bulls among men. Always warned by me, by Gandhari, by Vidura, by Rama the son of Jamadagni, and by the high-souled Vyasa also, the depraved and corrupt Duryodhana, with Dussasana, always following the evil counsels of Karna and Subala's son, has behaved maliciously towards the Pandavas, and so great misfortune has fallen upon him.

After the killing of Sweta and the victory of Bhishma, what does the enraged Partha, with Krishna, do in battle? Indeed, it is Arjuna that I fear, and these fears cannot be dispelled. He is so very brave and powerful. He can decimate his enemies with his arrows. The son of Indra, and equal to Upendra, the younger brother of Indra, he is a warrior whose fury and intent are never futile. When you behold him on the field of war, what is your state of mind?

Valiant, familiar with the Vedas, resembling the Fire and the Sun in radiance, and owning knowledge of the Aindrastra, this Kshatriya of immeasurable soul is always victorious. His weapons always descend on his enemies with the force of the thunderbolt and he is blindingly quick in drawing his bowstring.

The formidable son of Drupada is also endowed with great wisdom. What does Dhrishtadyumna do when Sweta is killed? I am certain that the implacable hearts of the Pandavas burn for the injustices heaped upon them and the death of Sweta. Thinking of their wrath I am never at ease, by day or by night, on account of Duryodhana. How does the great war unfold? Tell me all about it, Sanjaya.'

Sanjaya says, 'Listen carefully, Rajan, to the account of your own wrongdoings. It is not fitting for you to attribute their outcome to Duryodhana. Your understanding is much like the construction of an embankment after the waters have disappeared, or like the digging of a well when the house is on fire.

With the passing of the morning, and the killing of Sweta by Bhishma, Virata's son Sankha, that grinder of the enemy, always delighting in battle, seeing Salya stationed with Kritavarman on his chariot, suddenly blazes in anger, as does a fire when ghee is poured on it. Stretching his immense bow that is like the bow of Indra himself, he rides to kill the king of the Madras, supported on all sides by a legion of chariots. And Sankha shoots a torrent of arrows as he dashes towards Salya's chariot.

Seeing him come like an enraged elephant, seven of your maharathas surround Salya to save him from the jaws of death. Mahabaho Bhishma, thundering like the very clouds, and taking up a bow six cubits long, rides swiftly at Sankha.

And seeing great Bhishma charge, the Pandava host trembles like a skiff tossed in a storm. Arjuna swiftly places himself in front of Sankha to protect him from Bhishma. And the duel between Bhishma and Arjuna begins. Loud exclamations arise among the gathered. One army blurs into the other, and all are filled with wonder.

Salya alights from his great chariot, and savagely kills Sankha's four horses with his mace. Sankha jumps down from his chariot and, sword in hand, runs to Arjuna's chariot where he is safe, and mounts it. A dense cloud of arrows from Bhishma's chariot covers all the sky and the earth. The arrows that fall from that most excellent archer's deadly cloud annihilate the Panchala, the Matsya, the Kekaya and the Prabhadraka horde and rills of blood flow on Kurukshetra.

Leaving Arjuna Savyasachin, the perfectly ambidextrous bowman, Bhishma dashes towards Drupada, king of the Panchalas, surrounded by his forces. And he shrouds his beloved kinsman with a dazzle of arrows. Like a forest consumed by fire at winter's end, the troops of Drupada are obliterated.

Bhishma stands in that battle like a radiant smokeless fire, or like the sun himself at noon scorching everything with his heat. The Pandava fighting men are unable to even look at him. In terror, they look around for a protector, and seeing none, seem like a herd of trembling cows.

The Pandava forces, slaughtered or retreating dejectedly, lament dispiritedly while being pursued.

Bhishma, with bow always drawn in a circle, shoots fiery shafts like virulent poison, creating a continuous stream of arrows in all directions; that hero of rigid vows kills the Pandava maharathas naming each aloud as he picks them off one by one. When the Pandava troops have been routed and crushed, corpses askew strewn across the battlefield, the sun sets and nothing can be seen.

And then, Bharatarishabha, beholding Bhishma, proudly standing before them, the Parthas withdraw their forces for the night.'

Sanjaya says, 'When the troops have been withdrawn on the first day, and when Duryodhana is elated seeing Bhishma in full fury of battle, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira hastily approaches Krishna, accompanied by all his brothers and his allies.

Filled with great despair thinking of his rout, and seeing Bhishma's dominance, he says to Krishna, "See how Bhishma of terrible prowess consumes my forces with his arrows like fire consuming dry grass. How can we even look at that high-souled warrior who is sweeping through my men like flames fed with ghee?

Watching that purushavyaghra with his mighty bow, my men flee, excoriated by his barbs. Enraged Yama himself, or Indra armed with the Vajra, or even Varuna with Paasa in hand, or Kubera with his mace may be defeated. But maharatha Bhishma is impossible to overcome. I am drowning in the fathomless ocean called Bhishma, without a boat to rescue me.

Kesava, it is from my abysmal ignorance that I have Bhishma as my adversary in war. I want to quit this terrible massacre and take sannyasa in the forest. To live there is preferable to sacrificing these earthly kings to Death come hunting us in the form of Bhishma.

Bhishma is a master of the greatest astras, and he will annihilate my army. My fighting men are like insects rushing into a raging fire to their certain death. In fighting for a kingdom, I am being led only to sure destruction.

My gallant brothers also bear arrows for my sake, having lost both sovereignty and happiness for the love of me, their eldest brother. We regard life highly, and it is too precious to be so lightly sacrificed. During the rest of my days I will practise the severest tapasya. I will not anymore be the cause of the deaths of my friends and my kinsmen.

The resplendent Bhishma, with his divine weapon, ceaselessly thwarts thousands of my maharathas, the most excellent of great warriors. Tell me, Krishna, without delay, what should I do for my own good?

As for Arjuna, I see that he is an unmoved spectator in this battle. Only great Bhima, remembering Kshatriya dharma, fights with all his strength. With his mighty mace, this high-souled Kshatriya achieves the most difficult victories over foot-soldiers and horses, chariots and elephants. But this hero cannot in fair fight destroy the enemy even in a hundred years. Only your Arjuna can achieve this with his Devastras.

He looks on indifferently as we are overpowered by Bhishma and Drona. The unceasing astras of Bhishma and Drona raze all our Kshatriyas. Unquestionably, the raging Bhishma and his allies will annihilate us. Krishna, go look for that great archer, that maharatha, who can extinguish Bhishma like rain clouds a forest fire. Then with your blessings, the sons of Pandu, their enemies defeated and their kingdom restored, will be at peace with their kinsmen."

Having said this, Yudhishtira, with a grieving heart and mind in turmoil, remains silent in reflection for a long time. Seeing the son of Pandu stricken with grief, Krishna lifts the spirit of the Pandavas saying, "Do not mourn, lord of the Bhaaratas. It does not befit you to lament, when your brothers are all brave archers renowned the world over.

I also am engaged in working towards your welfare, as are the revered maharathas Satyaki and Virata and Drupada, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's line. All these kings and their legions honour you and are devoted to you. Maharatha Dhrishtadyumna, who commands your army, wants your welfare, as also Mahabaho Sikhandin, who is the one certain to kill Bhishma."

Hearing these words, before the assembled men and in the presence of Krishna, Yudhishtira says to Dhrishtadyumna, "You of Prishata's lineage, listen to my words which must not be violated. Approved by Vasudeva, you have been our Senapati. As Kartikeya was the Senapati of the divine forces, in bygone days, so also are you for the Pandava army.

Use your prowess, O tiger among men, and exterminate the Kauravas. I will follow you along with Bhima, and Krishna also, and the sons of Madri, all united together, the sons of Draupadi in full armour, and all the other valiant kings."

Dhrishtadyumna says, "Ordained by Shambhu himself, I am the proclaimed destroyer of Drona. I shall wage war against Bhishma, and Drona and Kripa, and Salya and Jayadratha, and all the proud kings on the Kaurava side."

When that most glorious of princes, that slayer of enemies, the son of Prishata, says this defiantly, the Pandava warriors are once more filled with great unyielding courage and heart, and roar loudly.

Yudhishtira says to Dhrishtadyumna, "Form the vyuha called Krauncharuma. This formation was the one advocated by Brihaspati to Indra in ancient days when the Devas and the Asuras fought, and it devoured enemy hosts. Unseen before, dazzle the Kauravas with its power."

Thus addressed by that god among men, Yudhishtira, like Vishnu by Indra, Dhrishtadyumna places Arjuna in the vanguard of the army at dawn. And Dhananjaya's standard, crafted by divine power at Indra's command, waves gloriously in the crisp morning air.

Decked with the colours of the Indradhanusha, the rainbow, that standard coursing through the air looks like an edifice of vapour which seems to glide along its chariot. And the bearer of the Gandiva, adorned with jewels, and that standard beside him, looks doubly brilliant, like Brahma with the Sun, and the Sun with the Self-created One.

King Drupada, surrounded by a host of fighting men, becomes the head of that vyuha. And the two kings Kuntibhoja and Saibya become its two eyes. And the ruler of the Dasarnas, and the Prayagas, with the Daserakas, and the Anupakas, and the Kiratas are its neck, Bharatarishabha.

Yudhishtira with the Patachcharas, the Hunas, the Pauravakas and the Nishadas, so also the Pisachas, with the Kundavishas, and the Mandakas, the Ladakas, the Tanganas, and the Uddras, and the Saravas, the Tumbhumas, the Vatsas, and the Nakulas, become its right wing. And Nakula and Sahadeva place themselves on the left wing.

On the joints of the wings are ten thousand chariots, and on the head a hundred thousand; on the back of the vyuha are a hundred million and twenty thousand rathas, and on the neck a hundred and seventy thousand. On the joints of the wings and their tips move majestic elephants, like blazing mountains. And the rear is protected by Virata with the Kekayas, and the ruler of Kasi and the king of the Chedis, with thirty thousand chariots.

Forming this mighty vyuha, the Pandavas, eager for sunrise, await battle in armour. And their white royal parasols, rich and sparkling, as brilliant as the sun, bedazzle on their elephants and chariots.'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the awesome Krauncha vyuha, formed by Pandu's son of immeasurable energy, your son approaches Acharya Drona, and Kripa, and Salya, and Somadatta's son, and Vikarna, and Aswatthaman also, and all his brothers, led by Dussasana, and other mighty Kshatriyas gathered for battle, and speaks these judicious and pleasing words, "Armed with diverse weapons, you are all familiar with the shastras. Each of you maharathas is singly capable of decimating the sons of Pandu with their legions. How much more then we can accomplish when you are united. Our forces, protected by Bhishma, are beyond measure, while theirs, protected by Bhima, are limited.

Let the Samsthanas, the Surasenas, the Venikas, the Kukkuras, the Rechakas, the Trigartas, the Madrakas, the Yavanas, with Shatrunjayas, and Dussasana, and that admirable Vikarna, and Nanda and Upanandaka, and Chitrasena, along with the Manibhadrakas, protect Bhishma with their fighting men."

Then Bhishma and Drona and your sons form a mighty vyuha for resisting that of the Parthas. And Bhishma, surrounded by a vast fighting force, advances like the king of the Devas himself. And that mighty archer, the son of Bharadwaja, endowed with immense tejas, follows him with the Kuntalas, the Dasarnas, and the Magadhas, and with the Vidarbhas, the Melakas, the Karnas, and the Pravaranas also.

The Gandharas, the Sindhusauviras, the Sibis and the Vasatis with all their legions follow Bhishma, that ornament of battle; and Sakuni, with all his warriors, protects him. King Duryodhana, with all his brothers, with the Aswalakas, the Vikarnas, the Vamanas, the Kosalas, the Daradas, the Vrikas, as also the Kshudrakas and the Malavas, advances spiritedly against the Pandava army.

And Bhurisravas, and Sala, and Salya, and Bhagadatta, and Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, guard the left flank. And Somadatta, and Susarman, and Sudakshina, the ruler of the Kambojas, and Satayus, and Srutayus, are on the right flank. Aswatthaman, and Kripa, and Kritavarman of Satwata's race, with a very large akshauhini, are at the rear of the army. And behind them are the kings of many lands, Ketumat, and Vasudana, and the powerful son of the king of Kasi.

All the forces on your side joyfully await battle, blowing their conches with delight, and roaring like lions. Hearing these happy shouts the revered and powerful Bhishma also roars and blows his conch. Conches and drums, and many kinds of pesis and cymbals are sounded by others, setting up an upsurge of pulsating noise.

Krishna and Arjuna, both on a majestic chariot yoked to white horses, blow their beautiful conches decked with gold and jewels. Hrishikesa blows the Panchajanya, and Dhananjaya the one named Devadatta. Bhima of terrible deeds blows the enormous Paundra, and king Yudhishtira blows the Anantavijaya, while Nakula and Sahadeva blow upon the Sughosa and Manipushpaka.

The ruler of Kasi, and Saibya, and maharathas Sikhandin and Satyaki, and Dhrishtadyumna, and Virata, and that awesome archer, the king of the Panchalas, and the five sons of Draupadi, all blow their conches and set up leonine roars. And the great uproar of these Kshatriyas reverberates thunderously through the earth and the sky.

Thus, Rajan, the Kauravas and the Pandavas advance against each other eager to scorch each other in further battle.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'When the two armies stand ready in battle formation, how do those excellent warriors begin their attack?'

Sanjaya says, 'When all the forces are arrayed, the fighting men wait, in full armour, with their beautiful standards raised. And seeing the Kaurava army looking like the boundless ocean, your son Duryodhana, standing within it, commands his forces into fight.

The soldiers, with savage intent, abandoning all caution, charge the Pandavas, with standards aloft. The battle is fiercely fought and makes one's hair stand on end. The chariots and elephants blur into each other. And vigorous, beautifully feathered shafts shot by maharathas rain down on the elephants and horses.

Mahabaho Bhishma of awesome prowess, encased in mail, takes up his bow, and approaching them, looses a torrent of arrows on the valiant son of Subhadra, and maharatha Arjuna, and the king of the Kekayas and Virata, and Dhrishtadyumna, as also upon the Chedi and the Matsya warriors.

And that mighty Pandava vyuha wavers at Bhishma's onslaught. Terrible is that encounter, terrible the Kuru grandsire. Horses and riders, and maharathas, fall swiftly. The Pandava chariot akshauhinis melt away.

Then that tiger among men, Arjuna, seeing the supreme Bhishma, angrily says to Krishna, "Press forward towards the Pitamaha. Bhishma incensed will annihilate our army for Duryodhana's sake. And this Drona, and Kripa and Salya and Vikarna, united with Dhritarashtra's sons headed by Duryodhana, and protected by this awesome archer, will slaughter the Panchalas. I must stop him."

Krishna cautions him saying, "Be careful, Dhananjaya, as I take you towards the Pitamaha's chariot." And he drives Arjuna's celebrated chariot towards Bhishma's.

With numerous banners waving, with handsome steeds resembling a flight of white cranes, with a raised standard bearing a roaring Vanara, Arjuna, the friend of friends, swiftly draws up on his chariot of sunlike radiance and the thunder of clouds, razing the Kaurava and the Surasena hordes.

Dashing like an incensed elephant he terrifies brave warriors felling them all round with his shafts, and encounters Bhishma, protected by the forces headed by Saindhava and by the fighting men of the East, and the Sauviras and the Kekayas. Who other than Bhishma, Drona and Karna can advance in battle against the bearer of the Gandiva?

Bhishma strikes Arjuna with seventy-seven arrows and Drona shoots him with twenty-five, and Kripa with fifty, and Duryodhana with sixty-four, and Salya with nine; and Drona's son, that purushavyaghra, with sixty, and Vikarna with three barbs; and Saindhava with nine and Sakuni with five. And Artayani pierces Pandu's son with three thick shafts.

Though pierced from all sides with sharp arrows, Mahabaho Arjuna does not falter; he is like a mountain struck by straws. In response, this Kiriti of immeasurable soul pierces Bhishma with twenty-five and Kripa with nine barbs, and Drona with sixty, and Vikarna with three shafts, and Artayani with three, and Duryodhana also with five.

And then Satyaki, and Virata and Dhrishtadyumna, and the sons of Draupadi, and Abhimanyu, all ride up, surrounding him for protection. The prince of the Panchalas, supported by the Somakas, advances towards the great Drona, who guards Bhishma.

Maharatha Bhishma swiftly stabs the son of Pandu with eighty fierce arrows, greatly pleasing your soldiers. Hearing the shouts of those maharathikas, Arjuna joyfully enters into their midst raining fire upon them.

Watching his troops struggle in battle against the son of Pritha, Duryodhana says to Bhishma, "This mighty son of Pandu, with Krishna, felling all our troops, cuts away our roots, even while you and Drona live. It is on your account that Karna has laid aside his weapons, and does not fight against the Pandavas. O son of Ganga, Arjuna must be killed!"

Bhishma Pitamaha saying, "Fie on this cruel Kshatriya dharma!" rides towards Arjuna's chariot. And all the kings, seeing both those warriors with white horses yoked to their chariots, roar like lions and blow their conches. Drona's son and Duryodhana, and your son Vikarna, encircle Bhishma and stand prepared; and so also do all the Pandavas, surrounding Dhananjaya. And the battle begins.

Bhishma pierces Arjuna with nine shafts; Arjuna strikes him in return with ten, probing his very vitals. With a thousand adroit missiles, Arjuna, famed for his archery, shrouds Bhishma in a net of arrows. Bhishma responds with a like mesh of his own. And both are pleased, and both delighting in battle, contend with each other without either gaining any advantage.

The flights of arrows from Bhishma's bow are dispersed by Arjuna's shafts. And so the torrents of arrows shot by Arjuna, cleaved by the arrows of Ganga's son, all fall tamely to the ground. Arjuna strikes Bhishma with twenty-five keenly whetted barbs. Bhishma strikes Partha with nine.

And these two glorious warriors, those Parantapas, sport with each other, piercing each other's chariots, horses, shafts and wheels. Suddenly Bhishma strikes Krishna squarely in his chest with three sizzling barbs, and Krishna bleeds red, Rajan, like a flowering kinsuka.

Infuriated at seeing Krishna wounded, Arjuna strikes Bhishma's sarathy with three searing arrows. Both maharathas strive against each other, without success. The dexterity of their charioteers allows them to display beautiful circles and advances and retreats with their chariots. They zealously seek any slight opening to strike, frequently changing positions.

Both Kshatriyas blow their conches echoingly, the boom of which mingles with their leonine roars; those maharathas twang their bows deafeningly. The resonance of their conches and the rattle of their chariot wheels agitate the very Earth, which begins to tremble and make cavernous sounds.

No one detects any weakness in either of them. Both are strong and courageous, and a match for the other. Guided by his fleeting standard, the Kauravas seek refuge in Bhishma; the Pandavas are inspired by Arjuna's moving banner. Seeing this stunning display of prowess, all present are filled with wonder.

No one, Bhaarata, observes any difference between the two, just as no one finds lapses in a man of dharma. At times, both become perfectly invisible in the prevailing clouds of arrows. At times, both are clearly seen.

The Devas with the Gandharvas and the Charanas, and the great Rishis watching this, say to one another, "These wrathful maharathas cannot be defeated by the Devas, the Asuras and the Gandharvas. This breathtaking battle will be held in awe in all the worlds. Indeed, such a war will never take place again.

Bhishma cannot be overcome by even brilliant maharatha Arjuna raining down arrows. So also Arjuna, who cannot be vanquished by the very gods, will not be defeated by Bhishma. As long as the world itself lasts, so will this battle continue without an outcome." We hear these words in praise of both embattled warriors.

While these two are engaged in displaying their magnificent dexterity, other soldiers of both armies kill one another with sharp-edged swords, polished battle-axes, innumerable arrows, and a variety of weapons. Brave fighting men continue to fell each other in the murderous war.

And the clash between Drona and the prince of the Panchalas is terrible too.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me, Sanjaya, how that great archer Drona and the Panchala prince of Prishata's race fight, each striving to put forth his utmost. I regard destiny to be superior to exertion, considering that Bhishma could not escape Arjuna in battle. Indeed, when enraged, Bhishma can destroy all mobile and immobile creation; then why can he not kill the son of Pandu?'

Sanjaya says, 'Listen attentively, Rajan, to the story of this awesome war. The son of Pandu cannot be defeated by the very gods led by Indra. With a range of arrows Drona pierces Dhrishtadyumna and fells his charioteer. He also strikes Dhrishtadyumna's four horses with four brilliant shafts. The daring Dhrishtadyumna strikes Drona's body deep with nine arrows and arrests him.

Bharadwaja's son, of great prowess and immeasurable soul, shrouds the wrathful Dhrishtadyumna with his arrows. And he takes up a forbidding missile, like a second rod of death, as powerful as Indra's Vajra. Seeing that astra aimed by Drona, fearful shouts arise among the fighting men.

We watch Dhrishtadyumna's prowess as he stands alone like a mountain, adamant. He cuts down that blazing arrow flying towards him like his own death, and rains a storm of barbs on Drona. Seeing that incredible feat of Dhrishtadyumna's, the Panchalas with the Pandavas roar in delight.

Always seeking Drona's death, that fire prince hurls a spear at him, decked with gold and stones of lapis lazuli, like a thunderbolt. Drona smiles and cuts it into three slivers. Seeing his missile frustrated, Dhrishtadyumna looses a gale of arrows on Drona. Containing that squall, maharatha Drona smashes the Panchala prince's bow in his hands.

His bow riven, Dhrishtadyumna casts a mace weighty as a mountain at Drona. As it flies for Drona's life, we witness the astounding dexterity of Bharadwaja's son. By a nimble movement of his chariot, he avoids that golden arcane mace, in a wink, and looses a clutch of inscrutable golden-winged shafts at Prishata's son. These pierce Dhrishtadyumna's armour drinking his blood.

The high-souled Dhrishtadyumna takes up another bow, and strikes Drona with five barbs. Those two bulls among men, both covered in blood, look quite beautiful, like two blossoming kinsukas in spring.

Drona again breaks Drupada's son's bow in his hands. That profound Kshatriya, the Acharya with arrows, like clouds lashing a mountain with rain. Roaring like a lion, he fells his enemy's sarathy and his four horses from his bay in the chariot; elegantly, fiercely he cuts away the leather glove that protects Dhrishtadyumna's right hand.

His bow broken, deprived of his chariot, his horses slain, and charioteer overthrown, the prince of Panchala begins to alight from his ruined ratha, mace in hand, ready to display great prowess. But before he can leap down, Bhaarata, Drona smashes his mace into fragments with arrows swifter than seeing. Ah, that is breathtaking to see!

The stalwart prince of the Panchalas, that Mahabaho, takes up a grand shield decked with a hundred moons, and a mighty sword, and dashes out, like a ravenous lion towards an incensed elephant to kill Drona. With lightness of hand and power, we see Bharadwaja's son curb Prishata's son with a spate of arrows.

Yet for all his great power, Drona cannot himself advance, for the maharatha Dhrishtadyumna stands resolute and unmoving, warding off those arrow clouds with his shield with unmatched skill. Bhima swiftly moves to help Dhrishtadyumna. He stabs Drona with seven arrows, and forces him to clamber on to another chariot. Duryodhana cries at the king of the Kalingas, with his large force, to protect Drona.

The fearsome Kalinga legion charges against Bhima at your son's command. And Drona, abandoning the prince of Panchala, faces Virata and Drupada together. Dhrishtadyumna advances to support Yudhishtira. A fierce fight breaks out between the Kalingas and Bhima, making one's hair stand on end; it quickly swells into an encounter that threatens to destroy the universe.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'How does the king of the Kalingas, that commander of a vast army, goaded by my son, fight Bhima of stupendous feats, that Kshatriya ranging over the field of war with his mace like Death himself?'

Sanjaya says, 'Driven by your son, the mighty king of the Kalingas, accompanied by a colossal force advances on Bhima's chariot. And Bhima, supported by the Chedis, charges that army, replete with chariots, horses and elephants, and bristling with powerful weapons, flying towards him with Ketumat, the son of the king of the Nishadas.

And Srutayus also, lively and armoured, followed by his troops in battle formation, rides with king Ketumat to assail Bhima. The lord of the Kalingas with thousands of chariots, and Ketumat with ten thousand elephants, and the Nishadas encircle Vayu's mighty son.

With Bhima at their head, the Chedis, the Matsyas and Karushas, along with others, plunge wildly at the Nishadas. A fierce and majestic battle erupts between Bhima and his enemies, all avid to kill one another, a terrific fray that resembles the clash between Indra and the host of Diti's sons. The uproar of that horde reverberates like the booming ocean.

The fighting men fell one another, transforming the battlefield into a cremation ground strewn horribly with flesh and flowing blood. The warriors, in their frenzy of killing, cannot distinguish friend from foe, and so men strike down their own. Ah, feverish is the encounter between the few and many, between the Chedis on one side, and the Kalingas and the Nishadas on the other.

After briefly displaying fierce valour, the Chedis abandon Bhima, and turn away. Unruffled by the desertion, the son of Pandu takes on the Kalingas single-handedly. The mighty Bhima stands unwavering, and inundates the Kalinga legions with torrents of arrows.

That mighty archer, the king of the Kalingas, and his son the maharatha Sakradeva, both strike Bhima painfully. Mahabaho Bhima fights back bravely, but his horses are felled by Sakradeva's volleys. Seeing Parantapa Bhima without a chariot, Sakradeva attacks him fervently with a gale like a cloudburst at the end of summer.

Bhima remains in his horseless chariot, and hurls an iron mace at Sakradeva. The son of the Kalinga king plunges to the ground, with his standard and sarathy, dead. Seeing his son killed, maharatha Srutayush surrounds Bhima with thousands of chariots.

Bhima discards his mace and takes up a sword. Crimson eyed with anguish and wrath, the great Kalinga rubs his bowstring, takes up an arrow deadly as a king cobra, and shoots it at Bhima. Bhima cleanly divides that coursing arrow in two with his imposing sword. And he roars in triumph, terrifying the soldiers.

In deranged fury, the Kalinga launches fourteen bearded stone-whetted shafts at Bhima, who in a blur smashes those arrows surging through the sky into bits with his sword. Bhima, husky bull among men, attacks Bhanumat. Bhanumat envelops Bhima with a shower of arrows, and makes the sky echo with a resounding shout. Bhima responds with strident roar after roar, like an angry tiger.

Hearing him roar so awfully, the Kalinga army grows fearful. That army suddenly sees Bhima as being more than a mere man. Levering himself by its tusks, Bhima, sword in hand, leaps onto the back of Bhanumat's elephant, and slices through Bhanumat with his magnificent sword, bisecting his trunk in a flash of scarlet.

Having killed that prince of the Kalingas, Parantapa Bhima dissevers the neck of his tusker which falls to the ground with a deafening bellow, like a cliff whose base has been eroded by the heaving sea. Leaping down from that dying elephant, the prince of Bharata's race stands once again on the ground, his mighty chest heaving, sword in hand and impervious as ever.

Destroying numberless elephants on all sides, he wanders across the battlefield, looking like a moving wheel of fire, decimating akshauhinis of cavalry, elephants, chariots, and hordes of foot-soldiers.

And that lord among men, the mighty Bhima, moves hawklike, cleaving the bodies and heads of elephants and their riders with his keen-edged sword. On foot and furious, he strikes fear into his bravest opponents and baffles them single-handedly, like Yama during the pralaya. Only the foolish dare challenge him rashly as he roams the battleground, sword in hand.

That hulking, terrifying Kshatriya smashes the shafts and yokes of chariots, also killing their warriors. Bhima displays all kinds of movements, so surprisingly agile and graceful for one of his bulk: he turns, and wheels, makes side-thrusts, jumps, runs, and leaps high. He races forwards and flies upwards. And some are mangled, struck by his sword through their very vitals, and others beheaded.

Many elephants, Bhaarata, some with their trunks and tusks severed, others with their temporal lobes slit open, deprived of riders, kill their own ranks and fall down with plaintive cries. And broken spears, and the heads of elephant drivers, and beautiful caparisons of elephants, and dazzling golden chords, and collars, and arrows and mallets and quivers, many kinds of war machines, and beautiful bows, short arrows with polished heads and hooks, and iron goads for driving elephants, bells of many shapes and tones, and hilts decked with gold, are seen tumbling to the ground along with horsemen past count.

And with elephants spread on the ground with parts of their bodies and their trunks cut, or killed, the field appears to be spread with fallen hills. That bull among men, having killed those majestic tuskers, moves on to raze the horses, and also fells their riders. Savage and ferine is the battle between him and them.

We see hilts and traces, and radiant golden saddle girths and covers for the backs of horses, and bearded shafts, and costly swords, and coats of mail, and shields, and beautiful ornaments scattered all around in that virile encounter. Bhima covers the earth with blood as if it were dotted with crimson lilies.

The mighty son of Pandu leaps high and dragging some maharathas down, fells them and their standards with his sword. Filled with entirely boundless energy, that Kshatriya sometimes lunges, or dashes on all sides, along many sudden paths; and the fighting men all look on in wonder.

And some he kills with his legs, and others he drags down, thrusting them into the earth. Some he strikes with his sword, and others he petrifies with his roars. Some men are thrown to the ground by the force of his thighs as he runs through them; others escape hastily, terrified to see him.

Yet again, the vast and vigorous force of the Kalingas rushes at the dreadful Bhima and surrounds him. Seeing Srutayush at the head of the Kalinga forces, Bhima charges him. The Kalinga king pierces Bhima's chest with nine whistling arrows. Like an elephant pierced with a goad, Bhima blazes up in anger, like a fire fed with ghee.

Ashoka, that most excellent sarathy, brings up a golden chariot for Bhima to mount. The son of Kunti swiftly climbs on and rides at the ruler of the Kalingas, calling out to him to halt.

The mighty, infuriated Srutayush looses a luculent volley at Bhima, flaunting his marvellous lightness of hand. Struck forcefully by nine shafts from Kalinga's bow, Bhima shivers like a snake beaten with a rod. With a growl he raises his bow and kills the Kalinga king with seven massive iron shafts.

With another two arrows he brings down the two powerful protectors of Srutayush's chariot wheels. He despatches Satyadeva and Satya to Yamaloka. Of immeasurable soul, Bhima has Ketumat's life with a mad flurry of arrow and spear. Supported by a force of many thousands, the Kshatriyas of the Kalinga country rise in incensed froth to confront the raging Bhima.

With spears and maces, swords and battle-axes, hundreds upon hundreds of the Kalingas besiege Bhima. Grandly foiling their torrents of missiles, the mighty one takes up his mace and again leaps from his chariot.

Bhima on his fresh rampage kills another seven hundred brave Kshatriyas; that Parantapa sends two thousand more Kalingas to their death. Ah, truly wonderful, even by his lofty norm, is his feat. Thus does Bhima of awesome prowess fell teeming bands of the Kalingas.

Elephants deprived of their riders by Bhima, and stricken with arrows, blunder frenetically across the battlefield, trampling their own men, with deafening roars, like masses of clouds driven by the wind. Mahabaho Bhima, sword in hand, triumphantly and stridently blows his conch.

And that blast makes the Kalinga forces tremble, all of them absolutely panic-stricken. The warriors and the animals quake in terror for Bhima charges down many paths, impetuously, in every direction, like a prince of tuskers, roaring, leaping high time and again. His enemies are flung into a trance.

The Kalinga army shudders in dread of Bhima like a vast lake agitated by a great crocodile. And seeing Bhima's wondrous feats, the Kalinga forces flee in all directions. When they rally again, the Pandava Senapati Dhrishtadyumna, Bhaarata, orders his own troops to fight.

Obeying their Senapati, many warriors of the Pandava army led by Sikhandin surge towards Bhima with their akshauhinis of consummate chariots. Dharmaraja Yudhishtira follows them with a grand elephant force the colour of clouds. Exhorting his men, the son of Prishata, surrounded by so many great warriors, takes upon himself the protection of one of Bhima's flanks.

There exists no one on earth who is more cherished by the prince of the Panchalas than Bhima and Satyaki; indeed he values them more highly than his life. As that Parantapa, the son of Prishata, watches Mahabaho Bhima rampaging among the Kalingas, he roars in exultation. He blows his conch and lets out a leonine roar. And Bhima, seeing the red standard of Dhrishtadyumna's chariot decked with gold and yoked with horses white as pigeons, is reassured. Soon enough he remounts his own chariot again.

Dhrishtadyumna of immeasurable soul advances to rescue Bhima beleaguered by the Kalingas. And both those Kshatriyas, Dhrishtadyumna and Bhima, of pulsating tejas, noticing Satyaki at a distance, furiously fall upon the Kalingas.

And that bull among men, Satyaki Yuyudhana, grandson of Sini, foremost of victorious warriors, swiftly rides to defend the flanks of Bhima and Prishata's son. Bow in hand, fighting ferociously, he devastates the enemy's ranks. Bhima lets flow a crimson river, a bloody current floating the shredded flesh of the Kalinga fighting men.

Beholding Bhima the men cry out, "This is Yama himself fighting against the Kalingas in Bhima's form!" Hearing those cries, himself encircled by armed adversaries, Bhishma breaks free of his encirclement and rides at Bhima.

Satyaki and Bhima, and Dhrishtadyumna rush at Bhishma's silver chariot decked with gold. And all of them surround Ganga's son and pierce him, each with three scathing barbs.

Bhishma pierces each of those mighty archers with three straight shafts. And checking those maharathas with thousands of arrows, loosed in moments, he kills Bhima's horses. Resplendent with golden armour and filled with tejas, Bhima stands firm on that horseless chariot and launches a spear at Bhishma's chariot, which the Pitamaha cleaves in two before it can reach him.

Bhima seizes a mighty mace made of Saikya iron and leaps down from his chariot. Dhrishtadyumna swiftly takes him into his own chariot and carries him to safety in plain view of all the soldiers.

Satyaki kills Bhishma’s sarathy with a single arrow, and Bhishma is borne away from the battlefield by his horses with the speed of the wind. Bhima remains in the midst of his men, burning like a mighty fire consuming dry grass as he kills all the Kalingas. None of your warriors, Bharatarishabha, dare to oppose him.

And revered by the Panchalas and the Matsyas, he embraces Dhrishtadyumna and then Satyaki. In the presence of Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, tiger among the Yadus, of unthwarted prowess, gladdens Bhima by saying, “By our good fortune the king of the Kalingas, and his son Ketumat, and their kinsman Sakradeva, indeed, all the Kalingas, have been killed. With the strength of your arms alone, the vast legions of the Kalingas teeming with elephants, horses and chariots, noble Kshatriyas, and brave fighting men, have been decimated.”

Having said this, the long-armed grandson of Sini, that Parantapa, climbs back into his chariot and embraces the son of Pandu. That maharatha begins to slaughter your forces vigorously augmenting Bhima’s efforts.’

Sanjaya says, 'As the morning passes, and the destruction of chariots, elephants, horses, horsemen and foot-soldiers and cavalry continues, Dhrishtadyumna engages with the three maharathas, Drona's son, Salya, and the high-souled Kripa.

And the valiant heir of the king of Panchala kills the celebrated steeds of Drona's son with a storm of arrows. Deprived of his animals, Aswatthaman climbs into Salya's chariot and showers him with his shafts.

Seeing Dhrishtadyumna battling Aswatthaman, the son of Subhadra rushes forward, loosing a tide of fire. He pierces Salya with twenty-five arrows, Kripa with nine, and Aswatthaman with eight. Drona's son retaliates, striking Arjuna's son with a fusillade of winged shafts; Salya stabs him with twelve, and Kripa with three fierce barbs.

Your grandson Lakshmana storms at Abhimanyu and a duel between them ensues. Duryodhana's vehement son covers Abhimanyu in a fury of arrows. His feat, O king, appears truly wonderful!

The magnificent Abhimanyu blithely shoots five hundred arrows at his cousin, in a flash. Lakshmana responds by carving up his adversary's bow in his hands, seeing which all the warriors send up a loud shout. That Parantapa, the son of Subhadra, discards his broken bow and seizes up another strong one.

The two young bulls among men defy each other ferociously, drawing rich, royal blood. Seeing his powerful son afflicted by Abhimanyu, Duryodhana himself rides to where the cousins fight feverishly. All the enemy kings surround the son of Arjuna with hosts of chariots. Invincible in battle and equal to Krishna himself in prowess, that resplendent Kshatriya remains unperturbed. Seeing Subhadra's son in the midst of fierce fighting, Arjuna rushes to rescue him. The kings allied to the Kauravas, led by Bhishma and Drona, with their chariots, elephants and horses, briskly attack Savyasachin.

A pall of dust, raised by foot-soldiers and horsemen, horses and chariots, obscures the sky. Coming within range of Arjuna's arrows, those thousands of elephants and hundreds of kings cannot advance. All the creatures there wail loudly and darkness cloaks every direction.

The violation of the Kauravas assumes a fierce and dreadful mien. Neither the sky nor the sun, nor any of the cardinal points of the earth can be distinguished for Arjuna's tempest of arrows.

Many elephants have the standards cut down from their backs, and many maharathas their horses killed. Some commanders of chariot akshauhinis can be seen wandering purposelessly on foot, bereft of their chariots. And other maharathas, their arms graced with angadas, roam aimlessly with their weapons.

Fearing Arjuna, riders of horses and elephants abandon their beasts, and flee in all directions. Kings are felled by Arjuna's arrows or plunge to the ground from chariots and elephants and steeds. With his terrible volleys, Arjuna, fierce-faced, dissevers the upraised arms of warriors grasping maces and swords, or spears, quivers, arrows, bows, hooks, or standards.

Bhaarata, we see spiked maces shattered, and mallets, and bearded shafts, and short arrows, and swords, and sharp battle-axes, and spears and shields smashed into shards, and coats of mail and standards, and other weapons of all kinds, and parasols furnished with golden staves, and iron goads, and whips, and traces strewn across the battlefield in stacks.

There is no warrior who can face Arjuna in battle; whoever advances against him is killed. When all your fighting men scatter, Arjuna and Krishna blow their conches.

Bhishma sees the routed host and smilingly addresses the brave son of Bharadwaja, "The daunting, with Krishna in his chariot, frustrates all our forces. He cannot be overpowered today by any means; today he is like Siva at the end of the yuga and we cannot rally our legions, vast though they be.

Look how our forces scatter. The setting sun is about to reach that best of mountains, the sunset mountain Asta. Bharatarishabha, I think that the hour has come for us to withdraw our army. Our warriors are weary and panic-stricken and cannot fight anymore."

Having said this to Acharya Drona, Maharatha Bhishma orders the retreat of your army. And thus at nightfall, both sides withdraw.'

Sanjaya says, 'With the arrival of dawn, Parantapa Bhishma gives the order for the Kaurava army to prepare for battle. The son of Shantanu, eager for the victory of your sons, forms the Garuda vyuha.

And on the beak of that Garuda is Bhishma himself. Its two eyes are Drona and Kritavarman of Satwata's race. The famed Aswatthaman and Kripa, supported by the Trigartas, the Matsyas, the Kekayas, and the Vatadhanas, stand at its head. Bhurisravas and Sala, and Salya and Bhagadatta, and the Madrakas, the Sindhu-Souviras, and the Pancha-Noadas, together with Jayadratha, are placed on its neck.

And upon its back is Duryodhana with his followers. Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and the Kambojas with the Sakas, and the Surasenas, Rajan, form its tail. The Magadhas and the Kalingas, with all the tribes of the Daserakas, encased in mail, form the vyuha's the right wing. And the Karushas, the Vikunjas, the Mundas, and the Kaundivrishas, with Brihadbala, are its left wing.

Arjuna, seeing this vyuha, forms another with Dhrishtadyumna to oppose it. The son of Pandu forms the commanding crescent moon vyuha.

Surrounded by kings of many lands, abundantly armed, stationed on the right horn, Bhima dazzles. Beside him are those maharathas Virata and Drupada; next to them is Nila bearing deadly weapons. After Nila stands the maharatha Dhrishtaketu, surrounded by the Chedis, the Kasis, the Karushas, and the Pauravas.

Dhrishtadyumna, and Sikhandin, with the Panchalas and the Prabhadrakas, supported by other forces, are stationed in the centre, Bhaarata, ready for battle. And there also stands Yudhishtira Dharmaraja surrounded by his akshauhini of elephants. Next to him are Satyaki and the five sons of Draupadi. Immediately beyond is Iravan. After these are Bhima's son Ghatotkacha and those maharathas, the Kekayas.

On the left horn of that vyuha stands that best of men, he whom Janardana, the preserver of the Universe, protects. It is thus that the Pandavas form their powerful vyuha to counter and destroy your sons and their allies.

Conches boom and the war between your forces and those of the enemy begins again. Chariots and elephants charge one another and blur on grim Kurukshetra. Hordes of elephants and hosts of chariots can be seen everywhere rushing wildly forward to effect the destruction of the enemy.

The roar of the chariots swiftly moving to either join the general fray or to fight individually is fused with the thunder of drumbeats. The shouts and yells of the dauntless warriors on both sides as they cut each other down reaches the very heavens.’

Sanjaya says, 'After the two armies have been disposed in battle formations, maharatha Arjuna wreaks great carnage on the commanders of the enemy's hosts of chariots with his arrows. Despite being slaughtered by him, who is truly like Siva at the end of the yuga, the Dhartarashtras persevere to fight the Pandavas.

Wanting to win blazing glory, unrelenting and absorbed in their task, scorning death, they break the Pandava ranks in many places and are also themselves broken. In places, Pandava and the Kaurava troops both briefly scatter and flee.

Nothing can be distinguished. A swirling dust arises and shrouds the very sun. The cardinal and subsidiary directions are a haze; the warriors are guided only by the indications of colours, passwords, names and tribal distinctions. Protected by great Drona, the vyuha of the Kauravas remains whole and steadfast. So also the formidable Pandava vyuha holds firm, defended by Arjuna and Bhima.

Chariots and elephants, in close ranks, and hordes of fighting men of both the armies, clash vigorously. In that savage fight, riders on horses kill one another with polished swords and long spears. Maharathas cut each other down with golden-winged arrows. And elephant-riders mow down others with broad-headed shafts and lances.

Hosts of doughty foot-soldiers cheerfully slaughter others with short arrows and battle-axes. Maharathas kill elephants and their riders; and are in turn slain by the latter. Bharatarishabha, the horseman fells the maharatha with his spear, and is in turn flung down to the ground by the chariot warrior. In both the armies, the foot-soldier kills the maharatha only to be razed by another rathika. Elephant-riders fell horse-riders, and horse-riders fell warriors on the backs of elephants.

All this seems all too awesome and so very bloody. Roars and screams of slayer and slain thicken the air and men quit their bodies in their thousands, each moment, and the air is a denseness of the shocked or bemused spirits of fighting men.

Everywhere foot-soldiers, elephant-riders and horse-riders despatch each other; and strewn with broken standards and bows, spears and housings of elephants, costly shawls and feathered barbs, maces and spiked clubs, kampanas and arrows, mottled coats of mail and kunapas, iron hooks, and polished swords, and golden winged shafts, the gore-slicked battlefield shines as if with floral wreaths.

The earth, mired with chunks of hewn off flesh and spilt blood, becomes impassable with the corpses of men and horses and elephants killed in that most dreadful war. Drenched with human blood, the dust settles, and the cardinal points become perfectly clear once again. Many headless bodies rise up in macabre pageant to intimate the end of the world. And in that fell and gruesome battle, maharathas can be seen escaping in all directions.

Then Bhishma and Drona, and Jayadratha, king of the Sindhus, and Purumitra, and Vikarna, and Sakuni the son of Subala, all leonine and invincible in battle, break through the ranks of the Pandavas. Bhima and Ghatotkacha, and Satyaki, and Chekitana, and the sons of Draupadi, supported by their allies, begin grinding down your forces and your sons, like the Devas razing the Danavas.

And those bulls among Kshatriyas, smiting one another, are awesome to behold; covered in blood, dripping blood, they glow like kinsukas. The foremost warriors of both armies, striking down their opponents, look like the luminous planets in the sky.

Your son Duryodhana, supported by a thousand chariots, storms at the Pandavas and Ghatotkacha, the Rakshasa. The Pandavas, with a great host of fighting men, charge the Parantapas Bhishma and Drona.

The diadem-decked Arjuna furiously attacks all the foremost among the enemy kings. Abhimanyu and Satyaki ride against the forces of Subala's son Sakuni. A bloodthirsty encounter breaks out again between the two sides both of whom yearn for victory, a battle that makes one's hair stand on end.'

Sanjaya says, 'Then those kings, seeing Arjuna in battle, furiously hem him round with thousands of chariots and shroud him with a dark and dense cloud of arrows. And they hurl shining spears, and maces, and spiked clubs, and feathered barbs and battle-axes, and mallets and bludgeons at his chariot—braids of eerie lighting flashing.

With golden shafts Arjuna thwarts that shower of weapons coursing towards him like a flight of locusts. Watching the superhuman lightness of that hand, the Devas, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Pisachas, the Uragas and the Rakshasas cry out: "Magnificent, truly magnificent!"

The daring Gandharas, led by Subala's son with a vast force, encircle Satyaki and Abhimanyu. With diverse astras, Sakuni's warriors shatter the chariot of the Vrishni hero. Satyaki abandons his chariot and swiftly mounts Abhimanyu's. The two begin to slaughter the army of Subala's son.

Drona and Bhishma steadily dwindle the forces of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja with jagged shafts furnished with the feathers of the kanka bird. The son of Yudhishtira and his uncles, Madri's twins, now savagely raze Drona's legions in plain sight of both vast armies. That hair-raising battle can be likened to the one between the Devas and the Asuras in ancient times.

Bhima and Ghatotkacha achieve stupendous feats; until, riding up in fury, Duryodhana thwarts them both. We see Hidimbi's son displaying his prowess and even transcending his father. Enraged, Bhima shoots Duryodhana squarely through his chest, smiling the while. Duryodhana slumps onto the floor of his chariot and faints. His charioteer quickly bears him away to safety, and the forces supporting Duryodhana break rank and scatter.

Pursuing them, Bhima hunts the fleeing Kaurava army with inexorable archery.

Even before the eyes of Drona and Bhishma, blazing Dhrishtadyumna, foremost of warriors, thins their army with stunning flurries from his great bow. The Acharya and the Pitamaha together cannot stop your son's host from breaking ranks and fleeing from the terror that the Panchala prince brings.

When those thousands of maharathas have fled in all directions, Subhadra's son and Satyaki, that bull of Sini's race, together in the same chariot, attack the army of Subala's son. And Sini's grandson and that bull of the Kuru vamsa are radiant like the sun and the moon together in the sky after the last lunation of the dark fortnight.

Arjuna yet furiously rains down his remitless arrow storms on your army in mighty cloudbursts. Trembling like children, the Kaurava army flees his terror and his slaughter. Seeing their army run from battle, the enraged Bhishma and Drona move to stop its retreat.

Duryodhana himself comforts the fighting men and prevents a further flight of his unnerved forces. All the maharathas stop when they see your son. The common soldiers, seeing them halt, stop of their own accord; ashamed and wanting to display their courage to one another, Rajan, your army rallies like the surging sea at moonrise.

Seeing his legions revive, Duryodhana quickly rides upto Bhishma and says, "Pitamaha, while you are alive, and Drona, master of weapons, with Aswatthama and all our other friends, still alive, and that mighty archer Kripa, it is dishonourable that my army should take flight.

The Pandavas are not any match for you or for Drona, or for Drona's son, or for Kripa. Pitamaha, you are favouring the sons of Pandu by disregarding this massacre of my army. You should have told me before this war began that you will not fight against the Pandavas.

Had you and Drona said this, I would have reflected upon the course I should pursue with Karna. If I do not deserve to be abandoned by you both in battle, O bulls among men, fight with your full powers."

Hearing these words, Bhishma laughs and, rolling his eyes in anger, says to your son, "Many a time, I spoke to you in the interest of your good. As long as Krishna is with them, the Pandavas are invincible even against the Devas.

However, what my age and strength permit, best of kings, I will do in this war. With your kinsmen, witness it today! In the sight of all, single-handedly I will contain the sons of Pandu as they lead their forces with all their kin. I will kill ten thousands of their men each day."

Thus addressed by Bhishma, your son has conches blown and drums beaten in joy. And the Pandavas also, hearing that loud uproar, blow their conches, and sound their drums and cymbals.’

Dhritarashtra says, 'After his dreadful vow made when stirred by the words of my son, what, Sanjaya, does Bhishma do to the sons of Pandu; what do the Panchalas do to the Pitamaha? Tell me all, O Sanjaya.'

Sanjaya says, 'After the passing of that morning, as the sun moves on his westward course, and after the high-souled Pandavas are victorious, Bhishma, knower of every nuance of dharma, protected by a vast force and by all your sons, rides on his ratha yoked to the swiftest horses towards the Pandava army.

As a result of your sinful policy, O king, a horrific battle breaks out between us and the Pandavas. The twang of bows and the flapping of bowstrings against leather gloves, unite to make a tumult like the cracking of mountains.

"Stay! Watch me! Know this one! Turn back! Stand! I await you—strike!" These roars resound everywhere. And the sounds of tumbling golden coats of mail, of crowns and diadems, and of standards, resemble the clatter of stones onto a great bed of rock. Heads and arms decked with ornaments fall by the thousands upon the field of the awful sacrifice of living men.

Some warriors, with heads severed from their bodies, continue to stand, weapons in hand or armed with drawn bows. Soon a ghastly turbulent river of blood flows, choked with lifeless dismembered men and hewn limbs, and the corpses of elephants its jutting rocks. It flows from the bodies of horses, men, and elephants, delighting swarming raucous vultures and jackals, and it races towards the ocean of the next world. A war such as this one, Rajan, fought between your sons and the Pandavas, has never been seen or heard before.

The bodies of slain soldiers render the field impassable for chariots. And dead elephants lying on the ground make Kurukshetra appear to be covered with the peaks of blue hills. And, ah, the battleground, strewn with multicoloured coats of mail and turbans, is also as beautiful as an autumn sky.

Some fighting men, though sorely wounded, can be seen charging joyfully and proudly against the enemy. Many fallen on the field, cry out, “O father, O brother, O friend, O kinsman, O companion, O uncle, do not abandon me!” Others shout, “Come! Come back! Why are you frightened? Where do you go? I stand firm in battle, do not be afraid.”

In that deathly conflict, Bhishma, with bow drawn to a circle, looses astras like deadly snakes. Raining down a continuous tempest of arrows in all directions, that hero of rigid vows strikes the Pandava maharathas naming each one. Displaying his unearthly skill, and dancing as it were along the path of his chariot, he appears to be present everywhere, like an ubiquitous circle of fire.

The Pandavas, along with the Srinjayas, behold that lone Kshatriya as multiplied a thousand-fold; all who are there regard Bhishma as having multiplied himself with maya. Having seen him now in the east, the next moment they see him in the west. Having seen him in the north, the next instant they see him in the south. Thus the son of Ganga fights that war. None among the Pandavas is able to even gaze upon him. They see only the bankless, seamless blaze of arrows radiating from his bow.

Valiant warriors, seeing him butcher their ranks, lament loudly. And, kings in thousands attempt to face the Pitamaha, who seems to fly over the field in a superhuman way, falling into the fire, the conflagration that is the enraged Bhishma, like senseless insects that fly into a flame, only to be devoured.

Not a single shaft of that warrior is futile; each one claims a life, felling men, elephants and horses without favour. With a single arrow he kills a mighty tusker like a hill being riven by the Vajra. Another single shaft does to bring down two or three armoured elephant-riders standing together.

Whoever approaches Bhishma, that tiger among tigers among men, is seen for but a moment before slumping to the ground. And being annihilated by Bhishma of incomparable prowess, that vast host of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja scatters in all directions. Assailed by Bhishma’s simoom of arrows, the immense Pandava army trembles despite the presence of Krishna and Arjuna.

The gallant efforts of the heroic leaders of the Pandava army cannot check the flight of the maharathas afflicted by Bhishma’s volleys; the prowess that routs this great legion equals that of Indra himself. Yudhishtira's army is so completely dispersed, that no two men can be seen together.

Chariots and elephants and horses are pierced all over, and standards and shafts of chariots strewn across the field. The Pandava forces cry out in anguish. The father strikes the son and the son strikes the father; and friend challenges the dearest of friends to battle to death as if goaded by destiny.

Many of the Pandava allies flee, dishevelled and distraught, flinging off their coats of mail. Loudly, dismally, the Pandava army wails and screams as it witnesses the best of its maharathas appearing as bewildered as a herd of cows lost in a terrible jungle.

Krishna, observing the rout of the army, stops the chariot and says to Arjuna, "The hour you awaited has arrived, Partha. Strike Bhishma now before you are lost. Remember, in an assembly of kings you said, 'I will slay all the warriors of Dhritarashtra's sons, headed by Bhishma and Drona; why, I will not leave a single man who fights against me alive.'

Son of Kunti, Parantapa, make those words true. Bibhatsu, look at your legions being routed on all sides. Seeing Bhishma looking like Rudra himself with open maw, watch how Yudhishtira's allies flee. Terrified they run, like weaker beasts on seeing the lion."

Arjuna replies, "Plunging through this sea of the hostile host, drive the horses to where Bhishma stands. I will overwhelm that invincible warrior, the revered Kuru Pitamaha."

Krishna drives his silvery horses to where Bhishma's chariot stands, chariot that shines like the sun, impossible to even gaze upon. Seeing Mahabaho Arjuna charging at Bhishma, the mighty army of Yudhishtira rallies for battle.

Bhishma, that foremost of Kuru warriors, roars like ten lions, and swiftly shrouds Arjuna's chariot with a gale of arrows. In a moment, that chariot, with standard and charioteer, becomes invisible. Patiently, fearlessly, Krishna guides his horses wounded by Bhishma's barbs. And Arjuna takes up his celestial bow, whose twang resembles the roar of thunderclouds, and cleaves Bhishma's bow with a clutch of jagged shafts.

The Pitamaha takes up another and strings it in a flash; with his two hands, he stretches that bow whose reverberations are like thunder. But Arjuna, excited with wrath, severs that bow as well.

The son of Shantanu applauds Arjuna, saying, "Excellent, Mahabaho, son of Pandu! Magnificent Dhananjaya, such a marvellous feat is truly worthy of you. I am pleased with you. Fight hard against me."

Having praised Arjuna, Bhishma seizes up another great bow and unleashes a fiercer storm on Arjuna's ratha. Krishna displays divine skill guiding that chariot in sharp, impossible circles, frustrating Bhishma's transcendent archery. But tireless Bhishma soon strikes both Krishna and Arjuna with subtle, whetted barbs. And pierced by those shafts, those two tigers among men look like two roaring bulls with the gashes of horns on their bodies.

In high dudgeon, Bhishma covers the two Krishnas from all sides with an unprecedented fusillade, which makes Krishna shiver. Laughing loudly, Bhishma fills even blue Krishna with wonder.

Mahabaho Krishna contrasts the prowess of Bhishma with the mildness of Arjuna; he sees Bhishma loosing incessant firestorms of arrows, looking like the all-consuming sun himself in the midst of the two contending armies. And marking that that Kshatriya ancient was killing the best of Yudhishtira's warriors, bringing havoc to the legions as if Pralaya had arrived, Kesava of the fathomless soul, slayer of enemy hosts, thinking that Yudhishtira's army will be annihilated, cannot bear what he sees.

He thinks, "In a single day this Bhishma can kill all the Daityas and the Danavas. How easily then will he crush the sons of Pandu with their forces and allies. The vast Pandava army is again being scattered. And the Kauravas, seeing the Somakas routed, fight in high spirits, much to Bhishma's delight.

Protected by my kavacha, I will stop Bhishma today for the sake of the Pandavas. I will lighten their burden. As for Arjuna, though struck with keen shafts, he still hesitates, out of his reverence for Bhishma."

While Krishna thus reflects, Bhishma again looses a deep and violent swarm of arrows at Arjuna's chariot. All the cardinal directions are completely shrouded. And neither the sky nor the quarters nor the earth nor the brilliant sun can be seen. The gusts of winds that blow are mixed with smoke, and all the points of the compass are agitated.

And Drona, and Vikarna, and Jayadratha, and Bhurisravas, and Kritavarman, and Kripa, and Srutayush and the ruler of the Amvashtas and Vinda and Anuvinda, Sudakshina and the rulers of the western kingdoms, and the tribes of the Sauviras, the Vasatis, and the Kshudrakas, and the Malavas, swiftly advance towards Kiritin, at Bhishma's command.

The grandson of Sini sees that Arjuna is surrounded by hundreds of horses and foot-soldiers, chariots and colossal elephants. Seeing both Krishna and Arjuna encircled, Satyaki rides swiftly forward. Coming to Arjuna's side like Vishnu to the aid of Indra, that noblest archer charges the gathered enemy.

In grand exhilaration, he addresses Yudhishtira's host of fighting men who, cowed by Bhishma, their elephants, steeds, chariots and standards slain, mangled and shattered, roaring, "Brave Kshatriyas, where do you go? This is not the dharma of the righteous as proclaimed by the ancients. Excellent heroes, do not break your vows. Keep your Kshatriya dharma!"

Unable to bear the flight of the army, marking the mildness with which Arjuna fights, and seeing Bhishma's forceful exertions, and the Kauravas rushing in from all sides, Krishna, younger brother of Vasava, and protector of all the Dasarhas, cries to the intrepid and famed Satyaki, saying, "O hero of Sini's race, let they who retreat go. And let they who remain, let them also flee.

I will fling Bhishma down from his chariot, and vanquish Drona, too, and all their followers. No one in the Kaurava legions will escape my wrath. I will kill Bhishma of high vows with my Sudarshana. Killing those two greatest of maharathas, Bhishma and Drona, and their forces, O my Satyaki, I will please Arjuna and Yudhishtira, and Bhima, and the twin Aswins. And killing all the sons of Dhritarashtra and all their allies, I will joyfully deliver unto king Ajatashatru a kingdom today."

Saying this, Vasudeva's son releases the reins of his horses, leaps off the chariot, and materialises over his right hand his beautiful chakra whirling, sharp as a razor, as radiant as the sun, with the force of a thousand thunderbolts. Making the earth tremble under his step, Krishna runs towards Bhishma.

And that Parantapa, the younger brother of Indra, charges Bhishma in the midst of his forces, like a lion wanting to kill a prince of elephants blinded with fury, proudly awaiting the attack. The fringes of Krishna's yellow pitambara robe flutter in the air like a lightning-charged cloud in the sky.

That lotus-like Sudarsana, having for its stalk the beautiful arm of Saurin, is as beautiful as the primeval lotus, bright as the morning sun, which springs from the navel of Vishnu Padmanabha. Krishna's anger is the morning sun that makes that lotus sway. And the exquisite leaves of that lotus are as sharp as a dagger's edge.

Krishna's body is the beautiful lake, and his right hand the stalk that, springing from it, holds the shining lotus. Seeing him, in wrath and roaring loudly, armed with that chakra, all creatures howl piercingly, thinking that the destruction of the Kauravas is imminent. With his chakra, Krishna looks like the Samvarta fire that appears at the end of the yuga to consume the world. And the preceptor of the universe blazes like a fierce comet risen to consume all creatures.

Seeing that Avatara advancing with the Sudarsana, Bhishma standing in his chariot, bow and arrow in hand, cries fearlessly, "Come, come, Lord of the Devas, you who dwell in all the universe! I bow to you, you who are armed with mace, sword and Saranga.

Lord of the universe, cast me down from this chariot, O you who are the refuge of all creatures in this war. Krishna, were I to be slain here by you, great will be my fortune both in this world and the next. You show me exalted regard, Lord of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas. My fame will be celebrated in all the three worlds."

Hearing Shantanu's son, Krishna charges him and says, "You are the cause of this great slaughter on earth. You will see Duryodhana killed today. A wise minister who walks the path of dharma must restrain a king addicted to the evil of gambling. That despicable one who transgresses dharma should be abandoned as one whose intelligence has been led astray by destiny."

Hearing this, the royal Bhishma says to the Lord of the Yadavas, "Destiny is all powerful. The Yadavas abandoned Kamsa for their own good. I said this to Dhritarashtra but he paid no heed. Destiny perverts the listener's understanding and, to his own detriment, he cannot receive good advice."

Meanwhile, leaping off his chariot, Mahabaho Arjuna runs towards Krishna and seizes him by his two hands. That supreme deity is incensed, and, though seized, he forcibly drags Jishnu after him, like a tempest bearing away a single tree. The high-souled Arjuna forcefully holds Krishna's feet, as he rushes towards Bhishma, and succeeds, Rajan, in stopping him with great difficulty at the tenth step.

And when Krishna halts, bedecked with a beautiful gold garland, Arjuna joyfully bows down to him and says, “Subdue your anger. You are the refuge of the Pandavas, O Kesava. I swear by my sons and my brothers that I will not retreat from what I have pledged myself to. Krishna, at your command I will annihilate the Kauravas.”

Hearing Arjuna’s vow, Krishna grows calm; he is gratified. And devoted to the cause of that most excellent Kuru, he once more mounts his chariot, still armed with his chakra. And that Parantapa takes up the abandoned reins, and blowing on his conch the Panchajanya, he fills all of the earth and the sky with its blast.

Seeing Krishna, decked with necklace and angada and earrings, with curling eyelashes coated with dust, and with teeth of perfect whiteness, take up his conch again, the Kuru heroes cry out stridently. The clash of cymbals and drums, and the thunder of chariot wheels and the clatter of smaller drums, mingle with those leonine shouts to become a fierce uproar. And the twang of Arjuna’s Gandiva, like the roll of thunder, fills the sky and all the quarters of the earth. Its burning shafts flare out in all directions.

The Kaurava king, with a vast force, along with Bhishma and Bhurisravas, arrows in hand, resembling a comet risen to consume a constellation, dashes against him. Bhurisravas hurls seven spears with wings of gold at Arjuna, while Duryodhana flings a brutal lance; Salya launches a mace, and Bhishma looses an astra.

Arjuna stops Bhurisravas’s spears with seven shafts, and cleaves the lance hurled by Duryodhana with another. He thwarts the blazing pike, as luminous as lightning, cast by Bhishma, and the mace of the ruler of the Madras, with two mighty arrows of his own.

Then drawing with both hands and with great energy his magnificent Gandiva, he invokes with fitting mantras the awesome Mahendra astra to appear in the sky. With it, that maharatha, decked with diadem and a garland of gold, produces an intense storm of flaming arrows that frustrates the Kaurava host.

Those shafts from Arjuna’s bow sever arms, bows, standard-tops, and chariots; they pierce the bodies of the enemy kings and their imposing tuskers and horses. Arjuna fills the cardinal and subsidiary directions with his awe-inspiring arrows and makes the hearts of his adversaries tremble with the twang of Gandiva.

The blast of conches, the beat of drums and the sonorous rumbling of chariots are silenced by the resonance of the Gandiva. Following that reverberation, king Virata and other Kshatriyas, and the brave Drupada, the king of the Panchalas, all joyfully advance towards Arjuna.

All your warriors are fearful and become rooted to where they stand when they hear the Gandiva. None dare to venture to the place from where the sound springs. In that terrific war of kings, valiant warriors are killed along with maharathas and their sarathies. And elephants with resplendent golden howdahs and beautiful standards, pierced with broad-headed shafts, fall dead, their bodies truncated by Arjuna.

Struck by Partha's winged wide shafts, the standards of many kings stationed at the heads of their yantras and Indrajalas are cut down. Hordes of foot-soldiers and maharathas, and horses and elephants, fall rapidly on the battleground, their limbs paralysed, or themselves killed, by Arjuna's arrows.

Rajan, many fighting men have their armour and bodies perforated by the all-powerful Mahindra astra. And with his deadly shafts, Arjuna makes a vile river of blood course across the battlefield, formed by the twisted bodies of the warriors, with their fat as its froth. The bodies of slain elephants and horses form its banks.

Its mire consists of the entrails, the marrow, and the flesh of men, while Rakshasas are the majestic trees on its banks. And a profusion of human skulls, covered with hair, forms its floating morass; heaps of human bodies, forming its sandbanks, cause the current to flow in a thousand directions. The coats of mail strewn all over form its hard pebbles.

Its banks are infested with jackals and wolves, cranes and vultures, crowds of Rakshasas and Pisachas, and packs of hyenas. And they that are alive gaze upon that terrible river of fat, marrow and blood, caused by Arjuna's arrows, the river that embodies man's cruelty, like the great Vaitarani.

Seeing those outstanding warriors of the Kaurava army decimated by Phalguni, the Chedis, the Panchalas, the Karushas, the Matsyas, and all the Pandava allies roar jubilantly in unison to terrify the Kaurava fighting men. Their triumphant shouts proclaim the victory of Arjuna, who razes the Kaurava legions, though they are protected and led by the noblest men, the greatest maharathas, mighty leaders of akshauhinis; Arjuna terrifies them like a lion frightens herds of small animals.

And then the bearer of Gandiva himself and Krishna roar in delight. The Kauravas, with Bhishma, and Drona and Duryodhana and Bahlika, are savagely wounded by Arjuna's weapons. Watching the setting sun, and seeing the irresistible Aindrastra spread out as if to invite the end of the yuga, they withdraw their forces for the night and rest.

Famed for crushing his enemies, the victorious Arjuna, having achieved a great feat, seeing the sun turn red as dusk approaches, also retires with his brothers to their camp.

Then when darkness is about to descend, there arises a terrible lament in the Kaurava camp. And all cry, "In today's battle Arjuna has killed ten thousand maharathas and seven hundred elephants! All the forces of the western kingdoms, and all the tribes of the Sauviras, and the Kshudrakas and the Malavas, have been annihilated. Arjuna has achieved a mighty feat indeed. There is no other who could do this.

Srutayush, the ruler of the Amvashtas, and Durmarshana, and Chitrasena, and Drona, and Kripa, and the ruler of the Sindhus, and Bahlika, and Bhurisravas, and Salya, and Sala, and other warriors united in hundreds, along with Bhishma himself, have been defeated today by the angry son of Pritha, Arjuna, that most wondrous of warriors."

Talking thus among themselves, Bhaarata, all your soldiers leave the battlefield and enter their tents. Petrified by Kiritin, your warriors enter their beautiful tents illuminated by countless torches and lamps.'

Sanjaya says, 'Next morning, the incensed Bhishma, supported by an enormous force, at the head of the Bhaarata army, advances against the enemy. And Drona and Duryodhana and Bahlika, and also Durmarshana and Chitrasena, the mighty Jayadratha, and other royal warriors, backed by massive legions, surround him on all sides. Protected by those magnificent maharathas, Bhishma shines forth like Indra in the midst of the Devas.

The colourful standards, red, yellow, black and brown, waving in the air, on the backs of the elephants in the vanguard, look beautiful. The entire army, with Bhishma and other chariot warriors, with their elephants and horses, glows, like a mass of clouds charged with lightning, or like dark thunderheads gathered in the sky during the monsoon.

The Kaurava army, ready for battle and led by Bhishma, charges towards Arjuna like the turbid current of the Ganga rushing towards the sea. Filled with many kinds of mighty forces, and having in its wings a profusion of elephants, horses, foot-soldiers, and chariots, Arjuna, with the great Vanara on his banner, sees that vyuha like a dense mass of approaching clouds.

That Kshatriya mahatman, bull among men, upon his chariot furnished with a lofty standard, yoked to white horses, riding at the head of his own great army presses forward against the enemy.

Seeing the warrior with the wild Hanuman on his banner, lofty standard and chariot shaft wrapped in costly sheath, with Krishna Yadupumgava, his charioteer in battle, your sons and all the Kauravas are dismayed. Your army gazes upon that most excellent vyuha with four thousand elephants at each corner, protected by maharatha Arjuna with astras ready.

This vyuha of the Pandavas is as wonderful at the one formed just yesterday by Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, the like of which has never been seen or heard before by men.

Thousands of drums are pounded, and the deafening sound of conches, the blast of trumpets, and many leonine roars arise from every legion. The twang of countless bows stretched by noble warriors and the blowing of conches, silence that din of drums and cymbals.

The sky resounds with the booming of the conches and, diffused with an earthly dust, is awesome to behold; the sky looks like a vast canopy spread overhead. Seeing that canopy, the fighting men charge into battle.

Maharathas are overthrown by maharathas, with their sarathies, horses, chariots, and standards. Elephants fall to the ground, attacked by elephants, as do foot-soldiers struck by other foot-soldiers. Racing horsemen are felled by horsemen with spears and swords. And all this seems amazing.

Beautiful shields decked with golden stars and radiant like the sun lie smashed on the field, riven by battle-axes, lances and swords. Many maharathas, gored and mangled by the tusks and the trunks of elephants, collapse along with their charioteers; many are struck down by other chariot warriors. Hearing the cries of riders and foot-soldiers pierced by the tusks or crushed by the massive legs of elephants as they charge in close ranks, other warriors fall senseless to the ground.

As the horsemen and foot-soldiers fall fast, and elephants, horses and chariots scatter in fear, Bhishma, surrounded by maharathas, glimpses him who has the mighty Vanara on his standard. The five Palmyra bannered warrior, attacks the diademed Arjuna, the Kiritin, whose chariot, because of the swift horses yoked to it, and the power of his mighty astras, blazes with energy like lightning.

And so against that son of Indra who was like Indra himself, advance many warriors headed by Drona and Kripa, and Salya and Vivimsati, and Duryodhana and Somadatta's son.

The gallant Abhimanyu, son of Arjuna, master of all weapons and protected by golden armour, attacks those warriors; and he of most wondrous feats, thwarts their mighty weapons, fiery like the adored Agni himself, on the sacrificial altar, invoked with mantras.

Bhishma of great tejas, letting a veritable river of the blood of his enemies, avoiding Subhadra's son, encounters Arjuna himself.

With sparkling coronet and bright garlands, with his Gandiva of wonderful mien and twang as loud as thunder, shooting cataracts of arrows, Arjuna foils the astras of Bhishma. And that invincible Kshatriya, with Hanuman on his banner, looses a towering gale of shafts upon the son of Shantanu.

Your troops watch that swarm of arrows shot by Arjuna dispersed by Bhishma like the maker of day dispelling the darkness of night. And the Kurus and the Srinjayas, and all the men there, behold that clash between those two supreme heroes, Bhishma and Dhananjaya, distinguished by the dreadful twanging of their bows.’

Sanjaya says, 'Drona's son, and Bhurisravas, and Chitrasena, and the son of Samyamani also, all attack Subhadra's son, who fights back single-handedly with great urjas against those five tigerish men, like a young lion against five tuskers. None among them equals Krishna's nephew in bravery, in lightness of hand or in the knowledge of astras.

Seeing his son, that Parantapa, displaying his prowess, Arjuna sets up a leonine roar. And seeing your grandson, Rajan, thus afflicting your army, your warriors encircle him. The valiant son of Subhadra, advances cheerfully against the Dhartarashtra host. His powerful and radiant bow is seen to be relentlessly stretched, always ready to strike.

Piercing the son of Drona with one shaft, and Salya with five, he overthrows the standard of Samyamani's son with eight. With another whetted arrow he cleaves the snakelike golden spear hurled at him by Somadatta's son. The heir of Arjuna cuts down his many deadly shafts and kills his four horses.

Bhurisravas, and Salya, and Drona's son and Samyamani, and Sala, terrified by this display of arms, cannot stand before him. Goaded by your son, the Trigartas and the Madras, with the Kekayas, numbering twenty-five thousand, all excellent men skilled in the science of weapons and unconquerable in war, surround Arjuna and his son to destroy them.

The Senapati of the Pandava army, the prince of the Panchalas, sees their chariots surrounded. Leading thousands of elephants and chariots, and hundreds of thousands of horsemen and foot-soldiers, he stretches his bow in great wrath, and advances against that horde of the Madras and the Kekayas.

That division of the Pandava army, protected by this brilliant archer, and consisting of chariots, elephants, and horsemen, is so majestic as it advances. Moving towards Arjuna, that perpetuator of Panchala's race pierces Saradwat's son's shoulder with three keening arrows. He swiftly strikes the Madrakas with ten shafts, killing him who protects Kritavarman from the rear.

With a thick shaft, that Parantapa slays Damana, the heir of the high-souled Paurava. The son of Samyamani stabs the indomitable Panchala prince and his charioteer with ten arrows each. Though wounded, Dhrishtadyumna merely licks the corners of his mouth, resolutely, and cleaves his enemy's bow.

The prince of Panchala attacks his adversary with twenty-five arrows and kills his horses, and both the protectors of his flanks. Bharatarishabha, Samyamani's son, standing on that horseless chariot, looks intently at the son of the famed Drupada. Taking up a terrible sword of steel, Samyamani's son walks towards the Panchala prince who awaits him in his chariot.

The Pandavas, the soldiers and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race watch him come like a surging wave, a snake falling from the skies. Dazzling like the sun, he whirls his sword and advances with the tread of an incensed elephant.

As Samyamani's son, sword and shield in hand, nears his enemy's chariot, the enraged prince of Panchala takes up a mace and smashes his head. The young warrior plunges to the ground, dribbling blood and brains, with his shining blade and shield loosened from his grasp. And so, having killed his opponent, Dhrishtadyumna wins great glory.

Upon the slaying of that maharatha and most excellent archer, loud lamentations can be heard among your troops. Beside himself at seeing his son killed, Samyamani charges towards the invincible fire prince of Panchala. All the kings of both the Kaurava and the Pandava armies watch those two noble maharathas lock in battle.

The Parantapa Samyamani strikes down the scion of Prishata's race with three shafts much like a mahout of an elephant felling a mighty tusker with hooks. Thus does Salya, that jewel among kings, pierce the valiant son of Prishata in the chest. And another battle begins.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'I regard destiny to be superior to exertion, Sanjaya. This is clear to me as I watch my son's army being decimated by the Pandava host. You always describe my forces as being slaughtered, and you speak of the Pandavas as being unslain and cheerful. Indeed, you speak of mine as stripped of manliness, felled and falling, even as they fight uncompromisingly and strive hard for victory.

You portray the Pandavas as achieving victory and my sons as becoming progressively weaker. I incessantly hear of countless causes of unbearable and poignant sorrow caused by Duryodhana's deeds. I do not see, Sanjaya, the means by which the Pandavas may be diminished and my sons can triumph in this war.'

Sanjaya says, 'This great evil has ensued from you, Rajan. Listen now with patience to the annihilation of men, elephants, horses and maharathas. Dhrishtadyumna, wounded by Salya's nine shafts, pierces the ruler of the Madras with many steely arrows. We watch the awesome prowess of Drupada's son as he swiftly impedes Salya.

The battle between them is brief, and they fight vigorously without rest. Salya rives Dhrishtadyumna's bow with a tempered shaft; he covers him with a deluge of arrows like a cloudburst on a mountain's breast during the monsoon. While Dhrishtadyumna is being attacked, Abhimanyu wrathfully charges towards the chariot of the ruler of the Madras. Nearing it, he stabs Artayani with three sizzling barbs.

To oppose Abhimanyu, your warriors quickly surround Artayani's chariot. And Duryodhana, and Vikarna, and Dussasana, and Vivimsati and Durmarshana, and Dussaha, and Chitrasena, and Durmukha, and Satyavrata, and Purumitra position themselves to defend that chariot.

Incensed, Bhima, and Dhrishtadyumna, and the five sons of Draupadi one by each Pandava, and Abhimanyu, and the twin sons of Madri and Pandu attack the Dhritarashtra army with a rage of astras. They fight to kill one another, Rajan, as a result of your evil deeds.

When those ten enraged maharathas clash with the enemy ten, the other maharathas of both armies stand still like spectators, and gaze. Those powerful warriors bellow stridently and strike one another with myriad astras. With ever rising anger, they roar fiercely and challenge each other. They unite and fight the enemy with deadly, mighty weapons.

Choleric Duryodhana pierces Dhrishtadyumna with four shafts. Durmarshana pierces him with twenty, and Chitrasena with five, and Durmukha with nine; he shoots Dussaha with seven, and Vivimsati with five, and Dussasana with three barbs. Dhrishtadyumna resists each of them expertly with twenty-five arrows of his own.

Abhimanyu pierces Satyavrata and Purumitra each with ten shafts. The sons of Madri shroud their uncle with sheets of lean missiles. And all this appears wonderful. Salya attacks his nephews, those two excellent maharathas who want to counter their uncle's exploits; but the sons of Madri do not falter.

The mighty Bhima, seeing Duryodhana, and wanting to end the very war, takes up his mace. Beholding Mahabaho Bhima with raised mace and looking like the peak of Kailasa, your sons flee in terror. Duryodhana, incensed, goads the Magadha legion of ten thousand majestic tuskers to attack. Surrounded by that legion and placing the ruler of Magadha before him, Duryodhana rushes at Bhimasena.

Watching that legion of elephants coming towards him, Vrikodara, mace in hand, leaps down from his chariot with a lion's roar. Armed with that awesome mace, having the weight and strength of adamant, he charges like Siva himself with cavernous mouth agape.

Like a slayer of Vritra among the Danava host, Bhima ranges across the battleground killing elephants with his mace. With his frequent roars, that make the heart and mind tremble, the elephants cower and cannot move.

The sons of Draupadi, and the son of Subhadra, and Nakula and Sahadeva, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race, protecting Bhima's rear, move swiftly behind him, and stop all by loosing a barrage of arrows, truly like the very clouds pouring rain on a mountain's breast. From the backs of elephants, those Pandava warriors sever the heads of their adversaries with exquisite shafts.

The heads of elephant-riders, and arms decked with ornaments, and hands still holding iron-hooks, falling fast, resemble a downpour of strange rocks. The headless bodies of those riders on the necks of the beasts they rode look like crownless trees on mountain peaks. And we see mighty elephants felled and falling, killed by Dhrishtadyumna.

The ruler of the Magadhas goads his elephant which looks like Airavata himself towards the chariot of Subhadra's son. Parantapa Abhimanyu kills it with a single shaft. After killing his elephant, Abhimanyu cuts off that king's head with a silver-winged arrow.

Bhima penetrates that horde of elephants and meanders about, crushing those royal beasts around him like Indra crushing the mountains of yore. We watch Bhima kill those tuskers, each with but a single stroke of his mace, like hills riven by thunder. Numerous elephants as grand as hills perish, having their tusks broken, or temples, bones, backs, or frontal lobes shattered. Others lie dead, with foaming mouths. Many mighty elephants, with frontal lobes smashed, vomit streams of blood. And some, from fear, lie down on the ground side by side like a range of hills.

Smeared with their fat and blood, and almost bathed in their marrow, Bhima roams over the field like Siva himself; whirling his blood-soaked mace, he is terrible to behold, like Rudra armed with his Pinaka. Being crushed by the raging Bhima, those massive tuskers run wildly in pain, trampling their own warriors.

All the while, the daring archers and maharathas, led by Subhadra's son, guard that awesome Kshatriya, whirling his gory mace, dripping the blood of elephants, like the Devas protecting Indra. Of terrible soul, Bhima now truly looks like none but Sankara.

Indeed, Bhaarata, displaying his strength on all sides, we see Bhima like Siva dancing his Tandava at the end of the yuga; his heavy and resounding mace resembles the club of Yama, it echoes with the sound of Indra's thunderbolt. His bloodthirsty mace, smeared with marrow and hair, seems to be the Pinaka annihilating all creatures during Rudra's rage.

As a herdsman chastises his herd of cattle with a goad, Bhima smites that elephant legion with his club. Slaughtered by Bhima and pierced with the arrows of the warriors who protect his rear, the elephants scatter, crushing your chariots. Driving away those great beasts from the field like a mighty wind great clouds, Bhima stands like the wielder of the Trisula on a cremation ground.'

Sanjaya says, 'When that elephant akshauhini is destroyed, your son Duryodhana rouses his entire army, commanding his warriors to kill Bhima. The whole awesome force rushes towards Vrikodara. That vast host, a challenge for the very Devas, impossible to cross like the surging sea at the full or new moon, teeming with chariots, elephants and horses, resounding with the blast of conches and the beating of drums, with countless foot-soldiers and maharathas, and shrouded by the swirling dust it raises, that sea of hostile forces, is arrested by Bhima, like the shore containing the ocean. We are wonderstruck by Bhima's superhuman exploit.

With his mace, he fearlessly checks all those kings cholerically attacking him, with their steeds and chariots and elephants. Withstanding that vast force with his mace, Bhima stands in that fierce melee as unyielding as Meru.

And in that tremendous encounter, his brother and sons, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race, and the sons of Draupadi and Abhimanyu, and the undefeated Sikhandin do not cravenly abandon him. Taking up his hefty mace made of Saika iron, Bhima charges the warriors of your army like Mahadeva turned to ire. Grinding a multitude of chariots and throngs of horsemen into the earth, Bhima roves across the battleground like the fire consuming all at the end of the yuga.

Pandu's son of infinite prowess smashes a host of chariots just with his legs like iron and kills another host of your fighting men. He crushes your troops with such ease, like an elephant ploughing through a forest of reeds. Dragging down maharathas from their chariots, and horsemen from their horses, and foot-soldiers as they stand their ground in your son's forces, Mahabaho Bhima demolishes them all with his mace like the mighty wind risen uprooting frail trees.

Slaughtering elephants and horses, smeared by now richly with fat, marrow, flesh and blood, his mace looks gruesome indeed. With the bodies of warriors and horsemen lying scattered, Kurukshetra appears like Yama's abode. Bhima's mace, that bludgeon of death with the brilliance of Indra's Vajra, is like the Pinaka of Rudra claiming all living creatures.

That swinging mace is fiercely resplendent like the Khatvanga of Siva at the end of the yuga. Seeing him routing that enormous force, your fighting men are dismal. Wherever Bhima casts his eye, there all the warriors seem to melt away.

Beholding Vrikodara consuming those legions, himself impregnable, Bhishma charges at him on his chariot radiant like the sun and with the sound of thunderous clouds, covering the sky with his gale of arrows like a misty rain-filled awning.

Seeing Bhishma charging him like another Rudra, Mahabaho Bhima attacks him fiercely. At that moment, that foremost Kshatriya of Sini's race, the matchless Satyaki, also assails the Pitamaha, killing so many of the enemy as he gloriously rides, filling your son's army with fear. Your warriors, Bhaarata, cannot stop or stand up to him at all, flying along with his silvery horses, spraying splendid winged shafts.

Only the Rakshasa Alambusha pierces him with ten shafts. Satyaki shoots Alambusha with four arrows and continues on his careen. Watching that recalescent warrior whirl through his enemies, scything through the foremost of Kaurava fighting men, and roaring loudly all the while, your warriors shower him with clouds of arrows. But their deadly rain falls as onto a mountain's breast of rock. They cannot impede that gallant hero who looks like the noon-day sun in full glory.

Everyone is despondent, except for Somadatta's son, Bhurisravas, who, seeing the maharathas of his side dispersed, charges against Satyaki with his mighty bow.'

Sanjaya says, 'Bhurisravas, excited with great wrath, pierces Satyaki with nine arrows. Before the eyes of all, Satyaki stabs the Kaurava warrior with nine shafts of his own. Duryodhana and his brothers surround Somadatta's son as he fights passionately.

The Pandavas quickly encircle Satyaki, protecting him. Ever furious Bhima, mace raised, roars his challenge at all your sons led by Duryodhana. Supported by thousands of chariots, your son Nandaka attacks Bhima with arrows winged with the feathers of the kanka bird.

Duryodhana strikes Bhima in the chest with nine shafts. Mahabaho Bhima, standing in his chariot, says to his sarathy Vishoka, "These heroic and mighty sons of Dhritarashtra, all maharathas, are furious, and want to kill me. I will slaughter all of them today. So steer my horses carefully into battle."

O Dhritarashtra, saying this, Pritha's son strikes your son with a rash of gold decked arrows. And he pierces Nandaka with three barbs in his chest. Duryodhana stabs the mighty Bhima with six shafts and Vishoka with three. Duryodhana calmly cuts off Bhima's resplendent bow at its grasp with three arrows of incredible aim.

Bhima, bull among men, cannot bear to see Vishoka wounded by Duryodhana; he seizes another excellent bow to kill your son. Drawing a crescent-tipped winged arrow, he cleaves Duryodhana's bow in his hands. Roaring, your son discards it and plucks up a more robust one.

Aiming a fearful shaft blazing like Yama's danda, Duryodhana strikes Bhima. Deeply and painfully pierced in his chest, the mighty one drops down in his chariot and faints. Unable to endure seeing Bhima wounded, the illustrious maharathas of the Pandava army, led by Abhimanyu, with unwavering accuracy, loose a harmattan of arrows upon your sons.

Bhima regains consciousness and first covers Duryodhana with a hail of shafts. That gallant son of Pandu pierces Salya with twenty-five golden-winged barbs. Salya is carried off in a swoon from the battleground.

Your fourteen sons, Senapati, Sushena, Jalasandha, Sulochana, Ugra, Bhimaratha, Bhima, Virabahu, Aolupa, Durmukha, Dushpradarsha, Vivitsu, Vikata, and Sama, face Bhima. Unitedly they charge Bhima and with eyes red with anger wound him deeply with countless arrows.

Mahabaho Bhima, licking the corners of his mouth like a wolf amidst smaller creatures, falls upon them with the ferocity of Garuda. With a crescent-tipped shaft, Bhima decapitates Senapati. Exultant, laughing all the while, that towering Kshatriya kills Jalasandha with three arrows. Smiting Sushena, he dispatches him to Yama. And with a single barb he hacks away the stately head of Ugra, beautiful as the moon, decked with turban and adorned with ear-rings.

With seventy arrows, Bhima kills Virabahu and his horses, standard and charioteer. The smiling Bhima slays both the brothers Bhima and Bhimaratha. In that great war, Bhima also fells Sulochana. The rest of your sons, seeing indomitable Bhima roused like that, flee.

Bhishma addresses all the maharathas of his army saying, “Bhima, excited with wrath, can annihilate the mighty sons of Dhritarashtra and every other maharatha, all united together, regardless of their knowledge of weapons, and their valour. All of you must attack and kill that son of Pandu.”

Hearing this, the vast legions of the Dhritarashtra army rush at Bhima. Bhagadatta, on his elephant of rent temples, dashes to where the massive Pandava stands. He mantles Bhima with countless arrows, like the clouds covering the sun.

But those intrepid maharathas of the Pandava army cannot bear seeing that shrouding of Bhima by the torrent of Bhagadatta’s shafts, and they surround Bhagadatta, raining arrows on him. They also pierce his elephant with showers of barbs. Struck by the awesome shafts of those maharathas, that elephant of the ruler of the Pragjyotishas, with blood flowing down his body, appears as strikingly handsome as a mass of clouds stained by the sun’s rays. With temporal juice pouring down, that elephant Supritika is goaded by Bhagadatta to race forward, shaking the earth with his tread.

The Pandava maharathas, gazing upon the beast’s dreadful appearance, lose all courage. King Bhagadatta, lion among men, forcefully strikes Bhima in the chest with a straight shaft of great length. Bhima faints and falls to the floor of his chariot, holding onto his flagpole. Seeing the fear of the enemy maharathas and an unconscious Bhima, Bhagadatta roars exultantly.

Seeing his father Bhima fainted, the feral Rakshasa Ghatotkacha is incensed and vanishes from sight using maya. Creating a macabre illusion, he reappears the next moment in a form so prodigious and fierce as to fill the hearts of the timid with nameless dread. Riding on an Airavata created by his maya shakti, the other celebrated elephants, Anjana, Vamana, and Mahapadma, follow him.

Ridden by Rakshasas, those massive tuskers, with juice profusely trickling down in three lines, thunder into battle. Ghatotkacha spurs his own elephant forward to demolish Bhagadatta and his great beast. The other mastodons, each endowed with four tusks, goaded by huge and sinister Rakshasas, attack Bhagadatta's elephant from every side, goring him, shooting him with savage arrows.

Wounded by excruciating shafts, Supritika bellows boomingly as loud as Indra's thunder. Hearing those deafening cries, Bhishma says to Drona, Suyodhana and all the kings, "The mighty Bhagadatta, battling the evil son of Hidimbi, is in distress. The Rakshasa is formidable, and the king beside himself with anger. They will slaughter each other. Loud shouts of the rejoicing Pandavas can be heard, as can the agonised cries of king Bhagadatta's terrified elephant.

Let us all ride to save the beleaguered king or he will be killed! Warriors of great urjas, do not delay. The battle becomes even fiercer, making one's hair stand on end. That legion's commander is of high varna, brave, and devoted to us. O my heroes of unfading glory, we must save him."

Hearing Bhishma's words, all the kings of the Kaurava army, led by Drona, charge towards Bhagadatta, sovereign of the Pragjyotishas. Seeing them come, the Panchalas with the Pandavas, led by Yudhishtira, pursue them. Ghatotkacha, mighty prince of Rakshasas, roars shatteringly as he sees the enemy legion press forward.

Hearing that roar and seeing those battle elephants, Bhishma says to Drona, "I do not wish to fight today with the evil son of Hidimbi. Mighty and vigorous, he is so well supported at the moment that even Indra could not vanquish him. He has a deadly aim. As for us, today our animals are tired. We have been crushed by the Panchalas and the Pandavas. I would not like a fresh encounter with them just now. Order our army to withdraw. Tomorrow we will fight anew."

Hearing these words of the Pitamaha, the Kauravas, terrified of Ghatotkacha and ready to use nightfall as a pretext, obey him promptly. After the Kauravas have withdrawn, the conquering Pandava lions roar and roar in victory, and their roars echo with the blast of conches and mingle with the notes of flutes. Bhaarata, in this way did the Kauravas and the Pandavas led by Ghatotkacha fight each other on that day.

The Kauravas, overcome with shame at being decimated and humiliated by the Pandavas, retire downcast to their tents. And those maharathas, the sons of Pandu, lacerated by arrows and wearied by the fighting, also retire to their camp led by Bhima and Ghatotkacha. Joyfully, they praise these two heroes. Their triumphant shouts mingle with the music of horns. Those sounds make the very earth tremble, carving the hearts of your sons.

Thus those Parantapas retreat into their tents. Duryodhana, stricken by the death of his brothers, is forlorn, overcome with grief and weeping. He passes the hours in meditation, anguish over the killing of his brothers burning him.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Hearing of those feats of the Pandavas, before whom the very Devas appear powerless, my heart, Sanjaya, is filled with awe and fear. Hearing also of the humiliation of my sons, I dread the outcome of this war. Vidura’s words trouble me. Everything that has occurred appears to be the will of fate.

Led by Bhishma, The warriors of the Pandava army confront and annihilate our exceptional fighting men who are led by Bhishma and are so skilled in using every weapon. What ascetic penances have the high-souled and mighty sons of Pandu performed, what boon have they obtained, what science is known to them, that they do not diminish like stars in the sky? I cannot bear that my army is being slaughtered by them. This divine and cruel punishment has fallen on me alone.

Tell me everything truly, Sanjaya, that explains the invincibility of the Pandavas and the vulnerability of my sons. I am drowning in this ocean of anguish and cannot see the other shore. I am like a man thrashing to cross this vast ocean by just the strength of my two arms. I know that a great calamity has engulfed my sons. Certainly, Bhima will crush them. I do not see any hero who will be able to protect them. Their death, in this war, is assured.

I implore you, O Suta, to tell me everything about the true cause of all these events. Seeing his troops retreating from the melee, what does Duryodhana do? And what the respected Bhishma and Drona, and Kripa, and Subala’s son, and Jayadratha, and that forceful archer, Drona’s son, and mighty Vikarna? Wise Sanjaya, watching my sons withdraw, what do the Pandavas resolve to do?’

Sanjaya says, ‘Listen carefully, Rajan, and having heard, understand this. Nothing is the result of a spell, or the outcome of chimera of any kind. Nor have the sons of Pandu created any new terrors. They are mighty, and fight fairly in this war. Seeking glory, the sons of Pritha always cleave to dharma, even when their own lives are at risk.

Having both great wealth and strength, they continue to battle, never straying from righteousness. And victory lies with the virtuous. This is why the sons of Pritha are unassailable and always victorious. Your sons are evil and sinful. They are cruel and shameful in what they do. This is why they are being diminished.

Your sons' actions towards the Pandavas have been devious and ruthless. The sons of Pandu have always disregarded these offences. On many occasions your sons have humiliated them. Let them now reap the terrible fruit, like poison, of that persistent course of sins. Rajan, you too will harvest that fruit, along with your sons and kinsmen, since you could not be persuaded to return to dharma despite the counsel of your well-wishers.

Repeatedly forbidden by Vidura, by Bhishma, by the high-souled Drona, and by me also, you would not understand, disregarding what we said for your good, like a sick man refusing medicine that would save him. Instead believing your sons' opinions, you considered the Pandavas already defeated. Again, listen to me about the true cause of the Pandava victory. Parantapa, I will tell you what I have heard.

Duryodhana asked the Pitamaha this very question. Seeing his brothers, all mighty chariot warriors, routed in battle, your grief-stricken son humbly goes to the wise Bhishma during the night and asks him this same thing. Rajan, I will tell you all about it.

Duryodhana says, "Drona and you, and Salya, and Kripa, and Drona's son, and Kritavarman the son of Hridika, and Sudakshina the ruler of the Kambojas, and Bhurisravas, and Vikarna, and Bhagadatta of exceeding prowess, are all deemed maharathas. All are dvija, and prepared to sacrifice their lives in battle.

It is my view that these are a match for even the hosts of the three worlds combined. All the warriors of the Pandava army jointly cannot oppose your prowess. A doubt has risen in my mind. Explain it to me. Whom do the Pandavas rely on to repeatedly subdue us?"

Bhishma says, "Listen to me, Suyodhana. I frequently advised you about this but you did not listen. Bharatarishabha, make peace with the Pandavas. This will benefit both the world and you. Enjoy this earth with your brothers and be happy, gratifying all your well-wishers and delighting your kinsmen.

Although I beseeched you, you did not heed my counsel. You have always scorned the sons of Pandu. The outcome has now overwhelmed you. Listen also to the reason why the tireless Pandavas cannot be slain.

There is not, was not, nor will be, in all the worlds a warrior who can overpower the sons of Pandu who are all protected by the wielder of the Saranga. Knowing dharma as you do, listen to that ancient history, itihasa, which was narrated to me by sages of restrained souls.

In olden days, all the Devas and the Rishis, united together, waited respectfully on the Pitamaha Brahma upon the mountains of Gandhamadana.

And the Lord of all creatures, seated in their midst, saw a wonderful luminous chariot in the sky. Having gained knowledge of it through dhyana, calmly joining his hands, Brahma, with delighted soul, greeted the highest Divine Being. The Rishis and the Devas, beholding this form in the sky, all stood up with folded hands, their eyes fixed on that wonder of wonders.

Worshipping him duly, Brahma, the Creator of the universe, aware of Brahman, conscious of the highest rectitude, spoke these noble words: 'With your form, you endow magnificence upon the universe. You are indeed the protector of the universe. O most Supreme One, the universe is your creation. You are Vasudeva. Therefore, I seek refuge in You who are the soul of yoga and the highest God. Victory to You who are the Supreme Deity!

Victory to You who personify all the good of the worlds. Victory to you, Lord of yoga, who are omnipotent. Victory to You who both precede and succeed yoga. With the lotus springing from your navel, and having all-embracing eyes, victory to You who are the Lord of the Devas. O Holy Being of the past, the present, and the future, victory to You, the embodiment of gentleness!

You are the sun of suns. The receptacle of countless attributes, the refuge of all things, may You triumph. You are Narayana, too deep to be fathomed. Wielder of the Saranga, may victory be yours.

Unsullied and blessed with every attribute, having the universe for your form, may you always prevail. Lord of the universe, Mahabaho, one who blesses the worlds, victory to You. O great Snake, mighty Varaha, O first Cause, with tawny hair, all-powerful One, may You always be victorious!

Saffron-robed Lord of the cardinal and the subsidiary directions, You, who pervade all the universe, are infinite and eternal, the manifest and the unmanifest. You that are the immeasurable Akasa, with all your senses under control, who attains what is good, You that are immeasurable, You who alone know your own nature, victory to You!

You are profound and vast; you grant all wishes, One without end, known as Brahman, You that are eternal, the Creator of all creatures, ever successful and wise, are familiar with dharma, the One who confers victory, You of mysterious Self, You are the soul of all yoga. You who cause everything to be born, who are the knowledge of the selves of all beings, Lord of the worlds, victory to you. Svayambhu, most blessed, you are also the veritable Destroyer.

Inspirer of all thoughts, dear to all conversant with Brahman, ever creating and destroying, controller of all wishes, Supreme Lord, the cause of amrita, You are all-existent, nityasya. You are the first to appear at the end of the yuga, guardian of victory, Divine Lord of the Lord of all creatures, from whose navel springs the lotus, mighty and, arisen from Yourself, embodying the great elements in their primeval state, You who are the soul of all rites and rituals, victory to You who grants everything!

Bhumi Devi represents your two feet, the cardinal and the subsidiary directions your arms, and the sky your head. I am your form, the Devas your limbs, and the sun and the moon are your two eyes. Tapasya and satya born of dharma and yagna are your strength. Agni is your energy, Vayu is your breath, and the waters have sprung from your sweat. The Aswins form your ears, and Saraswati is your tongue. The Vedas are your knowledge, and upon you rests this Brahmanda. Lord of yoga and yogins, we do not know your extent, your measure, your energy, your prowess, your power, your origin.

Vishnu, we worship you fervently, with vows and ceremonies, as the Supreme One, and depend upon you. The Rishis, the Devas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, the Pannagas, the Pisachas, the Manavas, animals and birds, were all created by me on Earth through your grace.

Krishna, with the lotus springing from your navel, O you of large expansive eyes, you dispel all despair and are the refuge and guide of all creatures. The Universe is your mouth and the Devas delight in your blessings. Through your grace the Earth is freed from terrors.

Therefore, take birth in the Yaduvamsa. Establish dharma, slay the sons of Diti, and uphold the universe. Vasudeva, I sing your supreme mystery through your own benevolence.

Having created the divine Sankarshana out of your own self by yourself, Krishna, you then made yourself as Pradyumna born of yourself. From Pradyumna you created Aniruddha known as the eternal Vishnu. And it was Aniruddha who created me as Brahma, the support of the universe. Created out of Vasudeva's essence I have, therefore, been created by you.

Krishna, dividing yourself into amsas, take birth among human beings. Slaughtering the Asuras there for the bliss of all the worlds, establishing virtue, and winning fame, You will again realise Yoga.

The regenerate Rishis on Earth and the Devas are devoted to you and sing of your wonder, pronouncing all your names. Mahabaho, all classes of creatures depend on you, having taken refuge in You who grants boons. The regenerate ones sing of you being Setu, the world's bridge to salvation, having no beginning, middle and end, possessing unlimited Yoga.'''

Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma says, "Then the Lord of the worlds said to Brahma in a soft rumbling voice, 'Through Yoga, I know what you desire. It will be as you wish.'

And saying this, he disappeared. Then the Devas, Rishis and Gandharvas, filled with great wonder and curiosity asked Brahma, 'Who is that one that you worshipped with such humility and praised so highly? Tell us.'

The celebrated Pitamaha replied to all the Devas, the regenerate Rishis, and the Gandharvas, in sweet tones, 'He who is called TAT, He who is Supreme, He who exists now and for all time, He who is the highest Self, He who is the Soul of beings, and who is the great Lord, it was to Him that I spoke. I pleaded with the Lord of the universe, for the good of the universe, to take his birth among men in the family of Vasudeva.

I said to Him: Take birth in the world of men to slaughter the Asuras! Those fierce and strong Daityas and Rakshasas, killed in unworldly battle, have been born among men. Incarnating in a human womb, You will live on the Earth accompanied by Nara.

Those ancient and excellent Rishis, Nara and Narayana, cannot be defeated in battle by even all the Devas united. Of immense effulgence, those Rishis when born together in the world of men will not be recognised by fools.

He, from whose Self, I, Brahma, the Lord of the whole Universe, have sprung, that Vasudeva, that Supreme One, is worthy of your adoration. Imbued with great tejas, and holding the conch, the discus, and the mace, he should never be regarded as a mere man. He is the Unmatched Mystery, the Ultimate Refuge, the Supreme Brahman, and the Greatest Glory.

Unmanifest and eternal, he cannot perish. He has been praised as Purusha, though no one can understand him completely. The Creator has extolled him as the Supreme Energy, the Supreme Felicity, and the Supreme Truth.

Therefore, Vasudeva of vast capacities should never be considered as just a man, not by all the Asuras and the Devas led by Indra. Someone who speaks of Hrishikesa as only a man is a fool and a wretch.

People who disregard that Yogin of illustrious soul for entering into human form are blind. They labour under darkness who do not know that Divine luminary, that Soul of the mobile and the immobile creation, that one bearing the Srivatsa on his chest, that one of dazzling brilliance, that one from whose navel has sprung the primeval lotus.

He who disdains that high souled one, the wearer of the divine crown and the Kaustubha ruby, one who dispels his friends' fears, sinks into deep darkness. Vasudeva should be adored by all.'

Having said these words to those Devas and Rishis, the illustrious Brahma, dismissing them all, returned to his own abode. The Devas and the Gandharvas, and the Munis and the Apsaras, having heard those holy words of Brahma, were delighted and returned to Devaloka. I myself heard this about Krishna from Rishis of cultured souls speaking in their assembly.

You who know the Shastras well, I heard this from Rama, the son of Jamadagni, and Markandeya of great wisdom, and Vyasa and Narada. Having learnt all this and heard of the illustrious Vasudeva as the Eternal Lord, the Supreme God of all the worlds, and the great Master, from whom Brahma himself has sprung, I ask: why should not that Vasudeva be adored and worshipped by men?

You were forbidden by great sages who asked you never to go to war with that Vasudeva armed with his bow as also with the Pandavas. Your foolishness prevented you from comprehending what they said. I hence consider you a wicked Rakshasa. You are also enveloped in ignorance. It is for this reason that you hate Krishna and Arjuna, for who else among men would hate the divine Nara and Narayana?

It is for this, Duryodhana, that I say to you that this one is Eternal and Unfading, pervading the whole Universe, Unchanging, the Ruler, Creator and Upholder of all, and the truly Existent. He supports the three worlds. He is the Supreme Lord of all mobile and immobile creatures, and He is the great Master. He is warrior, He is Victory, He is Vanquisher, and He is the Lord of all nature.

He is full of goodness and without all the qualities of tamas and rajas, darkness and passion. Where Krishna is, there is righteousness; and where righteousness dwells, there is victory. It is by the Yoga of his Supreme Excellence, and the Yoga of his Self, that the sons of Pandu are supported. Therefore, they will surely triumph.

To the Pandavas he imparts understanding permeated with righteousness, and strength in battle; and He always protects them from danger. He is the Eternal God, pervading all beings, and ever blessed. Known as Vasudeva, he is humbly served by all, Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras, who, fulfilling their own dharma, worship Him with restrained hearts.

Towards the close of the Dwapara Yuga and the beginning of the Kali Yuga, it is He who is praised with songs of devotion by believers. It is that Vasudeva who creates, yuga after yuga, the worlds of the Devas and Manushyas, all the cities encircled by the sea, and all the regions where men live.'"

Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana says, "In all the worlds Vasudeva is known as the Supreme Being. Pitamaha, I want to understand his origin and glory."

Bhishma says, "Vasudeva is the Supreme Being. He is the God of all Gods. With eyes like lotus petals, there is none more exalted than him. Markandeya speaks of Govinda as the Most Wonderful and the Most High, as the All-being, as the All-soul, as the Highest soul, and as the Supreme Purusha.

He created Water, Wind, and Fire. That Divine Master created this Earth. That Supreme Being of illustrious soul and all kinds of Tejas laid himself down on the ocean and slept in Yoga. From his mouth He created Fire, and from his breath, the Wind. Of unfading glory, He created from his mouth Vak, the Word and the Vedas.

It was thus that he created first the Worlds and also the Devas along with the many classes of Rishis. And he created the decay and death of all beings, as well as birth and maturity. He is Dharma itself. He grants us boons and desires. He is the Actor and Action, and He is himself the Divine Guru.

He created the Past, the Present, and the Future; He is the Creator of the Universe. Of illustrious soul, He is the magnificent Preceptor. He created Sankarshana, the First-born of all creatures. He created the divine Sesha Ananta, who supports the Earth with all her creatures and mountains.

Of matchless Tejas, the regenerate ones know Him through Yoga. Sprung from the secretions of his ear, the fierce and merciless Asura Madhu, who intended to and almost destroyed Brahma, was slain by Vasudeva. And so the Devas and the Danavas, the Manavas and Rishis call Janardana the slayer of Madhu, Madhusudana.

The great Varaha, the great Narasimha, He is the Three-stepped Vamana. He is the Mother and the Father of all living creatures. There never was, nor will be, any more excellent than He of eyes like lotus petals.

He created the Brahmanas from His mouth and the Kshatriyas from His arms; from His thighs He fashioned the Vaisyas, and from His feet the Sudras. One who serves Him dutifully, observing vows with ascetic austerities on days of the full-moon and the new-moon, is sure to obtain the Divine Kesava, that refuge of all embodied creatures, that essence of Brahman and Yoga.

Kesava is the higher Energy, the ancestor of all the worlds. The sages call Him Hrishikesa. All should know Him as the Acharya and the Pitamaha. Him with whom Krishna is delighted, attains eternal regions of blessedness.

He who is fearful should seek Kesava’s protection; and he who repeatedly reads this stuti, achieves happiness and prosperity. Those who attain Krishna are never deceived; Janardana always sustains those who are frightened.

Rajan, knowing this truly, Yudhishtira, has wholeheartedly sought refuge in Krishna, the Lord of Yoga, and the Lord of the Earth.’’

'Bhishma says, "I will recite this hymn that Brahma himself sang. In ancient times, this hymn was imparted by regenerate Rishis and the Devas to men:

'Narada described you as the Acharya and the Supreme Lord of the Devas and all the Sadhyas and the heavenly beings, and as one who knows the nature of Brahman. Markandeya spoke of you as the Past, the Present, and the Future, the sacrifice of sacrifices, and the austerity of austerities.

The celebrated Bhrigu said that you are the God of the gods and all creatures, the ancient form of Vishnu. Dwaipayana said that you are Vasudeva of the Vasus, who establishes Sakra. When mortals were being born, the sages described you as Daksha, the Father of creation.

Angiras said that you are the creator of all beings. Devala said that your body comprised the unmanifest, your mind the manifest, and that all the Devas are produced by your breath. The heavens are filled with your heads, and your arms support the Earth. In your stomach are the three worlds and you are the Eternal Being.

Even thus do men exalted by asceticism know you. You are the Sat of Sat, with Rishis gratified with sight of the Atman. With royal sages of liberal minds, resolute in battle and with ethical aims, you, destroyer of Madhu, are the only refuge.'

The Supreme Being, Hari, is thus adored and worshipped by Sanatkumara and other ascetic yogis. I have now described the truth about Kesava to you, both in brief and detail. Turn to him in love."'

Sanjaya continues, 'Hearing this sacred story, your son begins to revere both Kesava and the Pandava maharathas. Then, O Rajan, Bhishma says to Duryodhana, "You have now heard about Krishna's glory and about Nara. You also now know why Nara and Narayana have incarnated among men.

You have also been told why those heroes are invincible and have never been defeated in war, and why also no one can kill the sons of Pandu in war. Krishna greatly loves the sons of Pandu. And so I say: Make peace with the Pandavas. Curb your passions and enjoy the Earth with your mighty brothers. By disregarding the divine Nara and Narayana, you will be destroyed.”

Having said these words, the Pitamaha becomes silent, and dismissing King Duryodhana, enters his tent. Duryodhana also returns to his tent, after paying his respects to Bhishma. And then, Bharatarishabha, he lies down to sleep.’

Sanjaya says, 'When the night passes and the sun rises, the two armies face each other again. Each side moves forward in united and furious ranks to overcome the other. And as a result of your evil deeds, the Pandavas and the Kauravas advance, encased in armour and in battle formation.

The vyuha that Bhishma protects from all sides is that of the Makara, the great crocodile. The Pandavas also form and protect their vyuha. Maharatha Bhishma rides with a large akshauhini of chariots. Chariot warriors, foot-soldiers, elephants, and horsemen, all follow him, positioned in assigned places.

Seeing them ready for battle, the Pandavas deploy their forces in the invincible Syena vyuha. On that vyuha's beak shines the formidable Bhima. The invincible Sikhandin and Dhrishtadyumna are its eyes. In its head is the heroic Satyaki of indomitable prowess.

On its neck stands Arjuna vibrating his Gandiva. Upon its left wing is the high-souled and blessed Drupada with his son supported by an akshauhini of all forces. And the king of the Kekayas, with an akshauhini, forms the right wing of that vyuha. On its back are the sons of Draupadi, and Subhadra's wonderful son. And at its tail is the heroic and excellent Yudhishtira himself, supported by Nakula and Sahadeva.

In the battle that ensues, Bhima penetrates the Kaurava vyuha of Makara through its mouth, and approaching Bhishma, covers him with stern arrows. Mighty Bhishma looses his deadly weapons, baffling the Pandava forces. And when the Pandava fighting men are thus confounded, Arjuna swiftly strikes Bhishma with a thousand shafts. Countering Bhishma's weapons, Arjuna, supported by his own spirited men, erupts into battle.

Maharatha Duryodhana, seeing the bloody carnage wreaked on his army and remembering the slaughter of his brothers, rushes up to Drona and says to him, "Acharya, ever my well-wisher, relying on you and on the Pitamaha, we hope to defeat the very Devas in battle, let alone the sons of Pandu who are floundering with neither energy nor prowess. O blessed one, fight today so that the Pandavas are annihilated.”

At this, Drona plunges into the Pandava vyuha before Satyaki’s very eyes, who quickly retaliates to stop the son of Bharadwaja. The battle that follows is pitched and fierce. Roused, the great Drona, smiling the while, pierces the grandson of Sini with ten shafts in his shoulder. Bhima shoots Drona with a rash of arrows, seeking to protect Satyaki. Infuriated, Drona, Bhishma and Salya shroud Bhima with their fire. Abhimanyu and the sons of Draupadi wound those armed warriors with their sharpest barbs.

In that brutal contention, the great archer Sikhandin charges against Bhishma and Drona who have fallen upon the Pandavas. Firmly grasping his bow, whose twang is the roar of clouds, that Kshatriya, obscuring the very sun with his volleys, ferociously attacks his adversaries. The Pitamaha, finding Sikhandin before him, avoids him, remembering his once womanhood.

Spurred on by your son, Drona, wanting to protect Bhishma, presses forward. Sikhandin quickly turns on Drona, avoiding the Pitamaha, fearing that warrior who is like fire that appears at the end of the yuga. Duryodhana moves to protect Bhishma with a vast legion.

And the Pandavas, resolved on victory, also press forward, and the encounter between the two sides, both seeking fame and triumph, is breathtaking, indeed like the Devasura yuddha of old.’

Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma, son of Shantanu, fights awesomely to protect your sons from Bhima. The battle between the kings of the Kaurava and the Pandava armies is shocking and bloody, annihilating great Kshatriyas. From that war, a tumult rises, reaching the very heavens. Deafening is that bedlam, as tuskers scream and horses whinny, while conches blast and drums pound, and mighty enemies roar at one another like contending bulls in a cow-pen. Severed heads fall ceaselessly, like some grisly rain of weird rocks from the sky.

Bharatarishabha, countless heads lie strewn across the battlefield, with bright earrings and ornamented turbans. And the earth is covered over with limbs hacked away with broad-headed shafts, and bejewelled arms; with bodies sheathed in gleaming, red-stained armour, with braceleted arms, with moon-like faces and kohl-tinted eyes; limbs of elephants, horses and men lie everywhere. Dust swirls everywhere in a thick cloud, and bright weapons flash like lightning. The sound of all the weapons together is the roar of thunder.

The horrible war between the Kauravas and the Pandavas lets flow a bloody river, sprung from a million wounds made by the incessant tirade of arrows loosed by invincible Kshatriyas upon Kurukshetra. Bleeding from that gale of vicious barbs, the elephants of both armies shriek, and course furiously in all directions. Everything is hidden in the twang of virile bows and the mighty flapping of bowstrings against the leathern gloves of incensed and heroic fighting men.

On Kurukshetra, looking like a lake of blood, stand headless trunks, briefly; kings determined to kill their enemies charge reckless at them; mighty warriors, with club-like arms, slaughter one another with barbs, maces and swords; riderless horses and elephants, pierced with arrows, plunge wildly in all directions; many soldiers on both sides leap high and fall, heads stricken off.

In the battle between Bhima and Bhishma, ever-growing heaps of arms and heads, as also of bows and maces and spiked clubs, and hands and thighs, of legs, and jewels and bracelets, are strewn over the field. Across that dreadful field, Rajan, masses of unretreating elephants, horses and chariots can be seen. Kshatriya warriors, moved by destiny, decimate one another with maces, swords, spears, and arrows. Heroic and skilled fighting men contend with bare arms that resemble spiked iron clubs.

Other valiant men of your army fight the Pandava host, killing thousands with clenched fists and knees, slaps and blows. The fallen and falling warriors, and those lying on the ground wounded and in agony, make the fell field a horrible spectacle; maharathas, bereft of their chariots, still holding their swords, always eager to kill, attack one another in mad rage.

Surrounded by a large Kalinga akshauhini, with Bhishma at its van, Duryodhana charges the Pandavas. The Pandava warriors supporting Bhima ride wildly, intently against Bhishma with their fine horses and lumbering elephants.'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing his brothers and the other kings battling Bhishma, Arjuna storms towards him, weapons raised. Hearing the blast of the Panchajanya and the twang of the Gandiva, and seeing his standard, we are terrified. That standard bears the emblem of a lion's tail and looks like a mountain blazing in the sky. Beautiful and of divine workmanship, it is flecked with many colours, looking like a rising comet on a horizon unobscured by any trees.

All the warriors see the Gandiva, chased with purest gold, as magnificent as a great flash of lightning amidst dense clouds in the sky. While razing the soldiers of your army, Arjuna's shouts are like the thunderous roars of Indra himself; the slaps of his palms are deafening.

Like a cloud mass charged with lightning, bolstered by a raging wind, Arjuna relentlessly looses his arrows on all sides, completely shrouding the ten points of the compass. He of the terrifying astras advances rapidly towards the Pitamaha. We that watch are struck senseless and cannot distinguish the East from the West.

Bharatarishabha, your men are bewildered and depressed, their animals tired, their horses slaughtered; huddling close to one another, together with your sons, they seek Bhishma's protection. And in that battle Bhishma becomes their protector.

Fearstricken maharathas leap from their chariots, horsemen from the backs of their steeds, and foot-soldiers fall where they stand. Hearing the thunder of the Gandiva, all your fighting men flee, shutting their ears.

With many swift horses of the Kamboja breed, surrounded by thousands of Gopas with a large Gopayana force, and supported by the Madras, the Sauviras, the Gandharas and the Trigartas, surrounded by all the principal Kalingas, along with king Jayadratha accompanied by all the kings, and supported by a large force of diverse races with Dussasana at their head, and fourteen thousand leading horsemen, spurred by your son, the great Kamboja king encircles Sakuni, son of Subala, to protect him.

All the sons of Pandu, united, again desiccate your forces from their chariots and animals. And the dust raised by maharathas, horses and foot-soldiers, flecked generously with spraying blood, renders Kurukshetra hideous, like a dark precinct of hell.

With a vast legion of elephants, horses and chariots, armed with spears, barbs and arrows, Bhishma fights Arjuna Kiritin. The king of Avanti engages the lord of the Kasis, and the ruler of the Sindhus, Bhima. With his sons and advisors, Yudhishtira battles Salya, his uncle, the famed ruler of the Madras. Vikarna engages with Sahadeva, and Chitrasena with Sikhandin. The Matsyas fight Duryodhana and Sakuni, while Drupada and Chekitana, and the maharatha Satyaki encounter the high-souled Drona and his son Aswatthaman. Kripa and Kritavarman both charge against Dhrishtadyumna.

Thus, all over the field, storming bodies of horses, elephants and chariots break upon each other. Although there are no clouds in the sky, flashes of lightning are seen on high. Every direction is darkened by flying clouds of dust raised by the hostile forces. Fierce meteors fail with loud reverberations. Violent winds blow swirling the dense dust everywhere. The sun is eclipsed by these. And all the warriors, wielding weapons, are choked by that dust and swoon.

The roar of weapons, discharged from the arms of the fearless, missiles which can cut through armour like knives through butter, rises to another tumult. Bharatarishabha, those weapons of stellar brightness, illuminate the sky. Dappled leather shields plated with gold are scattered all around. Heads and limbs are seen falling on all sides, cut down with radiant swords and spears. Their chariot wheels, axles and carriages smashed, their horses killed, valiant maharathas plunge to the ground, their proud standards toppling about them.

The horses of these slain chariot warriors, dragging their riderless chariots, mangled with weapons, finally crash to the ground. Some excellent horses, despite having their limbs mangled with arrows, continue to run, dragging their chariot yokes behind them. Maharathas, their sarathies and horses are all flattened like meat on a cook’s board by powerful tuskers.

Many elephants, smelling the temporal juice of others, sniff the air repeatedly through wrinkled trunks. And the whole field is strewn with hilly corpses of these massive beasts, slaughtered by arrows, fallen along with their howdahs and mahouts. Many elephants, with their standards and riders, are trampled by others goaded on by their riders. Terror stalks Kurukshetra in every sinister guise.

Swinging thick trunks, the colossal war beasts, each one an Airavata, shatter chariot shafts all around; and many maharathas, with the jalas of their chariots cracked, are dragged by the bloodthirsty elephants from their rathas by their long hair, like branches of trees, and smashed again and again on the ground, crushed into shapeless heaps. Other enormous tuskers drag tangled chariots as if they were lotus stalks in lakes, and run bellowing in all directions.

And so we see that Kurukshetra grimly, copiously, adorned with the bodies of horse-riders and foot-soldiers, maharathas and their standards.'

Sanjaya says, 'Sikhandin, with Virata the Matsya king, swiftly nears the invincible Bhishma. Arjuna encounters Drona and Kripa, and Vikarna and many other brave kings, all powerful archers; he also faces that mighty bowman, the ruler of the Sindhus, supported by his friends and kinsmen and many kings of the west and the south.

Bhima marches against your malicious son Duryodhana, and also against Dussaha. Sahadeva advances against those invincible warriors, Sakuni and the maharatha Uluka, those great archers, father and son. Maharatha Yudhishtira, so treacherously treated by your son, presses forward against the Kaurava akshauhini of elephants.

And that son of Pandu and Madri, the valiant Nakula, who can reduce any enemy to tears, faces the excellent Trigarta maharathas. Satyaki and Chekitana, indomitable, and the mighty son of Subhadra ride against Salya and the Kekayas. The unassailable Dhrishtaketu and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha break upon your sons' chariots.

Maharatha Dhrishtadyumna, Senapati of the Pandavas, opposes fierce Drona. Thus those fearless and heroic archers of your army and the Pandavas engage in battle.

When the sun is overhead and the sky brilliantly illuminated by his rays, the Kauravas and the Pandavas massacre one another. Beautiful chariots, draped in tiger skins, race across the field, their flags and pennants fluttering in the wind. Warriors let out leonine roars as they contend fiercely.

Furious and wonderful to watch is the encounter between the noble Srinjayas and the Kauravas. Arrows fly thickly in every direction, covering the sky, the sun and every point of the compass.

The splendour of polished barbs looking like blue lotuses, of bearded spears hurled like thunderbolts, of tempered swords, of flecked coats of mail, and of the ornaments worn by the fighting men, light up the sky and the earth with blinding radiance. And Kurukshetra shines with the brightness of embattled kings as if with the lustre of the sun and the moon.

Brave maharathas, tigers among men, glow in that battle, Rajan, like the planets in the sky.

Maharatha Bhishma challenges the mighty Bhima before the eyes of all. Bhishma's golden-winged arrows strike Bhima. Bhima looses a serpentine astra at Bhishma, who cleaves that tangential weapon as it courses towards him with a flight of straight shafts. With another, he breaks Bhima's bow in two.

Satyaki flies up in his ratha and recklessly pierces Bhishma with a constellation of shimmering barbs shot from his bowstring drawn to his ear. Bhishma fells Satyaki's sarathy, while his horses bolt. Swift as the mind or a storm, they run wildly over the battleground.

Roars, yells, shouts and cries rise all around from the horrible melee: Run, seize, check the horses, hurry!

And this uproar follows Yuyudhana's chariot. Bhishma meanwhile begins to destroy the Pandava forces like Indra killing the Danavas. But the Panchalas and the Somakas, though suffering, courageously attack the Kuru grandsire. Other Pandava warriors, led by Dhrishtadyumna, determined to thin the ranks of your son's army, charge at Bhishma.

In this manner, the warriors of your army, headed by Bhishma and Drona, fearlessly harry their enemies. Then the warriors ride away from their many contentions and other fresh battles begin.'

Sanjaya says, 'Virata pierces Bhishma with three shafts; he strikes his opponent's horses with three golden winged arrows. Aswatthaman, the deadly maharatha, shoots Arjuna through his chest with six whistling barbs. Arjuna rives Aswatthaman's bow and strikes him deep with five shafts. Incensed, Drona's son snatches another great bow and pierces Arjuna with ninety whetted arrows and Krishna with seventy.

Arjuna and Krishna breathe deeply and pause to take thought. Firmly grasping the Gandiva in his left hand, Arjuna fits some vicious astras to his bowstring, and looses them at Aswatthaman. They plunge through the armour of Drona's son and drink his blood. But Aswatthaman does not flinch. With his heart set firm on protecting Bhishma, he unleashes his own robust volley back at Arjuna. And since he has faced the two Krishnas undaunted, the Kaurava legions roar his praises.

Aswatthaman has been taught the great astras by his father Drona, and he fights without fear.

"He is the son of my Acharya. He is Drona's beloved son. He is a Brahmana, and worthy of my respect," thinks Arjuna. And so he is lenient towards Drona's son. He avoids him, and instead decimates your other forces with terrible swiftness.

Duryodhana strikes Bhima with ten keen golden shafts winged with feathers of vultures. With a roar, Bhima seizes up a powerful bow which can despatch any enemy, and ten terrific arrows. He aims those shafts, draws his bowstring to his ear, and pierces the Kaurava king's wide chest. The pendant of Duryodhana's necklace, surrounded by those arrows, shines like the sun in the sky encircled by the planets.

Hissing like a beaten snake, Duryodhana responds in fury, covering Bhima with a rash of golden barbs. Thus your two mighty sons battle and draw blood from each other, looking like two Devas.

Abhimanyu assails Chitrasena with a haze of arrows and Purumitra with seven. Piercing Satyavrata with seventy shafts, Arjuna's son is like Indra himself in battle, as he seems to dance on the battleground drawing geysers of blood and sowing death all around.

Chitrasena attacks him with ten missiles, Satyavrata with nine, and Purumitra with seven. Abhimanyu is covered in blood, but he smashes Chitrasena's formidable bow, and strikes him deep through his breast with a potent shaft.

The wrathful kings of your army, magnificent maharathas, together stab Abhimanyu with barbs beyond count. And Abhimanyu, knower of the deadliest astras, shrouds them in supernal arrows. Seeing the splendid young Kshatriya consume your army like a blazing fire burning dry grass in summer, your sons surround him. As Abhimanyu devours your forces, he glows like a god on the profound and dreadful field of death.

Seeing him like that, Rajan, your grandson Lakshmana rounds on him. In a flash, Maharatha Abhimanyu pierces Lakshmana and his charioteer with six fleet shafts. Lakshmana responds with a flare of his own barbs. And this duel between the young princes is glorious.

Abhimanyu kills his four horses and his sarathy, and charges at Lakshmana, who looses a snakelike astra at Abhimanyu's chariot. Abhimanyu easily foils that ayudha, and Kripa rides up quickly to bear Lakshmana away from the field in full sight of all the warriors.

The fighting spreads like a dread disease, with men killing and dying thickly on every side. The great archers of your army and the maharathas of the Pandava host slaughter each other without pause, recklessly. Kurukshetra is a yawning portal to Yamaloka through which fervid hosts of warriors flow into death, in dark tide. With wild, dishevelled hair, deprived of armour and chariots, and their bows riven, the Srinjayas fight the Kauravas with their bare arms.

Mahabaho Bhishma continues to vigorously massacre the soldiers of the Pandava army with his divine weapons. And the earth is covered with the fallen bodies of elephants, horses, chariot warriors and horsemen.'

Sanjaya says, 'Mahabaho Satyaki takes up a fresh powerful bow and covers the field of Kurukshetra in a swathe of death. He is like a looming cloud of murder, as he draws his arrows, fits them to his bowstring and unleashes his bankless storms all round him in a seamless blur.

Seeing him blaze like a fire of the pralaya, Duryodhana sends ten thousand chariots against him. Satyaki is unmoved; he kills those maharathas in a flash flood with his divine weapons. He flares on towards Bhurisravas. Noble Bhurisravas, stricken to watch the decimation of the Dhartarashtra army, charges Satyaki in blind rage. Drawing his vast bow like Indra's, he looses a towering masterly salvo of thousands of shafts at the Vrishni. The warriors who follow Satyaki cannot endure that fulminant fire and scatter in all directions, abandoning their invincible leader.

Satyaki's mighty sons, celebrated maharathas all, cased in shining mail, bearing diverse weapons and flying fine standards, advance towards the great Bhurisravas, with his pennant with the emblem of a yupastamba, a sacrificial stake. They cry at him, "Kinsman of the Kauravas, come and fight us, jointly or separately. Either defeat us in battle and win fame, or be crushed by us and die!"

Proud of his strength, Bhurisravas roars back, "Kshatriyas, you speak nobly! Fight me jointly and vigilantly. For I will kill all of you in battle."

Those heroic archers energetically cover that lone Parantapa in a deluge of arrows. That majestic battle between Bhurisravas and those united against him is fought in the afternoon. The ten Kshatriyas, Satyaki's sons, rain unending storms on Bhurisravas, hiding him in a shroud of ferocious shafts. But none finds a mark on his leonine body, for he cuts them down with unworldly dazzling archery. All the while the Vrishni heroes press in on Bhurisravas, surrounding him, drawing nearer each moment. With incredible genius and prowess, whirling round and round in his ratha, he breaks their bows in their hands and sloughs off their handsome heads in scarlet explosions. And they plunge to the ground like majestic trees felled by thunder.

Seeing his mighty sons killed, Satyaki roars deafeningly and rushes at Bhurisravas. They thrust their chariots against each others. They destroy each other's horses. They leap down to the ground from their useless chariots. Taking up mighty swords and great shields they charge into each other, glow radiantly, those purushavyaghras. But then, armed with a mighty sword, Bhima streaks up to Satyaki and spirits him away in his chariot. And your son Duryodhana takes Bhurisravas into the safety of his chariot.

In that great war, the Pandavas fight vigorously, spiritedly against maharatha Bhishma. Near sunset, Arjuna massacres twenty five thousand maharathas. These had been sent by Duryodhana against him, but he destroys them entirely before they can even approach him, burning them with astras like insects by a blazing fire.

The Matsyas and the Kekayas, all masters of astras, surround Arjuna and Abhimanyu to bolster them. Just then the sun disappears, and all the fighting men are exhausted.

His horses tired, Bhishma orders the withdrawal of the forces. And the armies of the Pandavas and the Kauravas, both anxious and shaken by the day's carnage, return to their camps. The two armies rest for the night in accordance with the laws laid down for war.'

Sanjaya says, 'Having rested the night, most sleeping only fitfully with nightmares of the dreadful day raging through their sleep, at dawn of the next morning, the Kauravas and the Pandavas emerge again for battle.

A deafening roar rises from fearless, still excited Kshatriya maharathas as they ready themselves to take the field. And great tuskers trumpet as they are readied for the day's conflict, and foot-soldiers shout, at least to embolden themselves, as they wear their armour, and restless horses whinny, their eyes wild. The boom of conches and the beat of drums resound again across Kurukshetra.

King Yudhishtira addresses Dhrishtadyumna saying, "Mahabaho, deploy the forces in the Makara vyuha that will scorch the enemy," and maharatha Dhrishtadyumna arrays his rathikas in that formation of the great crocodile.

Drupada and Arjuna form the war beast's head, Sahadeva and Nakula its two eyes, and mighty Bhima is its snout. Subhadra's son and the sons of Draupadi and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, and Satyaki, and Dharmaraja Yudhishtira are positioned at its neck. King Virata, with a large akshauhini, becomes its back, supported by Dhrishtadyumna and his vast force. The five Kekaya brothers comprise its left flank, and that tiger among men, Dhrishtaketu, and Chekitana of great prowess, are its right flank, to protect the vyuha.

The great reptile's two feet are formed by the maharathas Kuntibhoja and Satanika, solidly supported. And the illustrious Sikhandin, surrounded by the Somakas and Iravat, make up the tail of the Makara.

Having shaped this wondrous formation, the armoured Pandavas, Rajan, stand ready for battle at dawn. With elephants and horses, chariots and foot-soldiers, with raised standards and unfurled parasols, with weapons gleaming, they march against the Kauravas.

Seeing the Pandava vyuha, Bhishma forms a great Krauncha vyuha, formation of the crane. On its beak is Drona. Aswatthaman and Kripa form its two eyes. Kritavarman, most excellent archer, with the king of the Kambojas and with the Bahlikas is stationed on its head. In its neck are Surasena and your son Duryodhana, surrounded by many other kings.

The ruler of the Pragjyotishas, along with the Madras, the Sauviras, and the Kekayas, followed by a massive force, make up its chest. Susarman, king of Prasthala, with his legion forces, stands in full armour as the left wing. The Tusharas, the Yavanas and the Sakas, along with the Chulikas, form the right wing of that vyuha. And Srutayush and Satyatish and Somadatta's son stand in the rear protecting the others.

The Pandavas charge the Kauravas. The sun rises above the horizon as the battle begins. Elephants advance against elephants, horse-riders against horsemen, chariot warriors against others like them, and also against war elephants in the war to end all others.

Maharathas attack riders of elephants, who bear down on horsemen. Foot-soldiers engage with maharathas, horse riders with foot-soldiers. All the fighting men storm against each other in battle.

The Pandava army, protected by Bhima and Arjuna and the twins, seem beautiful as the night spangled over with stars. And your army also, with Bhishma and Kripa, and Drona and Salya, and Duryodhana, shines like the sky sparkling with luminous planets.

Powerful Bhima, seeing Drona, wildly attacks the Acharya's akshauhini of swift horses. The spirited Drona pierces Bhima with nine iron arrows, deeply wounding his arms and legs. Bhima, roused, kills Drona's sarathy.

The adroit son of Bharadwaja, himself guiding his horses, begins to consume the Pandava army like fire consuming a stack of cotton. Slaughtered by Drona and Bhishma, the Srinjayas along with the Kekayas flee. Your troops also, mangled by Bhima and Arjuna, are benumbed and they stand still, like a magnificent lioness in her pride. In this war that annihilates Kshatriyas, both armies suffer grievously.

We are overwhelmed by the sight of men fighting frenziedly, unconcerned for their very lives. In this war, the Pandavas and the Kauravas oppose each other with all their energies and weapons.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Our army is skilled, resourceful and has diverse forces. It is organised, deployed expertly and should be invincible. It is loyal to us. It is obedient, and free from the vices of drunkenness and licentiousness. Its abilities are proven. The soldiers are neither very old nor very young. They are neither thin nor fat. They are robust, muscular and healthy.

They are well armed and armoured. They are proficient in the use of all kinds of astras. They fight skilfully with swords, maces and even bare arms. They are well trained in the use of spears and arrows of many kinds.

The men are fit, adept in mounting and alighting from the backs of elephants, in marching forward, attacking and retreating, and in effectively striking the enemy. They have been often tested in their handling of elephants, horses and chariots. They are paid soldiers, hired not because of their lineage, or on the basis of their earlier associations with us; neither have we chosen them in order to favour them.

They are upright and honest; their kinsmen have been treated well by us in the past. We have esteemed them highly for their services. They are all eminent and capable men.

They are in turn led by many dynamic and famed warriors, rulers of the earth, celebrated all over the world. Countless illustrious Kshatriyas, who have freely allied with us, with their forces also protect them.

Our army is like the vast ocean filled with the water of a myriad rivers flowing from all directions. It has countless elephants, and its chariots, though wingless, fly even like birds. Warriors are the waters of that ocean, and the horses and other animals are its lashing, terrifying waves. Swords, maces, spears and arrows are the oars of our vast and numberless craft. Rich in emblems and jewels, adorned with cloth inlaid with gold and gems, the charging horses and elephants are the stormy winds that make that ocean surge.

Our host resembles the vast, shoreless, raging ocean. It is defended by Drona and Bhishma, and by Kritavarman and Kripa and Dussasana, and others headed by Jayadratha. It is also protected by Bhagadatta and Vikarna, by Drona's son, and Subala's son, and Bahlika, and by other mighty and high-souled Kshatriyas.

That our army is being destroyed is only due to Destiny, Sanjaya. Neither men nor highly blessed Rishis have ever before seen such preparations for war on earth. That such a vast and loyal force, deployed so scientifically, can be slaughtered in battle can only be the outcome of Destiny. All this appears strange and inexplicable.

Vidura had often given useful and wise advice. But my evil son Duryodhana would not accept it. I believe that Vidura foresaw all that is happening now; and hence he gave his counsel. Or it may be that all these, in every detail, has been predetermined by God, for that which is ordained by the Creator must happen and not otherwise.'

Sanjaya says, 'You are the victim of this calamity because of your own weakness. Bharatarishabha, you, and not Duryodhana, clearly saw that what was done to the Pandavas was wrong.

That the game of dice was ever played was your folly. And it is your fault that this war against the Pandavas has been fought. Having done wrong, you must now face the outcome. One reaps the fruit of one's own actions. You must now reap the fruit of your sins in this life and the next. Rajan, be calm and accept the unfolding tragedy; listen to my narration of the battle.

Having smashed your awesome vyuha with his shafts, Bhima advances upon Duryodhana's younger brothers. Mighty Bhima sees Dussasana and Durvisaha, Dussaha and Durmada and Jaya, Jayasena and Vikarna and Chitrasena and Sudarsana, and Charuchitra and Suvarman and Duskarna and Karna, and other maharathas of the Dhartarashtra host approach him; he attacks your vyuha protected by Bhishma.

Seeing him amidst them, these warriors cry, "Let us kill Bhima!" and Bhima is surrounded by his indomitable cousins. He resembles the burning sun encircled by the malevolent planets at the end of the yuga.

Though besieged in the very heart of the Kaurava vyuha, Bhima is fearless, like Indra surrounded by the Danavas in the ancient battle between the Devas and the Asuras. Thousands of maharathas engulf him with deadly arrows. Valiant Bhima ignores the sons of Dhritarashtra and slaughters many other mighty Kaurava warriors fighting from chariots and from the backs of elephants and horses.

Then, knowing that his cousins are determined to kill him, Bhima sets himself to exterminate them all. Leaping down from his chariot, mace in hand, he begins to destroy the enemy.

As he penetrates the Kaurava army, Dhrishtadyumna turns away from Drona whom he has been fighting and swiftly advances towards Subala's son Sakuni. Killing so many warriors of your army, he notices Bhima's empty chariot. He sees Bhima's sarathy Visoka, and is distraught.

Filled with sudden sorrow, and in a choking voice, he asks Visoka, "Where is Bhima who is as precious to me as life itself?"

Visoka replies humbly, "Bhima commanded me to wait here, while he strikes out alone into the heart of the Dhartarashtra host vast as the ocean. He cheerfully said to me, 'Wait here with my horses for some time, until I kill those who are determined to kill me.' Seeing him storm ahead, mace in hand, all our fighting men were elated. Bhima smashed through the enemy's mighty vyuha in his awesome way."

Hearing Visoka's words, Dhrishtadyumna says to him, "My life would be worthless if I deserted Bhima in battle. If I return without Bhima, what will the Kshatriyas say about me? What will they say when they know that while I was on the battlefield Bhima charged alone into the enemy vyuha?

The Devas led by Indra curse those who abandon their comrades in war and return unharmed themselves! Brave Bhima is my friend and kinsman. He is devoted to me, and I too love that Parantapa dearly. I will go where he has gone. Watch me raze the enemy like Vasava slaying the Danavas."

Dhrishtadyumna rides right through the enemy, along the path opened up by Bhima and marked by elephants crushed under his mace. He sees Bhima consuming the Kaurava host, felling Kshatriya warriors like a storm ravaging trees. Maharathas and horsemen, foot-soldiers and tuskers scream aloud as he slaughters them. Your men cry in anguish as he massacres them.

The Kaurava warriors surround Bhima and shower him relentlessly with their arrows. Dhrishtadyumna sees Bhima attacked from all sides; mangled with shafts, on foot, and vomiting the poison of his anger, mace in hand, he looks like Siva at the end of the yuga. Dhrishtadyumna moves towards him and takes him into his chariot; he plucks out the shafts from his body, and embraces him in the sight of the enemy.

Duryodhana, seeing this, says to his brothers, "Dhrishtadyumna has allied with Bhima. Let us attack and kill him. We must be on the offensive and not wait for the enemy to strike us."

Goaded by their eldest brother's command, the Dhartarashtras, with raised weapons, hurtle towards Dhrishtadyumna, looking like fierce comets at the hour of universal dissolution. Like clouds shrouding a mountain with torrential rain, these Kshatriyas loose a volley of arrows on him, wielding their beautiful bows, making the earth shiver with the twang of their bowstrings and the rattle of their chariot-wheels.

But Dhrishtadyumna, proficient in all kinds of warfare, does not falter for a moment. Seeing your sons ready to kill him, he uses the Pramohana astra against them, again looking for all the world like Indra facing the Danavas. The Pramohana of sleep instantly makes the Kaurava princes weak and they swoon. Seeing your sons faint, your forces flee in all directions, with their horses, elephants and chariots.

Drona advances towards Drupada and pierces him with three searing shafts. Drupada, remembering his earlier enmity with Drona, leaves the battlefield. Drona blows his conch triumphantly, and the Somakas are terrified on hearing that blast.

Wielder of weapons, Drona, full of tejas, now hears of your sons being overwhelmed by the Pramohana astra, and rides in a flash to where they struggle vainly to remain conscious. Drona sees Dhrishtadyumna and Bhima careering across the battleground. And the maharatha watches your sons rendered unconscious. He uses the Prajna astra to make powerless the Pramohana loosed by Dhrishtadyumna. Your sons recover and again storm ahead to fight Bhima and Dhrishtadyumna.

Yudhishtira says to his warriors, “Send twelve brave maharathas, led by Abhimanyu, to Bhima and Prishata’s son. Let them find out about those two warriors. I am anxious.”

Those Kshatriyas sally forth at mid-day. The Kekayas and the sons of Draupadi, and Dhrishtaketu, supported by a large force and with Abhimanyu at their head, form the Suchimukha vyuha and drive deep into the Dhartarashtra chariot akshauhini.

Your forces, already terrified by Bhima and Dhrishtadyumna, cannot withstand the charge of those maharathas led by Abhimanyu. They are weak like an unprotected woman.

With standards flecked with gold, the Pandava warriors cleave swiftly through the Kaurava ranks to rescue Dhrishtadyumna and Bhima. Seeing them approach, Bhima is elated and, with a glad roar, continues to demolish your soldiers.

The heroic Dhrishtadyumna sees the Acharya advance towards him, to protect your sons. He has the chariot of the king of the Kekayas take Bhima away, while he himself engages the superlative Drona.

With a broad-headed shaft Parantapa Drona cuts down Dhrishtadyumna’s bow even as the Panchala prince rides recklessly towards him. Remembering his loyalty to Duryodhana, he also shoots hundreds of arrows after Prishata's son.

Dhrishtadyumna seizes another bow and pierces Drona with seventy whetted shafts, all golden winged. Drona again severs his bow and slaughters his four horses with four incredibly excellent barbs, and also kills his charioteer with a heavy shaft. Mahabaho Dhrishtadyumna leaps off his chariot and climbs onto Abhimanyu's colossal ratha. Right before Bhima and Dhrishtadyumna, Drona makes the Pandava army with all its chariots, elephants and horses tremble in fear.

Seeing that army devastated by Drona, all its maharathas cannot stop its flight. Slaughtered by Drona, that army heaves like a stormy sea. Seeing the Pandava army reduced, your forces are jubilant. Seeing the fiery Acharya consume the enemy, all your warriors roar loudly in praise of Drona.'

Sanjaya says, 'On recovering, Duryodhana again looses a tide of arrows at Bhima. And again those maharathas, your sons, unite and bravely oppose the great Pandava. Mahabaho Bhima mounts his chariot and rides straight at your sons. He takes up a golden bow, with the power to overcome any enemy, and he covers your sons with his wrath.

Duryodhana strikes him deep with a spear. Roaring, Bhima draws his bow in a circle and pierces Duryodhana through his arms and his chest with three fierce barbs. But the king stands firm like a prince of mountains.

Seeing those great Kshatriyas fight, Duryodhana's younger brothers renew their resolve to kill Bhima and attack him again, prepared to die if they must. The mighty Bhima charges them like an elephant charging another. With untold power, Bhima strikes your son Chitrasena with a long arrow, and your other sons with many kinds of swift and golden-winged shafts.

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira meanwhile sends his twelve maharathas led by Abhimanyu to follow Bhima. These ride towards your sons. Looking at those Kshatriyas on their chariots, resembling the Sun himself or a radiant fire, beautiful and resplendent in their golden ornaments, your mighty sons turn away from Bhima. The Pandavas, however, are determined not to let them leave the battle alive.'

Sanjaya says, 'Abhimanyu, along with Bhima, hunts and dismays all your sons. The maharathas of your army, including Duryodhana, see Abhimanyu and Bhima united with Dhrishtadyumna in the very middle of the Kaurava forces; they seize their bows and ride swiftly at those three warriors.

Ah, such a dreadful battle there is that afternoon, Rajan, between the two armies. Abhimanyu kills Vikarna's horses and pierces him with twenty-five fine arrows. Maharatha Vikarna abandons that chariot and mounts Chitrasena's shining one.

Abhimanyu envelops those two brothers of Kuru's race, standing together on one chariot, with a barrage of shafts. Durjaya and Vikarna stab Abhimanyu with five iron barbs. Abhimanyu stands firm like the mountain Meru.

Dussasana fights valiantly with the five Kekaya brothers. All these feats are more awesome than can be told. The Pandavas furiously round on Duryodhana and each of them pierces your son with three arrows. Your indomitable prince, too, shoots each of them with whetted shafts. Thus pierced and drenched in blood, he glows like a mountain with rivers of muddy water running down its sides.

And the mighty Bhishma persists against the Pandava army like some herdsman belabouring his recalcitrant herd. The twang of the Gandiva is heard repeatedly as Arjuna slaughters his opponents on the right of the army. In that corner of the battlefield thousands of headless bodies of both sides can be seen still standing macabre among the living forces. And Kurukshetra resembles an ocean with blood for its water, with arrows as its currents. The elephants are its islands and horses its waves. Chariots form the boats that bold men use to cross that ocean. Thousands of brave warriors, with arms amputated, without armour, and hideously mutilated, lie on the ground.

With the bloody bodies of massacred elephants, the battleground looks as if scattered with hills. What a sight! Not a single warrior in both armies is less than eager to fight. And so they battle on: those daring warriors of both your army and that of the Pandavas, seeking victory and glory.'

Sanjaya says, 'At sunset, Duryodhana charges Bhima, always to kill him. Seeing him come with loathing in his heart, Bhima says, "The awaited hour has come. If you do not yield, I will kill you today.

By killing you I will dispel Kunti and Draupadi's sorrows, and all our anguish during our exile in the forests. You arrogantly humiliated the sons of Pandu. O son of Gandhari, you will reap the fruit of all your sins today.

You always listened to the vicious counsel of Karna and Subala's son, and, dismissive of the Pandavas, you had treated us unjustly. You ignored Krishna who had pleaded with you for peace. Jubilantly you had sent haughty, mocking messages to us through Uluka. Today I will kill you and all your kinsmen, and avenge all the insults and suffering you inflicted on us."

Bhima stretches his bow, takes up many terrible shafts that shimmer like lightning, and looses thirty-six of them at Duryodhana. Flaming they fly at his cousin like thunderbolts. With two shafts, Bhima smashes Duryodhana's bow in his hands, and strikes his charioteer with two more. With four shafts he kills Duryodhana's four horses; with another two he cuts down the king's royal parasol. With three others he fells the Kaurava's magnificent, jewel worked standard, which falls to the earth like a flash of lightning from the clouds. All the gathered rulers see that radiant Kaurava standard, bearing the emblem of a great tusker, adorned with precious stones, plunge to the ground, and Bhima roars triumphantly.

Smiling, maharatha Bhima stabs Duryodhana with ten shafts like a mahout piercing a colossal elephant with his hook. The mighty king of the Sindhus, with many brave warriors, swiftly sets himself at Duryodhana's flank, while maharatha Kripa quickly takes the seething Duryodhana onto his own chariot. The king, deeply wounded by Bhima and suffering, collapses on its platform.

Jayadratha surrounds Bhima with thousands of chariots to have his life. Dhrishtaketu and Abhimanyu, and the Kekayas, and the sons of Draupadi, all clash with your sons. And the high-souled Abhimanyu strikes each of them with five straight shafts that appear like dark lightning or guises of Yama.

They, in turn, unleash a storm of arrows at Abhimanyu, like black clouds pounding Meru with rain. But brilliant Abhimanyu makes your sons tremble like Indra did the mighty Asuras during the ancient Devasura yuddha. In a moment, he shoots fourteen broad-headed shafts like snakes at Vikarna; as if dancing in battle, Abhimanyu destroys Vikarna's standard and kills his charioteer and horses.

Subhadra's resplendent son covers every direction around him with astounding gales of arrows, shafts that can pierce the best armour. Plumed with feathers of the kanka bird, these barbs pass right through Vikarna's body and enter the ground like hissing snakes. And decked with gold, drenched in Vikarna's blood, they seem to vomit blood on the earth.

Seeing Vikarna wounded, his brothers charge the maharathas led by Abhimanyu and engage the heroes of the Pandava army, who shine like so many suns.

Durmukha pierces Srutakarman with five shafts, breaks his standard with a single shaft and strikes his sarathy with seven. Advancing, he butchers his enemy's horses, as swift as the wind and wearing bright armour, with six arrows, and kills his charioteer too.

Srutakarman stands firm on his horseless chariot and casts a meteor-like astra at Durmukha; that weapon cuts through Durmukha's kavacha and plunges into the ground behind him, glowing all the while. Sutasoma helps Srutakarman into his chariot, in plain sight of all the forces.

The heroic Srutakirti storms at Jayatsena. Your son severs Srutakirti's bow with a horse-shoe headed arrow. Seeing his brother's bow broken, brave Satanika rides up swiftly roaring like a lion. In a blink, Satanika pierces Jayatsena with ten shafts, and then bellows his victory like a wild elephant trumpeting.

Satanika stabs Jayatsena deeply in the chest; Dushkarna who is near his brother Jayatsena, breaks Satanika's bow. The mighty Satanika seizes another powerful bow and, roaring dreadfully, looses a tide of arrows at Dushkarna before Jayatsena arrests him with some serpentine nagapasas.

Recovering in a moment, Satanika destroys Dushkarna's bow with one fell barb, kills his charioteer with two more, and pierces Dushkarna himself with seven unerring astras. That flawless warrior slaughters all Dushkarna's swift glossy horses with twelve sharp shafts. Satanika strikes Dushkarna deeply through his chest and Dushkarna plunges to the ground like a tree felled by lightning.

To avenge Dushkarna's death, five maharathas surround Satanika determined to kill him. They attack him with dense volleys. The five Kekaya brothers press forward to protect Satanika. Seeing them advance, your sons fly at them like elephants thundering at other colossal tuskers.

Your sons Durmukha and Durjaya, and the youthful Durmarshana and Satranjaya and Satrusha, all celebrated warriors, plunge red-eyed at the five Kekaya brothers. They ride on splendid chariots that look like fortified cities, yoked to bejewelled horses and bearing beautifully coloured standards; those Kshatriyas carry formidable bows, and wearing beautiful coats of mail they penetrate the enemy force like lions entering one forest from another.

A pitched earthshaking battle erupts, in which chariots and elephants are shattered and mangled. With untold hatred, they fight until sunset; countless warriors on both sides are killed. Thousands of great chariot-warriors and horsemen are strewn over the battlefield, like rag dolls now, drenched in crimson.

In rage, Bhishma continues his massacre of the Pandava forces with banks and banks of straight shafts, streaming ceaselessly from his matchless bow. His arrows annihilate the Panchala fighting men. Having savagely reduced the ranks of the Pandavas, the Pitamaha withdraws his forces and retires to his camp.

And seeing Dhrishtadyumna and Bhima both safe, Yudhishtira is relieved and he also leaves the field and enters his tent.'

Sanjaya says, 'Those Kshatriyas return to their tents, blood-spattered and with the hatred and enmity in their hearts undimmed. They praise each other for their glorious feats of the day and spend the night, some in deep sleep, others tossing and turning in their beds from the dark and violent dreams which plunge through their sleep. The next morning finds them again in full armour and ready for battle, which is now their very life to them; no other thought occupies their minds.

Duryodhana is anxious, and with blood still oozing from his wounds, asks his Pitamaha, "Our fierce forces carry countless standards. They are perfectly drilled and deployed. Yet the Pandava maharathas penetrate our vyuha, slaughter our men, and escape unharmed.

They humble us and win fame in battle. Smashing through our Makara vyuha, powerful as the Vajra, Bhima wounded me with terrible shafts each like a Yama danda. I was baffled by him. Even now I cannot regain my composure. Pitamaha only you can help me kill the sons of Pandu and achieve victory."

Foremost of all wielders of weapons, and imbued with great tejas, Bhishma understands Duryodhana's anguish; though inwardly despondent, he cheerfully says, "My child, I truly exert myself wholeheartedly, to crush the Pandava forces and bring you victory and joy, O king. For your sake I do not hesitate.

The Pandava's allies in this war are many and magnificent. Celebrated maharathas, they are more than merely brave and great masters of astras. Tireless, they spew forth their righteous anger. They hate you, Suyodhana, and swelling with prowess, they will not be easily defeated. I will fight them with my whole soul, risking my life. For your sake, for your glory, I will stake my life.

For you, my child, I would consume all the worlds with the Devas and the Daityas, not just your enemies on this battleground. And I will fight the Pandavas, and do whatever pleases you."

Hearing these words, Duryodhana is reassured and filled with hope and joy. He cheerfully orders his forces, along with the allied kings, to advance. And his army of chariots, horses, foot-soldiers and elephants moves regally forward.

And sensing their king's fresh confidence, that vast force, armed with every kind of weapon, is also full of joy. It looks wonderful with its elephants, horses and foot-soldiers. And its colossal tuskers, brightly caparisoned, formed in massive akshauhinis, and skilfully goaded, look the most resplendent. Many royal Kshatriyas, all accomplished in the use of diverse weapons, are seen amidst your forces. And the dust, red as the morning sun, raised by the chariots and foot-soldiers and elephants and horses as they move across the field, is deeply beautiful, even as it swirls up to obscure the face of the sun.

And the vari-coloured banners on the chariots and elephants wave in the air and look like many-hued lightning in clouds in the sky. The din raised by the twang of stretched bows is like the roar of the ocean when the Devas and the Asuras churned it together during the Krita Yuga, to fetch up the Amrita.

The stately and accomplished army of your sons, consisting of a great variety of fighting men, roar and shout fiercely, looking like the clouds of the Pralaya that appear at the end of the yuga.'

Sanjaya says, 'O Bharatarishabha, Bhishma once again addresses your thoughtful son with these pleasing words:

"Drona and I, and Salya and Kritavarman of Satwata's race, and Aswatthaman and Vikarna, and Bhagadatta and Subala's son and Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and Bahlika with the Bahlikas, and the mighty king of the Trigartas and the invincible ruler of the Magadhas, Brihadbala the king of the Kosalas, and Chitrasena and Vivimsati and thousands of maharathas with lofty standards, excellent horses mounted by superior riders, many incensed tuskers with the juice of rut trickling from their mouths and temples, and numberless brave foot-soldiers from many lands, are all prepared to fight for you.

These, and many others, are ready to lay down their lives for you, capable as they are of defeating the very gods in battle. I will however advise you again in your best interests.

The Pandavas are unconquerable even by the gods. With Krishna for an ally they are equal to Mahendra himself in prowess. As for myself, I am at your command. Either I shall crush the Pandavas or they will overcome me."

Saying this, Bhishma applies a poultice of medicinal herbs to Duryodhana's wounds and these heal instantly, magically.

At dawn, with a clear sky overhead, the valiant Bhishma, consummate master of vyuhas of all kinds, himself organises his fighting men in the Mandala vyuha, the formation of the Galaxy, bristling with weapons. And it still abounds in outstanding warriors, elephants and foot-soldiers.

It is protected on all sides by thousands of chariots, and with legions of horsemen armed with swords and spears. Near every elephant are seven chariots, and besides every chariot are seven horsemen. Behind every horseman are seven archers, and behind every archer are seven soldiers with shields. Thus, your army, assembled by mighty maharathas and protected by Bhishma, stands ready to fight.

Ten thousand horses, and as many elephants, and ten thousand chariots, and your sons, all covered in mail, the heroic Chitrasena and many others, all guard the Pitamaha. Thus Bhishma is protected by those intrepid princes, and they in turn are safeguarded by him. And Duryodhana in his coat of mail sits on his chariot, graceful and resplendent like Sakra himself.

Your sons let out thunderous shouts, and the clatter of chariots and the sound of musical instruments is deafening. The mighty and impenetrable Mandala vyuha of the Dhartarashtras created by Bhishma begins to move westwards. It is invincible and so beautiful to behold.

Seeing the Mandala vyuha, Yudhishtira himself arrays his forces in the Vajra vyuha. When all the akshauhinis of chariot-warriors and horsemen are suitably stationed, he roars like a most noble lion. The warriors of both armies advance; a thirst for battle, they want to destroy the other's vyuha, leaving not a single enemy alive.

Bharadwaja's son Drona rides against the king of the Matsyas, and his son, Aswatthaman, against Sikhandin. And king Duryodhana himself strikes out at the son of Prishata. Nakula and Sahadeva attack the king of the Madras.

And Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti charge against Iravat. Many kings unite to oppose Arjuna. Bhima challenges the son of Hridika, while Abhimanyu faces your sons Chitrasena and Vikarna and Durmarshana.

Hidimbi's son, Ghatotkacha, that prince of the Rakshasas, charges the mighty Bhagadatta, king of the Pragjyotishas, like one incensed elephant against another. The Rakshasa Alambusha, Rajan, with rising anger, battles the indomitable Satyaki surrounded by his Vrishni warriors. And Bhurisravas fights with vim against Dhrishtaketu.

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira advances against king Srutayush. Chekitana challenges Kripa. Other Kaurava fighting men confront maharatha Bhima. And thousands of other kings armed with spears, arrows, maces, and spiked clubs surround Arjuna.

Arjuna says to Krishna, "Behold, O Madhava, the Dhartarashtra troops, assembled by Bhishma conversant with every kind of vyuha. Look at these myriad daring warriors who seek to fight me. Kesava, look, there stands the lord of the Trigartas with his brothers. Today I shall kill them all, Janardana, before your eyes."

Saying this, Arjuna rubs his bowstring to warm it, pulls it to affright his foes and overwhelms that host of kings with his arrows. And those celebrated archers also cover him in gales of shafts, like monsoon clouds filling a lake with their torrents. Strident roars are heard in your army as the two Krishnas are mantled in a deluge of arrows. Seeing this from on high, the Devas, the celestial Rishis, and the Gandharvas with the Uragas are awestruck.

Arjuna, enraged, invokes the Aindra astra. We can only marvel at his impossible prowess, as he repels his enemies' scathing volleys, effortlessly. Thousands of kings, horses and elephants are direly wounded by Arjuna's unearthly archery; others are each pierced with two and three of his barbs and quickly flow blood.

The wounded warriors seek Bhishma's protection. The Pitamaha comes to their rescue as they flounder in the bottomless ocean that is Arjuna's mystic archery. Rajan, as they scatter in fear and confusion and tangle with other warriors, your broken ranks appear like a sea heaving in a storm.'

Sanjaya says, 'When the battle rages on, after Susarman stops fighting, and the other valiant Kshatriyas of the Kaurava army are routed by the high-souled son of Pandu, indeed, after your army has been tossed like a slight fleet of boats upon a great and turbulent ocean, and Bhishma has charged swiftly against the chariot of Vijaya, Duryodhana, seeing Arjuna straddle Kurukshetra like Yama come hunting, rides up and speaks comfortingly to those belaboured, lacerated kings, and to the mighty Susarman in the vanguard.

Duryodhana says, "This Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, uncaring for his very life, will fight wholeheartedly against Arjuna. United, exert yourselves, and protect Bhishma as he forges at the enemy."

All the akshauhinis rally and follow the magnificent Pitamaha. Mighty Bhishma charges to confront Arjuna, who also thunders towards him on his splendid chariot yoked to white horses, flying his standard bearing the fierce Vanara, who gives vent to the most bloodcurdling cries and roars.

Your entire army, seeing the diadem-decked Dhananjaya advancing into battle, cries out in terror. And your forces cannot gaze upon Krishna, as he stands, reins in hand, a fiery, magnificent sun.

The Pandavas also cannot look at Bhishma, who, with his white horses and gleaming bow, resembles Sukra rising in the sky. The son of Shantanu is ringed by the noble Trigarta warriors led by their king with his brothers and sons, and by many maharathas.

Drona strikes the king of the Matsyas with his winged shafts. He cuts down Virata's standard with a single arrow, and his bow with another. Virata, Senapati of a vast akshauhini, discards the cloven bow and swiftly takes up another that is strong and resilient. He seizes many blazing arrows resembling poisonous snakes, stabs Drona with three of these and his four horses with four. He fells Drona's standard with another barb, and his sarathy with five. Cracking Drona's bow in his hands with yet another shaft, he enrages that bull among Brahmanas.

Drona kills Virata's horses with eight long shafts, and then his charioteer with one. Virata has to leap down from his chariot whose horses have been slaughtered. Virata, that most excellent maharatha, mounts his son Sankha's chariot. Riding together, father and son powerfully resist Drona with a refulgent wrath of arrows.

In fury, Drona strikes Sankha with a missile like a serpent spitting venom. This shaft pierces Sankha's chest and he falls to the ground bathed in his own spraying gore. He plunges down from his chariot, before his father's eyes, his bow and arrows falling out of his grasp. Seeing his son killed, Virata flees howling in shock and terror, flees from the awful Drona who looks like Death with mouth agape.

Drona rapidly thwarts the vast Pandava host. Sikhandin strikes Drona's son in his forehead with three sharp darts. Aswatthaman glows like Meru with its three golden peaks. Incensed, in less than a blink of the eye, Aswatthaman overwhelms Sikhandin's charioteer and cuts down his standard, horses and weapons, covering them all in a swathe of arrows. Sikhandin, scorcher of enemies, leaps off his horseless chariot. Taking up a gleaming sword and shield, he moves as he wishes, wrathfully and sharply like a hawk. Aswatthaman cannot kill Sikhandin and all are filled with wonder.

Aswatthaman looses thousands of arrows at his enemy but mighty Sikhandin wards them off with his whirling sword and shield, as if in another dimension of time. Drona's son shoots Sikhandin's radiant shield decked with a hundred moons into shards, and cuts his sword in two. He now stabs Sikhandin himself with a volley of winged arrows.

Sikhandin whirls the remaining length of his snake like blade, and hurls it at Aswatthaman like lightning. Drona's son shoots that blade into slivers even as it flies at him, brilliant like the fire that blazes at the end of the yuga. And he strikes Sikhandin himself with countless solid iron arrows. Deeply wounded and in agony, Sikhandin climbs onto Satyaki's chariot.

Satyaki pierces the feral Rakshasa Alambusha all over, on every side, deeply with his lusty arrows. That prince of Rakshasas shatters Satyaki's bow with a crescent-tipped shaft, then draws blood from Satyaki himself with countless other barbs. Using his Rakshasa's maya to create a formidable illusion, he shrouds Satyaki with torrents of fire and water, and storms of very real sharp missiles.

The grandson of Sini displays breathtaking prowess as he remains undaunted by that ferocious fusillade. The son of Vrishni's race intones a profound mantra and launches the Aindra astra, which he had from his guru Arjuna. The astra burns down that demonic illusion and envelops Alambusha in a torrid arrow storm. Wounded sorely by that exceptional Kshatriya, Alambusha flees to avoid facing Satyaki.

Defeating that prince of Rakshasas, unbeatable by Maghavat himself, the grandson of Sini flings back his handsome head and roars and roars before your stunned forces. The indomitable Satyaki now begins to decimate and scatter your fighting men at will.

Meanwhile, O Rajan, Dhrishtadyumna covers your son in a shroud of fire. Your royal Suyodhana stands rocklike and undaunted. He strikes Dhrishtadyumna with sixty shafts, and in a wink with thirty more. And all these feats seem amazing. The Pandava Senapati responds by smashing your son's bow in fury. That maharatha slaughters your son's four horses, and pierces him with seven finely-honed arrows.

Your son, so strong and vigorous, leaps from his horseless chariot, and runs straight at the son of Drupada wielding a raised sword. The mighty and loyal Sakuni quickly takes Duryodhana into his own chariot. Having routed their king, Drupada's fire prince begins to raze your forces like Indra killing the Asuras.

Kritavarman swathes maharatha Bhima with his shafts, overwhelming him like a mass of clouds hiding the sun. That nemesis of enemies, Bhima, only continues to furiously shoot arrows at Kritavarman, laughing in glee. That atiratha of the Satwatavamsa, outshining everyone, boldly strikes Bhima with a ceaseless stream of lean missiles. The colossal Bhima kills Kritavarman's four horses and strikes down his sarathy and his beautiful standard; and masterful Bhima stabs Kritavarman with many kinds of arrows.

Pierced all over, his limbs mangled, Kritavarman runs to Vrishaka's chariot, in the sight of both Salya and your son. Fury unabated, Bhima begins to butcher your men all around. He beats them to pulp, like Siva with his mace.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'I hear you speak of the countless awesome single contests between the Pandavas and my warriors. You do not mention, however, Sanjaya, the heroism or high spirits of anyone of my side. You talk of the cheerful and invincible sons of Pandu, and of mine as being listless, dejected and vulnerable in battle. Unquestionably, all this is Destiny.'

Sanjaya says, 'Bharatarishabha, your fighting men display strength and courage to their utmost. But just as the sweet waters of the celestial Ganga turn salty when they meet the sea, so is the valour of your sons rendered futile when they meet the heroic sons of Pandu in battle.

They exert themselves forcefully, and accomplish the most difficult feats: you should not censure your forces. It is your sins, and those of your sons, that have resulted in this horrific destruction of the world, all this shameful and bloody waste and ruin.

It does not befit you, Rajan, to mourn what you have caused. The duty of kings in this world is not merely to protect their lives. Wishing to win the realms of the righteous, they fight daily, thrusting into enemy akshauhinis, with the heavens alone as their aim.

In the bright morning, widespread carnage ensues, yes, even like in the Devasura yuddha, the first of all wars. Hear of it with undivided attention.

The two lustrous princes of Avanti, those mighty archers, rush at Iravat. The battle that breaks out between them is brutal, making one's hair stand on end. The incensed Iravat strikes the divine brothers with a luminous and deadly volley, which they cut down in a shower of sparks. Hotly the three battle their only thought to have the enemy's life; so feverishly do they fight that they cannot be distinguished one from the others in the rage of arrows with which they darken earth and sky.

Iravat kills Anuvinda's four horses with four terrific shafts, and demolishes Anuvinda's bow and standard with another two, all of which pierce the general cloud of arrows all round. And this feat is truly wonderful.

Abandoning his chariot, Anuvinda leaps onto Vinda's. From that single ratha, the inspired brothers of Avanti unleash an elemental fury of missiles at the high-souled Iravat. Those golden arrows course through the air and cover the sky. Cut to the quick, Iravat creates a thunderhead of shafts in the sky and they lash down in a cataract on the two splendid maharathas and fell their sarathy.

When their charioteer falls dead to the ground, the unrestrained horses run amok, dragging the chariot wildly behind them. In some satisfaction, Iravat begins to consume your foot-soldiers all around him. And the mighty Dhartarashtra host, thus slaughtered, reels like a man drunk on poison.

Mounted on his black ratha, its flag flying high, that prince of Rakshasas, Hidimbi's looming son Ghatotkacha charges Bhagadatta. The king of the Pragjyotishas rides his prince of elephants, Supritika, even like Indra did Airavata in the battle of antiquity provoked by Taraka's molestation.

The Devas, the Gandharvas, and the Rishis all assembled in the subtle akasa cannot distinguish between Ghatotkacha and Bhagadatta. As the infuriated king of the Devas once infused the Danavas with fear, so does Bhagadatta terrify the Pandava warriors. And stricken on all sides, they look around vainly for a protector among their ranks.

The son of Bhima stands valiant with darkly glimmering defiance on his chariot, while other maharathas melt away disheartened. When the Pandava forces rally, there rises a deafening roar among your fighting men. Ghatotkacha, O Rajan, pours down a thunder shower of arrows on Bhagadatta, as the clouds of the monsoon do on Meru's great summit. Bhagadatta foils every falling shaft from the Rakshasa's bow, and strikes Ghatotkacha deeply in all his marmas, the vital parts of his hulking body, lancing agony through him. That prince of the Rakshasas does not waver for a moment but stands still like a mountain pierced.

Rage mounting, the Pragjyotisha king hurls fourteen spears, all of which the magnificent Rakshasa cuts in slivers. Mahabaho Ghatotkacha stabs Bhagadatta with seventy keening shafts, each one like Indra's Vajra.

But laughing all the while, Bhagadatta slaughters the Rakshasa's four horses. Ghatotkacha remains steadfast on his ratha and launches a deadly javelin at Bhagadatta's elephant. The mountain king smashes that swift golden lance hurtling wildly towards him into three harmless stalks.

Ghatotkacha flees terrified, like Namuchi, that foremost of the Daityas, did from Indra in the primordial battle.

Having defeated that daring Kshatriya, unassailable even by Yama himself or Varuna, king Bhagadatta with his elephant begins to crush the Pandava forces like a wild tusker trampling the lotuses in a lake.

Salya of the Madras fights his sister's sons, the twins. And he overwhelms them with salvos of arrows. Sahadeva shrouds his dead mother's splendid brother with arrows like clouds veiling the sun. Covered by these shafts, the king of the Madras is delighted, and the twins also are satisfied for their mother Madri's sake.

Maharatha Salya kills Nakula's four horses. Nakula leaps down from his own chariot and mounts his brother's. Standing on one ratha, the two brilliant Kshatriyas draw their bows in circles and pound Salya's chariot with a battery of arrows. That purushavyaghra remains unmoved as a mountain. Laughing, happy to see his nephews' prowess, he also inundates them with arrows.

Sahadeva charges at Salya, adroitly stabbing him with a powerful astra. Like Garuda's beak, the arrow pierces the Madra king and he falls in a faint in his chariot. Seeing him felled by the superb twins, and unconsciousness and prostrate, his sarathy steers him away to safety. Watching Salya's chariot leave the field, the Dhartarashtras are shocked, crestfallen, thinking he is dead.

Having bested their uncle, the twins blast their conches and roar triumphantly. They fly exultantly, Rajan, towards your forces like Indra and Upendra at the Daitya host.'

Sanjaya says, 'At noon, seeing Srutayush, Yudhishtira goads his horses at that Kshatriya. He attacks Srutayush, that chastiser of foes, striking him with nine keen shafts. Foiling those arrows, the illustrious Srutayush pierces Yudhishtira with seven barbs loosed in a single moment, which pierce his armour, spilling his blood and sapping the Dharmaraja's tejas.

Though painfully wounded, the son of Pandu shoots a missile formed like a boar's ear into Srutayush's breast and fells his standard from his chariot with another shaft. Seeing his proud standard destroyed, Srutayush strikes Yudhishtira with seven emerald arrows. The Dharmaraja is inflamed, and flares up like the fire that blazes at the end of the yuga consuming all creatures.

Seeing the son of Pandu's towering wrath, the Devas, the Gandharvas and the Rakshasas tremble on high, and the very universe is disturbed. And they fear that Yudhishtira will incinerate the three worlds that very day. And the Rishis and the Devas pray for peace. Still enraged and frequently licking the corners of his mouth, Yudhishtira looks like the sun that rises at the end of the yuga. Rajan, all your warriors fear for their lives.

With perfect composure, mighty Yudhishtira cleaves Srutayush's bow at its very grasp, and before the eyes of all the fighting men, he strikes Srutayush with a long arrow squarely though that king's chest. Summarily, the Pandava king despatches Srutayush's horses and his charioteer.

Srutayush abandons his horseless chariot and flees, and a wave of shame courses through Duryodhana's army. And now Yudhishtira begins to decimate your men at will, like Yama himself with mouth agape come hunting to Kurukshetra.

All see Chekitana of the Vrishnis cover maharatha Kripa Gautama with an extravagance of arrows. Cutting these down in flight, Kripa son of Saradwat shatters Chekitana's bow and fells his sarathy. Kripa kills Chekitana's horses, and the two warriors that protected his flanks.

Chekitana leaps down from his chariot with a mace in his hands. Dashing forward, he kills Kripa's horses and his charioteer with five sickening, bloody blows. Kripa, too, jumps down from his useless ratha and from the ground looses sixteen flashing arrows at Chekitana in the blink of an eye. Those barbs pierce cleanly through that noble Kshatriya and plough into the earth. Blossomed in blood flowers, in pain and enraged, Chekitana flings his mace at Kripa, like Purandara when he wanted to kill Vritra.

Gautama pulverises that gleaming gada coursing at him with a thousand arrows shot in an instant. Chekitana draws his sword and charges Gautama, who discards his bow, and drawing his own polished blade, also rushes towards his opponent. Both mighty warriors flay each other with their glinting weapons, sparks flying. Both bulls among men are wounded and fall onto the Earth, mother of all creatures. Exhausted, they faint.

Karakarsha, moved by friendship, rides up, and that invincible Kshatriya quickly lifts Chekitana into his chariot. And your brother-in-law, the intrepid Sakuni, swiftly helps maharatha Kripa onto his ratha.

Dhrishtaketu strikes the son of Somadatta in his chest with a blur of ninety shafts. And adorned with those arrows, Somadatta's son looks like Surya Deva with his burning rays.

Bhurisravas destroys maharatha Dhrishtaketu's chariot and kills his sarathy and his horses. Seeing him defenceless, Bhurisravas cloaks Dhrishtaketu with a veil of fine arrows. Dhrishtaketu abandons his chariot and mounts Satanika's. Encased in golden armour, maharathas Chitrasena, Vikarna and Durmarshana unite to attack the son of Subhadra. A fierce battle ensues between them and Abhimanyu, like the struggle of the body with vata, pitha and kapham, wind, bile, and phlegm.

Abhimanyu, tiger among men, smashes your sons' chariots, but does not kill them, remembering Bhima's vow to kill all the sons of Dhritarashtra himself. Arjuna sees Bhishma, invincible even against the Devas, advancing to save your sons from the terrible young Abhimanyu, already a maharatha among maharathas.

He addresses Krishna, "Urge your horses, Hrishikesa, to where those indomitable maharathas gather. Guide our horses so that the enemy does not annihilate our forces."

Krishna steers the chariot yoked to white horses into battle. Seeing Arjuna advance on your army, a loud clamour is heard among your fighting men. As he nears the kings protecting Bhishma, Arjuna addresses Susarman, "I acknowledge you both as excellent warriors and as our dire enemy. Today you will taste the harsh fruit of your sins. Today I will send you to the resting place of your ancestors."

That commander of chariot akshauhinis, Susarman, makes no reply to Arjuna's threat. Riding at Bibhatsu, with a large host of his allies, he surrounds him, and, supported by your sons, envelops him in a billowing gale of arrows, which hide the face of the sun.

Another dreadful battle breaks out between your army and that of the Pandavas, in which blood runs like water.'

Sanjaya says, 'Mighty Arjuna, pierced by Susarman and his host, inhales deeply and dissects the bows of those maharathas with his own arrow storm; he draws copious blood from all their bodies. Many of them fall bleeding on the ground. The limbs of some lie dissevered, and the heads of others roll, cut cleanly from their neck. Some die with bodies twisted and their coats of mail mangled. Struck by Arjuna's tremendous arrows, they plunge to gory death.

Seeing this carnage, Susarman, king of the Trigartas, yet advances on his chariot. And thirty-two other maharathas, who had been protecting the rear of those slain warriors, also attack Arjuna. Surrounding him, drawing their powerful bows in circles, they assail him relentlessly with deadly fire. Wounded by their deluge, Arjuna is incensed, and kills them all with six extraordinary shafts. Having slain sixty maharathas in moments and their legions in a few more, the glorious Kshatriya is exhilarated and he dashes ahead to kill Bhishma.

Seeing his allies overthrown, Susarman of the Trigartas still rushes at Arjuna with some other kings in his vanguard. Watching them press forward, the Pandava legion led by Sikhandin charges at them to protect Dhananjaya's chariot.

Arjuna turns and unleashes another arrow storm from the Gandiva at Susarman and his Samsaptakas. Eager to confront Bhishma, great Arjuna sees Duryodhana and some other kings led by the sovereign of the Sindhus, guarding the Kuru grandsire. Erupting into a grand inspiration of unearthly archery, sublimely thwarting the warriors who protect Bhishma, Arjuna who knows no fear adroitly avoids Duryodhana, Jayadratha and others, and forges on to engage the awesome son of Ganga.

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira also nimbly avoids the Madra king Salya, who has been assigned to harry him, and, along with Bhima and the sons of Madri, rides furiously at Bhishma.

Dominating the field of war as ever, peerless Bhishma faces the unified onslaught of the sons of Pandu, never wavering. The dexterous Jayadratha takes careful aim and with gusto smashes the bows of all those Pandava maharathas. Always wrathful, Duryodhana strikes Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna and the twins with a firetide of flaming shafts. Pierced roundly by Kripa and Sala and Chitrasena, Rajan, the Pandavas appear like the Devas attacked by the united Daitya hordes in ancient times.

Yudhishtira sees Sikhandin flee when Bhishma, with some disdain, consumes an astra loosed by the Panchala prince, and the Dharmaraja is stirred to anger. He cries at Sikhandin, “In the presence of your father, you had sworn to me that you would kill Bhishma. That was your solemn oath. Why do you not fulfil it now? O Kshatriya, do not neglect your vow. Defend your virtue, your noble race and your honour.

Look how Bhishma burns my troops with his fiery shafts, consuming them like Death himself. Your own bow is riven and you are repeatedly vanquished by Shantanu’s terrible son. Where do you go, deserting your kinsmen and brothers? This does not befit you.

Ah, you are terrified, and the colour fades from your face to watch indomitable Bhishma, and our army routed and in retreat. But you do not yet know that Arjuna has joined this dreadful fray. O celebrated Kshatriya, why are you afraid of Bhishma today?”

Hearing Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, harshly though the Dharmaraja speaks, Sikhandin is quickly reassured, and turns back to fight, once more his sole and fervid purpose to destroy great Bhishma. As that prince rides back with verve into battle, Salya greets him with a flaming agneyastra. The son of Drupada, powerful as Indra himself, is undaunted, by that weapon, luminous as the fire that burns at the end of the yuga. Sikhandin stands firm, and invokes a Varunastra, and douses Salya’s flames with a great tide of water in the sky. The Devas in the akasa and the kings of the earth all watch that awesome spectacle in wonder.

Meanwhile, the noble Bhishma breaks Yudhishtira’s bow and cuts down his standard. Seeing Yudhishtira suddenly seized by fear, Bhima sets aside his bow and arrows, and, seizing a club, rushes roaring at Jayadratha on foot. Jayadratha riding in a circle pierces Bhima from all sides as the great Pandava runs at him, with five hundred whetted arrows each like a Yamadana. Calmly ignoring those barbs, the daring Vrikodara, incensed, turns his fury on Jayadratha’s horses, foaled in Aratta, the kingdom of the Sindhus, and slaughters them all in explosions of blood.

Seeing Bhima fighting on foot, your son, the unrivalled Chitrasena, who, also, resembles the king of the Devas, swiftly attacks him from his chariot with astras. Mace in hand, Bhima bellows like ten wild bison and storms recklessly at your prince. Seeing Bhima's raised rod of Death, the Kauravas abandon your brave son and run like terrified boys.

In that fierce and bewildering fray, O Bhaarata, Chitrasena is undaunted as he watches that blood-dripping club flung by Bhima's tremendous hand course towards him through the air. Taking up a shining sword and shield, he leaps down from his chariot like a lion from the top of a cliff, to fight on foot. In that moment, falling on them like some meteor from the sky, Bhima's mace crushes Chitrasena's magnificent chariot, its horses and its sarathy. Watching your son's heroic and narrow escape, your forces are elated and shout triumphantly to applaud his deed.'

Sanjaya says, 'Your son Vikarna dashes up to Chitrasena and lifts him on to his own chariot. As the relentless war, fought at terror's very heart, continues, Bhishma attacks Yudhishtira. The Srinjayas, despite their chariots, elephants and horses, tremble to see the utterly frightening grandsire, and they believe Yudhishtira to be near his end.

Yudhishtira, accompanied by the twins, presses forward towards Bhishma, most illustrious archer, tiger among tigers among men. He shrouds Bhishma with thousands of arrows, clouds hiding the sun. And those countless arrows, so skilfully shot by Yudhishtira, reach the son of Ganga in distinct flights of hundreds and thousands.

And Bhishma responds by releasing a myriad shafts that are like dense locust swarms. In a flash, Bhishma mantles Kunti's son in several cerements of arrows which he looses in tide upon tide. Yudhishtira, stung, responds with an elongated nagapasa with venomous jade scales. Maharatha Bhishma destroys Yudhishtira's shaft in the air with a horse-shoe headed arrow.

Bhishma slaughters Yudhishtira's gold decked horses and the Pandava king abandons his horseless chariot and swiftly mounts Nakula's. Bhishma, conqueror of hostile cities, confronting the twins in battle, covers them entirely with his arrows. Seeing his afflicted brothers, Yudhishtira begins to seriously plot Bhishma's end.

He goads his friends and allies to the deed, crying, "Unite and kill Bhishma!" Hearing these words, the kings surround the Pitamaha with many chariots. But Bhishma, almost playfully, fells the maharathas, one after the other with his transcendent archery.

The Pandavas helplessly watch Bhishma thundering all over the battlefield, Bhishma like a young lion in a forest amidst a herd of deer. Roaring, he terrifies the bravest warriors; all the gathered Kshatriyas before him are like lesser animals before a lion. They see his swirling majestic movements in his chariot as being like a blazing wind-blown inferno devouring a heap of dry grass.

And Bhishma beheads maharathas like a forester felling ripe fruits from palmyra trees with stones. And those heads of helmeted soldiers fall upon the earth with the clatter of cascading rocks.

As that dreadful battle rages, utter chaos reigns among the armies. The carefully deployed legions of both armies fall into complete disarray. And the Kshatriyas challenge one another to individual combat.

Sikhandin charges at the Pitamaha, shouting to him to stop and fight. But Bhishma thinks of the princess Amba that Sikhandin once was, and disdaining him, advances against the Srinjayas who are delighted at seeing him approach. They cheer deafeningly and blast their conches.

Another bloodthirsty battle erupts in which chariots and elephants are mangled, and a thousand good fighting men die each moment. And the day passes as in a scarlet nightmare.

Dhrishtadyumna, prince of the Panchalas, and maharatha Satyaki are tormented by a barrage of arrows and spears aimed at them. With riptides of fire they begin to burn columns and columns of your warriors. Though under fiery siege, your forces do not retreat, but fight back bravely by now determined to die for honour if they must. Slaughtered by the illustrious son of Drupada, they cry out in anguish and fall in waves into the sea of blood which spreads everywhere and congeals upon sacred ground.

Hearing the desperate screams of those dying legions, maharathas Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti ride in a froth at Dhrishtadyumna at his horrible sacrifice of living men. Abruptly killing his horses, they envelop him in deadly storms of dark arrows. The prince of the Panchalas leaps off his chariot and mounts that of the noble Satyaki.

King Yudhishtira, supported by a vast akshauhini, rides against the two enraged princes of Avanti. And your son surrounds them defensively.

Arjuna fights against many bulls of the Kshatriya race, like Indra against the Asuras. Drona, always ready to defend your son, begins to devour the Panchalas like fire consuming a heap of cotton. Your other sons, Rajan, loyal to Duryodhana, surround Bhishma, and confront the Pandavas.

When the evening sun turns red, Duryodhana says to your forces, “Hurry!” And as the sun sets behind the western hill, and the soldiers accomplish difficult feats, the ghastly river of blood flows and swells, infested by jackals.

And the battlefield turns hideous, full of spectres, and the jackals howl, portending further evil. Thousands of Rakshasas and Pisachas and other flesh eaters and blood drinkers are seen all round.

Having routed the kings led by Susarman and their soldiers, in the very midst of their akshauhini, Arjuna returns to his tent. And Yudhishtira and his brothers, followed by his men, withdraw to theirs.

Bhima, too, having brought deadly havoc among Duryodhana's warriors, returns to his tent. And Duryodhana, with his troops, after defending Bhishma successfully another savage day, turns back to his.

And Drona, and Drona's son, and Kripa, and Salya, and Kritavarman of the Satwata vamsa, all of the Dhartarashtra army, retire to their tents. Satyaki too and Dhrishtadyumna, the son of Prishata, shepherding their army, withdraw towards theirs.

Thus those fearless chastisers of enemies, your forces and the Pandavas, stop fighting at sunset. Both the Pandavas and the Kauravas enter their tents and praise one another.

Making arrangements for the protection of their fearless legions through the night, having their watch posts manned, they pluck out the day's arrows from their bodies and bathe in many kinds of water. And Brahmanas perform propitiatory rites for them, and poets sing their praises.

Those illustrious men amuse themselves with singing and instruments. And for a while the whole place resembles heaven itself! Those bulls among men do not speak of the war. And when both armies sleep, exhausted men and elephants and horses, they are serene and beautiful to watch.'

Sanjaya says, 'Having passed the night in sound sleep, at daybreak the Kauravas and the Pandavas once more advance into battle. As they come onto the battleground again, a great deep sound like the roar of the ocean is heard.

Duryodhana, and Chitrasena, and Vivimsati, and that most excellent maharatha Bhishma, and Drona, all united and in full armour, expertly array the Kaurava vyuha against the Pandavas. Fierce as the stormy sea, with horses and tuskers for its billows and current, the Pitamaha leads that dwindled but still vast army, supported by the Avantis and the Malavas, the people of the southern kingdoms.

Beside him is the noble son of Bharadwaja, with the Pulindas, the Paradas, and the Kshudraka-Malavas. The valiant and stalwart Bhagadatta is in your ranks, along with the Magadhas, the Kalingas, and the ghoulish Pisachas.

Behind Bhagadatta is Brihadbala king of the Kosalas with the Melakas, the Tripuras, and the Chichilas. Next to Brihadbala is the brave Trigarta, king of the Prasthala, surrounded by a vast number of the Kambojas, and by Yavanas in thousands.

Next to the lord of the Trigartas, Bhaarata, advances that mighty Kshatriya, Aswatthaman son of Drona, filling the earth with leonine roars. Alongside is king Duryodhana himself with his entire army, surrounded by his magnificent brothers. Behind Duryodhana rides Kripa the son of Saradwat.

Thus, that mighty vyuha, resembling the turbulent ocean, presses into battle. And standards and royal white parasols, beautiful bracelets and costly bows, shine radiantly. Watching the enemy advance, maharatha Yudhishtira says to Dhrishtadyumna, "'Behold that oceanic vyuha! O son of Drupada, create another swiftly to contain and destroy it."

The gallant Dhrishtadyumna forms the Sringataka vyuha, which is known to raze all other vyuhas. At its horns are Bhima and Satyaki, with thousands of chariots, horsemen and foot-soldiers. Near them is Arjuna, with his chariot yoked to white horses driven by Krishna. In the centre stand Yudhishtira and Madri's twin sons.

Other royal archers, all knowers of the vyuha shastra, with their forces, fill the remaining spaces. Abhimanyu, and Virata, the sons of Draupadi and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha are told to bring up and defend the rear.

Having created this awesome vyuha, the noble Pandavas stand on the field, longing for battle and eager for victory. And the crashing of drums mingles with the blast of conches; the leonine roars of the soldiers and the slapping of their armpits are thunderous and fill every direction.

Those mighty warriors advance, and stare across Kurukshetra, field of dharma, chasmic field of death, unwinkingly. After a moment's perfect silence they erupt into fierce roars and yells, challenging each other, and attack! The war on the crack of the ages between your sons and their enemies, their cousins, resumes beneath its enveloping canopy of wrath.

Quickly lethal shafts fall like showers of serpents with mouths agape, and polished gleaming barbs rain down like gashes of lightning. Glittering maces loosed from bright slings fly up and whistle down over the enemy in batteries of thunder and blue swords and leather shields decked with a hundred moons look wondrous as they adorn the field of endless death.

The two hostile armies look at once awful and resplendent, like the Devas and Asuras fighting each other. In every direction they storm against one another, and the air is a thick hoarseness of roars and screams.

Celebrated maharathas crash violently into others, the yokes of their chariots tangling with those of their opponents. The friction of the tusks of elephants as they collide sets off flashes of fire and smoke.

Warriors on the backs of elephants, struck through with spears, fall like loosened rocks from hillsides. And the spectacle of foot-soldiers, fighting with bare arms or impaling one another with spears, is both magnificent and poignant.

With unending banks of arrows of every size and description, Kaurava and Pandava warriors mow each other down as if in some terrible game, a nightmare difficult to conceive. Bhishma charges the Pandavas, filling the air with the clatter of his chariot, while the twang of his bowstring petrifies his enemies all over again.

The resolute Pandava maharathas, led by Dhrishtadyumna, roar stridently and rush at him. This ignites a general battle between the foot-soldiers, chariot warriors, and elephants of both sides, in which countless bright fighting men, old and young, killing and dying, become tangled with one another, their bodies and already written destinies.’

Sanjaya says, 'The Pandavas cannot even look upon Bhishma who rages over the battleground scorching every side like the Sun himself. The Pandava army, commanded by Yudhishtira, attacks the son of Ganga who destroys everything around him with blazing tides from his noble bow.

In elation, Bhishma razes the best of the Srinjaya and the Panchala archers. Yet the Panchalas and the Somakas continue to attack him with no thought for their lives. Bhishma severs the arms and heads of their maharathas. He smashes their chariots. And the heads of horsemen fall like eerie hail as they are hewn off in vermilion blasts.

We see countless war elephants, paralysed by Bhishma's astras, sprawled like hills on the ground, their riders crushed under them. None among the Pandavas can resist Bhishma, but only the formidable Bhima. Bhima rides to face his Pitamaha in battle, scything a bloody path through the Kaurava ranks, who roar or scream at him even as kills them. The jubilant Pandavas too roar like lions to see the carnage Bhima inflicts on the enemy.

Duryodhana, surrounded by his brothers, protects Bhishma. Inexorable Bhima still thunders up and beheads Bhishma's charioteer. Uncontrolled, his horses run wildly from the field, dragging their chariot behind them. Bhima decapitates Sunabha with horse-shoe headed arrow, so that son of yours falls out from his chariot. Seven of his brothers watch this cool brutal slaying and cannot bear it.

Adityaketu and Bahavasin, Kundadhara and Mahodara, and Aparajita, and Panditaka and the invincible Visalaksha, dressed in silver-flecked armour and carrying splendid weapons, attack Bhima in fury. Mahodara pierces Bhima with nine thunderbolt like arrows, quite like Indra assailing the great Asura Namuchi.

Adityaketu stabs him with seventy shafts and Bahavasin with five. Kundadhara strikes him with ninety barbs and Visalaksha with seven. And that conqueror of enemies, the maharatha Aparajita makes Bhima's mighty body a home for countless smoking barbs. And Panditaka also pierces him with three shafts.

Bhima does not flinch, instead he laughs, roars, in echoing peals and roars to make your sons' blood run cold. His bow firmly held in his left hand, Vrikodara of the cavernous appetites sloughs off your son Aparajita's most handsome head. And that head falls to the ground and rolls some way like some grisly ball.

While both armies watch transfixed, Bhima cuts your son Kundadhara's body in two with an exceptional sword-headed arrow. His next shaft, Rajan, is aimed at Panditaka and its rips through his armour so his heart bursts in a hot red font, and passing clean through your son's body, that irresistible barb burrows into the ground like a snake entering its hole after claiming its marked victim.

In great joy now, for he thinks of all the pain and shame your sons inflicted on him in the past, he cuts away Visalaksha's head. Bhima strikes the mighty Mahodara square through his chest with an interminable arrow which excoriates this next son of yours and your prince plunges lifeless to the ground. Slashing down Adityaketu's royal chatra with one light like shaft, he beheads this boy of yours as well with another. Animated, roaring, roaring all the while, Bhima next kills Bahavasin in a bright red flash of gore.

Suddenly remembering the solemn oath that dreadful Bhima swore in the Kuru sabha, that he would kill every one of your sons, your other princes panic and flee from him. Stricken, sobbing, wailing to watch the brutal death of his brothers, Duryodhana roars at his forces, "There stands Bhima, preening. Destroy him!"

And your sons, those famed archers, seeing their brothers killed, painfully remember the wise and precious warning and counsel of the dignified and upright Vidura. For whatever nemesis he warned them of they now see unfolding before their eyes. Indeed, Rajan, everything that Vidura warned you of is coming to pass on Kurukshetra, field of dharma, field of death. But then you were blinded not just in your eyes, but your very heart by your greed, your foolishness and your inordinate love for your sons.

Ah, to watch that mahabaho decimating the Kauravas, it is amply clear that Bhima has undoubtedly been born to kill all your sons.

Overwhelmed by sorrow, Duryodhana rides up to Bhishma, and laments, "Bhima slaughters my brave brothers in battle like animals in a hunt. Our forces fight courageously, but they are failing. You seem to be an indifferent spectator, unconcerned about our fortunes. What terrible path have I taken? Ah, behold my evil destiny.”’ Sanjaya continues, ‘Hearing Duryodhana’s sad and cruel outburst, Bhishma’s eyes fill with tears, and he says, “I said this before, as did Drona, Vidura, and the revered Gandhari. O my child, you did not understand it then. Parantapa, I have long ago determined that neither I nor Drona will leave this war alive.

But I also tell you this: Bhima will kill all whom he targets in this war. So muster your fortitude, and firmly resolved on battle, fight the sons of Pritha, making only Swarga your goal. As for the Pandavas, with Krishna on their side, they cannot be vanquished by the very Devas. Be resolute and brave; fight, O Bhaarata!”’

Dhritarashtra says, 'Seeing so many of my sons killed by a single man, Sanjaya, how do Bhishma and Drona and Kripa respond?

Day after day my sons are being slaughtered. Ah, I believe they are being overtaken by dark destiny; for they seem unable to find victory and always appear to face defeat. If my sons are being overcome despite Drona and Bhishma, and the high-souled Kripa, and Somadatta's gallant son, and Bhagadatta, Aswatthaman and other invincible heroes being with them, it can only be the will of fate.

Though reproached by me, Bhishma and Vidura, heinous Duryodhana paid no heed to what we said. Gandhari, too, warned him, but the dissolute Suyodhana did not realise his folly. And his folly now results in the death of my reckless sons at the hands of Bhima, day after day in battle.'

Sanjaya says, 'You yourself did not then understand Vidura's august words spoken for your good, but they have now come true. Vidura said, "Restrain your sons from gambling."

Like a man whose hour is come, refusing the remedy which can save him, you did not listen to the counsel of your well-wishers. The words of the righteous are being fulfilled and the Kauravas now perish for disregarding what the wise Vidura and Drona and Bhishma and other well-wishers warned them about. Why, O king, the dark omens portending the unthinkable tragedy which would ineluctably unfold were in evidence even when you refused to listen to their dire warnings.

It is far too late now and you cannot turn time back. So listen instead to my narration of the war exactly as it happens.

At noon, the battle turns even more savage and bloody. At the command of Dharma's son, the Pandava forces charge Bhishma yet again, always seeking to kill him. Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin, and maharatha Satyaki, with their spirited legions, ride at Bhishma as he stands alone like some great and unassailable column of light and death looming over Kurukshetra.

Maharathas Virata and Drupada, with all the Somakas, attack the solitary Bhishma. And the Kaikeyas, and Dhrishtaketu, and Kuntibhoja, armoured and bolstered by their forces, advance against the grandsire. Arjuna and the sons of Draupadi, and the fierce Chekitana press forward against all the kings commanded by Duryodhana who protect Bhishma. The noble Abhimanyu, terrible Ghatotkacha, and the smouldering Bhima fall upon the remaining Kauravas.

These three Pandava legions begin to slaughter the Kauravas, and the Kauravas also kill their enemy in ever mounting numbers. Drona assails the Somakas and the Srinjayas, meaning to raze them from the face of the earth. Shrill cries of anguish rise among the brave Srinjayas as they are mown down by Drona's remorseless tide of fire.

Countless Kshatriyas, struck by Drona, shudder and writhe in agony like men in the grip of some terrible disease. All over the field wounded men moan, some scream in pain, some groan hollowly like men dying of thirst or starvation.

And so also, like a second Yama, Bhima ravages the Kaurava forces. The river of blood swells and surges frothing across Kurukshetra and every moment hundreds of souls increase the population of Yama's kingdom. Bhima runs amok among the elephant akshauhini of the Kauravas, striking the great beasts down at will with arrows and mace, so their trumpeting rings horribly with the screams and mortal cries of dying men and their blood foams copiously into the ankle-deep lake of gore which spreads across the field of horror.

Struck with Bhima's shafts, some of those tuskers plunge to the ground, some are paralysed and cannot move, some bellow in pain, while others run dementedly everywhere crushing men and chariots of both armies. Majestic elephants, their trunks cut off and limbs mangled, scream like cranes, and briefly pirouette ungainly before plummeting to the ground, shaking the earth.

Nakula and Sahadeva are at the Kaurava horsemen. Thousands of the finest horses, wearing garlands of gold on their heads and golden jewels on their necks and chests, are butchered by the radiant twins. The earth is strewn with handsome fallen steeds. Some have had their tongues cut away; some lying limbs askew with wild eyes, their flanks heaving; some whinny weakly in agony, while others are still, no movement or breath stirring in them and their noble spirits fled. The field of war presents a strange and unnerving sight, adorned with fallen horses of many breeds and colours.

The very earth looks fiercely resplendent, with the bodies of countless kings killed by Arjuna; and with broken chariots, slashed banners and brilliant parasols, with rent chamaras and fans, and mighty ayudhas smashed in pieces, with garlands and gold necklaces, with jewelled bracelets, with heads still decked with ear-rings, with crowns fallen from royal heads, with standards, with jutting bases of beautiful chariots ruined, O Rajan, and with traces and reins Bhumi Devi is as radiant as she is in spring when strewn with flowers. But with such a grim and eerie splendour.

Bhaarata, thus the Pandava host is devastated when Bhishma and Drona, and Aswatthaman, and Kripa and Kritavarman fight with their utmost ferocity, while your army also faces similar devastation when the Pandava heroes unleash their long withheld simmering rage and put forth their might.'

Sanjaya says, 'As that war greater and more horrible than any other continues to claim brave Kshatriyas all around, Sakuni charges the Pandavas. Hridika's son of the Satwata vamsa also rides at them.

Suddenly, joyfully, as if some hidden tide has turned in their favour, your warriors encircle the Pandava army; their horses are the best of the Kamboja breed and those born in the northern plains, those of Aratta and Mahi and Sindhu, Vanayu's white horses, and those of the mountain kingdoms. The Tittiri horses, swift as the winds, surround the Pandavas. And with swift, mail-covered horses, decked with gold, Parantapa Iravat, son of Arjuna, rides at the Kaurava legion.

Iravat is the son of Arjuna, born to the daughter of the king of the Nagas who was vulnerable and despondent when her husband was killed by Garuda. Childless, she was given to Arjuna by Airavat. Partha took her to be his wife for she desired him. Thus that son of Arjuna was born to the wife of another.

Abandoned by his uncle who hated Arjuna, he was raised among the Nagas, protected by his mother. He grew up handsome, strong and accomplished, with unassailable strength and many occult powers. Hearing that Arjuna had gone to Indraloka, he promptly went there. He approached his father and greeted him with folded hands. He introduced himself to Arjuna, saying, "I am Iravat. Blessed are you, and I am your son."

He reminded Arjuna of the circumstances of the Kshatriya's meeting with his mother. Arjuna embraced his son who was so like him in heroic deeds, and exulted. Mahabaho Iravat was then joyously commanded by Arjuna, "When the war begins, you shall fight for us." Agreeing happily, Iravat left.

And now at the hour of battle he presents himself, with many swift and beautifully coloured horses. Decked with gold ornaments, they glide across the field like swans on the surface of a lake. Those stallions dash headlong against yours and both fall to the ground with a reverberation like the swish of Garuda's wings. And the horse-riders hack one another down. The riderless chargers of both sides break free and scatter wildly in every direction.

Their strength sapped by receiving so many arrows upon their splendid bodies, their horses killed under them, brave Kshatriya horsemen stagger exhaustedly on Kurukshetra and die. When those legions of horses diminish and only a few survive, the younger brothers of Sakuni ride out of the Kaurava vyuha to the front, mounted on fresh, rested, well trained chargers, neither old nor young, swift and forceful as a gale.

Those six powerful brothers, Gaya, Gavaksha, Vrishava, Charmavat, Aarjavam, and Suka storm out of the Kaurava vyuha. They are supported by Sakuni and by their ardent fighting men, all wearing armour. Breaking through the hitherto inviolable Pandava legion of horsemen, those indomitable and jubilant Gandhara warriors penetrate deep into it, longing for victory or death and the bliss of heaven.

Seeing these exhilarated warriors, Iravat says to his bejewelled Naga soldiers, "Destroy these, their astras and their beasts." And his uncanny fighters, many of them half human and half great serpents, begin to cold-bloodedly harvest the onrushing cavalry of spirited Dhartarashtra warriors.

Watching their horsemen being coolly erased by Iravat's nerveless legion, the distraught sons of Subala charge Iravat and surround him. Their forces attack Iravat and his Naga cavalcade with spears, and gory pandemonium rules all Kurukshetra.

Pierced with deep spears and drenched in blood pouring free from his wounds, Iravat looks like an elephant repeatedly pierced with a hook. Though wounded deeply in his chest, back, and thighs, he faces his adversaries alone and never wavers, not for a moment, Arjuna's heroic son.

Iravat stuns his rivals with a tornado of arrows so they swoon. That parantapa rips out the spears from his body, and flings them back at the sons of Subala striking them deep. He charges them with sword and shield in hand to kill them. They recover consciousness and attack him ferociously. Undaunted, Iravat continues to run at them, blade upraised. So swiftly does he weave and run, that even on their fleet chargers they cannot accost him.

His enemies ring him round and try to capture him. But as they near him that parantapa hacks off their arms in a flurry and hacks away the legs of some. Their ornamented arms and weapons fall, and Arjuna's terrifying Naga son cuts off their heads all around.

Only the wounded Vrishava, Rajan, escapes alive from Iravat. Seeing those valiant Kshatriyas killed in moments, Duryodhana says to the sinister Alambusha, master of maya, who loathes Bhima for having killed his brother Baka once, "Look how Iravat has slaughtered my troops. You, too, have maya at your command and can go anywhere at will. You loathe Arjuna. Now kill his son in battle."

Alambusha roars like a lion and, with the fiendish Rakshasas of his akshauhini, wielding weirdly shining spears, charge Iravat. With the remainder of the Kaurava horsemen, too, Alambusha rushes at the mighty Iravat, who covers him in blizzard of arrows in the twinkling of an eye. Immediately, the Rakshasa begins to uses sorcery against the Naga prince. He conjures illusory chargers ridden by Rakshasas armed with spears and axes.

Two thousand die in moments in the battle between Iravat and Alambusha, and the two of them quickly come face to face like Vasava and Vritra. As Alambusha closes on him, Iravat cleaves his bow with his sword, and, whirling like some dervish, cuts down the Rakshasa's arrows all round him.

Alambusha flies up into the air and flitting here and there, changing his form moment to moment, tries to confound Iravat with maya. But Iravat can also shift his shape at will, and baffles Alambusha with his chimeras, and swiftly hacks off the fiend's arms and legs, shredding them with lightning sword strokes.

But lo, Alambusha reappears in a wink, now with a youthful appearance. Making illusion is natural to rakshasas, and they can choose their age and form at will. The Rakshasa's severed limbs join magically together and are now darkly splendid and rippling with youth and vigour. With a howl, Iravat hacks at Alambusha with his axe, like a woodsman cutting down a tree, mangling him again so his blood flows in rills. Alambusha's horrible roaring echoes across the field entirely patinaed with a skin of blood.

Yet again, Alambusha's desiccated body rejoins miraculously and now assuming a more macabre form than any he yet has, he rushes forward to try to seize Iravat bodily. Arjuna's son never flees a battle. Quickly a great Naga, a kinsman of his mother, appears at his side, and through that uncle's maya, Iravat is surrounded by his serpentine kin.

Surrounded by glimmering emerald-scaled Nagas, Iravat assumes a form as vast as Ananta himself. He then mantles monstrous Alambusha in a writhing mass of snakes. The Rakshasa reflects for only a moment and, assuming the form of Garuda, devours those snakes and Iravat's uncle with them. Seeing that Naga of his mother's line consumed through illusion, Iravat is momentarily confounded. In that moment, the Rakshasa kills him with his sword; Iravat's crowned head, lovely as a lotus, beautiful as the moon, rolls to the ground.

When Arjuna's noble son is slain by the Rakshasa, the Dhartarashtra legions erupt in celebration. Conches boom and drumrolls fill the air thick with ghosts of men and their beasts dying in thousands all the while, and hardly aware yet they have been killed.

What a bloodletting there is on both sides in the war on Kurukshetra. Horses and elephants and foot-soldiers are killed by rampaging tuskers, gored and trampled. And glossy steeds and countless elephants are felled by swarming foot-soldiers. Maharathas annihilate chariots and warriors in numbers that cannot be counted or told as death's hurricane swirls on, only mounting in savagery by the passing day, by the hour.

Unaware of his son's death, Arjuna continues to decimate the kings who shield Bhishma. The warriors of your army and the Srinjayas sacrifice their lives by the thousands as libations in the yagna fire of war. And having lost their swords and bows, many maharathas, with dishevelled hair, fight with their bare arms.

Bhishma kills so many maharathas with supernal astras of wind, fire and shafts of solid water and the Pandava forces tremble before him. He massacres horses, elephants, horsemen and chariot warriors without favour, the river of blood surging before him most of all. Surely, Bhishma's prowess appears equal to Sakra's.

The fearsome valour of Bhima and Parshata is no less than Bhishma's, and scintillating handsome Satyaki's no less than theirs. Yet on this day the Pandavas are most fearful when they see Drona put forth his might. They think: "Drona can destroy us and our forces singlehandedly. What can he not do when he has a legion of maharathas with him?" Even Arjuna thinks like this and is afraid to watch his Acharya sow death all around him as casually as a farmer sowing seeds in a fertile, darkling field.

With every passing hour of war, the warriors of both sides become more ruthless and cruel, as if demons possess them and impel them to commit every atrocity they can. Quickly the war, which began with noble covenants being made between both armies, degenerates in this horrible contention that is like a fell carnage between two Rakshasa hosts.'

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Tell me, Sanjaya, how does Arjuna respond when the Pandavas learn that Iravat is dead?’

Sanjaya says, ‘Seeing his cousin Iravat slain, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha roars terribly again and again in anguish. And the earth, with her oceans and mountains and forests, trembles. The sky and the four quarters of the world shudder.

Hearing those roars, the legs and arms of warriors quiver, and they sweat profusely. Your army is terrified. Everywhere, your soldiers stand frozen, like a herd of tame elephants fearing the charging lion.

With shattering roar after roar, Ghatotkacha assumes a truly terrifying form; with a raised flaming spear, encircled by many fierce Rakshasas all wielding astras, he charges in wrath like Siva at the end of the yuga. Seeing him come like some plague and his own troops scatter in absolute panic, Duryodhana, roaring like a pride of lions, rides headlong at the wild Rakshasa loosing a rage of flaming arrows at Ghatotkacha. Behind Duryodhana rides the king of the Vangas, with ten thousand great tuskers with musth juice trickling down.

The sight of your son with a legion of elephants angers Ghatotkacha further and his slanted eyes seem to spew flames. A pitched battle, that makes the hair stand on end, breaks out between him and Duryodhana. Seeing the lumbering elephant force towering on the horizon, the infuriated Rakshasas rush at it, weapons in hand, thundering forward like clouds charged with lightning, with chilling cries and yells. With sword and arrow, spear and mallet and rough hewn axe, they begin to raze that elephant host.

They kill majestic tuskers with great rocks and uprooted trees. As the Rakshasas demolish the elephants, we see some of the mighty beasts with their frontal globes smashed, some bathed entirely in their own blood, others with their limbs mangled or trunks sliced off leaving blood spraying hollow stumps whistling.

As his elephant host is laid waste, Duryodhana charges the Rakshasa horde recklessly. He looses cataracts of arrows at Ghatotkacha’s legion of night, killing any number of those dark and excellent warriors. Inflamed, Suyodhana strikes four of the best and most dangerous Rakshasas, Vegavat, Maharudra, Vidyujihva and Pramathin, with four particularly deadly arrows and swathes the entire fell force in a calorific mantle of arrows. Many handsome and magnificent Rakshasas perish.

Bhima's wild son blazes up at your son's success. He draws his resplendent bow and charges Duryodhana. But your son is unperturbed at seeing Ghatotkacha storming towards him like Yama at Siva's bidding.

With fiery eyes, Ghatotkacha says to Duryodhana, "Today I will be released from my debt to my elders, and my mother; they were exiled by your vile game of dice. You dragged Drupada's daughter Krishnaa, in her period and clad in a single garment, into the Kuru sabha and humiliated her. Your persecution did not end there, and at your command, Jayadratha of the Sindhus tried to ravish her in the forest. Wretched Duryodhana, if you do not surrender, I will avenge all those injuries today!"

With that, Hidimbi's son bites his lower lip with his fangs, and licking the corners of his mouth with his long sharp tongue, covers Duryodhana in a scathing tide of arrows.'

Sanjaya says, ‘Duryodhana calmly bears that storm of arrows, hard even for the Danavas to withstand, like a bull elephant, lord of his herd, enduring the rains. Bharatarishabha, your son is in grave danger, but heedless of it he looses twenty five keen arrows, which flash to strike great Ghatotkacha, like poisonous snakes on the chest of Gandhamadana. Pierced by those shafts, blood trickles down the Rakshasa’s body and he looks like an elephant with rent temples and juices flowing down.

Ghatotkacha turns his attention on Duryodhana, to kill your son no less. He seizes up an enormous spear, which could rive even a mountain. He chants an arcane mantra over it and it begins to blaze with light, like a comet, like a streak of lightning in his awesome hands. The Rakshasa raises it high above his head to cast it at Duryodhana, certainly impaling him, having his life.

Even as the recondite and dreadful thing burns and fizzes in Ghatotkacha’s hand, Bhagadatta king of the Vangas, riding an elephant taller than any other, the peerless Supritika, thunders and sets himself squarely between Suyodhana and the Rakshasa, shielding your son completely.

Ghatotkacha fumes to see his intention foiled and casts his incendiary lance at Bhagadatta’s elephant instead. Supritika gives a most abysmal bellow as the fiery ayudha strikes him with a huge explosion, blasting a gaping hole in his side, blowing his great heart to shreds, and slowly, his eyes screaming a legend of grief and pain that lord of all mountain elephants buckles at his knees and falls over dead, shaking the earth. Bhagadatta leaps down to save his life, with a heartbroken roar to see his beloved beast die.

Duryodhana is anguished to see that prince among elephants killed and his troops give way to the wave of despair that sweeps over them and they run in dismay in every direction. But steadfast himself, cleaving to his Kshatriya dharma and his dignity, and full of fresh wrath, the Kaurava king unleashes an astra seemingly made of the flames of the pralaya at Ghatotkacha.

With alacrity, Ghatotkacha thwarts that burning shaft in flight. He seems to grow even taller with the mahima siddhi he commands and looming like some great shadow over the cowering Kaurava legions, his eyes shining crimson red with rage, he gives a roar truly like a thundercloud's, so your warriors stand rooted and trembling before him. Again and again, Ghatotkacha roars and all Kurukshetra quakes to hear him.

Hearing him, Bhishma rides up to Drona and says, "Hidimbi's son is battling Duryodhana and no creature on earth can quell Ghatotkacha. O blessed one, go and protect the king or the Rakshasa will have his life today. Hurry Drona, and all your parantapas, this is our highest dharma!"

Drona and the other maharathas rush towards where the king of the Kauravas stands facing the roaring Rakshasa. They meet Duryodhana and Somadatta, Bahlika and Jayadratha, Kripa and Bhurisravas and Salya, and the two princes of Avanti, along with Brihadbala, Aswatthaman and Vikarna, Chitrasena and Vivimsati, all in the thick of the wheeling, whirling, blood spraying battle.

Thousands of other maharathas and their legions press forward to defend your son who is being cornered. Seeing those invincible forces dash towards him, Ghatotkacha stands unyielding as the Mainaka mountain, bow in hand, surrounded by his fiendish kinsmen armed with clubs and mallets and many astras.

The Rakshasas on one side and the best of Duryodhana's akshauhinis on the other launch into a mortifying battle. The twang of bows everywhere is like the ear-splitting cracks of burning bamboos cracking at their knots. The clatter of weapons falling upon coats of mail is as deafening as mountains shattering. Spears hurled by noble arms course through the sky like snakes.

Ghatotkacha raises his enormous bow, roars like a pride of lions, and cleaves Drona's bow with a strange, curved arrow. He fells Somadatta's standard with another broad-headed one. He pierces Bahlika with three shafts through his chest. He strikes Kripa with one arrow and Chitrasena with three. With another swift one from his fully stretched bow, he strikes Vikarna in the shoulder. Spouting blood, Vikarna falls to the floor of his chariot.

The Rakshasa vigorously drives fifteen shafts into Bhurisravas; they pierce through his armour and flesh and enter the earth. He smashes the chariots of Vivimsati and Aswatthaman. They drop the reins of their horses, and fall to the ground.

With another crescent-tipped arrow he fells Jayadratha's standard bearing the emblem of a golden boar; with a shaft he rives the Sindhu king's bow. In frightful rage, he kills the king of Avanti's four horses with four unerring barbs. With another well tempered shaft, he stabs king Brihadbala deep, and the wounded king stumbles in his chariot. Never pausing, Ghatotkacha looses a clutch of serpentine narachas, which pierce the celebrated Salya.'

Sanjaya says, 'Having scattered all your warriors, the rampant Rakshasa attacks Duryodhana, at which many indomitable warriors of your army rise up to kill Ghatotkacha.

Those maharathas draw their mighty bows and charge at him, roaring like a countless lions. Surrounding him, they lash him with arrows like clouds belabouring a mountain with torrential rain. Deeply struck and in agony Ghatotkacha is like an elephant pierced repeatedly with a cruel hook. Then, like Garuda, he soars up into the sky, from where he thunders like stormclouds, and his fierce roaring resounds in every direction.

Hearing the Rakshasa's roars, Yudhishtira says to Bhima, "Listen to Ghatotkacha! For certain he is battling the maharathas of the Dhartarashtra army. The Pitamaha stands always ready to slaughter the Panchalas and Arjuna fights to protect them. Mahabaho, both these tasks demand your immediate attention; go and support Hidimbi's son who is in grave danger."

Bhima advances swiftly, terrifying the enemy with his tigerish roars that sound like the ocean at full moon. The valiant Satyadhriti and Sauchiti, and Srenimat and Vasudana, and the powerful son of the king of Kasi, all follow Bhima Vrikodara. Countless other rathikas led by Abhimanyu, and by the sons of Draupadi, and the bold Kshatradeva, and Kshatradharman, and Nila follow these. To protect Ghatotkacha they encircle him with a great force of chariots and six thousand war elephants.

Their loud shouts and roars, the thunder of their horses' hooves and the clatter of their chariot wheels make the earth shudder. Hearing that tumult, your anxious forces, ever fearing Bhima, turn ashen. Leaving Ghatotkacha, they flee. An unrelenting battle breaks out between those high-souled warriors and yours. Maharathas unleash astras at each other.

The war makes the brave exult and strikes terror into the hearts of the timid, as horsemen and elephant warriors face each other, and foot-soldiers and maharathikas. Absolutely possessed by the spirit of battle and bloodlust, they fight blindly, in rage.

In that seething ferment of chariots, horses, elephants, and foot-soldiers, a pall of dust rises from chariot wheels and the running feet of men and animals. Impenetrable, like red smoke, it obscures Kurukshetra. The warriors cannot distinguish friend from enemy. The father does not recognise the son, nor the son the father, in that vicious, unfeeling war which makes one's hair stand on end.

The ceaseless ominous whine of coursing weapons and the roars and screams of fighting men are like the howls of dead souls in torment. The blood of men and their beasts flows in frothing rivers; warriors' hair upon dissevered heads form its ghastly weeds and moss. Indeed, severed heads fall like hail on Kurukshetra. The earth is scattered with headless corpses of men, alongside mangled bodies of elephants and hacked limbs and bodies of horses.

Maharathas pursue each other and loose elemental astras to consume the enemy. Chargers, goaded by their riders, dash against others and fall down dead, their wild eyes glazing over in death. And men with burning, mad eyes, who have lost their weapons, dash against each other breastplate on breastplate, helmet on helmet, and fall stunned. Cruelly prodded by their mahouts, elephants gore other elephants disembowelling one another. Covered with bleeding wounds, their backs decked with standards, they are seen locked horribly, inextricably into each other like clouds charged with ivory lightning.

Some lie on top of others; some have their frontal lobes split with spears; they run wildly thundering like roaring clouds. Some, with their trunks lopped off, others with mangled limbs, plunge to the ground like mountains shorn of their wings of old by Indra. Other majestic tuskers bleed copiously, their sides ripped open; they look like mountains with red muddy streams gushing down their sides after a cloudburst. Others, riderless and pierced with arrows and spears, are like mountains shorn of their peaks.

Some of the great beasts are blind with fury, with juice streaming down their temples and cheeks and over their maddened eyes; no longer guided or restrained by any goad, for their riders have fallen, they trample hundreds of chariots, horses and foot-soldiers.

Horses, attacked by horsemen with bearded arrows and spears, whinnying in pain and rage and helplessness, careen at their assailants, disturbing all the points of the compass. Noble maharathas, encountering others, all fight without fear, recklessly. All those that fight on that abysmal field seek earthly glory or eternal life as they hew and smite and loose coruscating tumults of arrows.

Then, their spirits suddenly broken by the primeval brutality of it all, the Dhartarashtra troops quit the battle and flee the field.’

Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana is incensed on seeing his forces decimated and he charges Bhima. With his bow luminous as lightning, he envelops Pandu's son with a wither of arrows. He cleaves Bhima's bow with a crescent-moon-tipped winged shaft. He ruptures his detested enemy's chest with a missile with the power to split mountains. Pain screaming through him in a flash, yet Bhima remains tenacious, clasping his golden flag pole.

Seeing his father spurting blood, Ghatotkacha blazes up like a wrathful inferno. With booming shouts, a swarm of Pandava maharathas, led by Abhimanyu, attacks Duryodhana.

Seeing them, Drona says to your maharathas, "The Pandava maharathas, with Bhima at their head, hem Duryodhana in. They terrify our own warriors with squalls of fire. The king is in mortal peril, fly to protect him!"

Led by Somadatta your rathikas fall upon the Pandava ranks. Kripa and Bhurisravas and Salya, and Drona's son and Vivimsati, and Chitrasena and Vikarna, and Jayadratha, and Brihadbala, and the two princes of Avanti, encircle Bhima in a ring of protection. The Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras encounter each other a mere twenty paces apart.

Mahabaho Drona bends his colossal bow and strikes Bhima with twenty six shafts. He bedevils Vrikodara with a luciferous volley like a cloudburst upon a mountain. Mighty Bhima swiftly pierces his Acharya with ten barbs through his left side. Frail with age, and tormented by pain, Drona faints on to the floor of his chariot. Roaring, Duryodhana dashes at Bhima with Aswatthaman beside him.

Seeing them come, each like a Yama at the end of the yuga, Bhima seizes a mace, and, leaping off his chariot, he stands like a hill on the field, unyielding. Why, he is like the imposing Kailasa, as Aswatthaman and Duryodhana attack him fervidly. Bhima, who knows no fear, runs straight toward them mace aloft. So terrible is his face that the Kaurava aim great astras at him to stop him somehow. Led by Drona, they harangue him from every side. Such is the immediate danger to his life and such his disdain for it, that the host of Pandava maharathas, led by Abhimanyu, dash forward, all of them ready to sacrifice their lives to save him.

Looking like a mass of blue clouds, heroic Nila charges Aswatthaman. A famed archer himself, he had long desired a duel with Drona's son. He strikes Aswatthaman with an irruption of winged shafts, even like Sakra who chastised Viprachitti, the Danava who once terrified the Devas and the three worlds.

Blood drenched in moments, infuriated, Aswatthaman draws his bowstring and, with a twanging as loud as Indra's thunder, unleashes a refulgence of flaming barbs at Nila. He fells Nila's standard and four horses with six rutilant shafts. With a seventh, he find Nila's chest and Nila, gushing blood, slumps down in his chariot.

Seeing Nila swoon, Ghatotkacha, with his invincible Rakshasas, falls upon Aswatthaman, who turns calmly to ride directly at his assailants. Quick as light, deadly as venom spitting king cobra, Drona's son despatches a host of Rakshasas in Ghatotkacha's vanguard. His anger stoked, Ghatotkacha uses powerful maya to create a great and demonic illusion. Aswatthaman stands bewildered and momentarily afraid. Your men run from that hellish vision, as part of which they see one another, though alive and breathing, lying dead, convulsed by death's spasms on the field of all horrors.

Drona and Duryodhana, Salya and Aswatthaman, and other noble Kaurava archers scatter before Ghatotkacha's fell sorcery. In his hallucinatory illusion, all your maharathas appear as being already routed, and all your allied kings slain. Meanwhile, the Pandava maharathas raze thousands of your horses and horsemen. Wailing, your legions escape to the safety of their tents.

Bhishma and I cry out to them, "Fight, do not run away! This is merely Rakshasa maya conjured up by Ghatotkacha."

Panic-stricken, they pay no attention to us, they do not stop. Watching this flight, the Pandavas regard themselves victorious. Along with Ghatotkacha they roar like lions. The air resounds with their shouts, the blast of their conches, and the throbbing of their drums.

By dusk, your entire army has been routed and scattered by Ghatotkacha.'

Sanjaya says, 'After that rout, Duryodhana approaches Bhishma and, with a humble salutation, tells him about the defeat at the hands of Ghatotkacha.

Dejectedly he says to the Pitamaha, "O sire, relying on you, just as the Pandavas rely on Krishna, I began a fierce war with the Pandavas. Parantapa, I and my eleven akshauhinis obey your command. Despite this, I have been routed in battle by the Pandavas drawing on the powers of Ghatotkacha.

Ah, this consumes my limbs like a fire burning down a dry tree. O Parantapa, with your support and blessings, I want to crush Ghatotkacha myself. It befits you to fulfil my desire."

Bhishma says to Duryodhana, "O king, you should always conduct yourself suitably. Protect yourself in battle under every circumstance. Fight against Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, or with Arjuna, or with the twins, or with Bhima. In accordance with varnadharma, a Kshatriya must only contend with another Kshatriya.

Myself, and Drona, and Kripa, and Drona's son, and Kritavarman of the Satwata race, and Salya, and Somadatta's son, and that maharatha Vikarna, and your valiant brothers led by Dussasana, will all combine to fight the Rakshasa. Or if you are inconsolable at the carnage he brought to your legions, let Bhagadatta, who is equal to Purandara himself in war, fight Ghatotkacha."

And Bhishma says to Bhagadatta, "Advance swiftly, Rajan, against the son of Hidimbi. Engage that savage Rakshasa with caution, like Indra in ancient times did Taraka. You have divine weapons; your prowess is great. You, who have vanquished many Asuras in the past, are a true match for Ghatotkacha on the field. Backed by your vast forces, kill that bull among Rakshasas."

Hearing Bhishma's words, Bhagadatta advances towards the enemy, roaring like a lion. Seeing him approach like a storm of thunderheads, many Pandava maharathas furiously move against him: Bhima, Abhimanyu and Ghatotkacha, the sons of Draupadi, and Satyadhriti, and Kshatradeva, and the rulers of the Chedis, and Vasudana, and the king of the Dasarnas.

Mounted on his great new elephant, Bhagadatta charges into battle. A truculent encounter erupts. Forceful shafts, shot by maharathas, fall on elephants and chariots. Majestic trained tuskers with rent temples fall upon one another. Blind with rage, with temporal juice trickling down their bodies, they gore one another with column-like tusks.

Regal horses, ridden by warriors armed with spears, are goaded to fearlessly fly at each other. And thousands of foot-soldiers, attacked by legions of foot-soldiers with spikes and arrows, plunge to the ground, their legion spirits quitting their carved and mangled bodies in thick swarms. Roaring maharathas slaughter their daring adversaries with livid coruscations of barbed arrows.

In that battle which makes one's hair stand on end, the famed Bhagadatta, mounted on his elephant of rent temples with juice trickling down in seven streams, which makes him look like a mountain with seven rivers gushing down after heavy rain, like Indra himself riding Airavata, attacks Bhima in fury. Riding on the head of his massive beast, he looses a fulmination of arrows on the hulking Pandava.

King Bhagadatta unleashes that volley on Bhima like clouds lashing rain on to a mountain at the end of summer. Incensed, Bhima kills more than a hundred fighting men that protected Bhagadatta's rear and flanks in a sanguinary flash.

Wrath surges up in Bhagadatta and he goads his elephant straight at Bhima's chariot, why, even like some unimaginable arrow from a great god's bow! Bhima leads a host of Pandava maharathas directly at the attacking elephant. These warriors are the five Kekaya princes and Abhimanyu, the five sons of Draupadi and the ruler of the Dasarnas, Kshatradeva and the ruler of the Chedis, and Chitraketu. They wield divine astras with consummate skill and prowess, and they quickly surround their opponent's elephant.

That majestic tusker, stabbed with many arrows, streams blood from his wounds, and looks resplendent like a mountain plastered with red mud after the rains. The ruler of the Dasarnas rides his elephant out towards Bhagadatta. Bhagadatta's beast contains the attack like a continent the surging sea. Seeing this remarkable resistance, even the Pandava troops applaud and marvel.

The ruler of the Pragjyotishas is enraged and casts fourteen spears at the Dasarna king's regal mammoth. Like snakes entering anthills, these pierce the tusker's gold-decked armour. Deeply pierced and sorely wounded, that elephant's fury subsides and it swiftly retreats. As it flees, it mows down the Pandava host of its own side like a gale smashing down young trees.

With their elephant defeated, the maharathas of the Pandava army roar like lions and setting Bhima at their head, storm at Bhagadatta loosing all manner of arrows and astras at him. Bhagadatta is unmoved by these weapons and the legion that surges roaring at him; instead, he goads his great prince among elephants at them, prodding it with his hook and spurred boots. That elephant provoked with hook and spur seems to assume the form of the Samvarta fire that destroys everything at the end of the yuga.

Crushing hordes of chariots, elephants and horses with their riders, it thunders about in every direction, pounding down foot-soldiers by the thousands. The vast legions of the Pandavas shrink like leather exposed to fire.

As Bhagadatta thins the Pandava vyuha, Ghatotkacha, with fiery eyes and blazing face, charges towards him. Assuming a terrible form alight with rage, he seizes a bright lance that can penetrate a mountain and hurls the flaming thing at Bhagadatta's elephant. Seeing it course towards him, the ruler of the Pragjyotishas cuts it in two with a crescent-headed arrow, and the golden spear plunges into the earth like Indra's thunderbolt.

With a shout, Bhagadatta takes a glittering spear and in a fluid blur casts it at Ghatotkacha, who leaps up into the air and seizes it in his hand. The Rakshasa snaps it like a twig against his knee before the eyes of the assembled kings. All this appears awesome. The Devas, the Gandharvas and the Munis are wonderstruck. And the Pandava warriors, led by Bhima, also cry out their praises at what Ghatotkacha incredibly does.

Bhagadatta cannot endure these exultations. He roars, draws his radiant bow, and shoots a scintillation of fire shafts at all the Pandava maharathas. He strikes Bhima with one arrow and Ghatotkacha with nine. He shoots Abhimanyu with three, and the Kekaya brothers with five. With his bow drawn in a circle, he pierces Kshatradeva's right arm deeply so that the Kshatriya's bow falls from his hand.

Bhagadatta strikes the five sons of Draupadi with five arrows; he kills Bhima's horses; with three feathered shafts, he cuts down Bhima's standard bearing the lion emblem. And with three more searing arrows he pierces Bhima's charioteer Visoka, who plunges to the floor of his chariot in agony. Bhima leaps down from his chariot with his mace. All your forces are terrified, watching him with gada upraised, looking like a mountain peak.

As Bhima and Ghatotkacha are battling the ruler of the Pragjyotishas, Arjuna appears, slaying the enemy on all sides. He sees his embattled brothers and radiates tides of fire in every direction. Duryodhana swiftly moves his legion of chariots and elephants. Arjuna charges that Kaurava akshauhini on his chariot of white horses.

Riding his elephant, Bhagadatta crushes the Pandava ranks, and storms towards Yudhishtira. A fierce battle begins between Bhagadatta and the Panchalas, the Srinjayas and the Kekayas. Bhima narrates the details of the slaughter of Iravat to Krishna and Arjuna.'

Sanjaya says, 'Hearing of his son Iravat's death, Arjuna's eyes glisten with tears and he sighs deeply. He says to Krishna, "Ah, the wise Vidura Mahatman surely saw this terrible destruction of the Kauravas and Pandavas clearly with his mind's eye. And so did he warn Dhritarashtra repeatedly.

Krishna, the Kauravas have killed so many of our heroes, and we have killed many of theirs. What contemptible deeds have been done in the pursuit of kingdom and wealth! I curse these that have led to such slaughter of kinsmen.

For him who is penniless, even death would be better than acquiring a fortune by killing his relatives. Krishna, what will we gain by destroying our own blood and lineage? Duryodhana, Sakuni and Karna are to blame for the extermination of the very Kshatriya race.

I now understand, Mahabaho, that Yudhishtira was wise to ask Suyodhana for only half the kingdom, indeed for only five villages. And even that was not given. Seeing so many brave warriors lying dead on the field, I curse myself and curse the dharma of a Kshatriya.

I continue to fight only so that I am not called weak and cowardly. Otherwise, this war repulses me. Ah, drive the horses forward towards the Dhartarashtra army; let me continue with this bloodthirsty sacrifice. There is no time to lose."

And Krishna goads those fleet white horses forward, while your troops are disturbed like the stormy ocean at high tide. The battle between Bhishma and the Pandavas is dreadful and deafening like thunder.

Your sons surround Drona like the Vasus surrounding Vasava, and storm into battle against Bhima. Bhishma and maharathas Kripa, Bhagadatta and Susarman advance against Arjuna. Kritavarman and Bahlika attack Satyaki. And king Amvashta sets himself before Abhimanyu. Other great chariot-warriors clash with each other. On every side, the war is ever more fierce and gruesome.

Bhima is a fire that blazes up with offerings of ghee. Your sons shroud him with arrows, but that Kshatriya, his body and litheness like a tiger's, licks the corners of his mouth in savage glee. Bhima kills your son Vyudoroska with a horseshoe-headed arrow; with another keen shaft, he blows Kundalin's heart to shreds like a great lion killing a small cub. He covers your other sons who are close in gusts of fire, killing Anadhriti, and Kundabhedin, and Virata, and Dirghalochana, and Dirghabahu, and Subahu, and Kanykadhyaja, who topple lifeless from their chariots, Bharatarishabha, looking like mango trees sprouted with red blossoms in spring.

Your other sons flee from Bhima as if from Yama himself. Drona envelops him in a shroud of arrows. But Bhima is irresistible, his prowess astounding as he continues to massacre your sons in the face of Drona's best efforts to thwart him. Bhima laughing aloud wildly, magnificently foils Drona's intense volleys, while he continues to feed the blood and corpses of your sons to yawning thirsty Kurukshetra. He sports among your sons like a tiger among a herd of deer. Like some mythic wolf, Vrikodara terrifies your sons and kills them one after the other.

Meanwhile, Bhishma, Bhagadatta and Kripa oppose the daring Arjuna. Dhananjaya thwarts the astras of his adversaries with his own, and kills many leading warriors of your army.

Abhimanyu divests king Amvashta of his chariot with a flurry of arrows. Amvashta leaps out of his ruined ratha in shame, hurling his sword at the high-souled Abhimanyu. And he hastily mounts the chariot of Hridika's son, while Abhimanyu shatters his sword in the air. The Pandava warriors marvel at the inspired archery of Subhadra's son and cheer loudly. Others led by Dhrishtadyumna continue to raze your forces, which still stand valiant, fighting on, facing death squarely.

With great feats of daring, the war swells and plunges on, claiming thousands of lives across grisly Kurukshetra every moment. Brave fighting men seize one another by the hair, fight with their nails and teeth, fists and knees, heads and hands and swords, and strapping arms. With frightening vigour they slaughter each other.

Father and son kill one another. The soldiers fight desperately using all their limbs. Beautiful bows with golden arrows slip from the hands of fallen warriors, and precious jewels and gleaming feathered shafts lie scattered thickly across the killing field; glistening arrows resemble snakes with shed skins.

Golden swords with ivory handles, and shields dappled with gold, lie fallen on the field, blood slicked, glistening under the hazy sun. Arrows, axes, swords and spears, many decked with gold, beautiful coats of mail, and heavy and spiked clubs, and howdahs of elephants, and yak tails, and fans, are strewn everywhere.

Lifeless maharathas, still clasping their weapons, look as if they are still alive, biting bloodied lips. Their arms and legs shattered with maces and heads smashed with clubs, or crushed by elephants, horses and chariots, foot-soldiers lie like broken puppets on the crimsoned earth. The earth laden thickly with the corpses of horses, men and elephants, looks beautiful, Rajan, as if dotted with hills great and small. How copiously Kurukshetra of the terrible blood sacrifice is covered with arrows, axes, swords, spears, cudgels, satagnis and mangled bodies.

Bleeding profusely, warriors lie with limbs askew, some silent in death, others moaning in anguish. What a sight the Earth presents! Smeared with sandalwood paste and wearing fine leather gloves and golden armlets, severed arms of powerful warriors are to be seen everywhere one looks; also mighty, shapely thighs like the trunks of elephants, and fallen bejewelled turbaned heads; and all this fills the field of dread with strange and poignant beauty.

The field of the Kurus, stained with blood, covered with bloodied coats of armour and radiant ornaments, looks as if on fire. Like a beautiful woman adorned with jewels, Bhumi appears eerily lovely with scattered ornaments, bows, arrows with golden wings, smashed chariots with silvery bells, and horses with tongues lolling out, with standards, quivers, banners and great conches of heroes, and elephants with severed trunks—with all these.

Wounded elephants groan in agony and appear like shifting mountains. Colourful mantles and finely wrought hooks studded with stones of lapis lazuli, and bells, flecked cloths and deerskin, neck-chains and golden girdles that once adorned majestic tuskers, are spread across the ground as if in some great and bizarre exhibition.

Various devices lie broken by golden darts, and embroidered saddles of horses, caked with mud. The hacked arms of horsemen, decked with bracelets, are everywhere, along with shining spears and swords, and turbans fallen off noble heads.

The earth looks like the star-strewn sky with crescent-headed arrows, crushed saddles of ranku deer skin, and glistening jewels from the coronets of kings. It glows with the resplendent parasols, yak tails and fans, and with faces, bright as the lotus or the moon, of daring Kshatriyas, with gleaming ear-rings and elegant beards, who lie lifeless.

Thus the two armies annihilate each other in the fight. The warriors are exhausted in body and spirit; the events and sights of the day have been splendid and horrifying beyond imagining; until, dark night sets in and nothing can be seen. The Kauravas and the Pandavas withdraw their armies. Retiring to their tents, they rest for the night.'

Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana, Sakuni, Dussasana and the invincible Karna sit together and evaluate their situation. How can the sons of Pandu and their allies be defeated? This is the subject of their discussion.

Duryodhana says to them, "Drona, Bhishma and Kripa, and Salya and Somadatta's son do not challenge the Pandavas. I do not know why. Unopposed, they are destroying my forces. Karna, I am being weakened and my weapons exhausted. I am baffled by my adversaries; I feel that even the Devas cannot vanquish them. My mind is filled with doubt; how can I quell the Pandavas in battle?"

Karna replies, "Do not be distressed, O lord of the Bhaaratas, for I will achieve the end you desire. Let Bhishma withdraw from the great war. When he puts down his weapons, I will kill the Parthas and the Somakas, before Bhishma's eyes.

I swear I will do this. Indeed, Bhishma shows mercy towards the Pandavas everyday. He cannot defeat those maharathas. Bhishma is proud in battle. He enjoys the fight. Why would he subdue the Pandavas, for then the war itself will end?

Go to Bhishma's tent, and ask the revered Pitamaha to set aside his weapons. When he does this, consider the Pandavas dead, slain along with all their supporters and kinsmen by me alone."

Thus addressed by Karna, Duryodhana says to his brothers, "Dussasana, get ready to accompany me." He says to Karna, "Parantapa, I will persuade Bhishma to consent to what you ask, and then promptly come to you. After Bhishma retires from the fight, you will destroy the enemy."

Accompanied by his brothers, your son sets out like He of a hundred sacrifices accompanied by the Devas. Dussasana makes him mount on his horse. Adorned with bracelets, with a crown on his head, and ornaments on his arms, he shines brilliantly as he goes forth. Smeared with fragrant sandalwood-paste, bright as the burnished gold of the bhandi flower, wearing spotless garments, Duryodhana goes forth like a great lion, looking like the glowing sun in the sky.

And as that tiger among men goes towards Bhishma's tent, many celebrated archers follow him. His brothers also accompany him, like the Devas walking behind Vasava. Other gallant men, riding on horses, elephants and chariots, go with him.

Like the Devas surrounding Sakra, his well-wishers assemble in hordes to protect him. Adored by all the Kauravas, Duryodhana rides slowly, regally towards Bhishma's tent.

He raises his right arm, like an elephant's trunk with which he can crush all enemies, and accepts the homage paid to him by the bystanders who stand with folded hands raised above their heads. As he canters along, he hears the sweet voices of the people of many lands. He is praised by their bards and poets. That great king responds with equal respect to all.

Many high-souled men stand around him with golden lamps burning with perfumed oil. Duryodhana looks radiant like the moon surrounded by blazing planets. Attendants with head-gear decked with gold, with canes and jhariharas in hand, gently part the crowd.

The king reaches Bhishma's tent and dismounts from his horse. He greets the Pitamaha and sits on a golden seat covered with an ornate cloth.

With hands folded, tearful eyes, and in a grieving voice, he says to Bhishma, "Parantapa, under your protection, we could defeat the very Devas and Asuras led by Indra. What can I say, then, of the gallant Pandavas, their kinsmen and friends?

Son of Ganga, be merciful. Kill the sons of Pandu like Mahendra destroying the Danavas. I will slay all the Somakas and the Panchalas, and the Karushas along with the Kekayas: these were your words to me. Stand by those words.

Kill the Parthas, and the Somakas. Honour your promise. If your love for the Pandavas, or loathing towards me, sways you to spare them, then allow Karna to fight. He will put a swift end to them along with their allies and kinsmen."

Having said this to Bhishma, your son Duryodhana falls silent.'

Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma is saddened by your son's dagger like words. But he does not reply with a single harsh word. He is overwhelmed with grief and anger, sighs deeply and reflects silently for a long time.

Looking up, as if angrily swallowing the world with the Devas, Asuras, and Gandharvas, Bhishma speaks calmly to Duryodhana, "Why do you stab me with such sharp words? I always try hard to achieve your interests. For this I am prepared to sacrifice my life in this battle.

The Pandavas cannot be defeated. This is clear ever since the brave son of Pandu pleased Agni in the Khandava vana, after vanquishing Sakra himself in battle. O Parantapa, Arjuna rescued you when you were captured by the Gandharvas; even that was a clear sign.

On that occasion, your brave brothers fled, as did Radha's son. What Arjuna did even then clearly revealed his prowess. In Virata's city, he single-handedly subdued us all. That was a sufficient indication.

He defeated and disrobed both Drona and me. That was ample evidence. When the cows were stolen, he overcame Aswatthaman and Saradwat. This surely should have shown you what he is.

Having easily quelled Karna, who boasted loudly of his manliness, Arjuna took his robes and gave them to Uttara. That should have been unmistakable proof for you. Arjuna defeated the Nivatakavachas who were invincible even to Vasava. How much clearer could it be, Suyodhana?

Who can hope to defeat such a hero, and besides one protected by the Protector of the Universe armed with sankha, chakra and gada? Krishna has infinite power, and is the Destroyer of the Universe. He is the highest Lord of all, the God of Devas, the eternal Paramatman. He is eulogised by Narada and other great Rishis.

But, ah, you are foolish and do not know what should be said and what should not. To a man on the point of death, all trees appear to be made of gold. Son of Gandhari, you see everything as being the opposite of what they truly are. Having provoked war with the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, fight them now. Let us see you not moan and whine like a boy, but fight like a man.

As for me, I will bring death to the Somakas and the Panchalas, avoiding only Sikhandin. If killed, I will go to Yama's abode; if I kill them, I will give you joy.

Once, Sikhandin was born in Drupada's palace as a woman. Upon receiving a boon, she became a man. She is Sikhandini. I cannot kill him even to save myself. She is the same Sikhandini created by Brahma. Sleep peacefully tonight. Tomorrow I will fight so fiercely that men will remember the battle as long as the world lasts."

Duryodhana comes away with these words. He bows to the Pitamaha and returns to his own tent. He dismisses his attendants. He enters his tent and sleeps. At dawn he rises, and orders the royal warriors, "Gather our forces. Today Bhishma will slay all the Somakas."

Bhishma regards Duryodhana's lamentations as commands to himself. Saddened, and deploring his servile position, he thinks carefully about a possible duel with Arjuna.

Duryodhana anticipates Bhishma's plan and commands Dussasana, "Deploy the chariots to defend Bhishma. Press all our twenty two legions into battle formation. The moment that we have been thinking about for years, the slaughter of the Pandava army and seizing the whole kingdom, has arrived.

For this, our first duty is to protect Bhishma. Well guarded, he will protect us and kill the Parthas in battle.

Bhishma said to me, 'I will not kill Sikhandini, for he was a woman once and I will not face him in battle. The world knows that, to honour my father, I gave up a vast kingdom. I will not kill any woman or anyone who was once a woman. This is the truth by which I live and the dharma I will never break.

Sikhandin was first born a woman. You have heard that story as I have narrated it to you before the war began. Killing herself first and taking birth as a daughter, she who was once the princess Amba of Kasi has become a man. She will fight me, but I will never aim an arrow at her.

Other Kshatriyas who fight for the victory of the Pandavas, I will consume them all with devastras.' These were the wise Bhishma's words to me.

Our first and last duty is to protect the son of Ganga. If a lion is left unprotected in the jungle, he can be killed even by a wolf. We cannot allow the Pitamaha to be slain by Sikhandin like the lion by the wolf. Let Sakuni and Salya, Kripa and Drona, and Vivimsati safeguard Bhishma. If he is safe, our victory is assured."

Hearing Duryodhana, all surround Bhishma with a majestic legion of chariots. Your sons position themselves around him and ride into battle. As they advance the earth and the sky shudder and strike fear into the hearts of the Pandavas.

The Kaurava maharathas stand around Bhishma, in full armour, backed by that resplendent chariot force and by their elephants. They hold their positions to protect the Pitamaha even like the Devas watching over Indra in the war against the Asuras.

Duryodhana says to his brother, "Yudhamanyu protects the left wheel of Arjuna's chariot, and Uttamaujas his right wheel. Arjuna in turn protects Sikhandin. Dussasana, see that Bhishma is never left unprotected for even a moment so that Sikhandin might attack him."

With his surging forces, Dussasana rides with Bhishma in the vanguard of the Kaurava army. Seeing Bhishma encircled by so many chariots, Arjuna says to Dhrishtadyumna, "Prince of Panchala, place Sikhandin before Bhishma today, and I myself will be your brother's protector."'

Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma advances with his forces. He ranges them in the sweeping, encompassing Sarvatobhadra vyuha. Kripa and Kritavarman, and maharatha Saibya, and Sakuni, and Jayadratha of the Sindhus, and Sudakshina king of the Kambojas take their positions at the forefront of the army and the vyuha, along with Bhishma and your sons.

Drona and Bhurisravas, and Salya and Bhagadatta, guard the vyuha's right flank. Aswatthaman and Somadatta, and those maharathas, the two princes of Avanti, with a vast host, protect the left. Surrounded by the Trigartas, Duryodhana places himself in the middle, ready for the Pandavas. Maharathas Alambusha and Srutayush, position themselves behind that vyuha and the whole army.

Your mail-clad warriors form this enveloping vyuha and they look like flames upon Kurukshetra.

Yudhishtira and Bhima, Nakula and Sahadeva, in glistening armour, position themselves in the vanguard of their vyuha, in front of all their fighting men. Dhrishtadyumna and Virata, and maharatha Satyaki stand ready, hungry for battle. Sikhandin and Arjuna, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, Mahabaho Chekitana, and the valiant Kuntibhoja, all encircled by their forces, stand prepared. Abhimanyu and Drupada, and the five Kaikeya brothers, all in their chariots, are splendid to behold, weapons at the ready.

Having formed their mighty vyuha, the Pandavas serenely wait for the conches to boom, the drums to roll and the day's fighting to begin. Today, the kings in your vyuha and their warriors set Bhishma at their head and with a tumult of blaring sankhas and deafening roars, they charge out against the Parthas. The Pandavas, led by Bhimasena, rush out against Bhishma seeking victory.

Roaring and shouting, blowing their krakachas and cow-horns, beating their drums and cymbals, the Pandavas forge into battle. We respond to their call with the pounding of our drums, and clash of cymbals and conches; roaring like lions, we attack our enemies furiously.

Those sounds from both armies mingle like two surging seas and the warriors of the two armies charge wildly into the ranks of the enemy, so that in moments there are no longer two great forces facing each other but a single throng of men all intent on killing one another as brutally as they can. The earth shudders with the clamour of that vast collision.

Birds scream and wheel in the sky. The radiant sun dims. Fierce winds blow, portending ever greater terrors. Jackals roam howling, foretelling another horrible carnage. All corners of the earth seem to be on fire, and dust rains down.

A rain of hewn limbs and spurting, splashing blood falls on to the earth. And tears fall from the eyes of weeping animals. In their distress they urinate and defecate. The cries of the Rakshasas drown every other roar and shout of the battle. Jackals and vultures, and crows and dogs wheel at the perimeter of the holocaust and also in the air above the canopy of arrows and spears that quickly covers Kurukshetra.

Ominous meteors collide against the sun and fall to the earth, foreboding incomprehensible tragedy. The blast of conches and drums shake the Pandava and the Dhartarashtra hosts like forests in a hurricane. The uproar of the two armies, kings, elephants and horses, which face each other in that malevolent hour, resembles that of a raging ocean.’

Sanjaya says, 'Riding his tawny horses, the dashing Abhimanyu charges Duryodhana's host, his bow flaring arrows. Bharatarishabha, your warriors cannot withstand him, as he plunges into the sea of Kaurava hordes with his wealth of astras.

Subhadra's son kills many Kshatriyas with deadly shafts that are like venom-spitting cobras and rods of death. Phalguni's son truncates maharathas and their chariots, horses and riders, elephant-warriors and their tuskers. The kings of the earth are delighted, and laud these feats and those who achieve them, regardless of whether they are ally or enemy.

Abhimanyu tosses those Kaurava legions about like a storm that scatters a heap of cotton in every direction. Like elephants stuck in mire, your men flounder without a protector. Having routed them, Abhimanyu stands like a fire which blazes pure and smokeless. Like insects drawn irresistibly to a fire but consumed by it, your warriors cannot endure that Parantapa. Abhimanyu looks like Vasava himself armed with his Vajra.

His gold inlaid bow flashes like lightning amidst clouds as it courses through the enemy in its magnificent archer's hand, loosing endless shafts like swarms of bees from trees blossoming in the forest. No one is able to strike or contain Abhimanyu, as he careers over Kurukshetra in his golden chariot. Riding swift as the wind, the sublime youth baffles Kripa and Drona, Aswatthaman and Jayadratha. He consumes your forces, his bow always bent in a circle, his chariot also wheeling in a circle, resembling the bright halo sometimes seen around the sun.

Seeing him lustily decimating the enemy, brave Kshatriyas think that the world contains two Arjunas. The vast host of the Bhaaratas reel under that golden prince's onslaught like a drunken woman. He routs them everywhere, terrifying maharathas and delighting his friends, like Vasava who pleased the Devas when he vanquished Mayaa.

Your warriors roar in anguish even like thunderclouds. Hearing that awful wail like the turbulent sea raging at full tide when lashed by violent winds, Duryodhana says to Rishyasringa's Rakshasa son Alambusha,

"Abhimanyu single-handedly destroys my army like Vritra routing Indra's legions. You, who know war so well, must challenge him for it seems none else can. Ride swiftly, Alambusha, and kill the preening sons of Arjuna. And led by Bhishma and Drona, we will kill Arjuna himself."

That dreadful Rakshasa charges into the fray, his roars like thunderclouds rumbling, and the Pandava host trembles. Why, many warriors are so terrified by those roars that they fall dead. Jubilant, dancing in glee, it appears, in his chariot, Alambusha advances towards Abhimanyu with bow drawn round. On reaching Arjuna's son he begins to despatch his supporters. Alambusha dwindles the Pandava legion, like Balasura once did the divine host.

Carnage and rivers of blood flow once more when the Rakshasa assails the Pandava force with thousands of immaculate arrows. Terror-stricken, the Pandava army flees his slaughter. Ravaging the enemy like an elephant trampling lotus-stalks, Alambusha now rides at the Pandavas themselves. The five sons of Draupadi attack the Rakshasa like five planets plunging at the Sun. They torment him as the five planets afflict the Moon at the end of the yuga.

Prativindhya pierces the Rakshasa with shafts as heavy and sharp as battle-axes, which can cleave any armour, drawing geysers of blood from the Rakshasa, who looks like clouds stabbed by the sun's rays. Lacerated by golden-winged shafts, he looks like a mountain with peaks ablaze.

The Pandavas wound him grievously with gusts of arrows that look like angry snakes. Alambusha is enraged like the king of the Nagas himself. Pierced all over by those maharathas, he faints and remains unconscious for a long time. Awakening, he jumps up with a fulminant roar and using the mahima siddhi grows to twice his size, and in fury carves up their bows, arrows and standards. Baring great fangs in a hideous smile, he shoots them each with five seething shafts.

Wild Alambusha dances in his chariot, and kills their horses and sarathies. Burning, he stabs them with thousands of every kind of fell barb. That night ranger dashes forward now to kill the beleaguered sons of Pandu. Seeing them tormented by the Rakshasa, Abhimanyu attacks him. The battle between him and the Rakshasa compares with that between Vritra and Vasava. The maharathas of both armies witness that encounter. Their eyes bloodshot, both warriors seem to be aflame with wrath, and regard each other as the fire that burns at the end of the yuga.

The duel between them is like the ancient one between Sakra and Sambara in the war between the Devas and Asuras.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Sanjaya, how does Alambusha resist Abhimanyu who so imperiously dominates our maharathas? How does the son of Subhadra face Rishyasringa's son? Tell me all this in detail, exactly as it happened. How do Bhima, and Ghatotkacha, Nakula and Sahadeva, and maharatha Satyaki, and Arjuna confront my forces? You are a master narrator, Sanjaya; tell me everything.'

Sanjaya says, 'I will describe the merciless, tumultuary duel between Alambusha and Abhimanyu. I will also describe Arjuna's prowess in battle, and the marvellous feats of Bhima, Nakula and Sahadeva, and the achievements of your warriors led by Bhishma and Drona.

Alambusha roars at Abhimanyu to stand and fight and then charges him. Abhimanyu whirls around to face his father's sworn enemy. Mounted on their chariots, like Deva and Danava, man and Rakshasa confront each other. Alambusha owns the hermetic powers of maya, while Abhimanyu is accomplished in the use of divine astras.

Abhimanyu strikes the Rakshasa with three sizzling shafts, and yet again with five. Alambusha pierces Abhimanyu's chest with nine barbs like a mahout goading his elephant with his hook. In a wink, he looses a scathing volley of a thousand shafts at Arjuna's superb son. Incensed Abhimanyu makes a bloody home in the Rakshasa's hirsute breast for nine steely arrows, which delve deep into Alambusha's innards. The bloodied Rakshasa looks like a mountain lush with flowering kinsukas. The Rakshasa bears those golden-winged shafts and glows like a mountain on fire.

Alambusha shrouds Abhimanyu, equal to Mahendra himself, in clouds of smoking arrows. Like Yama dandas these pass through Abhimanyu into the earth. Abhimanyu's golden shafts plunge through the Rakshasa and also enter the ground. Alambusha retreats before the prince's scintillating barrage of arrows, like Mayaa repulsed by Sakra. Quickly the Rakshasa invokes sorcery, mantling the field in perfect darkness using maya. All the warriors on Kurukshetra are lost in that blind night. Abhimanyu is hidden by it, and friend and enemy cannot be distinguished.

Abhimanyu calls forth the blazing Suryastra and Alambusha's illusional night is dispelled in a moment, and everything is visible again. With renewed ferocity Abhimanyu covers the Rakshasa with a solid swath of brilliant arrows.

Now Alambusha creates a slew of magical illusions, hunts of sinister beasts and monsters bound at Arjuna's son from every side. Abhimanyu dissipates them all with knowing astras. His every sorcery pierced and made impotent, and bleeding from countless wound mouths that Abhimanyu opens all over his devilish body, Alambusha flees in terror from the lustrous prince.

After routing the devious Rakshasa, Abhimanyu begins to demolish your forces, truly like a maddened tusker wading into a lake of lotuses. Seeing the field being richly strewn with his warriors' corpses, Bhishma looses a tremendous volley at Abhimanyu, shrouding him in a wave of arrows.

Swiftly, numerous maharathas of the Dhartarashtra army encircle that angelic and terrible young Kshatriya and strike him repeatedly. So resembling his father and equal to Krishna in profound valour, Abhimanyu demonstrates his stunning genius worthy of both his vamsas. He astounds his gathered enemies with archery not yet seen on Kurukshetra.

Seeing his precious magnificent son hemmed in, Arjuna arrives at the place where Abhimanyu continues to raze your warriors with breathtaking ease. Immediately Bhishma rides at Arjuna, like Rahu approaching the Sun. Supported by chariots, elephants, and horses, your sons surround the Pitamaha as he comes. And the Pandavas ride with Arjuna and a feverish battle breaks out.

Kripa stabs Arjuna with twenty-five arrows, as Dhananjaya engages Bhishma. Like a tiger attacking an elephant, Satyaki pierces Kripa with countless whetted shafts. Enraged, Gautama bloodies his chest with nine arrows like time. Sini's grandson draws his bow round and looses a deadly astra him at Kripa, but fiery Aswatthaman cuts it down as it flames at the old Acharya. Satyaki leaves Kripa and charges Drona's son like Rahu flying to devour the Moon. Aswatthaman rives Satyaki's bow in two, and launches a fury of barbs at the bright Vrishni.

Satyaki seizes up another colossal bow and strikes Aswatthaman with six searing arrows through his chest and arms, drawing a howl of pain from him. Aswatthaman faints and falls to the floor of his chariot, clinging on to its flagpole. Regaining his senses in a moment, he looses a long shaft at Satyaki, which passes right through the handsome body of Sini's grandson, and plunges into the earth like a young snake entering its hole after the end of winter.

Another arrow shatters Satyaki's standard. Drona's son roars like five lions and covers his adversary in a rain of arrows as the clouds do the sun at the onset of the monsoon. Like the sun from behind clouds, Satyaki emerges undimmed, and shrouds the son of Drona with twisting sheets of arrows, vicious windings. Aswatthaman unravels them unscathed. Anger mounting, with a roar, Satyaki unleashes a thousand arrows in a moment, a deadly relucent torrent of shafts. Seeing his son afflicted like the Moon by Rahu, Drona storms at Satyaki, striking him deep with a streak of lightning from his great bow.

Satyaki turns away from Aswatthaman and pierces Drona with a scourge of twenty stinging barbs. Immediately, Arjuna rushes at Drona, and these two, guru and sishya, assail each other like the planets Budha and Sukra in the sky.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'How do those famed warriors, Drona and Arjuna, face each other in battle? The son of Pandu is as dear as a son to Drona. Arjuna worships the Acharya. Both maharathas delight in war, and both are awesomely powerful. How do they battle each other?'

Sanjaya says, 'In battle Drona remains distant from his love of Arjuna. Arjuna focuses on his dharma as a Kshatriya and does not recognise his teacher but only an enemy. Kshatriyas never turn away from battle. They are detached, and fight their fathers and brothers.

Arjuna stabs Drona with three scalding shafts. Drona remains unperturbed. Arjuna covers the Acharya in a mantle of arrows. Drona blazes up in anger at the heart of the dreadful war, like a fire in a dense forest. Drona covers Arjuna with myriad arrows. Duryodhana sends Susarman to protect Drona's flank. The king of the Trigartas swathes Arjuna in countless iron-tipped missiles, beautiful like cranes flying through the sky. They pierce Arjuna like birds vanishing into a fruit laden tree. Arjuna roars and savages Susarman and his son with riptides from the Gandiva.

Despite the towering attack, and quite ready to die, they do not retreat. They target Arjuna's chariot and the Pandava faces their onslaught like a mountain receiving a cloudburst. Partha's prodigious archery is superhuman as, almost with disdain, he scatters his enemies' combined, virile flurries of fire, cutting down their storms of arrows as if he were facing some boys in battle, why like a high wind scattering fleecy clouds. The Devas and Danavas congregated in the firmament acclaim his feat.

Arjuna invokes the Vayavya astra against the Trigarta legion. A mighty gale sweeps across Kurukshetra, shaking the sky, felling trees, and blowing away enemy chariots and soldiers like bits of straw. Drona looses the Sailastra, which makes Arjuna's squall abate and calm returns to all quarters. But, fearing Arjuna now that they have seen some part of his actual prowess, the Trigarta maharathas are despondent and leave the battlefield.

Duryodhana and Kripa, and Aswatthaman, and Salya, and Sudakshina, the king of the Kambojas, and Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and Bahlika supported by the Bahlikas, surround Arjuna with their chariots. Bhagadatta and the mighty Srutayush encircle Bhima with an akshauhini of elephants. And Bhurisravas, and Sala, and Subala's son attack the twins with luminous whetted arrows. Along with your sons, Bhishma rides to surround Yudhishtira.

Bhima watches that legion advance and licks the corners of his mouth like a hungry lion. He seizes his mace, leaps off his chariot again, terrifying your warriors. The elephant-warriors besiege him from all sides. At the very heart of your sons' forces, Bhima looks like the sun in the midst of dark clouds. And like the wind that scatters those clouds, the Vayuputra swings his mace all around him in scarlet eruptions to slaughter your son's elephant legion. The shrill trumpeting of those tuskers and Bhima's dreadful roars shake the very earth; covered with gashes inflicted by the tusks of the elephants, Bhima blossoms in blood like a flowering kinsuka.

Seizing some of the elephants by their tusks, he rips them out and then with those tusks smashes other elephants on their round foreheads and kills them like Siva himself. Like Rudra, his body and mace are drenched in blood. A few surviving tuskers run in every direction, crushing their own ranks as they blunder away from the fearful Bhima. Duryodhana's frantic forces quit the field any way they can.'

Sanjaya says, 'At high noon a bloody battle breaks out between Bhishma and the Somakas. Bhishma denudes the Pandava ranks with thousands of immaculate arrows, every one claiming a life. He crushes them like a herd of bulls grinding paddy clumps under their hooves.

Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin, and Virata and Drupada attack maharatha Bhishma with a torment of arrows. Bhishma pierces Dhrishtadyumna and Virata each with three exquisite barbs, and aims a long lance at Drupada. Wounded, shamed by Parantapa Bhishma, those maharathas are like snakes stamped upon. Sikhandin darts within range and besieges the Pitamaha with countless arrows. Bhishma does not shoot back, still regarding his enemy as a woman.

Dhrishtadyumna skewers Bhishma with three lean shafts through his arms and chest. Drupada pierces him with twenty-five barbs, Virata with ten, and Sikhandin with another twenty-five. Bhishma is covered in blood, and looks quite magnificent like an ashoka in full carmine bloom. Bhishma shoots them each with three arrows. He cracks Drupada's bow with a broad-headed shaft. Drupada seizes another bow and strikes his adversary with five barbs quick as one. He stabs Bhishma's sarathy with three shafts.

Draupadi's five sons, the five Kaikeya brothers and Satyaki, all led by Yudhishtira, charge Ganga's son to protect the Panchalas and Dhrishtadyumna. All your warriors attack the Pandava host to defend Bhishma.

Another pitched battle ensues, resulting in another carnage. Maharathas kill maharathas. Soldiers, elephant-riders and horse-riders kill others with inhuman, heartless projectiles. Riderless chariots are hauled wildly across death's abysmal field. Careening blindly, these crush countless men and mow horses down; they dash everywhere like the wind strewing cloud forms across a sunset sky, bathing it in stains of blood.

With sparkling ear-rings, bright garlands and bracelets, handsome as the sons of Devas, surpassing Vaisravana in wealth and Brihaspati in intelligence, great rulers of vast kingdoms, brave maharathas left without their chariots, run like ordinary men in every direction.

Mighty tuskers, their skilled riders slain, crush friendly ranks and run wildly until they fall. These mammoths, their armour cut away by arrows and spears, flowing blood from all over their massive bodies, roar like clouds and scatter in all directions. The chamaras and dappled standards, their golden parasols, and the dazzling spears of their riders lie in ruins everywhere.

Elephant-riders of both armies, their mounts slain, run on foot in that awful melee. Thousands of horses with golden ornaments gallop away from death's field. Armed with swords, but without horses, horsemen run from their assailants.

Elephants continue to dash against other elephants, crushing foot-soldiers and horses on their way. They smash countless chariots; chariots ride tilting over fallen horses lying in their path. Horses trample foot-soldiers under their hooves. Thus, O Rajan, they massacre one another and mercy has fled this war entirely.

The river of blood swells every hour, frothing across Kurukshetra with a hundred tributary streams. Fallen bows obstruct its straight course, and the hair of dead warriors forms its moss. Smashed chariots are its islands, and arrows beyond count create its eddies. Horses make up its fish; heads of tuskers its boulders; butchered elephants are the river's crocodiles. And coats of mail and helmets form its froth.

Bows still clutched by fallen warriors regulate its swift current and swords are its tortoises. Banners and emblems stand like forlorn trees on its banks. And bodies of men are its banks relentlessly consumed by the russet river. Countless carnivores are its swans, drinking thirstily of its sanguine waters.

That river swells not the ocean but Yama's kingdom. Noble and fearless maharathas try to cross that river with their chariots, elephants, and horses for rafts and boats. Like the river Vaitarani bears the dead to Yama's realm, so does that bloody river on Kurukshetra sweep along diffident and unconscious men.

The Kshatriyas look upon that horrible carnage and exclaim, "Alas, the very race of Kshatriyas will perish from Duryodhana's sin. Deluded by greed, why, O Dhritarashtra, was he so envious of the virtuous Pandavas?"

Such cries are accompanied by others that praise the sons of Pandu. Hearing these reproaches, Duryodhana says to Bhishma and Drona and Kripa and Salya, “Fight without pride. Why do you delay?”

The murderous war caused by a game of dice, resumes between the Kauravas and the Pandavas.

Son of Vichitravirya, you see now the dreadful outcome of disdaining the advice of your true friends. Neither the Pandavas nor their forces and allies, nor the Kauravas, fear for their lives in this war. And for this very reason, Rajan, of savage Kshatriya dharma, such a terrible destruction of kinsmen is underway on Kurukshetra, ah, caused either by Destiny or your wicked design.’

Sanjaya says, 'With banks of razor like arrows Arjuna kills the warriors who ride with Susarman. Susarman strikes Arjuna with an angry volley. He pierces Krishna with seventy barbs and Arjuna again with nine. Serenely, Arjuna continues to kill Susarman's men.

Those maharathas flee from Arjuna as if Death himself had come to hunt them at the end of the yuga, for indeed the Dwapara Yuga is drawing to its end and the Kali, age of wrath, is rising near. Some of the Trigartas jump down from their horses, some from their chariots, others clamber down from their elephants and flee. Others swiftly escape on their very mounts and chariots. Foot-soldiers throw away their weapons in panic, and run helter-skelter with no thought for their comrades. Though stridently forbidden by Susarman and other noble kings, they desert their armies.

Seeing this rout, Duryodhana, together with Bhishma, mounts a driving attack against Arjuna to protect Susarman. While his men take to their heels all around him, Duryodhana is unyielding and, surrounded by his brothers, continues to engage the enemy with undiminished vigour.

To protect Arjuna, the other Pandavas advance on Bhishma. Aware of Phalguni's prowess, they still dash forward roaring, and the Pitamaha relentlessly dwindles the Pandavas army with every moment, his every arrow a killer. At noon, absolute, bloody, chaos reigns on Kurukshetra so it seems unclear whether the war between cousins is being fought in the realm of the living or the dead, whether on Bhumi or in Yamaloka.

Striking Kritavarman with five arrows, the triumphant Satyaki kills thousands of Dhartarashtra men with uncanny archery so like his master Arjuna's. King Drupada, having already drawn blood from his old and hated enemy, his boyhood friend Drona, strikes the Acharya with seventy shafts, all loosed in a moment, and Drona's sarathy with another nine.

Bhima roars like some mythic tiger after wounding his great granduncle, king Bahlika. Chitrasena wounds Abhimanyu deep with a brace of torrid shafts, and the luminous Abhimanyu adorns Chitrasena's broad breast with three perfect barbs. Locked in battle, the two are as glorious on the field as Venus and Saturn in the sky. Then, in a flash, Abhimanyu kills his noble adversary's horses and charioteer and maharatha Chitrasena leaps off his chariot and mounts Durmukha's.

Drona repeatedly carves slivers off Drupada's ratha, and remembering their enmity of such long standing, the Panchala king retreats with his swift horses.

Bhima kills Bahlika's horses and sarathy. Finding himself in grave danger, Bahlika jumps down from his chariot and mounts Lakshmana's and they ride away from dreadful Bhima.

Satyaki thwarts Kritavarman, who fights for Duryodhana, and looses a plethora of every kind of barb upon the Pitamaha whom Kritavarman protects. Piercing Bhishma with sixty whetted feathered shafts, the ebullient Satyaki seems to dance on his chariot, brandishing his bow. Bhishma shoots an extraordinary iron arrow at the Vrishni, flecked with gold, serpentine and beautiful as a Naga woman.

But Satyaki intercepts it with another astra and both exceptional weapons explode into flames and lunge harmless to the ground like extinguished meteors. Satyaki seizes up a shimmering golden spear and casts it like a streak of lightning at Bhishma. It flies at the Kuru ancient like his very death coming to claim a doomed man. Quicker than seeing, Bhishma trisects it with two lean horseshoe-headed arrows and it falls to the ground in three strips, undone.

Possessed by the murderous spirit of war, yet smiling the while, Parantapa Bhishma strikes Satyaki through his chest with nine arrows in an incredibly close and neat cluster. With their chariots, elephants and horses, the Pandava warriors besiege Bhishma from every side to rescue Satyaki.

Yet another general fray, always more bloody than the ones gone before, breaks out between the Pandava and the Kaurava hosts, both seeking glory, both wanting victory more than life itself.'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Bhishma seethe upon Kurukshetra, encircled by the Pandavas, like the sun in the sky by monsoon clouds, Duryodhana says to Dussasana, "Parantapa Bhishma is surrounded by the Pandavas. Your only charge is to protect him. If we guard him well, our Pitamaha will destroy the Panchalas and the Pandavas. Defending Bhishma is our first and highest dharma, for he is our protector and our main hope. Surround him with your legions, Dussasana, and make sure he comes to no harm!"

Dussasana surrounds Bhishma with a vast force and stands ready to fight anyone who threatens his grandsire. With thousands of horsemen carrying shining spears, swords and standards, forming a confident legion, together with twice as many proficient foot-soldiers, Subala's son Sakuni assails Nakula, Sahadeva and Yudhishtira.

Duryodhana sends ten thousand horsemen to attack the Pandavas. As they fly like so many Garudas, the earth trembles and groans under their horse hooves, the din of which resounds like a bamboo forest on fire. They raise a cloud of dust as they hurtle across the battlefield, obscuring the sun. They unnerve the Pandava host like a flight of swans that disturbs a lake while descending on it. Nothing can be heard above their loud neighing.

Yudhishtira and the sons of Madri contain their charge like the shore the surging sea at high tide. Those three maharathas mow down line after line of horsemen with tides of arrows. Themselves wheeling across the battleground, the three Pandava brothers display some incredible archery in concert as they decapitate those onrushing lines of horsemen while never so much as scratching any other part of their bodies.

Felled with swords and arrows, heads drop like fruits from tall trees. Everywhere riders and their horses fall dead to the ground. Many horses bolt in fear like deer on seeing lions. And the Pandavas blow their conches and beat their drums in triumph.

Duryodhana is crestfallen to see his forces demolished again and says to Salya, king of the Madras, "Before your eyes, Yudhishtira and the twins have routed our army. Mahabaho, you are powerful and irresistible. Stop Yudhishtira, like the continent that resists the ocean."

Salya rides at Yudhishtira with a legion of chariots. As he rushes at Yudhishtira like a tidal wave, the Pandava calmly strikes Salya through his chest with ten thudding shafts. Nakula and Sahadeva assail him with seven more. Salya, whose very name means to menace, to harry, pierces them each with three arrows, and further stabs Yudhishtira with sixty keen darts. Enraged, he makes the twins bleed with two shafts each. Parantapa Bhima sees Yudhishtira within Salya's reach, as in the jaws of Death, and rushes to his defence.

And as the sun begins to set, one more dark and destructive battle begins.'

Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma bestrides the yawning field and his great bow radiates arrows in every direction, every shaft claiming an enemy soldier's life or drawing blood from a Pandava maharatha. Yet he fights without rancour even with deep sadness in his aged heart, and even for this is more terrible. He strikes Bhima with twelve arrows and Satyaki with nine. Stabbing Nakula with three barbs, he shoots Sahadeva with seven. Yudhishtira he pierces through his arms and chest with twelve faultless shafts. Lacerating Dhrishtadyumna with a flat flight of barbs, that mighty old lion roars deafeningly.

Nakula stabs him with twelve arrows and Satyaki with three. Dhrishtadyumna shoots him with seventy shafts and Bhima with seven. Yudhishtira pierces the Pitamaha with twelve barbs. Drona attacks Satyaki and Bhima at once, stabbing them each with five whetted arrows like Yama dandas. Bhima and Satyaki retaliate without a moment's pause.

Rulers of the eastern, western and northern regions, the Sauviras, the Kitavas, the Malavas, the Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Sibis, and the Vasatis, vigorously assail Bhishma despite his endless barrage of arrows. Other kings of various realms loose many astras of fire, water and air at the Pandavas themselves.

The Pandavas surround the Pitamaha. Encircled and doubly defiant, the aged lion blazes like a forest fire, continuing to raze the enemy army with transcendent archery. His chariot is his fire-chamber; his bow its flames; swords, arrows and maces are his fuel; his shafts are sparks; and Bhishma himself becomes the fire that consumes his adversaries.

Bhishma shrouds the Pandava hosts with golden-winged shafts decked with the feathers of vultures, with nalikas, and dirghastras, elongated barbs. He fells elephants and chariot-warriors. He makes the Pandava legion of chariots look like a forest of palmyras shorn of their leafy heads. He decimates riders of horses, elephants and chariots without favour. Hearing the thunder of his bowstring and the thunderclaps of his palms as he looses his tirades of fire, all the soldiers tremble.

His arrows shot from his bow pierce through armour like through butter. And again, endlessly, we see riderless chariots dragged across the battlefield by their yoked horses. Fourteen thousand celebrated and noble maharathas, with golden standards, of the Chedis, the Kasi, and the Karushas, stand firm and ready to sacrifice their lives; they do not retreat, and are swiftly despatched, in blasts of gore, along with their horses and elephants, by Bhishma like Siva with mouth agape.

We see thousands of chariots with smashed axles, terraces and wheels. The ground is covered with wrecked chariots, arrows, axes, ruined coats of mail and the mighty bodies of maharathas, which seem to glow on even after life has left them. Maces and arrows, quivers and bows, swords, and jewelled severed heads lie scattered in profusion; as do gloves and felled standards, and riven bows.

Riderless elephants and horse-riders lie dead as if they are mere clods of earth, so plentiful are they. The most valiant efforts of the Pandavas cannot any more rally their maharathas who lose their nerve and flee before Bhishma's relentless arrow storms. By himself the Kuru Pitamaha disperses that teeming force of fighting men with the ageless energy of Indra. With its chariots, elephants, horses and standards felled, the Pandava army in disarray laments loudly and scatters. Driven by ruthless destiny, fathers, sons and friends kill one another, on and on.

The Pandava warriors tear off their armour and run dementedly in all directions, like terrified bulls lowing in despair, and running wild and unrestrained from the great terror which is Bhishma.

Seeing the Pandava army disbanding, Krishna reins in Arjuna's chariot, and says to his warrior, "The awaited hour has arrived. Strike now, O tiger among men, or you will be lost. You said, in Sanjaya's presence, in the assembly of kings in Virata's city, 'I will kill all Duryodhana's warriors and their followers, including Bhishma and Drona, if they oppose me in battle.' Son of Kunti, O Parantapa, honour your words now. Remember your Kshatriya dharma; fight fearlessly."

Arjuna, troubled and unsure, says, "I can seize the kingdom, slaughtering the innocent, or accept exile in the forest. These are my choices. Which of these should I strive for? Spur the horses on, Krishna; I will obey you. I will kill the invincible Bhishma." Krishna goads the silvery white horses to where Bhishma stands dazzling like the sun.

Seeing Arjuna riding at Bhishma, Yudhishtira's host rallies to the fight. Roaring, the Pitamaha shrouds Arjuna's chariot in an opacity of arrows so it is hidden from view. Krishna adroitly urges the wounded horses on. Arjuna raises the Gandiva and slashes Bhishma's bow into pieces. Bhishma promptly strings another bow. Arjuna breaks this one as well. Bhishma cries out in some delight, "Wonderful, Mahabaho! Well done, son of Kunti."

Bhishma takes up another beautiful bow and looses a crescendo of arrows at Arjuna's chariot. Krishna skilfully manoeuvres his horses and avoids the searing volley. Yet some shafts find their mark, and those two tigers among men look like two angry bulls gored by horns in a fight.

Meanwhile, yet again, Krishna sees that while Bhishma, positioned between the two armies, unleashes his firestorms of arrows, scorching everything like the Sun himself, and killing Yudhishtira's warriors relentlessly, proclaiming, as it were, the end of the yuga, Arjuna still hesitates and turns mild when faced with his grandsire.

Leaving Arjuna's horses, Krishna leaps off the chariot in fury. His eyes crimson, his body burning with terrible light, and the whip in his hand his only weapons, the Lord of the universe runs straight at Bhishma, like some great lion, his strides appearing to cleave the earth, and his heart set on killing the Kuru ancient.

All the assembled warriors can only watch, rooted and stunned as they see Krishna rush Bhishma. "Bhishma is dead!" they cry. Their shouts of dismay are loud and fearful.

Dark as lapis lazuli, clad in yellow silk, Krishna streaks towards Bhishma, like a thunderhead charged with lightning. Like a lion at an elephant, or a great bull thundering at another, Krishna roars as he storms at Bhishma.

Seeing the Dark One come with cosmic fury on his brow and in his eyes, Bhishma stands perfectly calm and fearlessly draws his great bow. Serenely he says to Krishna, "Come, O you with eyes like lotus petals. O Lord of the Devas, I bow to you. O best of the Satwatas, kill me today in this great war, for, Govinda, I will be blessed in every way if I die by your hand in battle. Krishna, the honour in the three worlds is mine today. Kill me as you please, for I am your slave."

But Arjuna has leapt down from his chariot and running after Krishna, seizes the Blue God in his arms, restraining him. Krishna hardly seems to notice Arjuna and drags him along as if he were not there at all. At the tenth step, Arjuna falls to the ground and stops Krishna by clinging to his legs.

Arjuna cries in despair to the terrifying Lord, “Stop, Krishna! You must not break your vow that you will not fight or men will say that Krishna is a liar. This burden is mine and I will kill the Pitamaha. I swear by my weapons, by truth, and my punya that I will do everything in my power to destroy all my enemies. Watch me now and I will effortlessly quell this great maharatha, even like the crescent moon being extinguished at the end of the yuga, at the moment of final destruction.”

Krishna’s brow is still like thunder, but he remains silent and allows Arjuna to lead him back to their chariot. The moment of absolute dread passes and the universe breathes again!

Bhishma once more envelops the two Krishnas in a cloud of arrows, while continuing to consume the Pandava ranks like the sun sapping the life force of all things in summer. The Pitamaha kills two Pandava soldiers for every life that the sons of Pandu claim from his own army. Without being able to even look upon him who blazes like the noonday sun, thousands of helpless dispirited warriors perish at Bhishma’s hands.

Fearful and grown timid, the Pandavas themselves are powerless before Bhishma’s super-human feats in war. Unprotected, their forces flee like a herd of cows swarmed by an army of ants, his millions of arrows.

The Pandavas, too, cannot bear to look upon that maharatha who turns his fire on Yudhishtira, their king. As the sun sets ever so slowly for the decimated Pandava army, and too swiftly for the triumphant Kauravas, the exhausted soldiers withdraw from the battlefield.’

Sanjaya says, 'Even while they fight like figures in a nightmare scathed by the many flares of Bhishma, the sun sets and in the deep twilight nothing can be seen, not the corpses now past all count with which the awesome grandsire has strewn Kurukshetra. Yudhishtira sees the remnants of his devastated forces throw down their weapons and eagerly quit the battlefield before the conches have been sounded for the day's slaughtering to end. But Bhishma stands still blazing in the gloom of dusk, still unleashing his arrow storms all around him. The shaken Pandava king orders the conches to be blown for the armies to withdraw.

In honour, Bhishma also withdraws his legions, and all the wounded and weary maharathas, those left alive, return to their tents.

As they have their wounds inflicted by Bhishma tended, the Pandavas reflect on how entirely terrible and invincible their Pitamaha had been through the day he has won so resoundingly for the Kauravas, and they are deeply distraught. Across the darkling field on which numberless corpses lie under the stars, Duryodhana and the Kauravas eulogise Bhishma's exploits as the old lion makes his way to his tent with some satisfaction surrounded by your jubilant sons.

Night, that quietens all creatures, sets in. In that intense hour, the Pandavas, the Vrishnis and the Srinjayas confer. Those noble ones, experienced in deliberations, discuss the courses that lie before them.

Yudhishtira says sombrely to Krishna, "Ah, look how the Pitamaha savaged our men like an elephant trampling a forest of reeds. We dare not even look at him, while he consumes my army like a raging fire. He is grown as fierce as the poisonous Takshaka. Yama can be defeated, even Indra armed with the Vajra, or Varuna, noose in hand, or the Lord of the Yakshas with his mace. But Bhishma cannot be killed.

Krishna, I am helpless, and drown in anguish, when I face Bhishma in battle. I will go into the forest and take sannyasa. That would benefit me. I do not want to fight this hopeless war any more. Bhishma conquers us always. Riding against him, I am like an insect that flies into a fire only to meet certain death. By foolishly fighting for a kingdom, I am being destroyed.

My brave brothers have all been wounded, look how they still bleed. Out of their love for me, their eldest brother, they lost their kingdom and followed me into exile. For my sake, Krishna, you also suffer. Life is so precious and now even that is threatened. If I survive this war, I will devote the rest of my days to the performance of penance and good deeds. If you bear us good will, Krishna, tell me what I should do, without forsaking the duties of my varna, my Kshatriya dharma."

Krishna speaks kind, comforting words to Yudhishtira, "Son of Dharma, you are unwavering in your commitment to truth; do not be sad, blessed as you are with Parantapas for brothers. Arjuna and Bhima are imbued with the energy of the Wind and Fire. The twin sons of Madri are as valiant as the king of the Devas.

Honour our friendship; use me and achieve victory. I will fight with Bhishma myself. Only command me and I will show you my prowess in war. If Arjuna will not, I will challenge Bhishma and kill him, in the very sight of the Dhartarashtras. If you think that killing noble Bhishma will help you triumph, I will single-handedly destroy the Pitamaha. My prowess is equal to Indra's in battle. I will overpower that Kshatriya of great weapons.

He, who is an enemy of the Pandavas, is also my enemy; and my detractors are yours. Your brother Arjuna is my friend, kinsman, and devotee. I will cut off my flesh and sacrifice it for Arjuna's sake. He, too, will give up his life for me. This is our sacred bond, and we will protect each other.

So command me: how should I fight? At Upaplavya, Arjuna vowed that he would kill Bhishma. Now he must honour his words with deeds. If he asks me to, I will fulfil what he swore he would do, unquestioningly. Otherwise, he must accomplish the task himself. It is not difficult for him, he can kill Bhishma easily, for this Arjuna can achieve feats that others cannot.

He can annihilate the very Devas, along with the Daityas and the Danavas. What then of Bhishma? Bhishma is old now, dull, his strength reduced by his years, and he cannot stand against Arjuna, if Arjuna once decided that he will indeed bring Bhishma down."

Yudhishtira says, "It is as you say, Mahabaho. When you both are united, not Bhishma or all the Kaurava maharathas together can stand before you. Krishna, with you by my side I am certain to have victory and everything that I might wish for. With you as my defender, I can overcome the very Devas with Indra at their head. And Bhishma, though he is the greatest maharatha, can also be vanquished.

But, Krishna, for my own honour and truth, I cannot let you break your vow that you would not actually fight. Give me the support you promised, but without actually fighting yourself. Bhishma said to me, 'I am obliged to fight for Duryodhana and against you. But you can always come to me for advice.

Krishna, Bhishma might still help me regain my kingdom by telling me what I should do. Taking you with us, we will all go to the Pitamaha once again and ask him how he can be killed. Let us go to him even now and I will do whatever he tells me to in battle. He is honourable and a man of unswerving dharma. His heart lies with us and he will tell me how I can win this war."

Yudhishtira's eyes are moist and his voice is low as he says, "We were orphans, mere children, and our Pitamaha raised us with his love. Ah, how cruel this Kshatriya dharma is that today I must go and ask my grandfather how I can kill him."

Krishna says to Yudhishtira, "Wise king, I approve of what you say. Bhishma is an unrivalled maharatha, the greatest master of astras. He can kill an enemy with just a look from his eyes. Yes, let us go to him and ask him how he himself can be killed. He will answer truthfully, especially if you are the one that asks this question. Let us go to him even now and ask him how we can win this war."

The Pandavas and Krishna set aside their armour and weapons and go towards Bhishma's tent; they enter, and bow to him. The Pandavas pay him obeisance and worship, and ask for his blessings.

The Pitamaha, Mahabaho Bhishma, says warmly to them, "You are welcome, my sons. Welcome to you Arjuna. Welcome Yudhishtira Dharmatma, and you also, my Bhima. Welcome Nakula and Sahadeva. Tell me why you have come to me at this hour. What can I do for you? Let it be anything, however demanding, and I will do it wholeheartedly."

His head bowed, Yudhishtira replies, "Pitamaha, wise Bhishma, tell us how we can win this war and have our kingdom back. Tell us how we can end this terrible slaughter of men. You, great Kshatriya, are invincible on the field of battle, you leave no chink through which an enemy might strike you down. As long as you live, we can never hope to win this war. O Pitamaha, tell us how you can be killed!

Your bow is always drawn and streams tides of arrows razing my army. Day after day, we see you, Parantapa, mounted on your chariot, blazing like a second sun, as you consume our chariots and horses, men and elephants.

Bharatarishabha, there is no man who can defeat you, and you wreak destruction on us with your arrows. Pitamaha, tell me how we can triumph against you in battle, regain what is rightfully ours, and prevent any more bloodshed."

Bhishma says to Yudhishtira, "'As long as I live, you cannot win. This is the simple truth. Sons of Pandu, only if you vanquish me can victory be yours. Indeed, if you want to win this war, you must kill me immediately otherwise your cause will be lost. I gladly give you leave to strike down me in any way. Why, I would be the happiest one if you did so for I hate this war in which I must fight against you. After you kill me, the others can all be slain. I do not ask you to do this, I, your Pitamaha, command it."

Yudhishtira says, "Tell us how we can defeat you in battle, you who are like the mace wielding Siva himself. Indra, Varuna, or Yama may be quelled, but not the Devas and Asuras united under Indra's command can overcome you."

Bhishma says, "What you say is true, Mahabaho. As long as I fight with my bow and my astras, I cannot be defeated by the Devas and Asuras led by Indra. But if I lay down my weapons, these brothers of yours, these maharathas can surely kill me. I never fight against one who has discarded his weapons, who has fallen, who has lost his armour, whose standard has collapsed, or who is fleeing from battle; nor will I confront anyone who is afraid, who humbles himself before me, or one who is weak and vulnerable, or a man who has only one son, or a vulgar lowly man. And I will never bear arms against a woman or a man who bears a woman's name.

This is my old resolve. I will never fight if I see an inauspicious sign. Sikhandin, son of Drupada, brave and tenacious in war, fights on your side; he was once a woman, a royal princess, before he became a man. We all know how this happened and the reasons for it.

Let Arjuna set Sikhandin in front of him, and then attack me. When I see that inauspicious sight, that ill omen in the form of a prince who was once a woman, I will never attack him. I will put down my bow and Arjuna must seize that moment to strike me down me with his arrows, piercing me through every limb and organ, from every side.

Even if I lay my weapons down, other than Krishna and Arjuna, there is nobody from any of the three worlds who can kill me in battle. Setting Sikhandin before him, let Arjuna, with his Gandiva and every astra, strike me down from my chariot. Then, and only then, will your victory be assured. Do as I have told you, Rajan, and after I have fallen you will surely kill all the Dhartarashtras."

The Pandavas listen numbly to what their grandsire says. They can only bow in silence to acknowledge the terrible counsel he gives them. Taking the dust from his feet, they return grimly to their tents.

Arjuna hears Bhishma's awful advice, he sees how his beloved Pitamaha is ready, so eager to die, and he is filled with shame and anguish. He cries to Krishna, "Krishna, how can I do what Bhishma asks me to? How can I kill our Pitamaha, who is so great and wise, and the eldest of our race?

In my childhood, I would climb onto his lap and playfully smear his face and body with dust. He is my father Pandu's father. As a child I once called him father as I clambered on his lap; and he said: I am not your father, but your father's father. That was his reply.

How can I kill someone who said those words to me? Ah, let my army perish and let me also die. I do not care if we lose this war, but I will never fight my Pitamaha. And how can I even think of killing him in the cowardly, shameful way that he commands me to? Ah Krishna, save me from this sea of grief in which I am drowning. Tell me what you think!"

Krishna says, "Having once sworn to kill Bhishma, how can you now break your solemn vow, without violating your sacred dharma as a Kshatriya? Arjuna, you must strike Bhishma down, for you cannot win this war unless you kill Ganga's invincible son. And he has told you the only way by which he can be sent to Yama's realm, and you are the only one who can do this thing.

The Devas decided this a long time ago and what is destined to happen must happen. It cannot be otherwise. You alone, not even Indra, can conquer Bhishma, who is like Siva with mouth agape. Fearlessly kill the Kuru Pitamaha.

My words are but those that Brihaspati said to Sakra. One should kill even an old person, however meritorious and revered, if he comes as an enemy, indeed one must kill anyone who comes to destroy you. Arjuna, this is the eternal dharma of Kshatriyas; they must fight, protect their subjects, and perform sacrifices, without hatred."

Arjuna says, "Sikhandin will certainly become the cause of Bhishma's death, for as soon as he sees the prince of the Panchalas my Pitamaha will put down his bow. We will keep Sikhandin in front of us, I will thwart the other archers who surround him and thus we will vanquish Bhishma. Sikhandin will fight Bhishma alone. I know that he will not strike Sikhandin, for he was once a woman."

Yet again, Krishna gives Arjuna the courage he needs for the great and violent deed. Having decided on their course, at Bhishma's own counsel and with his leave and blessings, the Pandavas feel relieved and hopeful again. And past midnight, these bulls among men retire to sleep.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'How did Sikhandin ride against Bhishma, and how did Bhishma press forward against the Pandavas? Tell me everything, Sanjaya.'

Sanjaya says, 'At dawn, to the beating of drums and the clash of cymbals, and the blast of milk white conches, the Pandavas advance into battle, setting Sikhandin before them. They form a daunting vyuha.

Sikhandin is positioned in the vanguard. Bhima and Arjuna defend his chariot wheels. The sons of Draupadi and Abhimanyu ride behind the Panchala prince. In turn, Maharathas Satyaki and Chekitana guard them. Behind them is Dhrishtadyumna surrounded by the Panchalas. Behind Dhrishtadyumna ride Yudhishtira and the twins, filling the air with roars. They are followed by Virata, surrounded by his troops.

Alongside Virata is Drupada. And the five Kaikeya brothers and the valiant Dhrishtaketu protect the rear of the Pandava army. Having prepared their vyuha, the Pandavas, taking their lives in their hands, charge your army by first light.

The Kauravas place maharatha Bhishma at the head of their army and advance against the Pandavas. That indomitable Kshatriya is protected by your mighty sons. Behind him are Drona and Aswatthaman.

Bhishma is followed by Bhagadatta surrounded by his elephant akshauhini. Behind Bhagadatta are Kripa and Kritavarman. Behind them are Sudakshina of the Kambojas, and Jayatsena of the Magadhas, and Sakuni and Brihadbala. Countless other kings, all great archers, protect the rear of your army.

Every day, Bhishma forms vyuhas, sometimes like those of the Asuras, sometimes similar to those of Pisachas, at other times comparable to ones of the Rakshasas. The battle between the two forces begins yet again; sweeping into each other, both forces recommence the great slaughtering, the blood sacrifice on Kurukshetra.

The Parthas with Arjuna leading them place Sikhandin before them all, and attack Bhishma with every kind of arrow and astra maiming and killing your warriors in waves. Nakula, Sahadeva and maharatha Satyaki vigorously annihilate your forces.

Such is the carnage the Pandavas bring to your warriors this day, from every side, that it does not take them long to scatter and flee from the rampaging maharathas. Felled by the whetted arrows of the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, your troops cannot defend themselves.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me, Sanjaya, what does Bhishma do when he sees my army afflicted by the Parthas? How does that greatest Kshatriya, that Parantapa, storm the Pandavas and slaughter the Somakas?'

Sanjaya says, 'I will tell you what Bhishma does when attacked by the Pandavas and the Srinjayas. In great heart after the night's secret meeting with Bhishma, the Pandavas assail your son's forces, slaughtering all in their path. Seeing their inexorable, bloody advance, seeing his men, elephants and horses razed at will, Bhishma blazes up in wrath.

Uncaring of his life, that greatest maharatha unleashes a tornado of every kind of shaft at the enemy, elongated arrows, calf-toothed and crescent-headed ones, and many others. He covers the five mighty Pandavas in sheets of fire, holding them up; countless elephants and horses he kills; and that bull among men unseats so many maharathas from their chariots, riders from their horses, elephant-warriors from the backs of their beasts, and strikes fear into the hearts of the enemy.

All together, the Pandava warriors charge maharatha Bhishma, like the Asuras assailing Indra in unison. He brings them up sharply with a storm of stone-whetted arrows, each like Indra's thunderbolt, and so fierce his very countenance, that the enemy quails to look at him. Like Sakra himself, his vast bow is always drawn in a circle, and arrows flare from it in tide.

Watching their Pitamaha, your sons are awestruck and humbled. The Pandavas are as shaken as they look at Bhishma dominate Kurukshetra as he pleases as the Devas were dejected by the feats of the Asura Viprachitti. They have neither the nerve nor the prowess to face that Kshatriya who looks like Siva with mouth agape.

On that tenth day of the great Mahabharata yuddha, the day on which the Dwapara Yuga ends and the Kali Yuga actually rises over the world, Bhishma devours Sikhandin's akshauhini like a fire burning down a dry forest. Resembling an angry Naga, or indeed Siva goaded by Yama himself, Sikhandin pierces the flaming Kuru grandsire squarely through his breast with three sizzling shafts. The surprised, wounded Bhishma sees that it is Sikhandin who has struck him.

Incensed, yet Bhishma laughs and says, “Whether you attack me or not, I will never fight with you. You remain the same Sikhandini, the princess Amba whom the Creator first made.”

Sikhandin’s eyes turn red, and licking the corners of his mouth he says to Bhishma in a ringing voice, “I know you, Parantapa, to be the exterminator of the race of Kshatriyas. I have also heard of your battle against your guru, Jamadagni’s son. I have heard a great deal about your superhuman prowess. Despite all that I have heard, I will fight you today.

What satisfies the Pandavas is also what I want; Parantapa, I will not only fight you but surely kill you today. I solemnly swear this. You have heard me now; do whatever you must. Whether you resist me or not, you will not escape alive. O mighty, ever-triumphant Bhishma, look at this world for the last time.”

Having loosed these word barbs, Sikhandin pierces Bhishma with five straight shafts. Arjuna urges the Panchala prince on, “Sikhandin, I am behind you, and the enemy will not stand before my arrows. Attack Bhishma and kill him now!

If you return without killing Bhishma today, you will be ridiculed by all. Kill him now, so that we may not be mocked in this great war. I will protect you from the Kaurava maharathas. Kill Bhishma, O Sikhandin!

I will contain Drona and his son, and Kripa, and Suyodhana, and Chitrasena, and Vikarna, and Jayadratha of the Sindhus, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and Sudakshina of the Kambojas, and the mighty Bhagadatta, and Salya of the Magadhas, and Somadatta’s son, and Rishyasringa’s son Alambusha and his fierce Rakshasas, and Susarman and the Trigartas, and all the other Kaurava maharathas.

I will contain them all like a continent does the surging sea. Destroy the Pitamaha even now!”’

Dhritarashtra says, 'How does Sikhandin attack the noble and righteous Bhishma? Which Pandava maharathas, armed with astras and seeking victory, protect Sikhandin? On the tenth day of the war, how does Bhishma fight the Pandavas and the Srinjayas? I cannot bear the thought of Sikhandin meeting Bhishma in battle. When Sikhandin attacks Bhishma what happens to the Pitamaha's chariot and to his bow?'

Sanjaya says, 'Neither Bhishma's bow nor his chariot is in the least damaged in that battle. He continues to mow down the enemy with deadly banks of arrows. Thousands of your maharathas and elephants and horses, led by the Pitamaha, advance into battle. Bhishma fulfils his word given to Suyodhana to massacre the Pandava forces. The Panchalas and the Pandavas can in no way withstand the magnificent Kshatriya and he destroys their forces as he likes.

On the tenth day, Bhishma scythes through the enemy with his countless shafts. Rajan, the sons of Pandu cannot remotely contain him for he is truly like Siva with his flaming trident come to Kurukshetra. Then Arjuna, with Krishna at his chariot head, appears and the perfectly ambidextrous Savyasachin is at your maharathas like some dreadful plague.

Roaring like a lion now, the greatest of them all, he seems to be everywhere, so prodigious is Krishna's chariotry, and the Pandava's bow, the peerless Gandiva, appears to have life of its own for it seems to hang in the air, always drawn in a round of flames, so one cannot see that awesome archer's hands or any apparent movement from them, while firetides of unearthly arrows flare in seamless spate from his chariot, incinerating the enemy all around him wherever he goes.

Your warriors are petrified, and either stand rooted while this Kshatriya like one they have never seen the like of before, while this bowman like Yama strews the field with their corpses, reduces them to ashes, or they flee like small animals at the growl of the lion.

Duryodhana, alarmed, cries to Bhishma, "Look at Arjuna, white horses yoked to his chariot, driven by Krishna, consuming your army like a flame of the pralaya burning a forest. O great Kshatriya, see how he devours our men, thinning our army by a thousand lives every moment.

My maharathas are as hard pressed as some cowherds in the jungle trying to control their stampeding herd attacked by a two great lions. From every side Arjuna and Bhima beset my legions and my men are butchered, and those that still live are terrified, their spirits broken. Satyaki, and Chekitana, and the twin sons of Madri, and the terrific Abhimanyu hunt with Arjuna and Bhima, and panic sweeps through my legions and they flee as they can.

Dhrishtadyumna and Ghatotkacha also put my men to rout so their blood flows again in rills. Ah, in this carnage, I see no one other than you, with your divine powers, who can prevent the Pandava maharathas from winning this war within the hour. Pitamaha, save us or we are lost!"

Bhishma ponders these words, and says slowly to your son, "Duryodhana, listen calmly to what I say. I vowed that I would kill ten thousand noble Kshatriyas every day, and return triumphant from the battlefield. I have fulfilled that vow!

Even today I will achieve a great feat as you watch me. I will either kill the Pandavas or die. Tiger among men, today I will free myself from my debt to you by sacrificing myself while leading your army." And Bhishma attacks the Pandava host.

The Pandavas oppose the son of Ganga who stands at the heart his forces seething like an angry snake. He annihilates thousands of warriors on that tenth day of the war. Like the sun sucking the earth dry of her moisture, he exhausts the regal ranks of the Panchala maharathas. He kills ten thousand spirited elephants, ten thousand horses with their riders, and two hundred thousand foot-soldiers; like a smokeless fire, Bhishma blazes like a flame which burns at its brightest just before being extinguished.

And none among the Pandavas can even look at him who is like the sun fixed in the northern solstice. The heroic Pandavas and the Srinjaya maharathas still storm at him in waves. Battling the countless warriors who surround him, Bhishma looks like Meru's steep slopes covered by dense clouds.

Your sons surround Bhishma with a vast protective force. Another fierce battle between the Kauravas and the Pandavas ensues.'

Sanjaya says, 'Watching Bhishma ablaze, more fearsome than he has yet been, Arjuna says to Sikhandin, "Ride towards the Pitamaha. Do not fear him today. For it is I who ride behind you and I who will strike him down from his chariot today."

Sikhandin charges Bhishma, and Dhrishtadyumna and the radiant Abhimanyu ride with him, their bows streaming many fires. Splendid in their armour, old Virata and Drupada, and Kuntibhoja also attack Bhishma before your son's eyes. And Nakula, Sahadeva, and Yudhishtira too, along with the other warriors ride at only Bhishma.

As for your Kshatriyas, listen, O Rajan, as I speak of them who advance so bravely, united against the Pandava army. Like a young tiger attacking a bull, Chitrasena charges Chekitana who is harrying Bhishma. Kritavarman holds up Dhrishtadyumna who is threateningly close to the Kuru Pitamaha.

Somadatta's son fearlessly attacks Bhima who is also furiously trying to make Bhishma's great frame a home for his powerful arrows. Vikarna creates a magical wall of shafts between Nakula's gales of barbs and the grandsire.

Kripa prevents Sahadeva from approaching Bhishma's chariot. Durmukha storms against the mighty Ghatotkacha who also wants to kill just the son of Ganga. Duryodhana stops Satyaki from advancing. Sudakshina, king of the Kamabojas, engages and holds up Abhimanyu as he nears Bhishma's chariot. And Aswatthaman foils both Virata and Drupada.

Drona somewhat easily contains Yudhishtira who also is bent just on having Bhishma's life today. Showing incredible skill today, Dussasana thwarts Arjuna himself who, with Sikhandin before him, is dashing towards Bhishma, lighting up the ten quarters of the world with his shining astras.

Other warriors of your army clash with the Pandava maharathas advancing against Ganga's majestic son.

Dhrishtadyumna rides at Bhishma alone, crying to his forces, "Look at Arjuna storming at Bhishma. Be without fear today and attack just the son of Ganga. Bhishma will be helpless to harm you today. Why, Vasava himself cannot face Arjuna in battle, then what to say of Bhishma who, though he great indeed and courage incarnate, is also old and weak?"

Hearing this from their Senapati, the Pandava maharathas are jubilant and rush all together towards Bhishma's chariot. Many excellent men of your army spiritedly resist those Kshatriyas hurtling hungrily towards Bhishma.

To shield him from the hunting Arjuna, Dussasana fearlessly attacks the Pandava. The other sons of Pandu assail your mighty sons who surround Bhishma's chariot. It is wonderful to see Arjuna stopped short by Dussasana. As the shore contains the surging sea, your son Dussasana holds up the storming son of Pandu.

Both of them are excellent maharathas. Both are invincible. Both magnificent to behold, they resemble the sun and the moon. Both are incensed, and both want to kill the other. They fight like Mayaa and Sakra in olden days.

Dussasana stabs Arjuna with three shafts and Krishna with twenty. Enraged to see Krishna bleed, Arjuna looses a hundred shafts at Dussasana, which flash through his armour and draw spouts of blood. Dussasana strikes Arjuna in the chest with five barbs, and upon his brow with three whetted shafts. These project from his head, making him look like Meru with lofty peaks. Looking like a radiant kinsuka, your son harangues Arjuna in that duel.

Inflamed like Rahu on a full moon night, Arjuna unleashes a flurry of arrows winged with the feathers of the kanka bird, and wounds Dussasana deeply. Arjuna cleaves Dussasana's bow and smashes his chariot with three shafts, and looses countless arrows like barbs of death at your son. But splendid Dussasana swiftly thwarts them in flight. All this appears so marvellous.

Dussasana strikes Arjuna with a hundred shafts and the angry Partha replies with flocks of searing arrows that plunge into Dussasana's body like swans diving into a lake. Covered in his own blood and staggering from the wounds of Arjuna, your son now runs towards Bhishma's chariot. He seeks Bhishma out like a drowning man clings to an island.

Finding refuge, your heroic Dussasana once more rains arrows at Arjuna, even like Purandara resisting Vritra. Though he is so mighty and powerful, his best efforts to vanquish Arjuna are in vain.'

Sanjaya says, 'Alambusha thwarts Satyaki and rides towards Bhishma to offer his protection. The incensed Satyaki strikes the Rakshasa with nine dire arrows. Alambusha responds with nine shafts as well. Satyaki unleashes a storm of arrows at the Rakshasa, who, roaring dreadfully, responds in kind. Deeply injured by Alambusha, Satyaki laughs off his wounds. Bhagadatta stabs him with more keenly whetted shafts like a mahout piercing a tusker with his hook.

Satyaki turns away from Alambusha to vent his wrath upon Bhagadatta, who calmly breaks the shining Vrishni hero's massive bow in his hands. Satyaki Yuyudhana seizes another and pierces Bhagadatta deeply, drawing small fonts of blood from his great frame. Bhagadatta licks the corners of his mouth and flings a most deadly iron spear, shimmering with gold and lapis lazuli, fierce like Yama's rod, at his enemy.

Satyaki cuts down that coursing shaft even as it flies at him, and it falls lustreless, like a burnt out meteor. Duryodhana surrounds Satyaki with many chariots.

He says to his brothers, "Kauravas, ensure that Satyaki does not escape from this encirclement. If he is killed, consider the vast host of the Pandavas also destroyed." Before Bhishma's eyes, those Kaurava maharathas attack Satyaki all together.

The king of the Kambojas sees Abhimanyu sweeping towards Bhishma and rides to bar his way. In a flash, Arjuna's son strikes Sudakshina with sixty four shafts. The Kamboja pierces Abhimanyu with five arrows and his charioteer with nine, to defend Bhishma. The duel between these two is ferocious and wonderful.

Meanwhile, Sikhandin continues to advance towards the Pitamaha. Destroying the teeming Kaurava army, maharathas Virata and Drupada also press their way towards Bhishma but they are confronted by an infuriated Aswatthaman.

Virata strikes Drona's son, that ornament of battle, sharply, as he dashes at them, and Drupada pierces him with three heavy shafts. Aswatthaman looses a fuming volley at the twain. With awesome archery the two old warriors serenely thwart Aswatthama's arrow storm.

Like an incensed elephant charging another in a forest, Kripa rides at Sahadeva who is also advancing upon Bhishma. He strikes Sahadeva with seventy golden shafts. The son of Madri cleaves Kripa's bow in his hands and pierces his first acharya with nine barbs.

Seizing another great bow, Kripa shoots ten immaculate barbs at Sahadeva in the space of a wish. Possessed by the single thought of killing Bhishma, annoyed at being thus held up, Sahadeva unleashes an altogether more savage clutch of missiles at his aged master's chest. And another zealous duel begins.

Parantapa Vikarna, also wanting to protect Bhishma, strikes Nakula with sixty shafts and Nakula replies with a hot salvo of seventy-seven barbs. Quickly, those purushavyaghras battle like two bulls in a herd over a cow. For Bhishma's sake, too, your son Durmukha whirls at Ghatotkacha who is slaughtering your army as he also rides at Bhishma. Hidimbi's son opens a deep gash in Durmukha's breast with one arrow like time. Durmukha only roars at the wound, even in elation, and stabs Ghatotkacha with sixty keen darts.

Dhrishtadyumna, also, sweeping down on Bhishma and Hridika's son Kritavarman, obstructs him. Drupada's fire prince looses a sear of five molten shafts at Kritavarman and strikes him with another fifty iron barbs in his chest, most of which glance off his mail. Dhrishtadyumna swift as the mind shoots nine more burning arrows, winged with the feathers of the kanka bird at the Yadava prince.

They battle impassionedly for Bhishma's sake, as fiercely as Vritra and Vasava. Bhurisravas assails Bhima who is also advances ever nearer the mighty Bhishma. That grand Kuru warrior pierces Bhima's commodious chest with a telling golden-winged arrow; so awesome does Bhima look as dramatic as the Krauncha mountain did of old when it bore Lord Skanda's barb. Ablaze, the two Kshatriyas, Purusharishabhas both, loose livid rivers of missiles, bright as sunflares, at each other. Bhima fights, longing for Bhishma's death, while Somadatta does to secure Bhishma's victory, and each matches the other's stunning feats.

Drona arrests the careen of Yudhishtira storming towards Bhishma. The Prabhadrakas tremble hearing the roar of Drona's chariot that is like the rumble of massed thunderheads, and that vast Pandava host cannot advance even a step because of Bharadwaja's formidable son.

Your tenacious son Chitrasena impedes the fierce Chekitana, also riding at Bhishma. Chekitana attacks him vigorously, and scintillating is the duel between these two. Though Dussasana powerfully obstructs Arjuna's path to Bhishma, that irresistible Pandava overwhelms him and forces your son to retreat. Arjuna strews the field with Kaurava corpses at his majestic, inexorable will, and the other Pandava maharathas also decimate your legions which try to keep Bhishma safe.'

Sanjaya says, 'Like an incensed elephant, Drona penetrates the Pandava ranks, and mows them down on every side with his godlike archery. Drona, knowing interpreter of omens, sees the signs of an age ending and another rising all around him and says to Aswatthaman who also ravages the enemy on every side, "This is that day on which Arjuna will put forth all his prowess to have Bhishma's life.

My arrows leap out from their quiver by themselves. My bow seems to yawn. My astra seems unwilling to obey me, and I feel a great despondence. Animals and birds cry relentlessly in fearful voices. Vultures fly down and vanish under the feet of the Bhaarata forces.

The Sun appears dull. The four quarters are on fire. Everywhere the Earth seems to wail and tremble in some great fear. Kankas, vultures and cranes cry out repeatedly warning of some dreadful evil. Jackals scream and wheel in inauspicious apradakshina also predicting grave danger.

Immense meteors seem to flare down from the heart of the Sun. The Parigha constellation appears around Surya Deva, shrouding his light. The Sun and Moon look threatening, foretelling a massacre of Kshatriyas. The statues in the temples of the Kauravas tremble and laugh and dance and weep, as if they have gone mad. The glowing crescent moon rises with horns turned down. The bodies of the kings in the Kaurava army appear pale, and though clad in armour, they are strangely dull.

The blast of Panchajanya and the twang of Gandiva resound all around both armies, above every other sound. Today, bearing all his astras, Arjuna will surely mow his way through all our maharathas and mount his attack on Bhishma.

The pores of my body contract, and all my hope drains from me, when I think of the coming battle between Bhishma and Arjuna. Ah, look! Keeping the deceitful Panchala prince before him, even now Arjuna rides at the Pitamaha. Bhishma has said that he will not kill Sikhandin because this prince was born a woman, and only later became a man.

That mighty son of Yajnasena is himself the most inauspicious omen. Bhishma will never fight with such an unnatural one. Ah, my son, fear grips my heat in a vice knowing that every moment Arjuna draws nearer the revered Pitamaha.

Yudhishtira's anger, which has been restrained so long, the very thought of Arjuna fighting his beloved grandsire, and me, a Brahmana taking to arms in a war, all portend the gravest tragedy. Arjuna is imbued with untold tejas; he is powerful, brave, and a great master of weapons. Apart from loosing his arrows farther and more powerfully than any other man, he too is a sure reader of omens.

So strong, intelligent and tireless is Arjuna that not the Devas with Vasava at their head can defeat him in battle. He has the most virulent astras and he is called Vijaya because he never loses a battle but always triumphs in war. Avoid him, my son, and ride to defend Bhishma from this terrible son of Pandu.

Today we shall see such carnage that not even this war among all wars has yet shown us. The beautiful golden armour of heroic Kshatriyas will be riven by his arrows, and Arjuna will cut down their flags, and bearded javelins in flight, and bows, and bright pointed spears, and glittering arrows, and the standards on the backs of their elephants.

O my son, this is not the time to care for our lives. Focussed on heaven, fame and victory, go and fight. There, the Vanara-bannered Arjuna crosses the treacherous river of battle in his chariot, the river that has blood for its currents and shattered chariots, dead elephants, and horses for its islets.

Regard for Brahmanas, self-restraint, liberality, asceticism, and noble conduct are to be found in Yudhishtira alone; for his brothers he has Arjuna, the mighty Bhima, and the twin sons of Madri by Pandu; and he has Krishna of the Vrishni vamsa for his protector.

His body has been purified by the flames of tapasya, and Yudhishtira's anger, born of grief, is directed at the black-souled son of Dhritarashtra and this righteous anger is what destroys the Bhaarata host.

There comes Arjuna; with Krishna as his sarathy and refuge he advances irresistibly and lays waste the entire Dhartarashtra army. Look, he terrifies our host like a great whale stirring up an ocean with towering waves. Listen to the frantic sad cries of our army.

Charge against the heir of the Panchala king. I will ride against Yudhishtira. The heart of his vyuha is difficult to penetrate. Inaccessible as the depths of the sea, it is guarded on all sides by Atirathas. Satyaki, and Abhimanyu and Dhrishtadyumna, and Bhima, and the twins, all protect Yudhishtira.

Dark as the younger brother of Indra, and standing like a tall sala tree, behold Abhimanyu storming ahead at the head of the Pandava host, like a second Arjuna! Seize your mighty weapons, and with your great bow ride against Sikhandin and Bhima.

Who doesn't want their son to live long? However, I now observe the dharma of a Kshatriya, and I assign this task to you. Ah, look where Bhishma also razes the swarming Pandava host. O son, the Kuru Pitamaha is equal to Yama or Varuna himself in battle.'"

Sanjaya says, 'Hearing what Drona says, Bhagadatta and Kripa and Salya and Kritavarman, and Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and Jayadratha of the Sindhus, and Chitrasena and Vikarna and Durmarshana, these ten warriors of your army, supported by a legion of diverse soldiers, boldly face Bhima, wanting to win fame in the war for Bhishma's sake.

Salya strikes Bhima with nine arrows, and Kritavarman stabs him with three, and Kripa with nine. And Chitrasena and Vikarna and Bhagadatta, each pierce him with ten barbs. Jayadratha strikes him with three, and Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti each with five shafts.

Duryodhana attacks him with twenty arrows. In return Bhima relentlessly pierces each one of those kings, those maharathas of the Dhartarashtra army. He shoots Salya with seven arrows and Kritavarman with eight. And he cleaves Kripa's bow in two. He pierces Kripa once more with seven shafts. And he strikes Vinda and Anuvinda with three barbs each.

Bhima strikes Durmarshana deep with twenty arrows, Chitrasena with five, Vikarna with ten, and Jayadratha with five; and once more flaying the king of the Sindhus with three astras, Bhimasena roars loudly with delight.

Kripa, maharatha, angrily stabs Bhima with ten polished shafts. Pierced like an elephant by a goad, Bhima's eyes turn red in a moment and he looses a vicious salvo at Kripa, drawing founts of blood from his old master. Splendid as Yama, as he appears at the end of the yuga, Bhima kills Jayadratha's horses with three scarlet explosions, and also his charioteer. Maharatha Jayadratha leaps down from his horseless chariot and looses a squall of keen shafts at Bhima.

Bhima destroys Jayadratha's bow with two broad-headed arrows. His bow broken, his chariot stranded, his horses and sarathy killed, Jayadratha mounts Chitrasena's chariot. Triumphant Bhima draws blood from all the maharathas before him; celebrant, he smashes Jayadratha's chariot into pieces in the very sight of all the Kaurava army. Watching Bhima's dreadful feats, Salya roars out a challenge to him; he looses a gale of gleaming barbs at the monumental Pandava.

Kripa and Kritavarman and the valiant Bhagadatta, and Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and Chitrasena, and Durmarshana, and Vikarna, and Jayadratha all attack Bhima in concert. Irrepressible Bhima stabs each of them with hot clutches of arrows, five for each one. And he harries Salya with seventy shafts loosed in the twinkling of an eye, and again with ten more. Salya drives nine steaming arrows through him, and then five more. With another broad one he pierces Bhima's charioteer deep.

Seeing his charioteer Visoka wounded deep, with a terrible cry, Bhima drills three searing shafts into the arms and chest of the Madra king; he riddles the other maharathas each with three perfectly straight arrows and, throwing back his massive head, lets out a deafening, lion's roar.

Those mighty archers gore Bhima, probing his very vitals. Wounded, he yet remains still, like a mountain drenched by lashing rain clouds. That Pandava maharatha, that celebrated Kshatriya, wrathfully reams the ruler of the Madras with three light like arrows; he punishes the ruler of the Pragjyotishas with a hundred.

He castigates Kripa with countless barbs and, with astounding dexterity, cleaves Kritavarman's bow with a single shaft—all this in a breathtaking instant. Kritavarman, parantapa, scourge of his enemies, takes up another bow and strikes Bhima right between his eyes with a fine long arrow.

Having pierced Salya with nine iron arrows, and Bhagadatta with three, and Kritavarman with eight, Bhima chastens the others led by Kripa, each with two shafts. These warriors reply with calid flurries, making blood flowers sprout on great Bhima. They scathe him with diverse astras, but Bhima remains nonchalant and courses effortlessly across the battleground, spraying Kurukshetra liberally with enemies' blood. Hundreds of thousands of arrows rain down on him from every side.

Bhagadatta casts a fierce golden javelin spear at him; the Sindhu king, Mahabaho, flings both a javelin and a battle-axe at Bhima in wrath, to remember the humiliation this Pandava inflicted on him once in the forest. Kripa unleashes a satagni of a hundred flames at Bhima, and Salya a single arrow as fulgurant. The other archers each aim five punitive shafts at him.

The son of Vayu cleaves Bhagadatta's missile along its deadly length; he pulverises Jayadratha's axe as if were a stem of sesame. He douses the satagni with five occult shafts winged with the feathers of the kanka bird, blows Salya's one arrow of dread into dust. Proud Bhima, who knows neither doubt nor fear, cuts every other arrow flying at him in three. And he strikes each of those illustrious archers who attacked him with blinding archery that rivals, why, now exceeds, his brother Arjuna's.

As the war burns on, Arjuna sees Bhima devouring the enemy on all sides like Yama and rides towards him on his chariot. The warriors of your army watch those two enkindled sons of Pandu come together, and their spirits tremble.

Arjuna has only a single intention today—to kill Bhishma. Setting Sikhandin before him, he nears Bhima who has been battling the ten Kaurava maharathas by himself; Arjuna descends on those fierce ten like some dreadful plague. In a wink he strikes all of them with arrows that fling them back in their chariots or strike them down.

In some alarm, Duryodhana cries to Susarman, the Trigarta king, "Great Susarman, fly taking your Trigarta host with you. Let the earth drink the blood of Pandu's sons Dhananjaya and Vrikodara today!"

Roaring, his host of sterling archers riding with him, Susarman, king of the Trigartas, lord of Prasthala, swoops on Bhima and Arjuna and surrounds them with thousands of chariots. A stupendous duel spumes up between him and Arjuna.'

Sanjaya says, 'With shafts of fierce precision, Arjuna envelops maharatha Salya who fights him gallantly. Arjuna pierces Susarman and Kripa with three arrows each.

Atiratha Arjuna torments your army all around him; he adorns Bhagadatta and Jayadratha, and Chitrasena, and Vikarna, and Kritavarman, and Durmarshana, and those two maharathas, the princes of Avanti, each with three barbs winged with the feathers of the kanka and the peacock.

Jayadratha, whom Siva blessed, putting forth his best fight, pierces Arjuna and also Bhima from Chitrasena's chariot. Salya and Kripa both strike Arjuna with diverse arrows, which burrow deeply into his virile form. Your sons led by Chitrasena, Rajan, each pierce Arjuna and Bhima with five arrows like daggers.

Kunti's two prodigious sons, both maharathas without compare, Bhima and Arjuna, begin to pound the mighty Trigarta host. Then Susarman looses nine extraordinary arrows at Arjuna, all of which find their mark, and roaring loudly terrifies the Pandava forces.

Other noble Kshatriyas rack Bhima and Dhananjaya with many whetted golden winged shafts. Standing amidst them, those two bulls of the Bharata vamsa only ever more look magnificent and they seem to tantalise their opponents like two furious lions hunting in a herd of cows.

The two peerless Kshatriyas cleave their most valiant adversaries' bows and barbs and fell the heads of countless warriors. Innumerable chariots they smash, hundreds of horses they kill, and so many elephants, along with their riders, in that tumultuary and dreadful battle. Chariot warriors and untold numbers of horsemen and elephant-riders are slain outright or seen convulsing in death's final spasms all over Kurukshetra. And the earth is covered with the corpses of elephants, horses and foot-soldiers, and chariots destroyed in many ways.

Arjuna's prowess is wonderful to behold, as he thwarts his enemies and slaughters them in droves. Kripa, and Kritavarman, and Jayadratha, and Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti remain resolute. And as if inspired at being opposed by any, Bhima and Arjuna appear to raise the level of their archery and where hundreds died at their hands each moment now thousands perish and the rout of the fierce Kaurava host swells exponentially. The enemy kings loose millions of arrows with peacock feathers at Arjuna's chariot. Dazzling, thought-swift Arjuna cuts all these missiles down as in some dream and in the same moment, it seems, annihilates his challengers.

Inflamed to watch this, Salya strikes Arjuna in his chest with some broad headed shafts. With five startling barbs, Arjuna breaks Salya's bow and shreds his leather gloves, and pierces him deep in his body. Snatching up another powerful bow, the Madra king furiously attacks Arjuna with three arrows and Krishna with five. He gores Bhima in the arms and the chest with nine shafts.

At Duryodhana's urgent command, Drona and the Magadha king ride swiftly to where Arjuna and Bhima massacre the mighty Kaurava army at will. As his rides up, Jayatsena pierces Bhima of terrible weapons with eight serrated arrows. Bhima looses a flash of fifteen searing shafts at him. With another broad-headed arrow he fells Jayatsena's charioteer from his chariot head, and the Magadhan's unrestrained horses dash wildly away and carry him out of battle in the sight of all the troops.

Drona, seeing an opening, stabs Bhima with eight unusual barbs with heads like a frog's mouth. Bhima, always delighting in battle, wheels round and strikes the Acharya with five heavy arrows, and O Bhaarata, with sixty more fleet ones.

Arjuna looses countless iron barbs at Susarman himself, while also demolishing his Trigarta forces like a high wind dispersing massed clouds. Bhishma and Duryodhana, and Brihadbala, king of the Kosalas, wrathfully advance upon Bhima and Dhananjaya. At this, the gallant Pandava warriors and Dhrishtadyumna charge against Bhishma who is pressing forward like Yama with mouth agape.

Sikhandin sees the Pitamaha of the Bhaaratas; he charges fearlessly and jubilantly towards that greatest maharatha. All the Parthas with Yudhishtira at their head, uniting with the Srinjayas and setting Sikhandin in their van, come hunting Bhishma. With Bhishma at their head, all the warriors of your army confront all the Pandava legions with Sikhandin in their van. That pitched battle between the Kauravas and the Pandavas, fought for Bhishma's victory or his death, is the fiercest and most terrifying one yet.

Indeed, on that fateful tenth day, first of the fell Kali Yuga, age of vileness and wrath, in that brutal game of war, being played out on sacred, bloodied Kurukshetra, field of dharma, Bhishma becomes the stake wagered, his life the precious thing on which the success or defeat of your army depends.

Dhrishtadyumna roars his command at all his men, “Charge against the son of Ganga. Be fearless, O you wonderful maharathas!”

Hearing their Senapati’s call to the moment of a great reckoning, the Pandava host swarms towards Bhishma, themselves roaring, ready to lay down their lives to achieve holy, priceless victory. Great Jaya! Maharatha Bhishma receives that storming host like a continent withstanding the surging sea.’

Dhritarashtra says, 'Sanjaya, how does mighty Bhishma fight the Pandavas and the Srinjayas on the tenth day of the war? How do the Kauravas oppose the Pandavas? Describe the great endeavour of that jewel of battle.'

Sanjaya says, 'I will tell of how the Kauravas fight the Pandavas, and the details of their battle. Day after day, Arjuna Kiritin obliterates countless maharathas of your vast army with his astras. The triumphal Bhishma also wreaks great carnage upon the Pandavas. O Parantapa, seeing Bhishma ablaze at the head of the Kurus, and Arjuna at that of the Panchalas, it is hard to say who will be victorious.

On the tenth day, when Bhishma and Arjuna face each other, there is an unprecedented bloodbath on Kurukshetra. Bhishma slaughters thousands of unknown but heroic warriors, all resolute in battle. Scorching the Pandava army for ten days, Mahabaho Bhishma fights without the slightest care for his life, and magnificently, yet with sorrow in his noble heart. And on this day of moment, he wishes fervently that he may not take any more noble lives discharging his terrible Kshatriya dharma, and he wishes for his own death.

Seeing Yudhishtira near him, he says, "Wise Yudhishtira, listen to my righteous words. I no longer want to save my body. I have already killed countless great warriors. If you want to truly please me, your Pitamaha, set Arjuna with the Panchalas and the Srinjayas in your van, and exert yourself to the utmost to take my life."

Understanding him, Yudhishtira presses forward with the Srinjayas. Also having heard what Bhishma said, Dhrishtadyumna goads his legions forward.

Yudhishtira cries with as much rage as grief, "Fly at Bhishma and kill him even now! Arjuna will protect you, as will Dhrishtadyumna and Bhima. Srinjayas, do not fear Bhishma today. With Sikhandin before us, we will surely vanquish the Pitamaha."

Determined to either triumph or die, led by Sikhandin and Arjuna, the Pandava host essays at Bhishma giving their all and with nothing to lose. Many powerful kings, urged on by your son Suyodhana, along with Drona and his son and a vast force, with Dussasana at the head of all his brothers, also fly toward Bhishma at the very heart of all the unspeakable and resplendent butchery.

Keeping Bhishma at their head, your legions spiritedly engage with the Pandavas led by Sikhandin. Supported by the Chedis and the Panchalas, the Vanara-bannered Arjuna, keeps Sikhandin before him, and storms at his Pitamaha. Satyaki clashes first with Drona's son, and Dhrishtaketu with Puru's descendant; Yudhamanyu grimly fights Duryodhana and his legion. Virata leads his heroes against Jayadratha's.

Parantapa, Vardhakshatra's heir encounters Chitrasena of the most excellent bow. And Yudhishtira faces the haranguing Salya at the head of his forces. Bhima, purest, mightiest and most unalloyed of all Kshatriyas in spirit, roaring, always roaring in exultation at being in battle at last, storms yet against the Kaurava elephants.

Dhrishtadyumna, fire prince of Panchala, along with his brothers, furiously attacks the unconquerable Drona, foremost of all wielders of weapons. Parantapa Brihadbala, who flies the lion on his standard, hurtles at Abhimanyu whose standard bears the karnikara flower. With countless kings going with them, your sons advance upon Sikhandin and Arjuna. When these warriors clash, the earth trembles.

Seeing Bhishma approach, both armies fall into disarray and become hopelessly entangled, flailing out with sword and spear, covering the air with a single dense cloud of arrows. Great is the commotion they make, those warriors inflamed with rage charge madly, bloodthirstily at one another. The tumult rings all around, a ceaseless deafening din, shattering the eardrums of warriors so blood oozes down their necks before those necks are hewn.

The blast of conches and the tigerish roars of fighting men form what appears to be an unending bellow of pain from the wounded earth's very womb. The radiance of the bracelets and crowns of all the heroic kings, equal to that of the sun or the moon, is dimmed by the dust raised by flying hooves, thundering elephants' charges, the running feet of millions of foot-soldiers, the whirling swerving wheels of numberless chariots; against this dark thunderhead of dust and smoke, the flash of weapons everywhere is like braids and streaks of lighting.

The twanging bows, the stentorian hum of arrows like that of black bee swarms beyond count disturbed, the booming conches, the pounding drums, and the dementedly barbarous clatter of chariot-wheels, of both the armies, is numbing. And the sky darkens deeper by the moment with rich flights of bearded barbs, spears, swords wildly flung and the ceaseless rain of fell astras.

Maharathas and horsemen cut each other down as if offering rivers of noble blood to the earth in some ghastly sacrifice in that awesome war, at once so abominable and so irresistibly beautiful. And elephants gore down elephants, and foot-soldiers butcher foot-soldiers. And the war on that tenth day, being fought for Bhishma's life, between the Kauravas and the Pandavas assumes an incrementally hideous aspect, while it is also like a fight between two hawks for a fine piece of flesh. The crimson river of death foams ever higher and darker on bleeding, incomparable Kurukshetra.'

Sanjaya says, 'Abhimanyu displays his prowess before Bhishma, and challenges your mighty eldest son. Duryodhana strikes Abhimanyu through his chest with nine straight arrows, and in a flash with three. Arjuna's son hurls a fierce and strange lance resembling Yama's rod at Duryodhana's chariot. Your son cleaves it along its length as it courses towards him.

Seeing his spear plummet, Abhimanyu seizes his bow and strikes Duryodhana deep with three shafts through his arms and breast. Quicker than the eye sees, that scintillating young maharatha stabs the Kaurava king with a blur of ten barbs making a neat feathered circle of quivering arrows on his wide chest.

And the duel between those two Kshatriyas, one fighting to kill Bhishma and the other to vanquish Arjuna, is brutal and breathtaking to watch, and gratifying to the senses; it is praised by all the kings.

The son of Drona, that bull among Brahmanas and chastiser of enemies, bloodies Satyaki's chest with a salient arrow. The grandson of Sini also pierces all his vital limbs with nine signal shafts winged with the feathers of the kanka bird. Aswatthaman stabs Satyaki's arms and breast with nine horned barbs, and then with thirty significant shafts more. That celebrated bowman of the Satwatavamsa returns the fire cardinally, covering Aswatthaman in blood.

Maharatha Paurava swathes Dhrishtaketu with his remarkable volleys and fairly mangles him. But the formidable Dhrishtaketu is unmoved and looses a jagged volley of lightning bolts at Paurava. Paurava smashes Dhrishtaketu's bow, and roaring loudly, strikes him repeatedly with a clutch of keen arrows. Dhrishtaketu seizes another bow and gouges Paurava with an astonishing salvo of seventy-three shafts all shot in the heart of a moment.

Those two illustrious archers cover each other with arrows. Each shatters the other's bow, and each kills the other's horses. They face each other with gleaming swords drawn, and bull's hide shields, one adorned with a hundred moons and the other with a hundred stars. They run at each other like two lions in the forest, over a lioness in heat. They wheel around in elegant circles, advance and retreat, and display other dancelike movements, all the while looking for an opening to strike the adversary.

Growing impatient, Paurava roars at Dhrishtaketu to stop and fight, and swiftly strikes him on his mail-covered collar bone, a mighty blow. Not flinching, the Chedi king fetches Paurava a powerful stroke on his shoulder, so some blood flies from the wound. In a blink, they rain a dreadful flurry of cuts, thrusts and wild swings on each other, so that both fall to the ground. Your son Jayatsena takes Paurava into his chariot and bears his away from the field, while Sahadeva bears Dhrishtaketu away.

Chitrasena, having already pierced Susarman with manifold arrows, looses a fresh salvo of sixty-nine burning shafts at him. The incensed Susarman wounds your son all over his body with hundreds of barbs. Chitrasena, infuriated, retaliates with thirty penetrating shafts, and Susarman strikes Chitrasena again.

In that battle for Bhishma's life, Subhadra's son further swells his fame and honour when he flays Brihadbala, drawing that maharatha away from Arjuna, and then marching towards Bhishma. The Kosala king attacks Abhimanyu with five heavy iron shafts, and then with twenty more. Abhimanyu stabs Brihadbala with eight similar missiles, which Brihadbala only shrugs off and Arjuna's son lifts his archery to rive Brihadbala's bow in his hands, and strikes him again thirty barbs swifter than light. Brihadbala takes up another bow and covers the brilliant youth of just sixteen summers in fire.

Both Kshatriyas, one so young and the other seasoned and mature, are such masters of war, that the duel between them is surely reminiscent of the contention between Indra and Bali during the Devasura yuddha in time out of mind.

Bhima, wild and bloody amongst the elephants, looks as resplendent as thunderous Sakra after splitting lofty mountains. The screams and dismal bellows of the great beasts, big as cliffs, that he strikes down as he pleases, fill the world. Hillocks of antimony, the tuskers lying dead across Kurukshetra with their round temples cloven by terrible Bhima are like mountains scattered over the earth.

Well protected, Yudhishtira attacks Salya, king of the Madras, who loses no time turning on his assailant. Jayadratha of the Sindhus strikes Virata with nine keen arrows, and seamlessly with thirty more. Commanding a vast legion, Virata makes a home in Jayadratha's chest for thirty polished shafts. And radiant are those two, the lord of the Matsyas and the ruler of the Sindhus, both armed with beautiful bows, swords and other weapons, wearing dazzling armour, and flying brilliant pennants.

Drona encounters Dhrishtadyumna and mounts a ferocious attack on the prince sworn, why, born to kill him. Smashing Drupada's son's bow, Drona excoriates him with a hum of fifty barbs. That parantapa raises another bow and vents his wrath on the Acharya with a fiery volley. Maharatha Drona slices those arrows along their length even as they flare at him, and looses five keening barbs at his old enemy Drupada's prince. Dhrishtadyumna, roaring, hurls a knobbed golden mace at the Brahmana warrior and Drona nervelessly shatters it with fifty arrows loosed in a blink.

Dhrishtadyumna launches a most refined astra at Drona, who effortlessly foils it with a clutch of nine smoking barbs, unsettling the Pandava Senapati. Rajan, thus they fight, master and disciple, both inspired to draw upon their deepest skills, during this duel fought for the life of Bhishma.

Arjuna, meanwhile rushes towards Bhishma like one king elephant at another, showering ceaseless fire over his Pitamaha. Bhagadatta arrests Arjuna's dangerous careen, setting his massive Supratika between the marauding Pandava and the Kuru grandsire and lashing down a gale of arrows from his height. Arjuna storms straight at Bhagadatta, unleashing a fury of silver shafts at his towering beast, so that Bhagadatta quickly turns away and thunders down upon Drupada's chariot.

Again, Arjuna sets Sikhandin before him and courses on towards Bhishma, who is all he sees before him, his only real target. With loud yells and roars, hordes of your brave fighting men assail Arjuna, who so calmly sows death all around him, in a carmine flash flood. And, ah, all this appears wonderful.

Like the high wind scattering fleecy clouds in a summer sky Arjuna disperses your son's akshauhinis, all the while thinning them, thinning them dreadfully. Each moment, Sikhandin of the single obsession that has possessed him through two strangest lives, heralding his advent with an endless stream of wooden arrows, plunges ever nearer Bhishma.

As for Bhishma, his chariot is his fire-chamber. His bow is the flame of that fire. And swords, shafts and maces are its fuel. The arrows he shoots are the blazing sparks that consume Kshatriyas in that grisly war. As a raging fire rolling across a field of dry grass with the wind, Bhishma burns gloriously as he unleashes his divine astras.

And he decimates the Somakas that follow Arjuna into battle; that effulgent maharatha attenuates the other Pandava legions that ride with Arjuna with swarms of golden-winged shafts. Bhishma fills all the directions, with his leonine roaring, and endlessly strews the awful field of dharma with corpses of chariot warriors and horses with their riders. He reduces the massed chariots to look like palm forests with their leafy heads severed. He strips horses, elephants and chariots of their riders, a thousand each moment.

Hearing the twang of his bow and the slap of his palms against his bowstring, like rolling thunder, terror sweeps through the Pandava ranks; even your own fighting men are affrighted. Not an arrow shot by the daunting Pitamaha misses its mark. They do not just pierce or slay his numberless victims; his barbs plough right through their armoured bodies in bright red eruptions and enter the earth behind them. What count is there of chariots careering across the field of death, with riders and sarathies slain and yoked horses dragging them on all sides with the speed of the wind?

Fourteen thousand noble maharathas, all ready to sacrifice their lives, with gold-worked standards, great warriors belonging to the Chedis, the Kasis, and the Karushas, attack Bhishma, Kshatriya who can only be Siva himself with mouth agape; in moments they are destroyed along with their horses, chariots and elephants.

Rajan, not a single maharatha of the Somakas returns alive from that encounter with Bhishma. Seeing his prowess, all know that none who dares ride against Bhishma this day will escape with his life. And indeed, after the massacre of the Somakas, no rathika will approach Bhishma anymore, but only Arjuna Swetavahana of the white horses, with Krishna as his charioteer, and Sikhandin, prince of Panchala.'

Sanjaya says, 'Sikhandin storms within range of Bhishma and strikes him squarely through his chest with ten broad-headed arrows. The son of Ganga merely looks at Sikhandin as if to kill him with withering disdain. Bhishma will not shoot back at Sikhandin.

Sikhandin pauses, bemused. Arjuna cries at the Panchala prince, "Do not hesitate, Sikhandin. Destroy Maharatha Bhishma, for you alone can. This is the truth. Kill him, Purushavyaghra, kill him now!"

Like a dreamer waking, Sikhandin covers Bhishma in a tirade of every kind of arrow. Ignoring these, Bhishma only looses his own shafts at Arjuna; he also razes the Pandava ranks behind these two. Like grim clouds occluding the sun, the Pandavas, with their vast hosts, push forward to engulf Bhishma.

Bharatarishabha, though surrounded on all sides, that Kshatriya without equal continues to consume the advancing legions like the forest fire does countless trees. Dussasana's shining prowess is wonderful to see as he battles Arjuna to protect the Pitamaha. Even his enemies laud his sheer courage as he fights alone and gloriously against all the Pandavas, and they cannot resist him.

Dussasana smashes the chariots of so many maharathas. With deadly salvos he fells mighty archers from horseback, powerful rathikas and elephants. The great beasts thunder away from the terror and pain of the incandescent Dussasana; flowing blood from the wounds he inflicts on them they scatter in all directions.

Like a fire that blazes more fiercely when fuelled, so does your son rage against the Pandava host. And no Pandava maharathika dares to advance against him as he is then, other than Arjuna with his white horses and Krishna for his sarathy. And, watched by all the warriors, Arjuna, the Vijaya, ineluctably quells the flaming Dussasana and flashes past him towards Bhishma. Though beaten, your son, still relying upon Bhishma's invincible might, comforts his forces and continues to fight fiercely against the Pandavas. Arjuna is radiant; his body seems to blaze with light as he scythes through his enemies.

Sikhandin pierces the Pitamaha with many arrows deadly as lightning and fatal as a snake's venom. But all the Panchala prince's missiles have little impact as Bhishma receives them smiling, as if with delight. Even as a man whose body is fevered by summer heat welcomes torrential rain so does awesome Bhishma seem to welcome Sikhandin's arrows.

All the assembled Kshatriyas behold Bhishma as a great and fierce being, more than merely a man, who relentlessly devastates the Pandava warriors. Duryodhana says to his troops, "Attack Arjuna from all sides. Bhishma will protect you."

The Kaurava forces shed their fears and charge the Pandavas. Duryodhana says again to them, "With his lofty standard with the golden palmyra, Bhishma stands resolute, protecting the honour and the power of all the Dhartarashtra warriors. The very Devas cannot defeat him. What then to say about the Pandavas who are mere mortals? Kshatriyas, do not flee when you face Arjuna. I myself will fight the Pandavas, and be your support."

Hearing your son's words, Rajan, enraged warriors of the Videhas, the Kalingas, and the many tribes of the Daserkas fall upon Phalguni. And many belonging to the Nishadas, the Sauviras, the Bahlikas, the Daradas, the western and northern kingdoms, the Malavas, the Abhighatas, the Surasenas, the Sibis, the Vasatis, the Salwas, the Sakas, the Trigartas, the Ambashtha, and the Kekayas, also swoop down on Arjuna, like swarms of insects upon a fire.

Arjuna aims his devastras at the maharathas leading their akshauhinis; he makes ashes of them, like a fire swallowing insects. As he creates thousands upon thousands of arrows with his astras, his Gandiva dazzles.

Wounded by those arrows, their grand standards torn, those Kshatriyas, even united, cannot so much as draw near Arjuna. Assailed by Kiritin's shafts, rathikas fall with their standards, horsemen with their horses, and elephant riders with their elephants. Soon the earth is covered with the fleeing forces of those kings, routed by Arjuna's arrows.

Having crushed the Kaurava army, Arjuna looses a storm of arrows at Dussasana. The iron shafts pierce through him, and enter the earth like snakes through ant-hills. Arjuna kills Dussasana's horses and his charioteer.

With twenty barbs he smashes Vivimsati's chariot, then strikes that prince with five straight shafts. Attacking Kripa and Vikarna and Salya with a terrific volley, he demolishes their chariots. Defeated, they flee, along with Dussasana and Vikarna and Vivimsati.

Victorious over those maharathas, Arjuna blazes like a god on Kurukshetra. Unleashing waves of arrows on every side, even like the sun streaming rays, Partha overcomes many other kings. Bhaarata, killing them disdainfully with his unearthly archery, he makes another bloody river flow between the Kaurava and Pandava hosts.

Elephants and horses and maharathikas are slaughtered by chariot warriors. And many chariot warriors are trampled by elephants, and many horses are butchered by foot-soldiers. The bodies of elephant-riders and horsemen and chariot warriors are hacked to pieces, which, along with their heads, tumble to the ground.

And the field of the dread war, Rajan, is strewn with the corpses of princes, maharathikas all falling or fallen, decked with ear-rings and bracelets. The bodies of warriors bisected by chariot wheels, or crushed by elephants, also lie scattered. And foot-soldiers and horse riders flee.

Elephants and maharathikas plunge to the earth on all sides. Numerous chariots, with their wheels, yokes and standards smashed, lie strewn across Kurukshetra, as if by some vengeful god's hand. Dyed with the gore of numerous elephants, horses and chariot warriors, the earth looks beautiful like a red cloud in the sky.

Dogs, crows and vultures, wolves and jackals, and other terrifying beasts and birds howl and screech, hungering for dead flesh. Many fell winds blow from all sides. And Rakshasas and Pisachas can be seen with monstrous and ghoulish visages roaring fiercely. Golden strings and costly banners flap in the unnatural wind. Thousands of royal parasols and lofty chariots with splendid standards lie ruined on the ground.

Before all the archers, Bhishma invokes an agneyastra and aims it at Arjuna. His kavacha glittering, Sikhandin rides between the Kuru ancient and Arjuna and attacks Bhishma fiercely. Bhishma promptly withdraws the blinding astra of flames. Arjuna of the white steeds continues to raze your forces, letting ever more streams of blood, while Bhishma is a helpless spectator to the massacre of his army.'

Sanjaya says, 'Resolved to fight to the death, the teeming legions of both armies are ranged against each other, tenacious Kshatriyas ranged in vyuhas which have long since been violated. And no more, as had been agreed before the war began, do rathikas exclusively fight other chariot warriors, or foot-soldiers against foot-soldiers, or horsemen face other horsemen, or elephant-warriors other elephant-warriors. Instead, possessed completely by the feral spirit of war they attack each other wildly, chaotically, like men gone mad.

Ghastly devastation sweeps both armies, as elephants and men fight each other without distinction.

Then Salya and Kripa, and Chitrasena, and Dussasana, and Vikarna, mounted on their shining chariots, bring swift terror to the Pandava host. Savaged by those great Kshatriyas, the Pandava army reels and lurches like a boat tossed on the ocean by the wind. Like the biting cold that chills the blood of soft cows, Bhishma ploughs through the forces of sons of Pandu.

Immaculate and absolute mayhem rules Kurukshetra. Celebrated Arjuna fells your mighty tuskers like bulging clouds; his arrows drink the blood and claim the lives of great rathikas by now past all count. Struck by tempests of arrows and spears, whole elephant legions fall trumpeting. And oh, the battlefield looks eerily magnificent with the lifeless bodies and heads of warriors still adorned with sparkling ornaments.

Watching the Pitamaha exert himself against the storming Arjuna, your sons draw near him and surround him with their forces. Wanting to give up their lives and attain swarga this very day, they ride fearlessly at the Pandavas. Remembering all the insults and injuries inflicted upon them by you and your son, the noble Pandavas, eager for revenge and victory, joyfully engage your sons and their army.

The Pandava Senapati Dhrishtadyumna roars to his men, "Somakas and Srinjayas, attack Bhishma!" And though wounded by innumerable arrows, they charge at the son of Ganga. Himself in the grip of the fury of battle, the Pitamaha turns on the Srinjayas. When he was a boy, Bhishma learnt the astra shastra from great Parasurama, who imparted to him knowledge of mighty devastras which could consume hostile armies. Using that knowledge now, the Kuru ancient wreaks havoc on the enemy ranks, killing ten thousand great warriors every day.

Bharatarishabha, on the tenth day, Bhishma single-handedly slaughters ten thousand elephants. He kills seven famed maharathikas of the Matsyas and the Panchalas; he kills five thousand foot-soldiers, one thousand tuskers, and ten thousand horses and horsemen.

Having razed the troops of all the kings who have come to war for the Pandavas, he kills Satanika, Virata's beloved brother. The incomparable Bhishma annihilates a thousand Kshatriyas with his broad-headed inexorable shafts. He cuts a russet swathe through the Kshatriyas of the Pandava army as they advance towards him following Arjuna.

Enveloping the Pandava host with dense barrages of arrows, with fire, water and wind of awesome devastras, Bhishma stands imperious at the head of the Kaurava forces. On the tenth day of the war, he stands between the two armies, bow in hand, and none of the kings can even look at him, for he burns like the mid-day sun in the summer sky. As Sakra scorched the Daitya host in battle, even so does Bhishma sear the Pandava army.

Seeing the Kuru Pitamaha's torrid prowess, Krishna says blithely to Arjuna, "'There between the two armies stands Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, devouring our ranks. Only you can withstand Bhishma's arrows. Only you can bring him down. Kill Bhishma today, Arjuna, or this war will be lost."

The Vanara bannered Arjuna lifts his archery and shrouds Bhishma, his chariot, horses and standard with his blistering arrow storm. But serenely Bhishma cuts Arjuna's every shaft down.

Dhrishtaketu, Bhima, Dhrishtadyumna, Nakula and Sahadeva, Chekitana, and the five Kaikaya brothers, and Mahabaho Satyaki and Subhadra's son, and Ghatotkacha, and the five sons of Draupadi, and Sikhandin, and the valiant Kuntibhoja, and Susarman, and Virata, and countless powerful Pandava warriors have been wounded by Bhishma's arrows, and they all seem plunged in an ocean of despair, until Arjuna arrives to rescue them.

Protected by Arjuna, Sikhandin seizes a mighty astra and charges toward Bhishma alone. The indomitable Arjuna makes short and bloody work of those who surround and follow Bhishma, and then himself attacks the Pitamaha. Satyaki, and Chekitana, and Dhrishtadyumna, and Virata, and Drupada, and Madri's twin sons, all led and shielded by Arjuna, attack Bhishma. And Abhimanyu, and the five sons of Draupadi, with raised weapons, also storm against him.

All those unwavering maharathas pierce various parts of great Bhishma's body with deadly barbs. Disregarding them entirely, Bhishma plunges ahead into the Pandava ranks with undimmed assurance. Effortlessly he thwarts all the arrows they rain down upon him and strikes them with terror and death.

Glancing frequently at Sikhandin, always with a mocking smile, always remembering this prince was born a woman, he does not aim a single arrow at him. Instead he kills seven maharathikas of Drupada's akshauhini. Confused and despairing shouts arise amongst the Matsyas, the Panchalas, and the Chedis, who unitedly attack that preternatural Kshatriya. With vast numbers of foot-soldiers and horses and chariots, and with unending volleys of arrows, they engulf Bhishma, son of Bhagirathi, that devourer of his enemies, like clouds hiding the sun.

Truly now, the war is turned as awesome as the Devasura yuddha of old at its most brutal, and Arjuna Kiritin sets Sikhandin before him and strikes Bhishma repeatedly with transcendent archery, with terrible fusillades.'

Sanjaya says, 'Keeping Sikhandin in front, the Pandavas surround Bhishma and rain wave upon wave of arrows at him. All the Srinjayas unite to strike him with hundred-flamed satagnis, with spiked maces and battle-axes, clubs and bearded barbs, golden winged shafts and spears and Kampana, arrows with heads shaped like the calf-tooth and myriad other missiles.

His coat of mail is pierced all over; he is wounded in every vital part and blood gushes from all him limbs; but Bhishma feels no pain. And to his enemies, he looks like the fire that blazes at the end of the yuga. His bow and arrows are the apocalyptic flames of that fire. The flight of his astras is like the winds of the pralaya. The clatter of his chariot wheels is its heat, and his weapons are its blinding brilliance. His beautiful bow forms its fierce tongue and the bodies of heroic warriors he slays is the source of its energy.

Bhishma blasts his scarlet way through hosts of chariots that encircle him and emerges triumphant from the welter of that seething throng. Ignoring the king of the Panchalas and Dhrishtaketu, he penetrates deep into the Pandava army. He stabs the six Pandava maharathas, Satyaki and Bhima, Arjuna and Drupada, Virata and Dhrishtadyumna, with a many headed dragon of arrows which can melt any armour on earth.

Those maharathas foil Bhishma's beast of barbs and strike him forcefully with ten barbs, always closing in on him still. Sikhandin continues to pierce great Bhishma's body with his golden winged arrows, and Bhishma never offers him any response. And protected by Sikhandin, Arjuna dashes at Bhishma and smashes his bow in his hands.

The seven maharathas, Drona and Kritavarman, Jayadratha and Bhurisravas, Sala and Salya, and Bhagadatta cannot bear to watch this affront. Inflamed, they assail Arjuna; they cover him with elemental devastras and the thousands of shafts that these divine weapons spew. As they charge Arjuna's chariot, their roaring is like that of the raging ocean at the end of the yuga: kill, bring up our forces, take, pierce, hack them down! These shouts resound all around.

Hearing that tumult, the Pandava maharathas fly up to defend Arjuna. Satyaki, and Bhima, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race, and Virata and Drupada, and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, and the wrathful Abhimanyu: enraged, and bearing mighty bows, they advance like seven storms. And the battle that breaks out between them and the Kaurava warriors makes one's hair stand on end, even on this tenth blood-soaked day of the war, for it is like the battle of the Devas against the Danavas.

Guarded by Arjuna, the Kiritin, Sikhandin strikes Bhishma with ten deep arrows after the Pitamaha's bow was broken. He strikes Bhishma's charioteer with another volley, and fells his standard with yet another.

Bhishma takes up another colossal bow. That too is riven by Arjuna with three barbs. Bhishma seizes up another, quick as thinking, but ambidextrous Arjuna, switching the Gandiva from hand to hand, breaks that one as well, and, indeed, every other bow which his Pitamaha picks up.

Bhishma licks the corners of his mouth and takes up a spear charged with an astra which can split a mountain. He hurls it furiously at Arjuna's chariot. Watching it course towards him like lightning, Partha looses five thick arrows swift as the mind and shatters Bhishma's recondite missile into five pieces. And it plummets, extinguished, like a flash of lightning separated from a mass of clouds.

Bhishma flares up in anger. That Kshatriya, that conqueror of enemy cities, now says to himself, "With a single bow I could kill all the Pandavas, if they were not protected by Mahavishnu himself.

But I will not fight them for two reasons: because they cannot be slain and because Sikhandin is a woman. When my father married Kali, he granted me two boons: that no one could kill me in war, and that I could choose the time of my death. I believe that this is the fitting hour, and I should now wish my own death."

Knowing Bhishma's resolve, the Rishis and the Vasus in the sky say, "We commend your decision, O son! Do as you have resolved and withdraw your heart from battle." As they finish speaking, a fragrantly moist and auspicious breeze blows along a natural direction. Heavenly cymbals clash and a shower of bright unearthly flowers rains down upon Bhishma.

Only Bhishma hears the words spoken by the Rishis and the Vasus. And I hear them through the power given to me by the Muni. The hearts of the Devas are full of anguish at the thought of Bhishma, that favourite son of all the worlds, falling from his chariot.

Having heard those divine words, though deeply pierced already, Bhishma of great tapasya attacks Arjuna more violently than ever. Incensed, Sikhandin strikes the Pitamaha in the chest with nine sharp arrows. Bleeding profusely, yet Bhishma remains fearless, and unyielding as a mountain during an earthquake. With a ferocious laugh, Arjuna draws his Gandiva, strikes the son of Ganga with twenty five barbs, and then roaring he pierces him through every limb and vital organ with a fiery sermon of hundreds of arrows.

Maharatha Bhishma remains unmoved and returns Arjuna's mighty fire, shaft for shaft. As for Sikhandin's whetted arrows with golden wings, they make not the least impression on the Kuru grandsire.

Still keeping Sikhandin before him, and his rage quickening each moment, even as if he finds himself hurtling, now helplessly, toward some great and fateful moment in time, Arjuna continues to advance towards Bhishma and once more breaks the bow in his hands. Striking Bhishma with ten punitive arrows, he cleaves the Pitamaha's standard with another. Pounding Bhishma's chariot with ten explosive shafts, he makes him shudder.

The son of Ganga takes up an even greater bow. But no sooner does he heft it than Arjuna slices it into three slivers with a trinity of broad-headed shafts. And thus the son of Pandu destroys all Bhishma's bows in that duel.

Suddenly the last vestige of resistance within Bhishma, the pure Kshatriya, gives way and with it Bhishma no longer wants to fight Arjuna. Arjuna strikes him with another tremendous volley of twenty five thudding shafts. Dripping blood, down his noble face and his magnificent body, Bhishma says to Dussasana, "Behold Arjuna, this magnificent Pandava maharathika, who has single-handedly pierced me with countless arrows. Not even Indra can vanquish Arjuna in battle. As for me, even united, the Devas, Danavas and Rakshasas cannot quell me. What then of maharathas among men?"

Even while Bhishma is speaking, Arjuna, still with Sikhandin before him, continues to attack his Pitamaha.

Deeply wounded by Arjuna's unearthly shafts, Bhishma says to Dussasana with a smile, "These arrows coursing at me in a straight line, whose touch is like lightning, are not Sikhandin's but Arjuna's. They plunge easily through my impenetrable armour, strike me with the force of mushalas and shake me with their ferocity. These shafts are not Sikhandin's.

Hard as the Brahmana's rod of punishment and with an irresistible force like lightning, these arrows ravage my very prana. These are not Sikhandin's. Each as forceful as a mace or a jagged club, these arrows destroy my strength like messengers sent by Yama himself. These are not Sikhandin's. Like angry serpents, flicking their tongues, these barbs eat into my vitals. These are not Sikhandin's—these that cut through me like the biting cold of winter that kills cows.

Other than the valorous wielder of Gandiva, the Vanara-bannered Jishnu, all other kings, even united, cannot harm me in the least."

And then, once more Kshatriya fire blazes up in the old warrior, like a lamp burning high just before it is put out, and Bhishma unleashes a terrible astra at Arjuna as if to destroy all the Pandavas with that single weapon. Before all the great warriors of your army, Arjuna truncates the incendiary shaft with three light like arrows, and it falls harmlessly to the ground. Ready for either death or victory, Bhishma takes up a sword and a golden shield. Before he can even alight from his chariot, Arjuna shatters that shield into a hundred pieces. All this, my lord, is breathtaking.

Yudhishtira goads his forces on crying, "Charge at Ganga's son. Do not be afraid!" And roaring all together, as if in some god's gigantic voice, they attack that solitary warrior from all sides with bearded shafts and long spears, axes and swords, with calf-toothed and thick arrows.

Longing for Bhishma's triumph, your sons surround him also roaring like lions. On that tenth day of the great war, when Bhishma and Arjuna face each other in that final contention, the two armies, with everything at stake this momentous day, fight a battle like none yet seen, inundating Kurukshetra with noble warriors' gore. An abysmal whirlpool of killing and dying rises and spins wildly where the two armies collide, even like the vortex that occurs where the Ganga meets the ocean. And the bloody Earth assumes a fierce form. Her even and rough surfaces can no longer be distinguished; the swollen tide of blood covers them.

Although pierced in all his limbs and vital organs, Bhishma stands serene, having annihilated ten thousand warriors. At the head of his forces, Arjuna breaks through the very heart of the Kaurava legions. With white horses yoked to his whirling chariot, he terrifies us with his astras, and your men flee from the nightmared field.

The Sauviras, the Kitavas, the kings of the eastern, western and northern regions, the Malavas, the Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Sibis, the Vasatis, the Salwas, the Sayas, the Trigartas, the Ambashthas, the Kaikeyas, and many other illustrious warriors, all mutilated by implacable, paramount Arjuna, desert Bhishma and flee.

The Pandava hosts encircle Bhishma and overwhelm the Kauravas that protect him. Kill, hack them to pieces, show no mercy, drink his blood, off with their heads! These are the unmitigated roars and yells which ring out around Bhishma's chariot.

Having killed so many thousands, now every inch of Bhishma's body is pierced by arrows, most of them Arjuna's keen shafts. And then, with a final echoing roar, with his head to the east, just before sunset, before your sons' very eyes, mighty, mighty Devavrata falls out of his chariot and onto to the waiting, grieving earth.

When Bhishma falls, the sky is rent with the sad cries of the Devas and of earthly kings. Seeing the high-souled Pitamaha fall, our hearts fall with him. That greatest of all maharathas, that Mahabaho, plunges to the ground like Indra's standard cut down, and the earth shakes.

With arrows protruding from him all over, his body never touches the ground. O Bharatarishabha, at that awful moment a miracle reveals him lying on a bed of arrows all plunged deep into his own body! Cloud scud into the sky at that twilight hour and bathe his resplendent, bleeding form with a soft, cool, fragrant shower; and Bhumi Devi trembles.

Fallen Bhishma observes that the sun is in the southern solstice, and he does not allow himself to die, for it is Dakshinayana still and an inauspicious time. The very sky is full of divine voices saying, "Why does Ganga's son, that foremost of all men, give up his life during the southern declension?"

Hearing them, Bhishma replies, "I am alive!"

Although fallen, Bhishma waits for Uttarayana, the northern declension, to die. Learning of his resolve, Ganga, the daughter of Himavat, sends some great Rishis to him. They come as swans who dwell on the Manasa lake, and fly down together to Bhishma, where he lies on his bed of arrows.

Those Rishis alight from the sky and walk around him in pradakshina. Knowing well that it still Dakshinayana, while the Sun is on his southern journey, they say to one another, "Being such a Mahatman, why should Bhishma pass from the world during the southern declension?"

Having said this, they fly up and towards the southern direction. Knowing Bhishma sees them and reflects for a moment. And he says to them, "I will not leave this world as long as the sun is in the southern solstice. I will die when the Sun resumes his northern journey, during Uttarayana. O swans, I swear this to you. I will keep my breath in this broken body until the northern declension.

I can choose the hour of my death, it was my father's boon to me and let his boon be proved true. I will stay alive, and die only when the Sun resumes his northern course during Uttarayana. I will hold life within this body and I have the power to decide the time of my death." Having said these words to the swans, Bhishma continues to lie upon his bed of arrows.

The Pandavas and the Srinjayas rejoice when they see Bhishma fall, and your son is aghast when the Pitamaha is overthrown. All the Kauravas are stricken, benumbed. Led by Kripa and Duryodhana they stand transfixed, tears leaking from their disbelieving eyes. Overcome, they remain motionless for a long time; as if frozen in that abyssal moment, they no longer fight the Pandavas.

When the unslayable Bhishma of untold tejas is felled, all the Kauravas think that the destruction of the Kuru king is now certain. Routed by Arjuna, in the midst of their fallen heroes, themselves mangled, they are all bemused, not moving a muscle, not knowing what to do.

The daring Pandavas, raise massive arms that look like spiked maces, and exult in their victory and blow their great conches. And the Somakas and the Panchalas rejoice. Thousands of trumpets are blown, and the mighty Bhima slaps his arm-pits and roars and roars above the shocked silence, peals of thunder.

When Bhishma falls, the warriors of both armies put down their weapons. Some then scream loudly and some flee, while others faint. Some condemn the ways of the Kshatriya varna while others praise the fallen Bhishma.

The Rishis and the Pitris all extol Bhishma of lofty vows; the departed ancestors of the Bhaaratas also honour Bhishma. Meanwhile, wise Bhishma himself, the noble son of Shantanu who knows the final Yoga, the communion described in the Vedanta, prays silently. He is quiet, and awaits his hour.’

Dhritarashtra says, 'Alas, deprived of Bhishma, god-like Brahmacharin, what is the state of my warriors, O Sanjaya? The very moment that Bhishma did not attack Sikhandin, even though he despised him, I knew that the Kurus would soon be vanquished by the Pandavas.

Ah, I am dejected to hear of the Pitamaha's fall. What can be a heavier sorrow than this? My heart must surely be made of stone that it does not break into a hundred pieces on hearing of Bhishma's end! Tell me of his achievements for, alas, the war has claimed even he who was invincible.

I cannot bear that Devavrata should be killed in battle. He who could not be overcome by Jamadagni's son himself, even with divine astras, alas, he is now felled by Drupada's son Sikhandin, that paltry prince of Panchala.'

Sanjaya says, 'Overpowered in the twilight hour, the Pitamaha Bhishma dismays the Dhartarashtras and delights the Panchalas. Falling onto the lap of the Earth, he lies on his bed of arrows without his body touching the ground.

When he plunges from his chariot, despondent cries are heard among all creatures. When that great tree of shelter of the Kurus, the ever victorious Bhishma, plummets, the Kshatriyas of both armies are astounded. Seeing Bhishma overthrown with his standard, his armour desiccated, the Kauravas and the Pandavas are both grief-stricken. And the sky darkens and the Sun himself is dimmed. The Earth seems to cry out when Bhishma is cut down.

This one is the foremost of those with knowledge of the Vedas! He is unsurpassed in this learning! This is what all men say of that Purusharishabha as he lies on his bed of a thousand arrows.

Once, discovering that his father Shantanu had been struck by Kama, he resolved to draw up his vital seed and to remain a brahmacharin throughout his life—this is what the Rishis, Siddhas and the Charanas say of Bhishma as he lies on his bed of arrows.

When Bhishma, the Pitamaha of the Bhaaratas, is struck down, your sons stand as if in a nightmare, bewildered, disbelieving, not knowing what to do next. Their hearts and faces are suffused with sadness. Their splendid appearances are dull. They hang their heads low in shame.

The victorious Pandavas, on the other hand, stand jubilantly at the head of their forces; and they blow their golden conches. As thousands of trumpets blast celebrantly, we see the mighty Bhima, drenched in blood, looking like some gory phantasm, prancing about, dancing, roaring, even singing in delight, having himself slaughtered countless enemy maharathas, among them many of your sons.

The Kauravas are crippled in spirit. Karna and Duryodhana sigh deeply. When Bhishma falls, cries of anguish and dismay are heard all around, and great confusion sweeps your son's ranks.

Seeing Bhishma fall, your son Dussasana swiftly rides into Drona's akshauhini. Duryodhana had given charge of protecting Bhishma's life to his younger brother, with his legion. Dussasana is now surrounded by a sea of abject, shocked fighting men. The Kauravas surround him wanting to hear what he has to say.

Dussasana gives Drona the grave tidings, and the Acharya staggers as if struck by an astra and falls down in a dead faint. When he recovers, he stops the Kuru army from continuing the battle. Seeing the Kauravas hold back, the Pandavas send messengers on horseback to forbid their forces also from fighting on. The kings of both armies remove their armour and move towards Bhishma.

Thousands of other warriors too put down their weapons and advance towards the high-souled Bhishma, like the Devas towards Indra. The Pandavas and Kauravas approach Bhishma, lying on his bed of arrows, and bow reverently to him.

Bhishma speaks to the Pandavas and the Kurus who stand sorrowing and silent before him. He says, "Welcome to you, blessed ones! Welcome to you, maharathas! I am pleased to see you, who are the equals of the very Devas." His head lolls back awkwardly unsupported. Bhishma says, "My head need a pillow, fetch me one."

The assembled kings rush away and bring back many soft and fine pillows. The Pitamaha refuses them all. That purushavyaghra says with a laugh, "These are not fitting for a Kshatriya's bed." Seeing the world's greatest maharatha, Arjuna, he says "Dhananjaya, Mahabaho, my head hangs back. Give me a pillow that you regard fitting."'

Sanjaya says, 'Stringing the Gandiva and bowing, Arjuna, with tear-filled eyes, says, "Command me, you invincible one, greatest of all Kshatriyas, O foremost among the Kurus, for I am your slave! What should I do, Pitamaha?"

Bhishma says, "My head droops. O Phalguna, quickly get me a pillow for my bed. You are the most outstanding archer. You know Kshatriya dharma, and you are both wise and noble."

Arjuna says, "So be it," and sets himself to the task. He raises the Gandiva and, with Bhishma's leave and chanting mantras, drills three arrows into the ground beneath the Pitamaha's head, to be its support! Bhishma is satisfied and he praises Arjuna.

Looking at all the Bhaaratas there, he says to Dhanajaya, "Son of Pandu, you have given me a fitting pillow for a fallen Kshatriya. Had you done otherwise, I would have cursed you. Mahabaho, a Kshatriya should sleep on the battlefield on even such a bed of arrows."

Bhishma then says to the gathered kings and princes, "Look at the pillow that Arjuna has given me. I will lie on this worthy bed until the sun turns north again at Uttarayana. Those kings who come to see me then will watch me die. When the Sun moves towards Vaisravana on his swift chariot yoked to seven horses, only then will I leave my body even like the dearest friend.

Dig a ditch around me, O kings. Lying upon these hundreds of arrows, I will worship the Sun. As for you, forsake your enmity and stop fighting."' Sanjaya continues, 'Now some physicians and men skilled in drawing out arrows, bring the tools of their trade. Seeing them, Bhishma says to your son, "Dismiss these physicians with gifts, after paying proper respect to them. I have no need for them now. I have won the highest and most praiseworthy state ordained for Kshatriyas!

Lying on this bed of arrows, it is not proper for me to accept any treatment. I should be burnt with these arrows in my body." Duryodhana honours and dismisses the physicians. The rulers of different realms who witness this display of great Bhishma's steadfast virtue are moved to wonder.

The Pandavas and the Kauravas together draw near Bhishma Mahatman lying on his magnificent bed. They pay him worship and circumambulate him three times in pradakshina; posting guards around him, those Kshatriyas, with bodies drenched in blood, retire to their tents in anguish, reflecting on what they have seen this dreadful day, the first of the Kali Yuga.

Krishna comes to the Pandavas, as those maharathas sit together both elated and grief-stricken at the fall of Bhishma, and says to Yudhishtira, "Your victory is the outcome of your good fortune. Through good fortune alone the indomitable Bhishma has fallen. Or perhaps it is destiny that he who was a master of every weapon found you, O king of dharma, as his enemy and has been consumed by your wrathful eye!"

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira replies feelingly, "Krishna, through your grace comes victory, and through your fury defeat! You dispel the fears of those who worship you. You are our refuge. It is no surprise that they whom you have always protected in battle, in whose welfare you have always been engaged, Kesava, should triumph. With you as our protector, I do not regard anything as surprising, fortunate or wonderful!"

Krishna answers with a smile, "O best of kings, only you can speak such words!"'

"Sanjaya says, 'The next morning, all the kings, the Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras go again to the Pitamaha. They worship that incomparable Kshatriya, lying on his hero's bed, and stand before him with folded hands. Thousands of maidens shower powdered sandalwood, cooked rice grains over him; they drape auspicious garlands of flowers on him.

And women and old men and children, and countless other spectators to the gruesome war, all approach Bhishma like earthly creatures wanting to gaze at the setting sun. Hundreds of thousands of conches boom and trumpets resound, and actors, mimes, and skilled craftsmen draw near the aged Pitamaha to pay homage.

The war pauses, as the Pandavas and the Kauravas put aside their armour and weapons and together come to that Parantapa. And once more, as in earlier times, they stand there together, kinsmen and enemies, and speak to each other amiably. That assemblage of hundreds of Bhaarata kings, adorned by Bhishma in their very midst, is glorious like a gathering of the Devas in Swarga. And they honour him like the Devas adore Brahma.

Though his body is broken by the very arrows on which he now lies, and they sear pain through him like burning fire, Bhishma shows hardly any sign of agony. Almost unconscious because of his wounds, Bhishma looks at the kings and asks for water. Those Kshatriyas bring him many beautiful jars of cool, crystalline water, and other exquisite drinks besides.

Seeing all that sweet water and wine, Bhishma says curtly, "I am now distanced from worldly pleasures and this fine water and wine is of no use to me. I am lying on a bed of arrows, waiting for the return of the Moon and the Sun!" Thus reproaching the kings in a low voice, he says, "I want to see Arjuna."

Mahabaho Arjuna comes forward, stands with folded hands, and says, "What shall I do?"

The righteous Bhishma says to him, "My body burns with your shafts and I am in agony. My mouth is parched. Give me water, O Arjuna. You are a great archer, and only you can give me water to quench my thirst."

Arjuna says, "I will, Pitamaha."

He mounts his chariot, and stretches the Gandiva. Hearing the twang of his bow and the slap of his palms like a thunderclap against his bowstring terrifies the armies and the kings. That maharatha mounts his chariot and circles the fallen Pitamaha. Before both vast hosts, chanting mantras to invoke the Parjanyastra, Arjuna shoots a candescent arrow into the ground, slightly south of where Bhishma lies.

Nectar-like in scent and taste, a spring of pure, auspicious and cool water gushes out of the earth and up into Bhishma's lips. And with that jet of water Arjuna slakes the thirst of Bhishma, that bull among the Kurus, of godlike deeds and prowess.

Watching that Sakra-like feat of Arjuna's, all the kings are amazed; and seeing his superhuman ability, the Kurus tremble like cows shivering in the cold. The gathered sovereigns of the world wave their pennants in admiration. And the deafening blast of conches and the pounding of drums are heard all over the battlefield.

His thirst quenched, Bhishma praises Arjuna before all the kings saying, "O Mahabaho, this is not as amazing as it seems, O son of Kuru's race, for, you of immeasurable effulgence, even Narada spoke of you as the ancient Rishi Nara!

With Krishna for your ally, you will accomplish things that even Indra may not try to achieve. Those who know such things recognise you as the destroyer of the entire race of Kshatriyas. You are the supreme archer. You are the most superior man. Just as humans are the best of all animals, and as Garuda is the foremost of all avians; as the Ocean is the best among all water bodies, and the cow foremost among all quadrupeds; as the sun is the most brilliant among all luminous bodies and Himavat among all mountains; as the Brahmana is among all varnas, you are the greatest archer!

Duryodhana did not listen to what Vidura and Drona and Rama and Janardana and I, and also Sanjaya repeatedly said to him. Rashly, foolishly, he ignored our most earnest advice. Beyond all counsel, he will die at the hands of Bhima!"

Hearing these words, Duryodhana is plunged in dejection. Bhishma says, "Listen to me, O king, and at least now discard your anger. You have seen how Arjuna created this spring of water like amrita for me. No one else on earth can achieve such a feat.

The weapons of Agni, Varuna, Soma, Vayu, and Vishnu, those of Indra, Pasupati, and Paramesthi, and those of Prajapati, Dhatri, Tashtri, Savitri, and Vivaswat—in this world of men, all these are known only to Arjuna. Yes, Krishna also knows them. But there is no one else.

Not even if the Devas and Asuras unite can they defeat this son of Pandu in battle. His powers are more than superhuman. Make peace with this mighty warrior, this ornament of battle. Before great Krishna is moved to complete wrath, king of the Kurus, it is dharma for you make peace with the heroic sons of Pandu. As long as a few of your brothers still remain unslain, let peace, O Rajan, be struck. Before Yudhishtira, with eyes blazing fury, entirely annihilates your forces, let peace be made. Before Nakula, and Sahadeva, and Bhima exterminate your army, you must befriend the Pandavas again.

Let this war end today with my death. Make peace with the Pandavas; listen to me, Anagha, and do as I say! Only this can still save you, and indeed the entire Kuru vamsa. Put aside your rage and make peace with your cousins.

What Arjuna has achieved is enough. Let Bhishma's death renew love between the sons of Dhritarashtra and those of Pandu. Let the surviving warriors live. Relent, O Rajan! Give half the kingdom to the Pandavas. Let Dharmaraja Yudhishtira go to Indraprastha. Do not be small-minded or incite further bloodshed; this will only bring you eternal disgrace among the kings of the earth.

With my death, let peace come to all. Let all the rulers of the earth embrace and mingle joyfully with one another. Let father be united with son; let sister's son join his uncle. Ah Suyodhana, if ignorance and foolishness keep you from listening to me, you will repent greatly. This is the truth. Stop this war now!"

Having said this kindly to Duryodhana in the midst of the gathered kings, Bhishma falls silent. The arrows burn his body and, withdrawing his mind from the pain with dhyana, he applies himself to yoga.

Your son disregards what Bhishma has told him, those words of dharma which might still have saved him, like a dying man refusing medicine.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After Bhishma shuts his eyes and falls silent, all the assembled kings return to their encampments. When he hears that Bhishma has been struck down, Radha's son Karna comes alone to him, in some fear. He sees that most illustrious Kshatriya lying on his bed of reeds.

With eyes closed, he approaches Bhishma and falls at his feet. His voice choking, Karna says, "O Lord of the Kurus, I am Radha's son, whom you always looked upon with hate whenever I was near."

Bhishma opens his failing eyes, asks the guards around to withdraw, and suddenly he embraces Karna with one arm, like a father holding his son, and speaks to him lovingly. "Come, come near me. You are my adversary who always challenges me. If you had not come to me, I would have been sad indeed.

You are Kunti's son, not Radha's. Adhiratha is not your father. Mahabaho, I heard this from Narada and from Krishna. And it is true. Ah Karna, I do not bear you any grudge. I only spoke harshly to you to weaken your resolve.

You of excellent vows, you speak ill of the Pandavas for no reason. You were born out of wedlock and that is why you have said and done whatever you have. Through pride, and keeping the company of base men, you have come to hate men of worth. And so I spoke unkindly about you in the Kaurava camp.

I know too well that your prowess in battle is irresistible. I also know of your deep reverence for Brahmanas, your courage, and your charity. You are like a Deva and there is none like you among men. I wanted to prevent this war between brothers and that is why I always spoke cruelly and contemptuously about you, for I knew that Duryodhana depended on you to win this war for him. And, my child, as a warrior and an archer you are Arjuna's equal in battle, why, even Krishna's peer!

O Karna, you rode by yourself to Kasi with your bow and vanquished all the kings there single-handedly to get a bride for Duryodhana. The invincible Jarasandha, who always boasted of his great prowess, was no match for you in battle and you quelled him.

You are devoted to Brahmanas; you always fight fairly. In strength and vigour, you are equal to a child of the Devas and superior to all men. I have never felt any true anger towards you and that which I showed is now dispelled. For I have learnt that men's best efforts cannot prevent Destiny from taken its course, having its way.

O Parantapa, the valiant sons of Pandu are your brothers. Mahabaho, if you want to gratify me, your Pitamaha, join them. O Suryaputra, let this war end with me. Even today let all the kings of the Earth who remain alive be freed from danger!"

Karna says, "I know this, Mahabaho! It is as you say. I know I am Kunti's son, and not the son of a Suta. But I was abandoned by Kunti, and I have been raised by a Suta. Having enjoyed the wealth and friendship of Duryodhana, I cannot betray his trust now. Like Krishna who fights resolutely for the Pandavas, I too am willing to sacrifice my possessions, my body itself, my children, and my wife, for Duryodhana's sake. It is fitting for a Kshatriya to die on the battlefield, and not from disease or old age!

Relying upon Suyodhana I have always chosen to oppose the Pandavas. This choice will run its full course. It cannot be changed. Who dares, O Bhishma, to challenge Destiny? Who can prevail against what is written in the stars before we are even born?

Pitamaha, you saw and spoke of various signs and omens which portended the destruction of the world. I know only too well that Arjuna and Krishna cannot be conquered in battle. Still we will fight them. And I will overcome Arjuna in war! This I am determined to do. I cannot put aside this hatred I have for the Pandavas. Readily and unwaveringly, I will face Arjuna in battle. I am firm in my resolve, so give me your leave to go to war.

Now that you have fallen, I will fight. This is my only wish. Ah Pitamaha, forgive me any cruel words that I may have spoken to you, or any angry or callous deed which I might have directed against you."

Bhishma says, "I allow you to fight, Karna, if you cannot root out this loathing in your heart. Fight, moved by the wish to attain Swarga! Without anger and spite, serve your king righteously with all your power and courage.

You have my leave, Karna! Achieve what you seek. Through Arjuna you will attain what is possible by fulfilling the dharma of a Kshatriya. Free of pride, fight vigorously and well, for a Kshatriya's source of happiness lies in a just war. For a long time I tried to make peace between the sons of Pandu and the sons of Dhritarashtra. But, Karna, I failed. This is the truth."'

Sanjaya says, 'Having obtained Bhishma's forgiveness and his blessing, Karna takes the dust from his Pitamaha's feet, bows deeply to him, mounts his chariot and rides towards Duryodhana's tent.'"

APPENDIX FOR THE BHAGAVAD GITA

1. Samkhya

Notes directly quoted from Sanskrit-English dictionary of Vaman Shivram Apte:

1. Relating to numbers. 2. Calculating, enumerating. 3. Discriminative. 4. Deliberating, reasoning, a reasoner. 5. Of one of the 6 systems of Hindu philosophy, attributed to the Sage Kapila. The philosophy is so called because it enumerates 25 tattvas or true principles; its chief objective is to enter the final emancipation of the 25th tattva, the Purusha or Soul, from the bonds of this worldly existence—the fetters of phenomenal creation—by conveying a correct knowledge of the 24 other Tattvas and by properly discriminating the Soul from them. It regards the whole universe to be a development of an inanimate principle called Prakriti q.v., while the Purusha is altogether passive and simply an onlooker. Samkhya agrees with the Vedanta in being synthetical and thus differs from the analytical Nyaya or Vaiseshika; but its great point of divergence from the Vedanta is that it maintains two principles that Vedanta denies, and it does not admit God as the creator of the universe, which the Vedanta affirms.

2. Yoga

Also from the dictionary of Vaman Shivram Apte:

1. Joining, uniting. 2. Union, conjunction. 3. Deep and abstract meditation, contemplation with the Supreme Spirit. 4. The system of philosophy established by Patanjali, which is considered to be the second division of the Samkhya philosophy, but is practically reckoned as a separate system. The chief aim of the Yoga philosophy is to teach the means by which the human soul may be completely united with the Supreme Spirit and thus secure absolution; and deep abstract meditation is laid down as the chief means to securing this end, elaborate rules being given for the proper practice of such Yoga or concentration of mind.

A NOTE ON HINDU TIME

365 human years make one year of the Devas and Pitrs, the Gods and the manes.

Four are the ages in the land of Bharata: the krita, the treta, the dwapara and the kali. The krita yuga lasts 4800 divine years, the treta 3600, the dwapara 2400, and the kali 1200; and then, another krita yuga begins.

The krita or satya yuga is the age of purity; it is sinless. Dharma, righteousness, is perfect and walks on four feet in the krita. But in the treta yuga, adharma, evil, enters the world and the very fabric of time begins to decay. Finally, the kali yuga, the fourth age, is almost entirely corrupt, with dharma barely surviving, hobbling on one foot.

A chaturyuga, a cycle of four ages, is 12,000 divine years, or 365 x 12,000 human years long. 71 chaturyugas make a manvantara; fourteen manvantaras, a kalpa. A kalpa of 1000 chaturyugas, 12 million divine years, is one day of Brahma, the Creator.

8,000 Brahma years make one Brahma yuga, 1,000 Brahma yugas make a savana, and Brahma's life is 3,003 savanas long.

One day of Mahavishnu is the lifetime of Brahma.'

A Brief Introduction

The last complete version of the Mahabharata to be written in India in English prose was the translation by Kisari Mohan Ganguli in the late 19th century. He wrote it between 1883 and 1896. To the best of my knowledge, it still remains the only full English prose rendering of the epic by any Indian.

More than a hundred years have passed since Ganguli achieved his monumental task. Despite its closeness to the original Sanskrit and its undeniable power, in more than a hundred years the language and style of the Ganguli translation have inevitably become archaic.

It seemed a shame that this most magnificent of epics, a national treasure, an indisputable classic of world literature, believed by many to be the greatest of all books ever written, is not available in complete form to the Indian (or any) reader in modern, literary and easily accessible English: as retold by Indian writers.

So we, a group of Indian writers and editors, warmly and patiently supported by our publisher Rupa Publications India, undertook a line-by-line retelling of the complete Mahabharata, for the contemporary and future reader. Our aim has not been to write a scholarly translation of the great epic, but an eminently readable one, without vitiating either the spirit or the poetry of the original, and without reducing its length.

This is not a translation from the Sanskrit but based almost entirely on the Ganguli text, and he himself did use more than one Sanskrit version for his work. However, as will be obvious, the style of this new rendering is very much our own, and our hope is to bring as much of the majesty and enchantment of this awesome epic to you as is possible in English.

Dronabhisheka Parva

AUM! Having bowed down to Narayana, Nara, the foremost of Purushas, and to Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

'Janamejaya said, "O regenerate Rishi, what does the powerful and disconsolate Dhritarashtra, his eyes bathed in tears, do when he hears that Sikhandin, prince of the Panchalas, has felled his sire, the incomparable Bhishma of matchless tejas? His son Duryodhana wants to vanquish the sons of Pandu, mighty bowmen all, through Bhishma, Drona and other maharathas, and have undisputed sovereignty. Tell me, O Tapodhana, you of the wealth of penances, what the scion of the Kurus does after Bhishma, greatest of all bowmen, falls."

'Vaisampayana replied, "When he hears that his sire has fallen, Dhritarashtra is filled with anxiety and sorrow, and has no peace of mind. While he is plunged in grief, Gavalgana's son Sanjaya, who has returned that night to Hastinapura, visits the son of Ambika. With a cheerless heart and anxious for his son's victory, the king in great distress laments and then questions Sanjaya, 'Tell me, Sanjaya, after weeping for the felled mahatman, the invincible Bhishma of terrible prowess, what did the Kauravas do next, sunk as they were in an ocean of grief? Indeed, now that the swelling forces of the Pandavas would strike fear into even the three worlds, what did the assembled kings do after the Bharatarishabha Bhishma's fall?'

Sanjaya says, 'Listen attentively, Rajan, and I will tell you what happened after great Bhishma's fall.

Your warriors and the Pandavas both reflect on the dharma of the Kshatriya and are filled with wonder and joy. Then, following their swadharma, they all bow to the maharatha and make a bed of straight arrows for him, as well as a pillow, and also arrangements for his protection, all the while engaging one another in pleasant converse. The Kshatriyas bid Ganga's son farewell and circumambulate him in pradakshina; looking at one another with angry red eyes and urged by fate, they take the field once more to do battle again.

The best part of the day has passed, when the divisions of your army and those of the enemy, sally forth with a blast of trumpets and the beat of drums. With hearts filled with wrath and touched by fate, they engage each other again, disregarding the wise counsel of Ganga's son Bhishma. Due to your folly and your son's folly and the fall of Bhishma, Death himself seems to summon the Kauravas with all the kings allied to them.

Deprived of Devavrata and filled with great anxiety, the Kurus resemble a herd of goats and sheep without a herdsman lost in a forest teeming with beasts of prey. Indeed, the Kuru army looks like the firmament without its stars, like the sky without the planets, like the earth with her crops all burnt, like an oration flawed by bad grammar, like the ancient Asura sena after Mahabali was struck down, like a beautiful bride deprived of her husband, like a river whose waters have dried up, like a doe who has lost her mate and is surrounded in the vana by wolves, or like a spacious mountain cave with its lion killed by a Sarabha. Indeed, O king, the Bharata army is like a frail boat on the bosom of the ocean, tossed by a tempest blowing from every side.

Hard pressed by the heroic and inexorable Pandavas, the Kaurava host, its steeds, maharathas and elephants are distressed, helpless and panic-stricken. With the frightened kings and the common soldiers no longer relying upon one another, the army deprived of Devavrata seems to sink into the deepest Patala.

Then the Kauravas remember Karna, who, indeed, is equal to Bhishma himself. All hearts turn to the greatest of all wielders of weapons, the one resembling a Guest resplendent with gyana and tapasya, even as the suffering heart of a man turns to a friend who can allay his distress. The kings then cry out, “Karna! Karna! The son of Radha, our friend, the Sutaputra, who is ever prepared to lay down his life in battle! The illustrious Karna, with his followers and friends, did not fight these ten days. O, summon him quickly!”

In the presence of all the Kshatriyas, Bhishma, during the enumeration of valiant and mighty maharathas, called Karna an ardharatha, although that bull among men is equal to two maharathas! Thus did Bhishma slight Karna who is easily the greatest of all rathas and atirathas, he whom all Kshatriyas respect, he who would venture to fight even Yama, Kubera, Varuna and Indra!

In anger at this insult, Rajan, Karna vowed, “As long as you live, O Bhishma, I will never fight! And if you succeed in slaying the sons of Pandu in battle, I will, with Duryodhana’s leave, retire to the forest and take sannyasa. But if, Bhishma, the Pandavas kill you and you find swarga, then I will fight from a single chariot, and kill all those whom you regard as great maharathas.”

Having said this, and with your son’s approval, Karna Mahabaho did not fight for the first ten days of the war. The awesome Bhishma slew a multitude of Yudhishtira’s warriors but when he is struck down, your sons think of Karna, like men wanting to cross a river thinking of a boat.

Your warriors and sons, together with all the kings, cry out in unison, “Karna!” And they all say, “This is the time to display your valour.”

We look to the invincible Karna, whom Jamadagni’s son Parasurama taught the astra shastra! He, Rajan, can save us from great peril, why, even like Govinda always rescues the Devas from the gravest dangers.”

To Sanjaya who thus repeatedly lauds Karna, Dhritarashtra sighs like a snake and says, ‘I understand that your hearts are all turned towards Vikartana and Radha’s son Karna and depend on the hero of the Sutas who is always ready to give his life in battle. I hope that shura will not belie the expectations of the grieving Duryodhana and the Kauravas, all of whom look to him for sanctuary. With Bhishma, the refuge of Kauravas fallen, will Karna, greatest of bowmen, fill the void he left and strike fear into the hearts of the enemy and crown my sons’ hopes of victory with success?’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Then Karna, Adhiratha's son of the Suta varna, knowing that Bhishma has fallen, comes like a brother who wants to rescue your son's army from the distress into which it has fallen. Indeed, hearing that Santanu's son, the maharatha of unfading glory, has been struck down from his chariot, Karna, greatest of all wielders of bows, swiftly joins the battle, coming to rescue the Kuru host which is like a boat sunk in the ocean, like a father to save his children.

Karna addresses the soldiers, "When Bhishma parantapa, who possessed firmness, intelligence, prowess, vigour, truth, self-restraint and all the virtues of a Kshatriya, and also devastras, humility, modesty, pleasing speech and freedom from malice, the slayer of the enemies of Brahmanas, in whom these attributes resided as permanently as Lakshmi in the moon, alas, has fallen, I regard all the other Kshatriyas as already slain. Due to the eternal connection of all things with karma, nothing exists in this world that does not perish. When Bhishma Mahavrata has been felled, who can say with certitude that tomorrow's sun will rise? When he, endued with prowess equal to that of the Vasus, born of the tejas of the Vasus, when he, the sovereign of the earth, has fallen, do you grieve then for your possessions, your children, for this very Bhumi, the Kurus and this host?"

Thus does Karna, with a dismal heart and eyes filled with tears, attempt to console your sons. Hearing what he says, your sons and their soldiers, initially wail and weep copious tears. However, when the dreadful battle is rejoined, the Kaurava akshauhinis, urged on by the kings, once more set up loud shouts, and Karna, bull among maharathas, speaks to the great chariot warriors of the Kaurava army, words which bring great joy.

Karna says, "In this transient world, I regard all things as ephemeral for they continually flit towards the jaws of Death. Still, with all of you present, how could Bhishma, bull of the Kurus, immovable as a hill, be struck down from his ratha? The son of Santanu even now lies on the ground like the Sun himself fallen from the firmament and the Kuru kings are scarcely able to face Arjuna, like trees that cannot bear the mountain-wind. Let the burden to protect this helpless and despondent Kuru army, whose greatest warrior the enemy has already cut down, now devolve on me. In this fleeting universe, since the greatest of all Kshatriyas has been laid low, why should I have any fear of battle? Rampaging through this field, I will despatch the Pandavas to Yama. I hold honour and fame as the highest objectives in the world and I will annihilate them in battle, or be slain and sleep on the field of war.

Yudhishtira possesses determination, intelligence, virtue and might; Bhima is equal to a hundred elephants in strength; Arjuna is young and is the son of Indra, the king of the Devas; thus, even the gods cannot easily vanquish the Pandava force. They include in their ranks, the twins, each like Yama himself, Satyaki and Devaki's son Krishna. Approaching them is like entering the jaws of Death from which no coward can return.

As the wise meet growing ascetic power with their own tapasya, so should force be opposed by force. Truly my mind is fixed firmly upon fighting the enemy and protecting my own. O sarathy, today I will defy the enemy's might and vanquish him on this Kurukshetra. I will not allow this feud between cousins to continue. When the troops are broken, he who helps in the endeavour to rally them is truly a friend. I will either achieve this deed of dharma worthy of an honest man, or casting off my life, I will follow Bhishma. I will either slay all my enemies united, or killed by them, find for myself the regions reserved for heroes. O Suta, I know that this is what I must do when women and children cry for help, or when Duryodhana's power sustains a diminution. Therefore will I today vanquish the foe in this terrible war, heedless of my very life; I will protect the Kurus and destroy the sons of Pandu and all my other enemies banded together. And then I will bestow undisputed sovereignty on Dhritarashtra's son.

Let me don my golden kavacha, bright and radiant with jewels and gemstones, and my crown, effulgent as the sun, let me take up my bows, and arrows that resemble fire, poison or serpents. Let also sixteen quivers be tied to my chariot in their proper places and let a number of superior bows be stocked in it as well. Let also shafts, spears, heavy maces and my conch worked with gold, be got ready. Fetch my many-coloured, beautiful and brilliant gold standard, with the lustre of the lotus and bearing the device of an elephant; clean it with a fine cloth and deck it with garlands and cover it with a mesh of wires. O Suta's son, bring me some fleet horses, not lean, of the hue of tawny clouds, bathed in water sanctified with mantras and caparisoned in trappings of bright gold. Quickly bring me such an excellent ratha, decked with garlands of gold, adorned with gems bright as the sun or the moon, stored with every weapon and yoked to superb steeds. Bring me also a number of strong bowstrings for my bows; bring me quivers, large and full of arrows, and armour for my body. Bring me also with haste, every auspicious thing needed before setting out for battle, the brass and gold vessels full of curd. Bring garlands of flowers and tie them to the limbs of my body. Let drums be beaten for victory!

Then fly to where Arjuna Kiritin, Vrikodara, Dharmaputra Yudhishtira and the twins are. I will either kill them, or being killed by them, follow Bhishma. Arjuna, Krishna, Satyaki and the Srinjayas are a force that cannot be conquered by the kings. But even if all-destroying Death himself, with unremitting vigilance, is to protect Arjuna, I will still have his life; or go myself to Yamaloka like Bhishma. Truly I say to you, I will ride into the very midst of those Kshatriyas. The kings that are my allies are not provokers of feuds, or of weak attachment to me, or of unrighteous souls."

And so, riding on a wonderful, rich and mighty chariot, with an excellent flagstaff and to which are yoked the best horses, fast as the wind, decked with gold, auspicious and flying a noble standard, and whose rumble resembles the rumbling of clouds, Karna rides forth fully prepared for battle. Worshipped by the greatest of Kuru maharathas, even like Indra by the Devas, the mahatman and fierce archer, of immeasurable energy like the Sun himself, rides leading a large force to the heart of the battlefield where Bharatarishabha Bhishma has paid his debt to nature.

Handsome and with the splendour of fire, the son of Adhiratha, the matchless bowman and mighty warrior, then mounts his radiant chariot and shines like Indra riding on his celestial vimana.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the Pitamaha, the venerable Bhishma, that destroyer of all the Kshatriyas, the soul of dharma, and of infinite tejas, that matchless archer shot down from his chariot by Arjuna with his devastras and lying on a bed of arrows, looking like the vast ocean dried up by mighty winds, the hope of your sons for victory disappears along with their peace of mind. He was always an island for men sinking in the fathomless ocean in their endeavours to cross it; and that Kshatriya now lies covered with arrows that coursed in a stream as continuous as that of the Yamuna, looking like Mainaka of awesome splendour struck down by Indra. He lies prostrate on the earth like the sun fallen from the firmament, he who looks like the inconceivable Indra himself after his defeat of long ago by Vritra. The depriver of all warriors of their very senses, the greatest of all shuras, the idol and ideal of all bowmen, bull among men, your Pitamaha Bhishma Mahavrata, the grandsire of the Bharatas, has been struck down in battle, covered with Arjuna's terrible shafts, and lies on a Kshatriya's bed.

Adhiratha's son Karna alights from his chariot in great sorrow, numb with grief and in tears. He approaches on foot and with joined palms, says reverentially, "I am Karna. Be you blessed! O Bhaarata, open your eyes and look at me and speak sacred and auspicious words to me. Certainly no man can enjoy in this world the fruits of his pious deeds, when you, venerable in years and devoted to dharma, lie mortally wounded on the ground. O Kurusattama, I do not see that there is anyone else among us who is remotely your equal in filling the treasury, in counsels, in the deploying of troops in the vyuhas of war and in the use of weapons. Alas, you who are endowed with a righteous intellect and have always protected the Kurus from every danger and killed numberless warriors are now on your way to the realm of the Pitris.

From this day, the Pandavas, energised by this success, will slaughter the Kurus like tigers hunting deer. Today the Kauravas, familiar with the force of the twang of the Gandiva, will view Arjuna with complete terror, like the Asuras do Vajradhari Indra. Today, the sound of the arrows shot from the Gandiva, like heaven's thunder, will fill the Kurus and all other kings with absolute fear and like a raging conflagration devours a forest, the shafts of the Kiritin will consume the Dhartarashtras. In the parts of a forest through which fire and wind flare together, they burn all plants, vines and trees. Without doubt, Arjuna is such a surging fire and Krishna is like the wind. The blast of the Panchajanya and the twang of the Gandiva will fill all the Kaurava troops with abject terror and panic.

Without you, when Arjuna rides at them, our kings will hardly bear the thunder of his monkey-bannered chariot. Who among the kings, save you, can match him whose feats in battle the wise say are all superhuman? Superhuman was the battle that he fought with the Mahadeva of three eyes. From Him he obtained a boon that men of unsanctified souls can never attain. Delighted by the duel, Siva blessed the son of Pandu and gave him his own astra. Who is there to vanquish him whom even you could not defeat although you vanquished the fierce destroyer of the very Kshatriya race, Parasurama, whom the Devas and the Danavas worship?

I am skilled and can withstand the son of Pandu, that greatest of Kshatriyas. With your leave and blessing, I will even kill this valiant and ferocious warrior who is like a snake of virulent poison and who slays his enemies with just the looks from his eyes!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'After listening to Karna, the aged Kuru Pitamaha, with a happy heart, gives this valuable advice, "Like the ocean to rivers, like the Sun to all luminous bodies, like men of dharma to Truth, like fertile soil to seeds, like the clouds to all creatures, be the refuge of your relatives and friends! As the Devas depend on him of a thousand eyes, let your kinsmen look to you. Be the conqueror of your enemies and the enhancer of the joys of your friends. Be to the Kauravas what Vishnu is to the dwellers of swarga.

O Karna, for Dhritarashtra's son you once conquered the Kambojas of Rajapura. In Girivraja, you defeated many kings, among whom Nagnajit was the greatest, as well as all the Ambashtas, the Videhas and the Gandharvas. You forced the Kiratas, so fierce in battle, who dwell in the fastness of Himavat, to accept Duryodhana's sovereignty. You subdued all the Utpalas, the Mekalas, the Paundras, the Kalingas, the Andhras, the Nishadas, the Trigartas and the Balhikas. In many other countries, Karna, driven by just the wish to benefit Duryodhana, you crushed many vamsas and kings of great tejas.

Like Duryodhana, with his kinsmen, relatives and friends, be you also the refuge of all the Kauravas. In words of blessing I command you, go and fight the enemy. Lead the Kurus in battle and bring victory to Duryodhana. You are my grandson just as Duryodhana is. According to the law, all of us also are as much yours as Duryodhana's! The wise say that the companionship of the righteous with other men of dharma is a superior relationship to the one with those born of the same womb. Therefore, regard the Kaurava army as your own and protect it even as Duryodhana would."

Karna reverentially touches Bhishma's feet, bids him farewell and joins the other Kaurava archers. Looking at the vast and matchless Kuru army he encourages and exhorts the well-armed and broad-chested warriors. All the Kauravas led by Duryodhana are overjoyed and seeing the Mahabaho Karna take the field and station himself at the head of their army; eager again for battle, they receive him with loud shouts, slapping of armpits, leonine roars, twanging of bows and diverse other kinds of loud bold sounds.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Karna Purushavyaghra mount his chariot, Duryodhana is filled with joy, and says, "With your protection, this army now has a proper leader. Let us decide our strategy and what we can achieve with our might.'

Karna replies, "Tell us yourself, O Naravyaghra, for you are the wisest of kings. No one can know better what to do than the one who is the most concerned. All these kings want to hear what you have to say. And I am sure that you will say nothing that is amiss."

Duryodhana says, "Bhishma was our commander, our aged and seasoned senapati, mighty, learned and supported by all our warriors. He achieved great glory, massacred vast numbers of my enemies, and served us by fighting with dharma for ten days. He achieved the most difficult feats but now that he is fallen, who, Karna, do you think is fit to be our senapati after him? Without a senapati, an army cannot fight a war for even a short while. You are the greatest warrior among us. An army without a general is like a boat without a helmsman or a chariot without a charioteer. Like a merchant who falls into every kind of distress when he is unacquainted with the ways of the country he visits, an army without a senapati is exposed to every kind of danger and loss. Therefore, look among the noble warriors of our host and identify a commander who can succeed the son of Santanu. All of us, without hesitation, will accept anyone you choose as the one fit to lead us."

Karna says, "All these best of men are mahatmans, and every one of them deserves to be our senapati. There is no need for any minute examination since all of them are highborn and masters of the art of war; they all own prowess and intelligence, and are heedful men who know the shastras. They are all wise and resolute in battle. Yet, since not all of them can at once be the supreme commander of our forces, we must choose just one of them in whom there are special and exceptional merits to be our senapati. All of them regard one another as equals and if you honour one among them, the others will be discontented and will no longer fight wholeheartedly for you.

Drona, however, is the Acharya of all these warriors; he is venerable in years, and worthy of reverence. Therefore, let this greatest of all warriors be made our senapati. Who else is worthy of becoming our supreme leader, when the invincible Drona, foremost of men who know the Brahman, equal to Sukra or Brihaspati, is among us? Among all the kings in your army, Bhaarata, there is not a single warrior who will not gladly follow Drona when he takes the field. Drona is the foremost of all our commanders, our greatest warrior, and the first among all intelligent men. Besides, Rajan, he is your guru. So, Duryodhana, make him the senapati of your forces without hesitation or delay, even as the Devas made Kartikeya theirs in their war against the Asuras."'

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing what Karna says, king Duryodhana addresses Drona, who stands amongst the troops. "For the superiority of the varna of your birth, for the nobility of your parentage, for your learning, your age and intelligence, for your prowess, skill, invincibility, knowledge of the world, policy, self-conquest, as well as for your tapasya and your gratitude, superior as you are in every virtue among these kings, there is none who will make a better senapati than you. Protect us, therefore, as Indra did the Devas. With you as our general, we will, O best of Brahmanas, vanquish our enemies.

As Kapali among the Rudras, Pavaka among the Vasus, Kubera among the Yakshas, Vasava among the Maruts, Vasishta among Brahmanas, the sun among light-givers, Yama among the Pitris, Varuna among aquatic beings, as the Moon among the stars, and Usanas among the sons of Diti, so are you the greatest of all lords of armies. Therefore, be you, O Anagha, our lord in war. Let these eleven akshauhinis be obedient to your command. Deploy these men for battle and destroy our enemies like Indra slaying the Danavas. You lead us all, even like Pavaka's son Kartikeya at the head of the celestial host.

We will follow you into battle, like bulls following the leader of a herd. You are a fierce and great archer, and besides, seeing you stretch your bow at the head of our forces, Arjuna will not strike. Without doubt, Naravyaghra, if you become our senapati, I will vanquish Yudhishtira with all his followers and kinsmen in this war."

After Duryodhana says these words, all the kings in the Kaurava army cry "Jaya! Jaya Drona!" They delight your son with a tremendous shout. The troops, with Duryodhana at their head, filled with joy and eager to win great renown, begin to glorify that best of Brahmanas. Then, Rajan, Drona addresses Duryodhana.'"

'Drona says, "I know the Vedas and their six angas. I am also familiar with the science of human affairs and know the Saivastra and diverse other weapons. I will attempt to display all the virtues that you have attributed to me, while I fight the Pandavas. However, O king, I will not be able to kill Drupada's son Dhrishtadyumna, for he was born to kill me. I will fight the Pandavas who will not fight me with happy hearts and I will raze the Somakas."

Thus permitted by Drona, your son, Rajan, then makes him senapati of his forces with the rites laid down in the shastras. The kings in the Kaurava army led by Duryodhana perform the investiture of Drona as the supreme commander of their forces, even like the Devas led by Indra in the ancient days, performing the investiture of Skanda.

The pounding of drums and the blare of conches follow this ritual—the expression of the Kaurava army's joy. They honour Drona with such cries as greet one's ears on a festive day, with auspicious invocations by Brahmanas, and gratify him with cries of Jaya! from the foremost of Brahmanas and with the dance of mimes and other players. The Kaurava warriors regard the Pandavas as already vanquished.

Then maharatha Drona, Bharadwaja's son, now senapati of the Kaurava army, deploys his troops for battle, and goes forth to the field with your sons to engage the enemy. The ruler of the Sindhus, the king of the Kalingas and your son Vikarna, all clad in mail, take up their positions on Drona's right side, supported by Sakuni and a squadron of great horsemen belonging to the Gandhara tribe, bearing bright lances. Kripa, Kritavarman, Chitrasena, and Vivimsati, led by Dusasana, protect the left flank supported by the swift cavalry of Kambojas led by Sudakshina, the Sakas and the Yavanas. The rear guard is comprised of the Madras, the Trigartas the Ambashtas, the westerners, the northerners, the Malavas, the Surasenas, the Sudras the Maladas, the Sauviras, the Kaitavas, the easterners and the southerners with your son Duryodhana at their head.

The Suta's son, Karna, at the head of the bowmen, adds prowess to the advancing force and gladdens the warriors of their army. His blazing, large and tall standard bearing the device of the elephant's girth rope, shines with an effulgence like that of the sun, gladdening his own akshauhinis; seeing Karna, no one anymore regards Bhishma's death as a calamity and the kings, along with the Kurus, are rid of their grief.

Large numbers of warriors huddle together and tell one another, 'Finding Karna on the field, the Pandavas will never be able to face us in battle. When Karna can vanquish the very Devas with Indra at their head, what can the sons of Pandu do, who are of little energy and strength? The Mahabaho Bhishma spared the Parthas in battle, but Karna will kill them with his scorching shafts.' Speaking thus to among themselves and filled with elation, they advance boldly, applauding and worshipping Radha's son Karna.

Drona arrays our legions in a Sakata vyuha, the cart formation, Rajan, while the serene Yudhishtira chooses the vyuha of the Krauncha, the crane, for his army. At the head of their formation are those two greatest of all men, Krishna and Dhananjaya, flying their banner with the device of the great Vanara. The inspiration of the whole army and the refuge of all its bowmen, Partha's banner, imbued with immeasurable tejas as it floats in the sky, seems to illumine the entire host of Yudhishtira Dharmatman. The potent standard of Arjuna seems like the blazing sun that rises at the end of the yuga to consume the world.

Among archers, Arjuna is the best; among bows, the Gandiva is the foremost; among all beings, Krishna is the first; and among all kinds of war chakras, the Sudarshana chakra is the greatest. Bearing these four embodiments of tejas, Swetavahana in his chariot takes up his position at the front of the enemy army, quite like the fierce chakra upraised to strike. Thus, the two greatest warriors stand at the very head of their respective forces—Karna at the head of your army and Dhananjaya at the head of the hostile one. Both excited with wrath and each wanting to kill the other, Karna and Arjuna glower at each other.

When Bharadwaja's son, maharatha Drona rides into battle like a storm, the very earth seems to tremble with a deep, chasmal wailing. The thick dust raised by the wind envelops the sky and the sun like a canopy of tawny silk. Though the firmament is cloudless, a shower of pieces of flesh, bones and blood falls on the earth. Vultures, hawks, cranes, kankas and crows in thousands, incessantly fall upon the Kaurava troops. Jackals howl and many fierce and terrible birds repeatedly wheel to the left of your army, in evil omen, impatient to eat flesh and drink blood; showers of blazing meteors, illuminating the sky and with their tails spread wide, fall on the field echoing with loud and uncanny sounds. And when the senapati of the Kaurava army rides forth, the wide disc of the sun, Rajan, seems to emit flashes of lightning and peals of thunder. One sees these and many other fierce portents, indicating an imminent devastation of Kshatriyas.

Battle erupts again between the armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas, each wanting to annihilate the other. So loud is the din that it seems to fill the whole world; and the Pandavas and the Kauravas, all masters of war, all in the grip of battle's consuming rage, strike each other with every manner of weapon, all determined to win the war.

Drona of blazing glory rides recklessly, furiously at the Pandava host, spraying hundreds of arrows at the enemy every moment. The Pandavas and the Srinjayas reply, O king, with their own searing fusillades. But swiftly routed by Drona, the vast host of the Pandavas and the Panchalas break ranks, like flights of cranes buffeted irresistibly by a dread wind. Invoking a slew of devastras, in moments Drona dreadfully besieges the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, while their blood sprays everywhere. Drona slaughters the Panchala forces led by Dhrishtadyumna, like Indra the Danavas. The Acharya lances terror through the enemy ranks.

Then, spurred to blind rage, Yagnasena's son, maharatha Dhrishtadyumna, master of devastras looses storms of recondite shafts at Drona's troops and rends them savagely all around, hundreds of men falling to his towering archery. He, the Pandava senapati, slaughters as many of Drona’s men as the Acharya does his. The mighty-armed Drona quickly rallies his forces around him, and charges Drupada’s son ablaze on Kurukshetra. Like an enraged Maghavat attacking the Danavas, Drona assails the Pandava and the Srinjaya ranks, so powerfully and remorselessly that they break ranks and flee before the terrible Brahmana like a herd of small animals set upon by a great lion. The mighty Drona devastates the Pandava force like the fabled ring of fire that protects the chalice of amrita.

It is truly amazing, wondrous, O Rajan, how Drona mounted on his magnificent ratha even like a city coursing through the sky, his horses past superb, his sarathy masterful, his flagstaff like shining crystal, and his banner flapping wide in death’s wind, strikes perfect and absolute terror into the hearts of the enemy and wreaks unprecedented carnage among them.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Drona furiously destroy horses, riders, maharathas and elephants, the Pandavas surround him. Yudhishtira tells Dhrishtadyumna and Arjuna, "Carefully surround the pot-born Drona with our men and check the slaughter he brings to us."

The maharathas Arjuna and Dhrishtadyumna, along with their soldiers, challenge Drona's wild onslaught. The Kekaya princes, Bhimasena, Subhadra's son, Ghatotkacha, Yudhishtira, Nakula and Sahadeva, Virata of the Matsyas, Dhrishtadyumna and the five sons of Draupadi, all exhilarated, and Dhrishtaketu, Satyaki, the fierce Chitrasena, the maharatha Yuyutsu, and many other kings who follow the sons of Pandu, all achieve diverse feats in keeping with their lineage and prowess, while now Drona looks on in frustrated rage.

Further inflamed, the invincible Brahmana warrior standing erect in his ratha yet consumes the Pandava host like a tempest dispelling cloud masses. Tilting from all sides at chariot-warriors, horses, foot-soldiers and elephants, Drona, despite his years, careens over the field like a young man. His thoroughbred chestnut horses, fleet as the wind, covered in blood, are beautiful and awesome. Yudhishtira's soldiers flee when they see him razing their ranks like an angry Yama. And as some take flight, others rally, some look at him dazed, and others remain on the field, the noise they make is tumultuous and terrible. The fearful din, which delights the brave and makes the timid tremble, fills all the sky and the earth. And once more Drona, roaring out his own name like a battle cry, makes himself still more awful, scourging his enemies with hundreds of arrows.

Indeed, though old, the mighty Drona even looks half his years as he rides everywhere loosing his tides of arrows at the Pandava legions like Death himself, striking off heads and arms decked with ornaments, emptying chariots in gory blasts, all the while uttering tigerish roars. At his terrifying roars and the force of his shafts, the enemy warriors, my lord, shiver like a herd of cows beset by deep winter's cold.

Kurukshetra resounds with the rumble of Drona's chariot, the twanging of his bow. His shafts fly in thousands from his bow, enveloping all the points of the compass, and fall upon enemy elephants, horses and horsemen, chariots and foot-soldiers.

The Panchalas and the Pandavas unflinchingly advance on Drona, who, with his mighty bow, resembles a dread fire with arrows and astras for its leaping flames. Countless elephants, foot-soldiers and horsemen he despatches to Yama and turns the battleground into bloody mire. Invoking mighty astras and spraying his shafts thickly on every side, Drona soon covers all the points of the compass, so that among millions of foot-soldiers, chariots, horsemen and elephants, one can see nothing save Drona's arrows. The pennant on his chariot is all that one sees, flashing here and there like streak lightning amidst all the other chariots.

The irrepressible Drona attacks the five princes of Kekaya, Drupada of the Panchalas, and then dashes against the akshauhini of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja.

Bhimasena, Arjuna, Satyaki, the sons of Drupada, the ruler of Kasi, the son of Saibya, and Sibi himself, gladly and with loud roars, swathe him with their arrows. Shafts in thousands, with wings of gold, shot from Drona's bow, pierce right through the bodies of the elephants and the young horses of these warriors, and plunge into the earth, their feathers dyed in blood. Strewn with chariots and the prostrate forms of numberless warriors, elephants and horses torn by the Brahmana's shafts, Kurukshetra looks like the sky covered with banks of black clouds.

Ever seeking victory for your sons, Drona rampages to decimate the divisions of Satyaki, Bhima, Dhananjaya, Subhadra’s son, Drupada, the king of Kasi, and excoriates many other Kshatriyas as well. Indeed, achieving these and many other terrible feats, that maharathin scorches the world like the sun as he rises apocalyptic at the end of the yuga.

After Drona entirely destroys more than two Pandava akshauhinis of brave and resolute warriors, the canny hero Dhrishtadyumna Mahabuddhi finally slays the Brahmana shura with the golden chariot; and Drona attains mukti, the highest state. Indeed, Rajan, it is only after he has brought the most horrific carnage to the Pandava and Panchala legions with his astras, letting rills of blood on hallowed ground, do they finally kill him.

When the Acharya dies, a loud uproar from all creatures and all the troops fills the sky. Resounding through heaven, earth and the intermediate space and through the cardinal and the subsidiary directions, one hears the loud cry “O Fie!” from all beings; and the Devas, the Pitris, and his friends; all watch that incomparable maharatha, the son of Bharadwaja, slain. With this triumph, the relieved and overjoyed Pandavas give vent to leonine shouts, and the earth trembles with their celebrant roaring.’”

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'How did the Pandavas and the Srinjayas kill Drona, who was such a matchless warrior? Did his chariot break down in the fight? Did his bow break while he was shooting at the enemy, or was Drona careless at the moment when he was killed? Sanjaya, how could Prishata's son kill the greatest of Brahmanas, that invincible hero gifted with such speed of hand, who could loose torrents of gold-winged shafts to great distances in the twinkling of an eye, who was a master of all the forms of warfare, of astounding skills, self-restrained, and also a master of the devastras?

It is plain to me that destiny is superior to effort and exertion since Dhrishtadyumna has killed the magnificent Drona, maharatha of unfading glory, who was always cautious, who achieved incomparable feats in battle, the Brahmana who verily embodied the four kinds of weapons. Ah, alas, you tell me that the same Drona, Acharya of archery, is slain!

Oh, hearing that the hero who rode his bright ratha covered with tiger skins and adorned with the purest gold is dead, I cannot contain or drive out my burning grief! Undoubtedly, Sanjaya, no one dies of grief from another's end, since, wretch that I am, I am still alive after hearing of Drona's death. Destiny is truly all-powerful and all effort fruitless. Surely, my heart is made of adamant, since it does not break into a hundred pieces after hearing of Drona's death. How can Death take him whom Brahmanas and Kshatriyas alike came and served to acquire instruction in the Vedas and divination and archery? Oh, I cannot brook the killing of Drona; it is even like the ocean drying up, or Meru being uprooted from his place, or the sun falling from the sky.

He restrained the evil, and protected men of dharma, and now he has given up his life for the wretched Duryodhana! He was equal to Brihaspati or Usanas himself in intelligence and upon his ability rested the hope of victory that my evil sons entertained. Alas, how was he slain?

Did his great, strong, keenly-trained, chestnut Sindhu horses, caparisoned in golden mesh, swift as the wind, yoked to his mighty chariot and drawing it so wonderfully, always neighing joyfully and invincible to every weapon, and always protecting him in the midst of war, grow suddenly weak and collapse? How did they overwhelm those Sindhu steeds of wonder that drew Drona's chariot, which could calmly face the sound of elephants trumpeting in war, the blare of conches and the pounding of drums; which were unmoved by the twanging of bows and showers of arrows and other weapons; those steeds that were ominous by their very appearance, never short of breath, exhausted or in pain? When such were the horses that drew his golden ratha, why could he not cross the sea that is the Pandava army?

What feats did Drona achieve in battle, the warrior who always drew tears from other Kshatriyas, and upon whose knowledge of weapons all the best archers of the world rely! What all did this mighty man of dharma do in battle?

Who were the maharathas who challenged that doer of fierce deeds, the best of all the bowmen, first among shuras, who was like Indra himself?

Did the Pandavas flee on seeing him, mighty and strong on the golden chariot, and invoke devastras? Or, did Dharmaraja Yudhishtira and his brothers with Dhrishtadyumna for their binding cord, fall upon Drona after surrounding him with their troops on all sides? Arjuna with his faultless arrows must have checked all the other chariot-warriors, and then, protected by Partha, Dhrishtadyumna must have brought death to the mighty Acharya. Possibly the brave Kekayas, Chedis, Karushas, Matsyas and the other kings surrounded the Acharya, like ants crawling over a snake, even while he was engaged in some difficult feat, and so allowing the wretched Dhrishtadyumna to bring him down.

How could the venerable Brahmana, master of the four Vedas with their angas and the Itihasas the fifth Veda, the refuge of all Brahmanas as the ocean is of rivers, that blazing parantapa, who lived both as a Brahmana and as a Kshatriya, alas, meet his end at the point of a weapon?

A proud spirit, he had yet to often endure humiliation and to suffer much pain on my account. However undeserving, he met his end at the hands of his pupil Arjuna. Such a dharmatman and yuddhavira, whose feats all bowmen in the world looked up to—alas, how could men greedy for riches kill such a one? Foremost in this world, like Indra in swarga, of great might and energy, alas, how could the Parthas kill him, like a whale being killed by smaller fish? He, from whose presence no challenger could ever escape with life, he whom, while he lived, the two sounds of the Vedas being chanted by those learning Vedic lore and the twang of bows, never left; he who was never dispirited or dejected, alas, that Naravyaghra, that shura endowed with prosperity and never vanquished in battle, that warrior of prowess equal to that of the gaja or the simha, has been slain!

Sanjaya, I cannot bear the very thought of his death. How could Dhrishtadyumna, in the sight of all the greatest men in the world, murder the invincible Drona whose might was unequalled and his fame never tarnished?

Who fought in Drona's van, protecting him, and who, riding by his side? Who guarded his rear and who were the maharathas who shielded the right and the left wheels of Drona? Who were before him while he strove in battle? Who were they, who reckless of their lives, met death with him and joined him on his last journey? Did any of these Kshatriyas assigned to protect Drona prove false and abandon him in battle, thus letting the enemy kill him while he was alone? However great the danger, Drona would never turn his back on battle from fear. How then did the enemy kill him? Even in great distress, Sanjaya, an illustrious man should demonstrate his prowess to the full measure of his might. All this was in Drona. Ah, Sanjaya, I am losing my mind! Let us stop this speech a while until I regain my reeling senses.'"

'Vaisampayana said, "Saying this to Sanjaya, Dhritarashtra, in extreme grief and distressed about the hopelessness of his son, Duryodhana's, victory, falls unconscious onto the ground. His attendants rush forward to fan him and sprinkle him with perfumed cold water, while the royal Bhaarata women surround him, weeping, gently rub him with their soft hands; and slowly lifting him up from the ground, seat him on his throne. He remains insensate and still, until a tremor passes through his body and he slowly regains consciousness.

He begins to question Sanjaya again about the incidents that occurred on the battlefield.

Dhritarashtra asks, 'Ajatasatru Yudhishtira who, like the risen sun, dispels darkness with his own light, who charges an enemy like an inflamed tusker in musth, whom no other herd leader can arrest, rushing eagerly towards a female elephant in heat—which of my warriors keep him at bay when he charged Drona? Who are the Kshatriya heroes that surrounded that best of glorious men, who killed so many of my brave men, that intelligent, courageous king of unbaffled prowess, who, bent on victory, could single-handedly consume the entire host of Duryodhana with just his terrible glances, that resplendent archer, that self-restrained king whom the whole world reveres?

Which valiant men of my army surround the invincible prince, Kunti's son Bhimasena, bowman of unfading glory, Naravyaghra, hero of gigantic fame and untold valour, strong as ten thousand elephants, when he rushed wildly at Drona?

When Arjuna, maharatha of exceeding tejas, came looking like a mass of clouds discharging thunderbolts, loosing showers of arrows like Indra pouring down rain, and making all the points of the compass resound with the slapping of his palms and the rattle of his chariot-wheels; when he whose bow is like the lightning's flash, whose chariot too resembles a cloud with the sound of its wheels its thunder, the hum of whose arrows is so very fierce, whose wrath resembles a dreadful thunderhead and who is as quick as the mind or the tempest; who always strikes an enemy deep in his very vitals, who is terrible to look at, who like Yama himself bathes all the points of the compass with human blood and who, with awful visage and fierce noise, wielding the Gandiva, lashes my warriors led by Duryodhana with arrows whetted on stone and fletched with vultures' feathers—alas, when that hero of great intellect descended upon you, what was your state of mind?

When Arjuna, with Hanuman upon his banner, obstructed the sky with dense swarms of arrows, what was your state of mind? Did Partha advance upon you, slaying your troops at will, with the Gandiva pealing in his hands, accomplishing great feats on the way? Did he take your lives like the tempest destroying gathering cloud-masses or felling forests of reeds by blowing through them? Who is there that can face the Gandivi in battle?

Just hearing that he leads the enemy's forces, the heart of every opponent would seem to be broken. In the war in which the troops tremble and even great Kshatriyas are terrified, who stood firm by Drona and which cowards abandoned him from fear? Who, reckless of their lives, met Death himself, facing them squarely in the shape of Dhananjaya who can vanquish even unworldly adversaries in battle?

My troops cannot withstand the impetus of Swetavahana and the twanging of the Gandiva that is like the thunder of the very clouds. Why, I believe the very Devas and the Asuras united together cannot conquer the chariot that has Vishnu himself for its charioteer and Dhananjaya for its warrior.

When the son of Pandu, Nakula, delicate, young, intrepid and so handsome, gifted with exceptional intelligence, skill, wisdom and prowess, invincible in battle, attacked Drona with loud roars, which shuras of my army contained him?

When Sahadeva, who resembles an angry snake of virulent venom, that invincible hero of the white steeds, who observes laudable vows, is resolute and modest attacked us, which Kshatriyas of our army encircled him?

O Sanjaya, which of my warriors resisted Satyaki who, having crushed the mighty host of the Sauvira king, took for his wife the beautiful, perfect-limbed Bhoja maiden, that bull among men Yuyudhana, gifted with decisiveness, awesome courage and brahmacharya, that maharatha always keeping dharma, never unhappy, never vanquished, who in battle is equal to Krishna and is regarded as Krishna's second self, who, through Arjuna's tutelage has become the greatest of bowmen, why, equal to Partha himself. Who resisted Satyaki, at least trying to keep him away from Drona?

Know, O Sanjaya that Satyaki of the Satwata vamsa, Yuyudhana greatest hero of the Vrishnis, is equal to Parasurama himself in his knowledge and genius in the use of weapons. Ability, fame, truth, determination, intelligence, heroism, the knowledge of Brahman, and of the great astras, are all to be found in him, as the three worlds are in Krishna. Which Kshatriyas of my host confronted this peerless bowman, the indomitable Satyaki whom not the Devas can contain?

Which of my warriors surrounded Uttamaujas, greatest among the heroic Panchalas, ever achieving wondrous feats at arms, high-born, favourite among champion warriors, devoted to Arjuna, born just to destroy my evil, equal to Yama, Vaisravana, Aditya, Mahendra, or Varuna, fearless maharatha always ready to lay down his life?

Who opposed that singular Chedi warrior Dhrishtaketu, ally of the Pandavas, when he charged Drona?

Who resisted the heroic Ketumat, slayer of prince Durjaya, even when Durjaya took refuge in Girivraja? Who kept the predatory Ketumat away from Drona?

Which of my Kshatriyas challenged the Naravyaghra Sikhandin, Yagnasena's son who knows the strengths and weaknesses of his own nature, who is man and also woman, who is always unperturbed in battle, the Kshatriya who became the cause of Mahatman Bhishma's fall? Who kept Sikhandin away from Drona?

O which Kshatriyas of my army defied the greatest hero of the Vrishnis, the noble Abhimanyu, Subhadra's son, that most transcendent of all archers, the intrepid son of Arjuna more accomplished than Dhananjaya himself, in whose weapons truth and brahmacharya dwell, who is equal to Krishna in tejas and Dhananjaya in urjas, who in splendour is equal to Aditya and in intelligence to Brihaspati, who is like Yama himself with yawning maw? Which of my heroes contained the youthful and radiant Abhimanyu when he charged Drona? What was your state of mind when that Parantapa of boundless vigour plunged towards the Acharya?

Which Kshatriyas surrounded the Purushavyaghras, the sons of Draupadi, when like rivers rushing towards the sea they hurtled at Drona? Who tried to keep those children, the heroic sons of Dhrishtadyumna—Kshatranjaya, Kshatradeva, Kshatravarman and Manada, who gave up all boyishness and sport for twelve years to observe stern vratas and to wait upon Bhishma to acquire the astra shastra from him? Who kept those ferocious youths away from the Acharya?

Who defied the great archer Chekitana, whom the Vrishnis regard as superior in battle to a hundred other maharathas, to keep him away from Drona?

O, which of the Kshatriyas of my army attempted to stop the onrush of the five Kekaya brothers, valiant, virtuous, irresistible in fight and of exceptional skills and prowess, who have the hue of the Indragopaka insect, clad always as they are in red coats of mail, with red weapons and red banners, cousins and fervent supporters of the Pandavas? Who faced those heroes when they rode at Drona to have his life?

Which champion from my army withstood Yuyutsu, lord of war, first among great bowmen, of unerring aim and prodigious strength, Naravyaghra whom many vengeful kings battled for six months at Varanavrata but could not quell him, and who, in a swayamvara at Varanasi, overthrew the prince of Kasi with a broad-headed arrow, and seized a young princess for his wife?

Which Kshatriyas of my host confronted the mighty, mighty Dhrishtadyumna, raised almost in Drupada's lap, the fire-born prince who is the chief counsellor and senapati of the Pandavas, who so hates Duryodhana, who was born to kill Drona, when he attacked the Acharya, breaking through my ranks, destroying all my warriors in battle in scarlet tide?

The Maharatha Saibya measured this earth on his chariot as if with a leather belt, and as a substitute for all other sacrifices, performed without hindrance ten Aswamedha yagnas with ample and excellent food, drink and gifts offered in profusion. He rules his subjects as if they are his children, gives away in sacrifices kine as numerous as the grains of sand in the Ganga; he whose feats none among men has or will ever be able to imitate, and after the performance of which, the very Devas once cried out, "We do not see in the three worlds with their mobile and immobile creatures anyone other than Usinara's son, who ever was, is, or will ever be born, who has acquired the rarest realms in the after-life unattainable by other men." O, Sanjaya, who in my army stood firm against this Saibya, Usinara's grandson, while he attacked Drona?

Which heroes of my army encircled the chariot-division of Parantapa Virata, king of the Matsyas, when it neared Drona on the field?

Who kept the gigantic Ghatotkacha away from Drona, that heroic Rakshasa who always puts forth his inhuman strength for the Pandavas' victory, Ghatotkacha who owns great powers of maya, apart from enormous strength and superhuman prowess, he who was born to Bhima in the course of a single day and of whom I entertain such terrible fears?

Who, Sanjaya, can remain unconquered by those who are prepared to lay down their lives in battle? How can the sons of Pritha meet with defeat, when they have the greatest of all beings, Krishna, wielder of Saringa, for their refuge and benefactor? He is, indeed, the Master of all the worlds, the Lord of all, the Eternal One! Narayana Divyatman, of infinite power, is the refuge of men in battle. The wise tell of his unearthly feats. Ah, let me also recite them with devotion, so that I may recover my composure and resolution!'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Yes, as I saw everything that happened with my own eyes, I will describe how Drona falls, slain by the Pandavas and the Srinjayas.

After he is appointed senapati of the Kaurava army, Bharadwaja's son, Drona maharatha, says to your son in the midst of all the troops, "O Rajan, how can I thank you for honouring me with the command of your legions after the son of Ganga? What desire of yours can I now fulfill? Ask any boon that you wish."

Having consulted with Karna, Dusasana and others, Duryodhana says to the Acharya, "If you will give me a boon, seize Yudhishtira alive and bring him here to me!"

Drona replies, gladdening all the men there, "Praise be to Yudhishtira, Kunti's son, whom you wish only to capture O invincible one. Why do you, Duryodhana, who are a strategist, not seek Yudhishtira's death? It is wonderful that he has no enemy wishing his death. Do you want him to live to preserve your race from extinction, or having vanquished the Pandavas in battle, are you keen to establish brotherly relations with them by giving back their kingdom? Auspicious was the birth of the intelligent prince Yudhishtira Mahabuddhi. He is truly called Ajatasatru—the man with no enemies, for even you have affection for him."

Hearing these words of Drona, the feeling that is ever present in your son's heart is plainly exposed. Not even a Brihaspati can conceal the expressions of his countenance! Your son filled with joy, answers, "By killing Kunti's son in battle, Acharya, victory cannot be mine. The very Devas cannot slay all of them and if Yudhishtira is slain, Arjuna or he among them who survives, will surely annihilate us. Yudhishtira, however, is truthful in his promises. If brought here alive and defeated once more at dice, the Pandavas will again go into the vana, for they are all obedient to their eldest brother. Such a victory will be an enduring one. This is why I do not wish to kill Dharmaraja Yudhishtira but to take him alive."

Ascertaining this crooked purpose of Duryodhana, Drona, conversant with the truths of the science of artha and gifted with great intelligence, reflects a little and gives him the boon, circumscribing it in the following way. Drona says, "If Arjuna does not protect Yudhishtira, you can consider the eldest Pandava as already brought captive to you. As for Arjuna, the very Devas and the Asuras together, led by Indra, cannot face him in battle. It is for him that I dare not do what you ask of me. Without doubt, Arjuna is my sishya and I am his Acharya. He is, however, young, blessed with great good fortune, and set upon achieving his purposes. He has obtained many astras from Indra and Rudra; and, besides, you have provoked him direly. I dare not, therefore, do what you ask.

However, if Arjuna is removed from the battle by whatever means, you may regard Yudhishtira as already taken. Since our victory rests upon his being captured alive, and not upon his death, we can accomplish this by stratagem, O bull among men! Seizing the king devoted to truth and dharma, this very day, I will yield him up to you. But only if he faces me in direct battle for at least a moment, and if you can lure Arjuna away from the field. For otherwise Yudhishtira cannot be captured."

After Drona promises that he would seize Yudhishtira, but if Arjuna is far from him, your foolish sons consider the Dharmaraja as already taken. Duryodhana knows Drona's partiality for the Pandavas and in order to make Drona fulfil his given word, he proclaims Drona's oath before all his troops.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'When your troops hear of Drona's vow to capture Yudhishtira, they roar their approval, mingling their lusty yells with the whistling of their arrows and the booming of their conches. Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, however, soon learns of Drona's oath and his intention through his spies. He brings together all his brothers and the other kings of his army and tells Arjuna, "You have heard, Naravyaghra, of Drona's plot. Take such measures that will prevent him from capturing me. It is true that Drona has sworn his pledge but its success or failure depends on you. Therefore, stay and fight today in my vicinity so that Drona will not keep his word given to Duryodhana."

Arjuna says, "Just as I can never cause the death of my Acharya, I can never give you up, my brother. O Yudhishtira, I would rather sacrifice my life in battle than fight against my guru. This son of Dhritarashtra wants sovereignty by taking you his captive in battle. He will never succeed. The Sky with its stars may fall down, the Earth herself may split in pieces, but Drona will not take you his captive as long as I am alive, not even if Vajradhari Indra or Vishnu at the head of the Devas comes to help him. As long as I live, Rajan, do not have any fear of Drona, although he is the greatest of all warriors. I further assure you that my word is never broken nor does what I swear ever remain unfulfilled. I do not recollect ever having spoken an untruth, ever being defeated, or leaving the least part of a vow unfulfilled."

Then, Rajan, small and big conches, drums and cymbals are sounded and beaten in the Pandava camp. The noble Pandavas roar and shout, and the awful twanging of their bowstrings and the slaps of palms reach into the high heavens. Hearing the loud booming of conches that arises from the camp of the mighty sons of Pandu, your divisions also sound diverse instruments.

Your legions and the enemy's forces slowly advance against each other in battle order and soon savage, bloodcurdling battle breaks out again between the Pandavas, the Kurus, Drona and the Panchalas. The Srinjayas fight vigorously but cannot make headway as Drona himself shields his forces. So also, your son's best maharathas cannot beat back the Pandava army, for the diademed Arjuna Kiritin protects it. Guarded by Drona and Arjuna, both sides appear as if to stand quite still, like two blossoming forests in the silence of the night.

Then Drona, mounted on his golden chariot, like the magnificent Sun, bursts headlong through the ranks of the Pandavas, smashing them down at will. The Pandavas and the Srinjayas are afraid and feel as if this single mahatejasvin warrior upon his racing ratha has multiplied into many maharathas. Drona's terrible shafts fly in all directions, petrifying his opponents and he is indeed like the Sun himself at mid-day shedding a thousand rays of light all around. Just as once the Danavas could not face Indra, there is no one among the Pandavas who is able to face the raging son of Bharadwaja. After he confounds the hostile troops, Drona swiftly begins to decimate the legion led by Dhrishtadyumna, mowing them down with his incessant volleys of arrows which cover all the points of the compass.'

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Drona, wrathful warrior in his golden chariot, causing great havoc among the Pandava host and destroying their divisions like a forest-fire consuming a vana, the Srinjayas tremble in fear.

In battle, the twang of the maharatha's taut bow resounds like roaring thunder. Fierce arrows that Drona shoots with light like speed decimate chariot-warriors, horsemen, elephant-warriors and foot-soldiers, along with their elephants and horses. Showering down arrows, like roaring clouds helped by the wind raining hailstones at the close of summer, he brings terror to the hearts of the enemy. Raging through the hostile ranks and petrifying the troops, the mighty Drona swells the unnatural fear that his enemies feel. The gold-decked bow on his fleeting ratha is like the streak of lightning in a mass of dark clouds.

The shura, firm in truth, wise and always devoted to dharma, causes an awful river of angry current to flow there, such as seen only at the end of the Yuga. The river has its source in the recklessness of Drona's wrath and is haunted by thronging carnivores. Fighting men are the waves that cover its surface, and great heroes constitute the trees on its banks whose roots the river's current constantly erodes. Its waters are the blood shed in the battle, chariots are its eddies, and elephants and horses form its banks. Coats of mail are its floating lilies, the flesh of men is the mire on its bed, the fat, marrow and bones of fallen animals and men are the sands on its banks, and fallen head-gear is its froth.

The battle itself is the canopy above its surface; lances, the fish with which it abounds, and it is uncrossable for the vast number of slain men, elephants and horses that fall into it. The impetus of shafts loosed constitute its flow, corpses the timber floating on it; chariots its tortoises; heads the stones strewn on its banks and bed; swords and scimitars its fish in profusion; chariots and elephants form its lakes and it is decked with many adornments. Maharathas constitute hundreds of little whirlpools and blood-damp earth its wavelets. Though it can easily be crossed by men of exceptional valour, the timid can never ford the dread river of death. Heaps of bodies pile up on sandbanks, obstructing its navigation, and it is the seething haunt of kankas, vultures and other birds of prey.

It bears away thousands of maharathas to Yama's abode. Long spears are the snakes that infest it in profusion and the living combatants are the fowl frolicking on its waters; torn chatras, parasols, are its swans, and diadems the smaller birds that adorn it. Wheels are its turtles, maces its alligators, and arrows its smaller fish. It is home to frightful swarms of crows, vultures and jackals.

The river carries away hundreds of those that Drona kills in battle to the region of the Pitris. Dammed by these numerous bodies floating upon it, the hair of slain warriors and animals are like its moss and weeds. The inexorable and awesome Drona causes even such a river to flow there, terrifying the timid, magnifying their fears.

While Drona is thus desiccating the enemy army everywhere, the Pandava warriors led by Yudhishtira rush at him from all sides. Seeing this, your brave soldiers counter attack from every direction and a hair-raising battle ensues. Sakuni, full of a hundred kinds of deceit, attacks Sahadeva and pierces his charioteer, standard and chariot, with many keen shafts. Sahadeva, however, remaining unruffled, first cuts down Saubala's standard, breaks his bow, strikes his charioteer and carves splinters from his ratha; and he then pierces Sakuni himself with sixty shafts like thunderbolts.

Seizing up his mace, Sakuni jumps down from his fabulous chariot and fells Sahadeva's charioteer with a blow, so the sarathy falls out of his ratha. Then, Rajan, those two heroic and mighty warriors, both on foot and armed with gadas, battle like the peaks of two mountains.

Drona and Drupada, king of the Panchalas, draw blood from each other with braces of searing arrows. Bhimasena strikes Vivimsati sharply, but Vivimsati remains wonderfully unmoved. Serenely he cuts down Bhimasena's horses, standard and bow winning the worship of all the witnessing troops. The incensed Bhima cannot brook this and in a blur kills Vivimsati's pedigreed horses, at which the mighty Vivimsati, taking up a shield and sword, jumps down and charges Bhimasena and they fight like two demented elephants.

The heroic Salya, laughing the while, pierces, as if in jest, his own beloved nephew Nakula with a flurry of arrows, mainly to annoy him. Nakula, however, in a hot flash shoots down his uncle's horses, royal parasol, standard and charioteer, and blows his conch in echoing triumph.

Dhrishtaketu engages Kripa, wards off diverse kinds of arrows Kripa looses at him, pierces him with seventy fiery barbs and then cuts down the device of his standard with three perfect arrows. Kripa replies with a thick shower of shafts and the fight between the Brahmana and Dhrishtaketu rages on.

An amused Satyaki bloodies Kritavarman squarely through his chest with a special long arrow and then strikes him in a wink with seventy more. The Bhoja replies in kind but like swiftly coursing winds failing to move a mountain, Kritavarman cannot move Satyaki at all or affright him in the least.

The Pandava senapati strikes Susarman deeply in his vitals and is himself stabbed with a lance through his shoulder-joint. Virata, with his energetic Matsya warriors, manfully resists Vikartana's son and this feat of the Matsya king is a deed of great valour for he singly contains an entire legion with his immaculate archery.

King Drupada engages with Bhagadatta, and the combat between these two warriors is quite beautiful to watch. Bhagadatta, bull among men, lacerates Drupada, his sarathy, his standard and whole chariot with a myriad of arrows. The wrathful Drupada swiftly strikes the maharatha squarely through his chest with a flawless shaft. The two great warriors, Somadatta's son Bhurisravas and Sikhandin, masters of every kind of weapon, fight a fierce duel that terrifies all. Bhurisravas covers Yagnasena's son Sikhandin with a heavy downpour of arrows and is in turn pierced with ninety shafts, making him tremble.

Both capable of creating a hundred illusions, and swelling up with pride, Hidimbi's son Ghatotkacha and Alambusha, fierce Rakshasas, battle each other in the most astonishing manner, using their powers of maya, vanishing and reappearing at will—each set on vanquishing the other.

The fierce Chekitana fights Anuvinda, and they range right across the field, causing great amazement. Lakshmana fights Kshatradeva fiercely, even like Vishnu, long ago, against the Asura Hiranyaksha. The mighty Paurava roars at Abhimanyu as he attacks him wildly. Abhimanyu retaliates fiercely but Paurava envelops him in a mantle of arrows. Arjuna's marvellous son fells his antagonist's standard, parasol and rives his bow. He pierces Paurava with seven arrows and with another five strikes deep his charioteer and horses, gladdening his own troops, and then repeatedly roars like a lion.

In a blur, Abhimanyu fits an arrow to his bowstring that is certain to take Paurava's life. Seeing this, Kritavarman, Hridika's son, with two thunderbolt like shafts, breaks both Abhimanyu's bow and arrow. Abhimanyu flings aside his broken bow, takes up a bright sword and a shield decked with many stars, and whirling these at great speed, he careens across the field, putting his prowess on display. Whirling them overhead and then brandishing them fiercely, and leaping high himself, he makes no difference between using blade and shield for defence and vicious attack.

He leaps suddenly onto the axle-shaft of Paurava's ratha, gives a mighty shout and next moment is in the chariot and seizes Paurava by his hair, meanwhile breaking his sarathy's neck with a terrific kick, and cutting down his proud standard with a fluent stroke of his sword. Abhimanyu raises Paurava up high, like Garuda a snake from the bottom of the sea, agitating the waters. All the kings see Paurava helplessly flung down and dragged about on his chariot floor, his hair disheveled, and looking like an ox deprived of its senses and on the point of being killed by a lion. Jayadratha cannot bear to watch Paurava being so roughly mishandled; seizing up a sword and a shield that bears the device of a peacock, decked with a hundred little bells hung in rows, he jumps down from his chariot with a roar. Abhimanyu sees the king of the Sindhus, lets Paurava go and springs like a launching hawk from that warrior's ratha, landing lithely on the ground. Like some dancer, he effortlessly wards off with his sword and shield the javelins, arrows and swords that his enemies aim at him, showing off the strength of his own arms.

Mighty Abhimanyu once more raises his great sword and shield, and now rushes at Vriddhakshatra's son, a sworn enemy of his father, why, like a tiger rushing at an elephant. Both shuras, they joyfully fall on each other, just like a tiger and a lion with claw and tusk. No one finds any difference between them in the swinging strokes and the flashing thrusts and parries of their swords and shields. They circle each other gracefully, quite beautifully, and seem like two winged mountains of old.

Abhimanyu bends low and thrusts out with his sword, and in a blink Jayadratha dances aside and swings down mightily from above with own blade but it breaks in shards against the gold-plated shining shield of Arjuna's son. Jayadratha hastily retreats six steps and in the twinkling of an eye, is back on his own chariot. The duel with the sword over, Abhimanyu also climbs back into his own chariot. Ten enemy kings of the Kuru army now unite and surround him, but still eyeing Jayadratha, mighty Abhimanyu continues to whirl his sword and brandish his shield and lets out a deafening roar of triumph.

Having bested Jayadratha, Abhimanyu proceeds to burn the Kaurava legions like the Sun scorching the world at midday. Salya casts a vicious iron spear at him, decked with gold and like a blazing flame. Abhimanyu jumps up high and catches it in flight, as Garuda may a mighty snake in the air. Seeing this, all the kings together give a great howl and in a flash Arjuna's son casts Salya's own spear back at him like a streak of lightning. Looking like, a snake that has recently cast off its slough, the missile kills Salya's charioteer in a burst of blood and fells him from the ratha. Virata, Drupada, Dhrishtaketu, Yudhishtira, Satyaki, Kekaya, Bhima, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandin, Nakula and Sahadeva, and the five sons of Draupadi all exclaim, "Uttamam! Excellent!"

Diverse kinds of sounds fill Kurukshetra—the loud hum of arrows, leonine shouts, all exhorting the aggressive son of Arjuna. Your sons cannot bear these sounds and all of them suddenly surround Abhimanyu and cover him with hails of arrows like clouds pouring down rain on a mountain-breast. The parantapa Salya storms up to support your sons and remembering the death of his own charioteer, attacks Abhimanyu furiously.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, you have described to me many awesome duels. Hearing about them, I envy those that have eyes. All men will speak of this battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas, which reminds one of the great and wonderful wars of ancient times between the Devas and the Asuras. Ah, I am agog to listen to your narration of this stirring battle. Tell me more about the duel between Salya and Abhimanyu.'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing his charioteer killed, Salya, with his iron mace upraised, jumps down in rage from his ratha; at which, Bhima hefts his own huge gada and rushes at Salya who looks like the blazing Yuga-fire or the Destroyer Himself, armed with his cudgel. Abhimanyu, too, plucks up a remarkable mace like the Vajra itself, and taunts Salya, crying, "Come! Come on!"

Bhimasena, though, persuades his nephew to stand aside, and advances on Salya who stands immovable as a hill, calmly watching Bhima come towards him like a tiger at an elephant. The blare of trumpets, thousands of conches booming, roars and shouts and the sound of drums then erupt and cries of “Jaya! Jaya!” arise among hundreds of Pandava and Kaurava warriors charging towards each other.

There is no one among all the kings, O Bhaarata, other than the king of the Madras who can bear the might of Bhimasena in single combat; similarly, who else in the world, save Vrikodara, can withstand the illustrious Salya’s mighty mace? Grasped by Bhima, his prodigious gada, bound in hempen strings mixed with wires of gold and magnificent to behold, shines so brilliantly. And Salya’s mace, adorned with beautiful circles, looks like a blaze of lightning. Both of them bellow like bulls, circle each other, and standing as they do with their maces slightly bent, truly resemble a hillocky pair of horned bulls. The duel between the two lions among men is in every way evenly matched. Bhimasena strikes Salya’s formidable mace with his own, and draws a burning cascade of sparks. And Bhima’s gada, struck by Salya, is like a beautiful tree covered by fireflies at eventide, during the monsoon.

The mace that Salya hurls at Bhima lights up the sky; likewise, the gada that Bhima flings at his enemy scorches Salya’s forces like a meteor falling from the sky. Both wonderful maces strike each other like hissing she-snakes and we see flashes of fire. Like two great tigers mauling each other with their talons, or like two mighty elephants goring each other with their tusks, the titanic warriors circle, striking one another with utmost violence; and soon, covered with blood, they look like a couple of flowering Kinsukas. The sound of the blows of the maces wielded by those two lions among men is as loud as Indra’s thunder; and it echoes on all sides. Soon, they are so battered that they can hardly move, like hills stricken by lightning. Yet, both of them are still full of vigour and, moving in smaller circles, quickly fall upon each other again like two bull-elephants, the leaders of their herds, and pound each other with their iron maces, and then fall down at the same moment like a pair of Indra’s massive sacrificial stakes!

In a wink, Maharatha Kritavarman darts up to Salya lying breathless and senseless on the field, hauls him up into his chariot and bears him away. Immediately, reeling like a drunk, Bhima gets up and stands ready, gada in hand, for further fight. Seeing Salya of the Madras turn away from the battle demoralizes your sons, along with their elephants, foot soldiers, horsemen and chariot-warriors. Sensing victory, the Pandavas quickly attack the frightened men of your army, who break ranks and flee in all directions, like masses of clouds scattered by the wind.

The triumphant Pandava maharathas are resplendent in that moment, Rajan, like blazing fires. Elated and joyful, they let out loud yells and roars, blow their conchs, beat their drums, large and small, clash cymbals and sound other instruments.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing your army comprehensively routed, Rajan, Karna's son, the valiant Vrishasena, single-handedly comes to their defence, creating an astounding mayic illusion with his astras. He sends flights of thousands of arrows of blinding effulgence soaring in all directions, like the rays of the sun in mid-summer, and striking men, horses, chariots and elephants, destroying chariot-warriors and horsemen, who fall like trees broken by the wind, in their thousands. Watching this single warrior wheel fearlessly on the field, all the kings of the Pandava army unite to surround him. Nakula's son, Satanika, attacks him and strikes him with ten keen barbs, but in a flash Vrishasena breaks his bow and cuts down his standard.

The other sons of Draupadi, anxious to rescue their brother, charge Vrishasena and shroud him with their arrows. Immediately, many maharathas led by Aswatthama dash up to defend Vrishasena and lash the mighty sons of Draupadi with all kinds of shafts, which fall like rain on mountain breasts. The Pandavas join the fray. The ensuing battle between your troops and those of the Pandavas is fierce and enthralling, indeed like the Devasura yuddha of old.

Having stoked intense enmity between them for past wrongs, in the grip of wrath, the heroic Pandavas and Kauravas fight savagely, even like Garuda and the mighty Nagas battling in the sky. With Bhima, Karna, Kripa, Drona, Aswatthama, Dhrishtadyumna and Satyaki, the battlefield is lustrous, terrible and resplendent as the all-destroying Sun that rises at the end of the Yuga. The brutal and awesome contention is surely like the Devasura yuddha of yore. Roaring like the swollen sea, Yudhishtira's host brings slaughter to your army, and even your maharathas flee the fight. Seeing the debacle, Drona rallies them, crying, "Kshatriyas do not run!"

Drona of the red steeds, now fuming with rage, is like Indra's four-tusked elephant Airavata, and surging forward he scatters the Pandava soldiers, penetrates deep into their host and attacks Yudhishtira. Yudhishtira responds with a fever of arrows fletched with the feathers of the kanka bird, drawing blood on his Acharya. Drona breaks Yudhishtira's bow in his hands and forges ever closer to the Pandava king.

Kumara, renowned prince of the Panchalas, protector of Yudhishtira's chariot-wheels, confronts the advancing Drona, like a continent receiving the surging sea. Seeing Drona, that bull among Brahmanas, contained by Kumara, loud shouts of "Uttamam! Wonderful!" are heard from the Pandava warriors.

Excited and his blood risen, Kumara roars and roars, and pierces Drona deep with an arrow through his chest. Holding up the dangerous Acharya, though tiring, the mighty Kumara shows amazing lightness of hand, and strikes Drona with a thousand shafts. But then, the incensed Drona, bull among men, kills valiant Kumara, Kshatriya of dharma, who knew both mantras and astras well.

The inexorable Brahmana plunges on, loosing firestorms of arrows in every direction, mowing down your legions at his august will. He strikes Sikhandin with twelve arrows, Uttamaujas with twenty, Nakula with five, Sahadeva with seven, Yudhishtira with twelve searing shafts, each of the five sons of Draupadi with three barbs, Satyaki with five, Virata with ten. He attacks each of the Pandavas, one after the other, and beleaguers their entire host. All the while, he is advancing on Yudhishtira, seeking to capture him. Yugandhara looms before the threatening Drona, and holds him up for a while. He only provokes the raging Drona, like the ocean whipped into fury by the tempest. The Acharya strikes him with a fusillade of immaculate arrows in the heart of a moment, and then with a wedge-headed shaft beheads him, and brave Yugandhara falls out of his chariot.

Virata, Drupada, the Kaikeya princes, Satyaki, Sibi, Vyaghradatta, the Panchala princes, the valiant Singhasena and many others rush forward to protect Yudhishtira from the marauding Drona. They surround Drona to slow him down, while he burns on loosing riptides of fire on every side. Vyaghradatta, prince of the Panchalas, strikes Drona with fifty keen barbs, and the Pandava troops shout in exultation. Singhasena also draws blood from the Brahmana; Drona bristles and then, throwing back his head, gives such a dreadful roar that even those Pandava maharathas feel terror touch their hearts. Red-eyed Drona glares, twangs his bowstring like thunder and charges the pair that dares confront him. With two perfect wedge-headed arrows, he decapitates both Singhasena and Vyaghradatta. Flaring on, harrying the other maharathas of the Pandavas with remitless tirades of arrows, he stands before Yudhishtira's chariot, like all-destroying Yama himself.

Then, Rajan, loud cries of The king is slain! are heard among Yudhishtira's warriors; seeing Drona's fearsome, ineluctable prowess, many cry in dismay, Today Dhritarashtra's son will have victory for Drona has captured Yudhishtira!

But even as black despair grips them, Arjuna Swetavahana thunders up on his chariot of white steeds and suddenly stands implacable between the Brahmana and his brother. He comes bringing carnage with him, leaving a river of blood in his terrible wake, whose eddies are broken chariots and the severed limbs, heads and bodies of brave warriors, whose froth is floating arrows, whose fish are spears and other weapons clutched in the hands of fallen men, river that bore them in swift tide to where spirits of the departed dwell. Driving the enemy before him like wretched animals on a hunt, Arjuna Kiritin breaks like a flash-flood upon Drona's divisions and mantles them in a thick cloud of deadly arrows, every shaft claiming a life.

No one can distinguish when he sets his arrows to his bowstring or looses them; it is a single uninterrupted motion, without pause or let, a fluid blur, a dance, a tandava of slaughtering. Neither the four cardinal directions, nor the firmament above, nor the earth, Rajan, can be distinguished, for the singular darkness of Arjuna's arrows, engulfing all. And then the Sun also sets in a pall of dust, and friend and enemy cannot be told apart. Drona, so close to taking Yudhishtira alive, is frustrated and lets out a howl that reaches into the very sky.

The day's battle ends, and Drona and Duryodhana, Arjuna and the others slowly withdraw their denuded legions. The Pandavas, the Srinjayas and the Panchalas are full of relief and joy, and praise Partha as the Rishis eulogise the Sun. Having thus vanquished his enemies, a happy Arjuna, rides slowly to his tent at the very rear of the rest of the army, with Krishna for his companion. Standing on his beautiful chariot decked with the costliest of sapphires, rubies, gold, silver, diamonds, corals and crystals, the son of Pandu is glorious as the Moon in a firmament spangled with stars.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The troops of both the armies retire in disciplined order to their tents, Rajan, according to the divisions and the subdivisions to which they belong.

Having withdrawn the legions, Drona, in great sadness, says to Duryodhana "I told you that when Arjuna is with Yudhishtira, he cannot be captured even by the very Devas. Look how, although all of you fell upon him, Partha frustrated all of you. Do not doubt me when I say that Krishna and Arjuna are invincible. If, however, Swetavahana Arjuna can somehow be lured away from Yudhishtira's side, I say to you that Yudhishtira will be your captive. Let someone challenge Arjuna to a battle and draw him away to a far corner of the field from where he cannot return without vanquishing the challenger. While Arjuna is away, I will penetrate the Pandava host and, in the very sight of Dhrishtadyumna, seize Yudhishtira. This I swear I will do, but only if the son of Dharma stands alone before me for at least a moment in battle. And surely, that single feat of mine will benefit us more than defeating the whole Pandava army!"

Hearing this from Drona, Susarman, king of the Trigartas, who is present there with his brothers, says, "Arjuna constantly wrongs and humiliates us, Rajan, although we have done him no injury. Remembering all those humiliations, we burn in anger and cannot sleep at nights. With some good fortune, Arjuna will confront us on the field and we will have revenge on him, which will not only suit your purpose but also bring us renown. We will lure him out of the very field and kill Arjuna. We solemnly swear that today the Earth will be either without Arjuna or without the Trigartas. Our oath will never prove false."

The five brothers Satyaratha, Satyavarman, Satyavrata, Satyeshu and Satyakarman also endorse what he says. With ten thousand chariots, they come to Duryodhana, having sworn their oath on the battlefield. The Malavas, the Tundikeras with a thousand chariots, and Purushavyaghra Susarman, lord of Prasthala, with the Mavellakas, the Lalithyas, and the Madrakas, also with ten thousand rathas, and his brothers, with another ten thousand chariots from diverse realms, also come.

They bring fire and each prepares for lighting one for himself. They take up ropes of Kusa grass and after they don remarkable coats of mail, they bathe in ghrita, put on robes of Kusa grass and tie their bowstrings as girdles around their waists. These Kshatriyas, who have given away hundreds and thousands of cows and gold nishkas as gifts to Brahmanas, who have performed many yagnas, who have been blessed with children, who have nothing more to achieve in this world, who have earned blessed regions in the hereafter, who are prepared to lay down their lives in battle, who have devoted their souls to the attainment of fame and victory, now only want to reach those unearthly kingdoms through dharma yuddha, those realms attainable by yagnas, with abundant dakshina to Brahmanas and through sacred rites, the chief among which are Brahmacharya and study of the Vedas. Having each gratified Brahmanas by giving them gold, cattle, fine clothes, and having addressed one another in loving discourse, those Kshatriyas kindle their sacred fires and take the solemn vow to either kill or be killed by Arjuna.

In ringing voices they declare in the hearing of all men, "Those realms shall be ours that are reserved for men of mahavratas, worlds which are not for those who drink wine, or have adulterous relations with their guru's wife, steal from Brahmanas, enjoy the king's favour without satisfying its conditions, or who abandon those who seek protection, who slay a rival out of selfish greed. Those exalted worlds are not for those who set fire to homes, who kill kine, who wound others with words or deeds, who harbour malice against Brahmanas, who from folly do not seek the companionship of their wives in their season, who seek the congress with women on the day they are to perform the Sraddha for their ancestors, who harm themselves, who misappropriate what is given to them in trust for safekeeping, who destroy learning, who have battle with eunuchs, who follow mean base men, who are atheists, or those who abandon their sacred fires, their mothers, and who are generally sinners.

May we lose those lofty, sacred worlds if we return from the field without killing Dhananjaya, or if we run from him on the field in fear. While if we do indeed achieve the most difficult feat in the world, of killing Arjuna, we will indeed attain to those most blessed realms of felicity and grace!"

Having said these words, sworn the grave oath for which they are henceforth called the Samsaptakas, Rajan, those Kshatriya shuras go forth into battle, and loudly challenge Arjuna, summoning him to the southernmost part of Kurukshetra. Thus challenged, Arjuna, tiger among men, subjugator of hostile cities, immediately says to Yudhishtira, "I never refuse a challenge. It is a sacred vow I have sworn. These men, Susarman and his brothers, themselves sworn to conquer or die, have challenged me to battle. You must give me leave to kill Susarman with all his followers, O Purusharishabha, for I cannot brook their arrogance and I say to you that these enemies are already dead."

Yudhishtira says, "You know, my child, what Drona has resolved to accomplish. You must not let him succeed in keeping his vile word given to Duryodhana. Drona is endowed with great prowess. He is a shura, accomplished in arms and tireless, and he has vowed to seize me."

Arjuna says, "Rajan, this Satyajit will protect you today in battle. As long as Satyajit lives, the acharya will never succeed in taking you. If, however Satyajit is slain in battle, you must not remain on the field for a moment, even if all our other warriors surround you."

Yudhishtira then gives Arjuna leave to face the Samsaptakas; the king embraces his brother lovingly and chants many mantras of blessing over him. After he makes this arrangement for Yudhishtira's protection, the mighty Partha rides against the Trigartas, like a hungry lion hunting a herd of deer. Filled with joy at Arjuna's absence from Yudhishtira's side, Duryodhana's men are eager to capture Yudhishtira. Both armies plunge furiously at each other, like the Ganga and the Sarayu in spate in the season of rains, when both rivers are swollen with water.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The Samsaptakas, sworn to kill Arjuna or die, are full of delight as they take their stand on a level part of the field, arraying their chariots in the vyuha of the Half-moon. Seeing Arjuna Kiritin come towards them, they give vent to lusty shouts that fill the sky and all the points of the compass. Because it is an open plain covered only with men, their roars create no echoes.

Seeing them so full of joy, Dhananjaya, with a small smile, tells Krishna, "Look, the Trigarta brothers, who are about to die, are full of delight when they should weep instead. Or, perhaps this is their moment to rejoice, since they will go to those transcendent realms that cowards can never attain."

Arjuna comes upon the arrayed ranks of the Trigartas, takes up his gold embellished conch, the Devadatta, and blows it with great force, filling the place with its blare, suddenly terrifying the Samsaptaka chariot legion, and all their animals, who stand, petrified, with staring eyes, ears, necks and lips paralysed. They urinate helplessly and some even vomit blood.

When they regain composure, they quickly form their ranks and loose their arrows all together in a stream at Arjuna. The mind-swift Pandava invokes fifteen astras and shoots down all those thousands of shafts in flight, before they can reach him. The Samsaptakas strike Arjuna with ten arrows each, and he, them with three. Each of them pierces Arjuna with five shafts; he, with two of storm force.

They shower Arjuna and Kesava with a downpour as thunderclouds do when they open. Thousands of arrows fall upon Arjuna, like swarms of bees on a flowering stand of trees in the forest. Thirty of these gold-winged barbs pierce Arjuna's crown of adamant and stick there, so he seems to wear golden ornaments, and shines like the newly risen sun.

With a wedge-headed arrow, Arjuna shreds Subahu's leathern shield; he covers Sudharman, Sudhanwan and Subahu in searing fire. They find Partha with ten arrows each, and he, the monkey-bannered shura, strikes them all with rashes of arrows, also cutting down their golden standards. He breaks Sudhanwan's bow, kills his horses and then, in a scarlet flash, cuts his turbaned head from his neck.

This terrifies the Samsaptaka troops and, panic-stricken, many break ranks and run headlong back to Duryodhana's main army. The incensed Arjuna inundates the mighty legion with a flood of arrows; he falls upon that host and begins to raze it with a ceaseless torrent of arrows, like the Sun destroying darkness with his rays. The Trigarta forces visibly melt away on all sides. The Samsaptakas are as full of fear as Arjuna is of wrath; they stand transfixed, helpless before him like a terrified herd of deer, and he slaughters them with his supernal archery. And then even their maharathas turn their chariots to flee from the terrible Pandava.

Susarman roars in rage at his maharathas, "Stand and fight, Kshatriyas! It is shameful to flee from battle. You swore such a dread and solemn oath before all the army. What will you say to Duryodhana's great commanders when you go running back to them? The whole world will mock us for such cowardice. Stand and fight!"

Hearing him, Rajan, those shuras roar aloud and blow on their conches to embolden themselves. The Samsaptakas return to the field, along with the fighting Narayana cow-herds, resolved now to face Yama himself.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the Samsaptakas return to the field, Arjuna says to his sarathy, the divine Krishna, "Hrishikesa, ride at the Samsaptakas! They will not yield as long as they are alive. Today you will see the might of my arms and of this Gandiva. Today I will slaughter all these men like Rudra does the creatures at the end of the Yuga."

The invincible Krishna smiles, heartens his warrior with some auspicious words, and sets his chariot towards the enemy. That chariot yoked to white horses is as splendid as a celestial vimana coursing through the sky. And like Indra's ratha, Rajan, in the war between the Devas and the Asuras in olden days, it could fly in every direction.

Armed with diverse weapons, the wrathful Narayanas surround Dhananjaya, and cover him with a thick darkness of arrows. Bharatarishabha, in moments Arjuna and Krishna are entirely shrouded, invisible. His face dark with anger, Arjuna grips the Gandiva more tightly, rubs its bowstring and, his great brow furrowed deep, he blows a reverberant blast on his prodigious conch, the Devadatta. His ire provoked, his greater might summoned, the Pandava invokes and looses the devastating astra called the Tvashtri. Thousands of shining terrible Arjunas and Krishna appear on that field. Confounded and maddened by that sight, the enemy soldiers turn on one another for they see just Arjunas and Krishnas everywhere, and their every comrade one!

"Hah! Arjuna!"

"Krishna!"

"Pandu's son!"

"Yadava!"

Bewildered by the hallucinations of the astra, crying out thus, they hew blindly at one another, and their bodies are quickly like blossoming Kinsukas, sprouted in red flowers and beautiful. The astra consumes all the thousands of arrows they shot at the real Arjuna and Krishna, plunging them in a solid night; the two emerge from darkness glorious as ever. All the while, the occult weapon sends Samsaptaka heroes past counting to Yama's halls. Then, laughing in exhilaration, Arjuna turns to further raze the Lalithya, the Malava, the Mavellaka, and the Trigarta warriors. Arjuna massacres those Kshatriyas in the grip of fate, but they valiantly continue to besiege him with so many different kinds of missiles.

Yet again, the Samsaptaka arrows plunge Arjuna and Krishna in darkness and neither they nor their ratha can be seen. Seeing their arrows find their mark, their enemies roar in joy; they already celebrate, waving bright silks scarves, thinking the two Krishnas are dead. They blow their conches, beat their drums and clash cymbals in thousands, and roar in exultation like some vast pride of lions.

Krishna, bathed in sweat and weak, speaks to Arjuna in the unnatural dark, "Where are you, Partha? I do not see you. Are you alive, O Parantapa?"

At once, Arjuna invokes the Vayavyastra, weapon of the Wind, and blows away the sinister cupola of arrows, and the darkness with it. Illustrious Vayu, god of that mighty astra, blows away whole legions of Samsaptakas, thousands of men, with their horses, elephants, chariots and weapons, as if they are dry leaves. And ah, they look beautiful, like flights of birds taking wing all together from their trees!

Even while they are borne through the air and along the ground, Arjuna cuts off thousands of martial and royal heads; he cuts away weapon-wielding hands from wrists, dissects warriors' thighs like elephants trunks, and strikes others deep and fatally through backs, arms and eyes.

Arjuna dismembers his enemies and shatters their richly adorned chariots that look like cloud palaces in the sky; he kills rathikas, horsemen, elephant-riders and their beasts of war. Ruined chariots lie everywhere in dense profusion, with standards broken, looking like forests of headless palmyra trees. Elephants bearing proud banners, hooks, goads and royal standards, fall like wooded mountains split by Indra's Vajra.

Horses in mail with yak-like tails, roll on the ground with their riders, in death's spasms, their entrails and eyes gouged out, all struck by Partha's shafts. Foot-soldiers lie askew in the final postures of death, their hands no longer grasping the swords that had been their talons, their armour shredded, their bones broken and protruding ghastly, their vitals excoriated, all slain by Arjuna's irresistible arrows.

Kurukshetra, field of war, is dreadful with corpses, with warriors still being killed, the fallen and then falling, standing or being swept away. The showers of blood sprayed copiously all around by Arjuna's indescribable archery wetly clears the air of it dust. The ground strewn with thousands of headless trunks is impassable.

Arjuna's chariot shines fiercely like Rudra's ratha at the end of the Yuga, when the Lord comes as Hara to destroy creation. The warriors, with their holy horses, chariots and elephants, slaughtered by Arjuna become the guests of Indra. Strewn thickly with dead maharathas, Kurukshetra is as macabre as Yama's domains that teem with the spirits of departed creatures.

Meanwhile, as Arjuna is furiously engaged with the Samsaptakas, Drona at the head of his forces in battle array, along with many armed and famous maharathas, hunts Yudhishtira, determined to capture him. The ensuing battle is unimaginably brutal.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The next morning, Maharatha Drona tells Suyodhana, "'I am ready! I arranged for Arjuna to be lured away by the Samsaptakas."

When Partha rides after the Samsaptakas, Drona, at the head of his vyuha, sets out to capture Dharmaraja Yudhishtira. Seeing Drona array his forces in a Garuda vyuha, Yudhishtira deploys his troops in an Ardhachakra vyuha.

At the beak of the Garuda is Drona himself while Duryodhana surrounded by his brothers forms the head with Kritavarman and the illustrious Kripa being the two eyes of that Eagle. Bhutasarman, Kshemasarman, the valiant Karakaksha, the Kalingas, the Singhalas, the Easterners, the Sudras, the Abhiras, the Daserakas, the Sakas, the Yavanas, the Kambojas, the Hangsapadas, the Surasenas, the Daradas, the Madras and the Kalikeyas, with hundreds and thousands of elephants, horses, chariots, and foot-soldiers are stationed at its neck. Bhurisravas, Salya, Somadatta, and Balhika, surrounded by a full Akshauhini, take up their position as the right wing, while Vinda, Anuvinda of Avanti and

At the rear of that Garuda are the Kalingas, the Ambashtas, the Magadhas, the Paundras, the Madrakas, the Gandharas, the Sakunas, the Vasatis, the Easterners and the Mountain-men. At its tail is Vikartana's son Karna, with his sons, kinsmen and friends, leading a large force raised from diverse kingdoms. At the heart of that formation are Jayadratha, Bhimaratha, Sampati, the Jayas, the Bhojas, Bhuminjaya, Vrisha, Kratha, and the mighty king of the Nishadas, all masters of war, surrounded by a large host, keeping Brahmaloka in their hearts and as their goal.

Drona's vyuha with its foot-soldiers, horses, chariots and elephants, heaves like a tempest-tossed ocean, as it advances to engage the enemy. Impatient warriors sally forth from its flanks, like roaring summer clouds charged with lightning, scudding in from all sides. In the midst of that army, the king of the Pragjyotishas, mounted on his war elephant, is magnificent, Rajan, like the rising sun. Decked in garlands of flower and with a royal white chatra held over his head, he is like the full moon when Soma is in conjunction with the Krittika nakshatra. His elephant, blind with the wine-like exudation from its temples rent in musth, looks like a mass of black antimony and shines like a mountain washed by the showers of mighty clouds. Bhagadatta himself, armed with various weapons, riding in the midst of many heroic kings of the hill countries, is like Indra himself surrounded by the Devas.

Yudhishtira sees that superhuman and invincible vyuha and tells Dhrishtadyumna, "O you of the steeds white as doves, do whatever you must to ensure that the Brahmana does not take me his captive."

Dhrishtadyumna replies, "O Punyavrata, Drona will never take you, however he strives to, for I myself will contain him and his forces. As long as I am alive, O Kurusthama, have no fear. Under no circumstances can Drona vanquish me in battle."

With this, Dhrishtadyumna, the mighty son of Drupada, with bow raised and streaming arrows charges Drona. Seeing the fire-born Panchala prince ride straight at him like an evil omen, Drona feels a pang of fear and weakness. Watching this, your son Durmukha, rides between the Acharya and Dhrishtadyumna, and a pitched battle erupts between them, O Bhaarata. Dhrishtadyumna covers Durmukha in a rage of arrows, and looses a scathing volley at Drona as well. Durmukha replies with thick swaths of violent shafts, arrow clouds of every hue and kind.

Even while they are thus engaged, Drona consumes many legions of Yudhishtira's army, like the wind scattering a cloudbank. Only briefly does that battle resemble an ordinary encounter, Rajan, for it swiftly turns into a wild carnage of men of absolute wrath, in the grip of the feral spirit of kali. The men can no longer distinguish their own from the enemy and the battle rages with the warriors guided only by instinct and the crying out of names. Rays of light like those of the Sun seem to fall and play upon the gemstones on their helmets, their necklaces, other ornaments and upon their coats of mail, and turn the chariots, elephants and horses adorned with streaming banners, into clouds with flocks of cranes under them.

Foot soldiers butcher other foot soldiers, cavalrymen riding horses of fiery mettle slay other horsemen, chariot-warriors kill other rathikas, and the elephant-mounted bring down other elephant-riders. Perhaps the most ferocious contention is between the elephant legions with lofty standards on their backs. The mastodons lumber at one another and great bodies collide in thunder; they gore each other deep with curved tusked, while smoke issues from white tusks locking and grinding against other tusks, so that the spectacle is like dark clouds massed in the sky and charged with lighting. The earth, spread over with elephants in mortal combat, dragging along other leviathans, trumpeting shrilly in fury and pain, drawing geysers of blood and then falling with dismal screams, quakes and looks beautiful like the autumn sky covered with clouds. The deep cries of the great beasts cut down by thousands of arrows and savage spears are like the rumble of thunderheads during the monsoon.

Some of the massive beasts, wounded with lance and barb, are panic-stricken and their tails curling run wildly from the field trumpeting in terror even like the roaring of the apocalyptic clouds of the pralaya when a Yuga ends. Some are turned back by their redoubtable riders, to the fray with sharp hooks and goads to charge the enemy again. They come back in renewed frenzy trampling, crushing to bloody pulp all that stand in their way.

Mahouts attack other mahamatras with arrows and lances and fell them from the backs of their beasts, their weapons and hooks falling from dead hands. Many riderless elephants blunder about like clouds torn from greater masses until they encounter one another and then fall to again. Some towering beasts, bearing slain warriors on their backs, or those whose weapons have fallen from their grasps, wander singly, aimlessly in all directions.

In that awful carnage of mammoths, untold numbers of the great animals are killed with spears, arrows, swords and battle-axes, and fall, shaking the earth with their heavy bodies and the sky with their echoing screams. The earth trembles repeatedly, struck all around by the falling creatures heavy as hills. With elephants killed along with their riders lying everywhere with the standards still on their backs, the earth looks eerily beautiful as if strewn with shapely grey hills running streams of red down their sides. The mahamatras on the backs of countless hulking beast, their breasts pierced by broad-headed shafts, collapse, their spears and hooks loosened from nerveless hands. Some elephants, struck through with long shafts, utter crane like cries and bolt in all directions, trampling allies and enemies alike, leaving ghastly patches of crushed bodies in their wake.

Covered with countless corpses of elephants, horses and chariot-warriors, the Earth, Rajan, is sludge of flesh and blood. Large chariots with wheels and many without wheels, shattered by great tusks, are tossed high into the air by the maddened elephants on the rampage, ever cruelly goaded by the warriors perched on their backs. Chariots are seen careering everywhere, their charioteers and warriors slain; and riderless horses and elephants, pouring blood from deep wounds and all crying out pitiably.

On horrible Kurukshetra, father slays son, and son kills father, for the war has turned altogether ghastly; the kali yuga is upon the world and dharma has left the sacred field stalked by unseen demons and every manner of sinister savagery. Men sink ankle-deep in the gory mire and look like tall trees whose lower parts have been swallowed in a forest-fire. Fine Kshatriyas' capes, coats of mail, parasols and standards are all dyed with blood and everything on the yawning field of Yama seems to have turned death's stark crimson. Muscular corpses of slain steeds ripple no more, chariots lie sad and broken, as do brave fighting men beyond count; yet the war rages on and these are further ridden over and truncated by the chariot wheels of those that fight on.

The sea of troops with elephants for its stream, slain men for its floating moss and weeds, and chariots for its fierce eddies, makes a grim and horrific spectacle. Warriors, with horses and elephants for their large craft, seeking victory for their spoil, plunge into that sea, and do not sink but soldier madly on to have their enemies' lives at any cost. When all the warriors, each bearing his particular insignia, are lashed by scathing arrow-storms, none among them loses heart, not though all have lost their proud emblems. In that greatest and most awful battle, Drona flays all the maharathas ranged against him, protecting Yudhishtira, confounding them with archery that defies both imagination and belief. Finally, the Brahmana afire draws near enough to charge Yudhishtira himself.'"

"Sanjaya continues, 'Seeing Drona near him, Yudhishtira greets him fearlessly with a thick shower of arrows. Yudhishtira's troops receive this like a herd of elephants trumpeting when a lion attacks their leader. Seeing Drona close in on Yudhishtira, the powerful Satyajit rushes at the Acharya; the Panchala prince and the Brahmana come hunting the Pandava king fight lustrously, stirring their troops even like Indra and Bali.

In a blur, Satyajit strikes Drona's charioteer with five barbs smoking like snake-venom, each one looking like Death himself. Drona swoons. Satyajit swiftly kills Drona's horses with ten deadly shafts; incensed, he pierces each of Drona's Parshni charioteers with ten arrows. Flaring around the field in a circle at the head of his troops, wrath of battle high in him, he cuts down Drona's standard.

Recovering himself, seeing his enemy's feats, Drona resolves to dispatch him. The Acharya first breaks Satyajit's bow, even as the prince draws the weapon's string back with an arrow fitted, and then plunges ten more terrible shafts deep into that Kshatriya's body. In a flash, valiant Satyajit takes up another bow and quick as thinking strikes Drona with thirty barbs winged with the feathers of the Kanka bird. The Pandavas roar in joy and wave their capes to celebrate Satyajit's valour. Now the mighty Vrika amazes all by striking Drona squarely through his chest with a swath of sixty arrows shot in a single moment. Mighty Drona glowers and reaching into his great heart summons all his energy.

He breaks both Satyajit and Vrika's bows, and with six missiles like thunderbolts, in a red flash, he kills Vrika with his charioteer and horses. Satyajit seizes up another stronger bow and again makes Drona, his sarathy and his horses a home burning shafts. Drona cannot bear this ignominy and pounds Satyajit with a hail of shafts, drawing blood from his horses, cleaving the very grip of his new bow, and wounding both his Parshni sarathies. Yet, though his bows are thus repeatedly riven, the Panchala prince, master of the greatest astras, continues to ferociously engage the Brahmana of the red chargers. Seeing Satyajit grow in energy in their pitched duel, Drona strikes off that shining young warrior's handsome head with a crescent-tipped arrow.

When he sees the Panchala prince die, Yudhishtira does not pause a moment but, borne away by his fleet steeds, flees that perilous encounter for fear of the hunting Acharya. The Panchalas, the Kekayas, the Matsyas, the Chedis, the Karushas and the Kosalas dash at Drona from every side to protect Yudhishtira. However, awesome Drona, razer of teeming enemy hosts, calmly begins to consume those legions, like fire consuming some heaps of cotton. Virata's younger brother Satanika leads a sally against Drona, and roaring like a tiger, strikes Drona, his charioteer and horses with six streaks of lightning, polished bright as sunrays. Never pausing, though it is a hard and wild thing he does, for Drona is a Brahmana, Satanika bathes Bharadwaja's maharatha son with arrow showers.

Then, Drona aroused roars back at Satanika and, with an arrow sharp as a razor, dissevers the Matsya hero's head decked with bright earrings. And the Matsya warriors all flee. Having vanquished the Matsyas, the inexorable son of Bharadwaja repeatedly routs the Chedis, the Karushas, the Kaikeyas, the Panchalas, the Srinjayas, and the Pandus.

Seeing the enraged warrior of the golden chariot consuming their akshauhinis like a fire devouring a forest, the Srinjayas tremble with rage and fear. Drona is everywhere massacring the enemy, and we hear the awful twang of his bowstring everywhere. Fierce arrows stream from his bow without pause or let, cutting down elephants, horses, foot-soldiers, chariot-warriors and elephant-riders. As a mighty mass of roaring summer clouds blown by violent winds batters down hailstones, so Drona does arrows and fills fear in the hearts of his enemies. He blows in every direction, seemingly ubiquitous, agitating the enemy sea. We see his gold chased bow in his hands of untold genius, all around us, like streak lighting amidst dark clouds. The beautiful emblem of the Vedi, the altar on his banner resembles a peak of Himavat.

The carnage that Drona fetches to the Pandava troops is like the slaughter that Vishnu, adored by both the Devas and the Asuras, brought to the Daitya army. Heroic, truthful in speech, wise beyond measure, mighty and inexorable, the illustrious Brahmana lets a fierce river of blood, which strikes terror into the timid. Coats of mail are its waves, standards its eddies, and it bears away, as it flows, countless numbers of mortal creatures, elephants and horses its great crocodiles, and swords its fish. Ah, no one can easily cross Drona's river of death.

The bones of heroes form its pebbles; drums and cymbals its tortoises; shields and armour are its boats; the hair of Kshatriyas its floating moss and weeds; arrows are its wavelets and bows its current; the writhing arms of soldiers form its snakes; and that river of fierce tide runs over the battlefield, sweeping away both Kurus and Srinjayas. Human heads, are its grisly stones; their thighs its large fish; maces form the rafts by which many seek to cross it; and floating helmets are the froth that covers its surface and the entrails of animals of war are its reptiles. Terrible in aspect, it bears away numberless heroes to the other world; blood and flesh make up its sludge; elephants its crocodiles and flagstaffs the trees on its banks. Thousands of Kshatriyas sink in it. Fierce corpses clog it and with horse-soldiers and elephant-warriors for its sharks, Drona's blood river is impassable, as it hurtles towards Yamaloka. It abounds with Rakshasas, wild dogs and jackals and macabre pisachas haunt its banks and drink thirstily from it.

Then, led by Yudhishtira, a host of Pandava warriors attacks Drona, as he burns on Kurukshetra like the Sun beating down on the world and devours their legions greedily like Death himself. The Pandava forces surround Drona from every side, hemming him in. At this, Rajan, the kings and the princes of your army, with weapons raised, all rush to support the Brahmana shura. Meanwhile, Sikhandin strikes Drona with five perfectly straight barbs, Kshatradharman with twenty, and Vasudeva with five; Uttamaujas pierces him with three shafts, and Kshatradeva with five;

Satyaki drills him with a hundred thunderbolts, and Yudhamanyu with eight. Yudhishtira shoots the fearsome Brahmana with a dozen shafts, and Dhrishtadyumna with ten and Chekitana with three.

But then Drona, like an elephant with rent temples, routs the chariot-division of the Pandavas and he kills Dridhasena. Attacking king Kshema, who fights without fear, the wild Acharya kills him with nine arrows loosed in the space of a wish and Kshema falls lifeless in his very ratha. Ploughing his way into the very heart of the hostile troop, Drona careening everywhere, Drona bestriding the war, protects his own luminously, while he himself needs no protection at all. He strikes Sikhandin with twelve singing shafts and Uttamaujas with twenty. He despatches Vasudeva with a wedge-tipped arrow that severs his head so very cleanly; Drona savages Kshemavarman with eighty arrows shot quicker than seeing, and Sudakshina with six and twenty. He shoots Kshatradeva down from his chariot with a thick and heavy shaft. Having wounded Yudhamanyu with sixty-four arrows and Satyaki with thirty, Drona of the golden chariot once again rounds on Yudhishtira, that best of kings, who wisely flees like the wind from his Acharya.

Panchala, son of Drupada, attacks Drona feverishly. Drona in his froth breaks his bow, fells his horses and his charioteer and with a single final shaft that plunges through Panchala's armour and blows his noble heart to shreds kills Drupada's son with some satisfaction, and the young hero falls lifeless from his sad chariot like a bright star come loose from the sky.

Upon the fall of the illustrious Panchala, we hear loud cries, "Kill Drona! Kill Drona!"

But the imperturbable and violent Brahmana continues to maim and slaughter the Panchalas, the Matsyas, the Kaikeyas, the Srinjayas and the Pandavas. Supported by your Kurus, Drona then triumphantly quells Satyaki, and Chekitana's son, and Senabindu, and Suvarchas, and many other majestic Kshatriyas. Your warriors, Rajan, are victorious in that fervid encounter, and massacre the Pandava forces as they fly in all directions. The Panchalas, the Kaikeyas and the Matsyas shake with fear as they are butchered on all sides like the Danavas were of old by Indra.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'When Bharadwaja's son breaks through the Pandavas and the Panchalas is there anybody who challenges him? Alas, seeing Drona standing there at the head of his troops like a tiger or an elephant in musth, such a terror to his enemies, and willing to die for Duryodhana's cause, was there no man who could face him, none of courage to enhance the fame of the Kshatriyas, a spirit that lower men can never have and which is distinctive only of the greatest? Tell me, O Sanjaya, which shuras faced Bharadwaja's son at the head of his forces?'

Sanjaya replies, 'Seeing Drona ravish the Panchalas, the Pandavas, the Matsyas, the Srinjayas, the Chedis, the Kaikeyas with his astras, so they shamefully flee from his unbearable archery, so they are like skiffs by the dreadful waves of a tempested ocean, your sons the Kauravas, roaring like lions, and blowing their conches and beating their drums, suddenly fall recklessly upon the enemy's chariots, elephants and foot-soldiers from all sides. The Pandava fighters break ranks entirely and flee blindly from the fray. At the head of his own forces, surrounded by his brothers and kinsmen, Duryodhana exults, and laughingly says to Karna, "Look Radheya, the Panchalas before Drona are like a herd of the wild deer terrified by a lion. I do not think they will come back to battle for our Acharya has blown them away as a great storm does mighty trees.

Each man for himself, they flee from his golden-winged arrows, no two of them together. They panic as men caught in whirlpools; and look now how they huddle together like elephants in a forest-fire. They are like trees in blossom swarmed by the dark bees that are Drona's arrows. With their blood flowing, they run all together, for they have no answer to the Acharya.

Look there Karna, the sight of the angry Bhima, abandoned by the Pandavas and the Srinjayas and surrounded by my warriors, delights me most of all! Ah today, that evil one see the world full of just Drona! I have no doubt that Pandu's wretched son has lost all hope today of life and kingdom."

Karna replies quietly, "Mahabaho Bhima will not abandon the battle as long as there is life in him. Neither will he brook our triumphant shouts, and nor will the Pandavas be vanquished in battle. They are valiant, resilient, powerful beyond common understanding and hard to resist in war. When they remember how we tried to poison them and burn them alive, and the shame and exile that arose from the game of dice, the Pandavas will not abandon the war.

Look where the mighty-armed Vrikodara of endless tejas has already turned back to the fight. This son of Kunti will certainly kill many of our best maharathas. With sword and bow, with astras, horses, elephants, men, chariots and with his iron gada, he will raze many legions of our soldiers. Other maharathas of the Panchalas, the Kekayas, the Matsyas, and especially the Pandavas themselves, follow him. All of them are intrepid, powerful and skilled. The mighty Bhima leads them again in wrath. Vrikodara surrounded by the bulls of his vamsas, like the clouds around the Sun, engages Drona from all sides.

Intent upon their one object, they will besiege the unprotected Drona, like insects near death flying at a burning flame. They are masters of weapons and equal to facing the Acharya in battle. Heavy is the burden that now rests on Bharadwaja's son. Let us ride quickly to Drona. We must not let them kill him like wolves hunting down a mighty elephant!"

Listening to what Karna says, Duryodhana with his brothers rushes to Drona's rescue. The sound of the Pandava warriors returning to the fight on their chariots drawn by superb horses of diverse colours, all bent upon Drona's death, is deafening.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Describe for me, Sanjaya, the distinctive marks of their rathas, all those who fight for Bhimasena against Drona.'

Sanjaya says, 'Vrikodara rides a chariot drawn by dappled horses coloured like the antelope, while the brave Satyaki's has a ratha is harnessed to silvery chargers. The furious and irresistible Yudhamanyu rides a ratha with superb horses of variegated hue. Dhrishtadyumna's chariot has fleet horses yoked, in trappings of gold and grey. Red horses draw the ratha of Dhrishtadyumna's son, Kshatradharman of firm vows, who fights to protect his father and ensure his complete success. Sikhandin's son Kshatradeva's finely caparisoned horses are of the colour of lotus-leaves and have pure white eyes.

Beautiful Kamboja chargers, decked with the feathers of the green parrot, bear Nakula towards your army. Horses dark like thunderclouds take Uttamaujas into the battle, against the invincible Drona standing with arrow drawn. Sahadeva, his weapons raised, has horses fleet as the wind and of variegated hues, during that fight encounter.

Yudhishtira Naravyaghra's steeds are ivory coloured with black manes, high-strung and fleet like the wind. He rides at the head of many warriors borne along by equally swift horses, decked in gold trappings. Behind him is Drupada, the king of the Panchalas, with a golden parasol over his head, protected by all these soldiers that follow Yudhishtira. Sautabhi, great archer, has truly beautiful horses that can endure every frightful sound of war, and Virata follows him.

The Kaikeyas, Sikhandin and Dhrishtaketu, surrounded by their respective troops, follow the king of Matsyas. Excellent horses of the pale red tint of trumpet-flowers are most handsome to behold as they bear Virata into the fight, while fleet yellow steeds yellow drawn with chains of gold, carry his son Uttara. Chargers of deep red hue bear the five Kekaya brothers. The aureate Kshatriyas, with red pennants and decked with golden chains, all great heroes, loose arrows like clouds pouring down rain.

Superb steeds of the colour of unbaked earthen pots, the gift of Tumburu pull the chariot of Sikhandin, Panchala prince of great tejas.

Altogether, twelve thousand maharathas of the Panchala race take the field. Of these, six thousand follow Sikhandin. Spirited piebald horses, dappled like the antelope, carry the son of Sisupala into the fray. The bull among the Chedis, the strong and invincible Dhrishtaketu, has Kamboja steeds of variegated complexion, while, fabulous Sindhu horses of beautiful limbs and of the hue of straw smoke draw the Kaikeya prince Brihadkshatra's chariot. Of eyes of pure white their skins the colour of the lotus, horses foaled in the country of the Balhikas and decked with fine ornaments, bear Sikhandin's son, brave Kshatradeva. Senabindu, scourge of his enemies, has quiet horses of the rich hue of red silk, caparisoned in gold. Exceptional stallions of the colour of cranes bring the youthful maharatha, the delicate son of the king of the Kasi, into battle.

White steeds with black necks, swift as the mind, yet always obedient to their sarathy, bear Prince Prativindhya. Arjuna's son Sutasoma has cream-coloured steeds, which he has received from Soma Deva himself. He was born in the Kuru city of Udayendu. Blessed with the brilliance of a thousand moons he came to be called Sutasoma because he also had won great renown in an assembly of the Somakas. Horses of the colour of sala flowers or of the morning sun bear Nakula's praiseworthy son Satanika. Horses of the hue of the peacock's neck, in trappings of gold, carry Draupadi's son by Bhima, the Naravyaghra Srutakarman, her son Srutakirti, who like Arjuna is an ocean of learning, uses marvellous steeds coloured like kingfisher.

The youthful Abhimanyu, who is regarded as one and a half times superior to Krishna or Arjuna in battle, has tawny horses yoked. Horses of gigantic size bear Yuyutsu, the only son of Dhritarashtra who, abandoning his brothers, fights for the Pandavas, into battle. Plump and well-decked horses of the colour of the dried paddy stalk, bear the most energetic Vardhakshemi into the terrible battle while the youthful Sauchitti has obedient horses with black legs, fitted with golden breastplates. Srenimat has well-broken horses, their skins like red silk, whose backs are covered with golden armour and drawn with chains of gold.

Satyadhriti, accomplished in the astra shastra and in the divine Vedas, yokes red horses. Steeds coloured like pigeons draw the ratha of Dhrishtadyumna, senapati of the Pandava army, who always views Drona as his victim by fate. He follows Satyadhriti, the irresistible Sauchitti, Srenimat, Vasudana and Vibhu, son of the Kasi king. They have thought-swift steeds of the best Kamboja breed adorned with chains of gold. Each resembles Yama or Vaisravana as they take the field, striking fear into the hearts of the enemy soldiers.

Six thousand Prabhadrakas of the Kamboja country, with exceptional steeds of different colours yoked to their gold-decked chariots, and resolved to die together, ride into battle, their bows always stretched and loosing tirades of arrows at their enemies, making them tremble. Exceptional warhorses, the shade of tawny silk, decked with shining chains of gold, heartily bear Chekitana into battle.

Arjuna's uncle Purujit, also called Kuntibhoja, has extraordinary rainbow-coloured horses. Steeds the colour of the star-spangled firmament draw king Rochamana's ratha, while stallions the colour of red deer, with white streaks on their bodies, are yoked to the chariot of the Panchala prince Singhasena, son of Gopati.

That tiger among the Panchalas called Janamejaya, has sturdy horses of the hue of mustard flowers. Fleet, massive and dark blue, with golden chains, their backs the colour of curd and faces that of the Moon, are the animals of Drupada himself, which bring him storming into battle. Fearless red steeds with striking white heads, their splendour like that of the sky or the lotus, are Dandadhara's. Vyaghradatta has light brown horses with mouse-coloured backs and their necks proudly drawn up. The Purushavyaghra Sudhanwan, prince of Panchala, yokes dark-spotted horses.

Chitrayudha drives fiercely mettlesome horses of the bright colour of Indragopakas, with variegated patches, and they resemble Indra's very Vajra; while Sukshatra, the son of the king of the Kosalas' horses, draped in golden chains, have bellies the colour of the chakravaka. Stunning tall beasts of many colours and giant bodies, yet exceedingly docile, and draped with chains of gold, fetch the seasoned Satyadhriti to the fight; Sukla's standard, armour, bow and horses are all white.

Magnificent steeds born on the sea-coast and white as the moon, are yoked by Samudrasena's son Chandrasena of burning tejas, while Saiba rides an exotic chariot drawn by horses of the complexion of the blue lotus, lavishly adorned with golden ornaments and bright garlands of flowers. The inexorable Rathasena has superior steeds the colour of kalaya flowers with white and red streaks, while white horses carry that bravest of men Chitrayudha, king who slew the Patachcharas. His chariot is also drawn by other pedigreed horses red as kinsuka flowers, and Chitrayudha himself wears beautiful garlands and wears striking armour, bears diverse marvellous weapons and flies a majestic standard.

King Nila comes to battle with standard, armour, bow, banner and horses all the same colour—blue.

Chitra's chariot-fence, standard and bow are bejewelled and his horses and banner remarkable. Grand steeds of the colour of the lotus carry Hemavarna, the son of Rochamana, into the fight, while bold, strong stallions, which can haul a heavy load of weapons, whose backs are the colour of reeds, and their testicles white as the hen's egg, pull Dandaketu's ratha.

Chargers like the moon's rays wearing kavacha set with stones of lapis lazuli draw the chariot of the mighty Sarangadhwaja, king of the Pandyas, and he advances upon Drona, stretching his tremendous bow into a circle. Krishna had killed his father in battle; his country had been invaded and his kinsmen had fled. Prince Sarangadhwaja learnt and acquired the devastras from Bhishma, Drona, Rama and Kripa, and became the equal of Rukmi, Karna, Arjuna and Krishna in battle. He then wanted to destroy Dwaraka and to subjugate the whole world. Wise friends counselled him against this reckless course. Having given up all thoughts of revenge, he now rules his own dominions. Horses all the colour of the atrusa flower carry a hundred and forty thousand principle mama-rathas that follow Sarangadhwaja into battle.

Chargers of diverse colours and many different kinds of troops follow the heroic Ghatotkacha. Enormous steeds of the Aratta breed are yoked to the golden ratha of Mahabaho Brihanta of the red eyes, prince, who flouted the counsel of all the Bharatas, and singly, from his reverence for Yudhishtira, went over to him, abandoning all his most cherished hopes and desires.

Yudhishtira Dharmaraja yokes the most exceptional steeds shining like gold.

Bhimasena leads a large contingent of Prabhadrakas with horses of various colours, all flying standards of gold and ready to battle with their very lives. Rajan, that force of Bhima's truly resembles the celestial army of Swargavasis, with Indra at their head. This assembled host pleases Dhrishtadyumna no end.

Yet, Drona surpasses all these warriors in splendour. His standard with a black deerskin and the beautiful kamandalu waving in the wind is the most striking. Bhimasena's standard, with the device of a great lion emblazoned in silver, its eyes of lapis lazuli, is also splendid. Yudhishtira's standard of great tejas bears the device of a golden moon with planets around it; it, too, is marvellous. Two large and exquisite kettledrums, called Nanda and Upananda, are fastened to it. Played upon by a yantra, these create wonderful music that delights all who hear it.

We see the tall and fierce standard of Nakula, which strikes terror into the enemy, for it bears the emblem of a golden-backed Sarabha. A graceful silver swan graces Sahadeva's banner, with bells upon; it is somehow terrible, as well, and brings grief to the enemy. The pennants of the five sons of Draupadi bear the marvellous images of Dharma, Maruta, Sakra and the twin Aswins. On youthful Abhimanyu's chariot is a gorgeous flag with a peacock, bright as molten gold. On Ghatotkacha's banner is a vulture which shines brilliantly and his horses can go anywhere at will, like those of Ravana in old days.

In Yudhishtira's hands is the celestial bow Mahendra; Bhimasena has the Vayavya; Phalguni wields the Brahmaa which was created to protect the three worlds; Nakula grasps the Vaishnava, and Sahadeva the Aswina. In Ghatotkacha's hand is the terrible Paulastya.

The jewels among weapons wielded by the five sons of Draupadi are the Raudra, the Agneya, the Kauverya, the Yamya and the Girisa. The great bow called the Raudra, which Rohini's son Baladeva had, he later gave to the noble son of Subhadra, being delighted with Abhimanyu.

We see these and many other standards decked with gold flying on Kurukshetra, all of which belong to brave warriors, all of which strike their enemies with dread. The host that Drona commands does not have a single faint-hearted man in its ranks. Its countless standards flying high together seem to obscure the sky, looking like magic images in a painting. As is the custom, we hear the brave warriors announce their names and lineage as they charge Drona in battle.

Then the royal Drupada takes the field against him at the head of a mighty akshauhini and their encounter is terrible, like that between two aged and mighty tuskers, the leaders of their herds, and yet in musth. Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, with their troops, encounter Virata, the Matsya king at the head of his forces, as Indra and Agni did the Asura Bali in days of yore. The dread contention between the Matsyas and the Kekayas, in which horses, maharathas and elephants fight so savagely, is like the Devasura yuddha of older days. Bhutakarman, also called Sabhapati, keeps away from Drona. However, Nakula's son Satanika attacks this Bhutakarman and with three broad-headed shafts, sharper than razors, hews off both that Kshatriya's arms and then his head.

Vivimsati intercepts the heroic and mighty Sutasoma as he advances towards Drona, spraying him with arrows. Inspired in wrath, Sutasoma drills his uncle with a clutch of line-straight barbs and, cased in mail, stands ready for a duel. Duryodhana's brother Bhimaratha looses six shafts of solid iron at the other Salwa, not the uncle of Madri's twins, and sends him straight to Yama, along with his horses and charioteer.

Chitrasena's son, Rajan, closes with your grandson Srutakarman as Srutakarman rides into battle with horses that are coloured like peacocks. These two grandsons of yours, both invincible in battle, and each determined to kill the other, fight vigorously, each one for his grandsire. Seeing Prativindhya in the van of the thick and heady fray, Aswatthaman attacks him wildly—for the honour of his father. The infuriated Prativindhya looses a rash of arrows, drawing blood from Aswatthaman who flies a lion's tail upon his standard.

Srutakirti, Draupadi's eldest son by Arjuna, sprays Drona's son with his barbs, like a farmer scattering seeds in the sowing season. The son of Dusasana bars the way of maharatha Srutakirti as Draupadi's prince flashes towards Drona. Srutakirti, however, who is equal to Arjuna himself, breaks Dusasana's son's bow in his hands, lacerates his standard and charioteer with three keen wedge-headed missiles, and charges on towards Drona.

Duryodhana's son Lakshmana stands firm against the slayer of the Patachcharas, whom both the armies regard as the bravest of the brave. Srutakirti, however, destroys both Lakshmana's bow and the standard and drawing blood-flowers from his enemy with great swiftness of hand, flares up in splendour. The wise and youthful Vikarna rounds on Sikhandin, son of Drupada, who greets Vikarna with a hot burst of arrows. The mighty Vikarna stands firm against this onslaught and is glorious on darkling Kurukshetra.

Angada confronts the heroic Uttamaujas as that Panchala prince dashes at Drona. Ferocious is the encounter between those two Naravyaghras and it infuses their troops with zeal. The mighty Durmukha covers the valiant Purujit with sizzling arrows as Durmukha also rides towards Drona. Purujit strikes Durmukha between his eyes with a long and slim shaft, so Durmukha's face resembles a lotus on its stalk!

Karna faces the five Kekaya brothers who fly red standards and course at Drona; he burns them with scorching volleys. Scathed by Karna's majestic archery, the five brothers respond with fire of their own, and a running battle erupts. Engulfed by arrows, neither Karna nor the five brothers can be seen, nor their horses, chariots, charioteers and standards.

Your sons Durjaya, Jaya and Vijaya set upon Nila, and the king of the Kasis and Jayatsena; intense is the encounter between these and it enthralls those who watch; it is as if they saw a fight between a lion, a tiger and a wolf, on the one side, and a bear, a buffalo and a bull on the other! The brothers Kshemadhurti and Brihanta harry Satyaki as the Satwata flies at Drona. The battle between these two and Satyaki is breathtaking, like one between a lion and two mighty elephants in musth, in a dim forest.

The king of the Chedis, aflame, kills hundreds of men with wrathful volleys; Ambashta, always delighted by bloody battle, keeps him far from Drona. Ambashta then strikes his antagonist with a long, long arrow that plunges into his very entrails and fells him from his chariot, the bow and arrow loosened from his grasp.

The noble Kripa, son of Saradwata, holds up Vardhakshemi of the Vrishnis, who is fury incarnate on the field, with a storm of short, thick shafts. Those who watch this duel stand riveted; they cannot tear their gazes away from the tremendous contest.

Somadatta's son, fighting of Drona, challenges the vital king Manimat. Manimat breaks his bowstring, flagstaff and sovereign parasol, so they fall out of his chariot. The son of Somadatta, who flies a yupastamba, device of the sacrificial stake, on his banner, leaps down from his ratha and with his great curved sword hacks down his adversary, along with his horses, charioteer, and carves his chariot into shards. Climbing back onto his own ratha, taking up another bow and his horses' reins himself, he begins, Rajan, to consume the Pandava host.

Vrishasena, the gifted son of Karna, looses a thick flock of arrows at the Pandava king, who is rushing into battle like Indra himself after the Asuras. With gadas, spiked cudgels, swords, stones, thick clubs, mallets, discs, short arrows, battle-axes, occult storms of dust and wind, fire and water, ashes, bricks, straw and trees, does Ghatotkacha fall on your forces, smiting and shattering—altogether terrifying as he lets rills of blood flow, also on his careen towards Drona. The fell Rakshasa Alambusha bars Ghatotkacha's way with a myriad of weapons common and strange. The battle between those fiercest and greatest of Rakshasas resembles the one between the Asura Sambara and Indra of long ago.

Thus, with your blessings, O king, hundreds of fervid single battles blaze between the maharathas, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers of your army and theirs in the midst of the dreadful general engagement. Such is the battle, at whose eye is Drona, so bloody and so brutal, that none like it has ever been seen or heard of before. Indeed, O lord, numberless are the pitched encounters that burn across all parts of the field, some of them vile and horrible, some inspired and even beautiful, and some just so fierce.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'When the troops in separate akshauhinis are thus ferociously engaged, how does Arjuna fight my army, how does he battle the maharathas of the Samsaptakas? And how, O Sanjaya, do the Samsaptakas face Arjuna?'

Sanjaya says, 'As the battle swells all around, your son Duryodhana himself leads his elephant division against Bhimasena. Like one elephant encountering another, like a bull meeting a bull, Bhima, challenged by Suyodhana himself, falls gleefully on the Kauravas' elephant legion. With gales of arrows, awesome Bhima brings bloody havoc to the great beasts of war, big as hills, with blood and ichor trickling from every part of their bodies. Single-handedly, and like a terrific wind scattering clouds massed in it path, Bhima savages the elephant host and the beasts left alive turn tail and flee from him in terror. Bhima is as magnificent as the risen Sun striking everything in the world with his rays swifter than thoughts. Struck by Bhima's bolts of thunder and lightning, the looming, lumbering beasts, bathed in blood, look like cloud masses in the sky painted upon by red rays of the sun.

Duryodhana, livid, looses a wrath of shining arrows at Vayu's son, his detested cousin who mows down his much-vaunted elephant force so joyfully, so disdainfully. He draws blood from Bhima whom, more than any other, Duryodhana would love to kill. Bhima's eyes turn red as plums and he unleashes a lucific volley at your son, whom he hates as much as he is hated by the Kaurava king. Pierced all over by Bhima's manic shafts, stricken with his cousin's warm barbs, but outwardly cool and grinning mockingly, Duryodhana responds with a brace of arrows bright and hot as the sun, piercing Bhima deep.

In a flash Bhima breaks Duryodhana's bow with two flat-headed shafts; he cuts down your son's black banner with the device of the jewelled elephant, unnerving Duryodhana with his ferocity. Seeing Duryodhana violently set upon by Bhima, the king of the Angas quickly thunders up on his loudly trumpeting elephant to rescue your son. Turning on the Anga, Bhimasena shoots a long arrow deep into that great grey beast's head, directly between its temples. The elongated barb drives right through the mastodon's head in a scarlet eruption and plunges into the earth beyond the beast. With an echoing bellow Anga's elephant falls like a hill riven by thunder, and the Mleccha king falls with it. Quicksilver for all his bulk, Vrikodara cuts Anga's head from his neck before that king's body strikes the ground.

When the heroic king of the Angas falls, his akshauhinis panic and flee in all directions. The fleeing chargers, elephants, chariot-warriors trample and run over their own foot-soldiers.

Then the king of the Pragjyotishas, Bhagadatta, riding his elephant, comes to challenge Bhima. Its eyes rolling in rage, it raises its trunk and forelegs and crashes them down on Bhima blazing like a dread fire on Kurukshetra. The great beast pulverises Bhima's chariot and crushes his horses into bloody pulp. Bhima, who has leapt out of his ratha just in time, does not flee but runs under that towering animal's belly. For Bhima knows the Anjalikabedha, the science of fighting the war elephant on foot.

From below Bhima repeatedly strikes Bhagadatta's elephant Supratika with thunderous blows of his mighty fists. The elephant turns and twists in frenzy, desperate to find Bhima and impale him on its tusks. But Vayu's son was born with the strength of ten thousand elephants and he seizes the great pachyderm and begins to whirl it around as potter does his wheel. Having dealt many staggering blows to that colossus, Bhima once more darts out from under its body and stands facing the beast. In a blink, Supratika seizes Bhima in his trunk, by his throat, and lifting him high dashes him down on the ground.

Twisting the elephant's trunk viciously, Bhima frees himself in trice and again gets under the body of the massive creature. Meanwhile, an elephant from the Pandava's side thunders up to face Supratika and now Bhima escapes, running quick as the wind! So swiftly does he go, that believing him dead, a dismal cry goes up from the Pandava army, 'The elephant has killed Bhima!'

Affrighted by the elephant Supratika, the Pandava host breaks and runs, back to a living, waiting Bhima. Meanwhile, Yudhishtira thinks that Bhima has been killed and in fury, riding with the Panchalas, he surrounds Bhagadatta with countless chariots, covering him in gales of vengeful arrows. But Bhagadatta, king of the mountains, strikes aside those arrow showers with his iron goad. Then falling like a natural disaster on the Pandavas and Panchalas, he tramples their legions with his terrible, hulking beast. Rajan, it is wonderful to watch—Bhagadatta and Supratika rampaging among the enemy, crushing them on every side.

The king of Dasarnas, mounted himself on a swift elephant, its temples too rent and the juice of mad musth streaming down, storms at Bhagadatta, attacking him from a flank. The battle that erupts between those two beasts of awful size is as the mythic one of old between two winged mountains covered with forests. Bhagadatta's elephant wheels around in a flash and, with tusks like streaks of lightning, rakes the Dasarna king's animal, tearing open its flank, killing it instantly. Even as that beast totters and falls, Bhagadatta kills the Dasarna king with seven lances cast in the blink of an eye, and bright as sunrays.

Yudhishtira once more surrounds Bhagadatta with a number of chariots, and makes his body a home for countless arrows. Ah, Bhagadatta seated lordly on Supratika, surrounded by the Pandava maharathas, blazes like a fire on a mountaintop, in a dense forest. He stays fearlessly in the midst of these serried rathas ridden by fierce archers, all of whom rain arrows at him.

The king of the Pragjyotishas presses down on his beast's back, hard with his great toe, urging Supratika to thunder down on Satyaki's chariot. The prodigious beast seizes Satyaki's ratha with his trunk and hurls it like a toy through the air so it shatters on the ground some distance away. Satyaki, however, jumps off in time and escapes. His charioteer, also, abandons the great Sindhu steeds yoked to his chariot and quickly follows his warrior.

Meanwhile, Supratika easily breaks out from the encirclement of Pandava and Panchala chariots, and brings mayhem to the Kshatriyas that stand in his dreadful way. Terrified out of their wits by that singular mastodon attacking them, those bulls among men look up at it in awe as if it has multiplied into a hundred great elephants, why, a thousand. From that indomitable animal's back Bhagadatta razes the Pandava army, even like the king of the Devas mounted on Airavata mowing down the Danavas in ancient times.

Their own elephants trumpeting shrilly and their horses whinnying awfully in fright and panic, the Panchalas flee in all directions. All the while Bhagadatta destroys the Pandava troops. And then wrathful Bhima rushes at the king of the Pragjyotishas. But Supratika terrifies Bhima's horses by spraying thick streams of water over them and the animals bolt from the field with a helpless Bhimasena.

Now Kriti's son, Ruchiparvan, rides at Bhagadatta, spewing arrows like Death himself. The handsome and magnificent Bhagadatta of the mountains shoots just a single shaft and sends Ruchiparvan to Yamaloka.

Upon the fall of the brave Ruchiparvan, Subhadra's son, the sons of Draupadi, Chekitana, Dhrishtaketu and Yuyutsu turn their attention to killing the elephant Supratika. With loud roars, they loose downpours of arrows on the colossal beast, like clouds drenching the earth with rain. Goaded by the masterful Bhagadatta, with heel, hook and toe, with trunk outstretched and eyes fixed and glittering, Supratika thunders at the enemy. Stamping down Yuyutsu's horses, the elephant kills his charioteer as well; Yuyutsu has to abandon his chariot and flee.

The Pandava warriors continue their combined assault on Supratika, prince of all elephants, inundating him with ceaseless volleys of deadly fire. And now, your son, incensed Duryodhana, wildly attacks Abhimanyu in his chariot.

Bhagadatta on his elephant, loosing arrows in tornadoes over the enemy, is radiant like the Sun himself covering the earth with his rays. Abhimanyu strikes Supratika with a dozen shafts Yuyutsu with ten, and each of the sons of Draupadi and Dhrishtaketu with three feral barbs. Bleeding from these missiles, the grand elephant looks magnificent like a mighty thunderhead wounded by the Sun's rays, bleeding. Impervious to his wounds, Supratika charges ahead tossing enemy warriors, their chariots and horses, around like straws in his mighty path.

Like a cowherd belabouring his cattle in the forest with his staff, Bhagadatta repeatedly strikes the Pandava host. Like the frenzied cawing of scattering crows attacked by hawks, we hear a loud and raucous din among the Pandava troops as they run from the savage elephant and his rider. Prodded repeatedly by Bhagadatta's sharp hook, Rajan, that prince of elephants resembles, an ancient winged mountain; and Supratika fills his enemies' hearts with naked fear, akin to merchants fearful at the sight of a swollen surging sea. As they flee, the elephants, maharathas, horses and kings of the Pandavas, create a resounding commotion, an echoing clamour that fills earth, sky, heaven and all the directions. Mounted on that greatest of elephants, Bhagadatta cleaves the hostile army like the Asura Virochana, who ripped through the celestial host though it was well protected by the Devas.

A violent wind begins to blow; a thick cloud of dust covers the sky and the troops and always the enemy sees that single elephant as multiplied into many, and stampeding murderous across all Kurukshetra.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'You asked me about the feats of Arjuna in battle. Listen, O Mahabaho to what Partha achieves in the fight. When he sees the rising pall of dust and hears the wail of the troops when Bhagadatta buffets them like a bloody tempest having sway over all the war, Arjuna says to Krishna, "O Madhusudana, it seems that the king of the Pragjyotishas has come to the field on his elephant. This din that we hear must be from his advent. He fights from elephant-back and stamps on all that come in his way. He is no less than Indra himself in battle, why, I believe he is the greatest of all elephant-warriors in the world.

His elephant Supratika, again, has no rival in war. He is amazingly nimble for all his massive bulk; he knows no fatigue, and is impervious to all weapons. Not even fire burns Supratika; by himself, he can destroy the entire Pandava army today. Other than the two of us, no one else can check this giant from the mountains.

Krishna, turn our horses towards Bhagadatta. He is arrogant because of his elephant's strength, and proud of his age. This very day I will send him to be a guest in the halls of Indra."

Krishna turns his chariot to where Bhagadatta continues to devastate the Pandava forces. While Arjuna is riding at Bhagadatta, the mighty Samsaptaka maharathas, numbering fourteen thousand, of which ten thousand are Goals or Narayanas, who once followed Krishna, return to the field and summon him to battle. Seeing the Pandava host broken by Bhagadatta, and challenged on the other hand by the Samsaptakas, Arjuna finds himself in a quandary. He asks himself, "Should I return to fight the Samsaptakas or ride to help Yudhishtira?"

Reflecting on this for a moment, O Kurupravira, Arjuna decides that he would devote himself to extirpating the Samsaptakas.

Wanting only to kill as many maharathas as possible—in their thousands—flying his banner with the image of Hanuman, greatest of Vanaras, Arjuna suddenly turns back. This is exactly as both Duryodhana and Karna had planned. Arjuna's heart wavers for a time, but finally he resolves to face the Samsaptakas and he appears to serve his enemies' purpose.

The excited Samsaptaka maharathas greet Arjuna's return with extravagant salvos, thousands of missiles loosed all together in a moment, shrouding him entirely with a dense locust swarm of arrows so one can no longer see Kunti's son, Krishna, their horses or their shining chariot. So sudden and overwhelming is the onslaught that Krishna briefly breaks into a profuse sweat and even swoons; at least he appears to! Now Arjuna is compelled to summon the Brahmastra and loose it at his enemies. In an apocalyptic flash, with a sound as if the earth broke in two, that astra of the Creator obliterates almost the entire Samsaptaka force in a moment. Thousands of arms with bows, arrows and bowstrings in their grasp, cut clean from their trunks, and thousands of standards, steeds, charioteers and maharathas, fall in the blinding flash of that astra. Elephants big as forested hills, or cloud masses, fall with muffled peals of thunder, their riders dead.

Arjuna does not pause. Countless elephants fall to his supernatural archery, their fine trappings shredded by the Kiritin's arrows, their housings torn, their riders crushed by them. Partha's flat-headed arrows shear countless arms from their shoulders, their hands still clutching spears and swords, clubs and axes. Heads, also, handsome as the morning sun, the lotus or the moon, severed cleanly by Arjuna roll onto the earth. While Phalguni in rage razes the Samsaptakas with storms of diverse missiles, the enemy host seems to be alight. Seeing great Dhananjaya crush the Samsaptaka legion like an elephant trampling some lotus-stalks, all men, why, all creatures applaud him, saying, "Uttamam! Wonderful!"

Krishna marvels seeing Partha's feat which is no less that those of Vasava himself. Indeed Madhava folds his hands to Arjuna and says, "Truly, Partha, I believe that not Sakra, Yama or Kubera can do what you have just done. Ah, in moments you have killed thousands of mighty Samsaptaka warriors."

Having despatched the battling Samsaptakas, Arjuna says to Krishna, "Now let us ride at Bhagadatta.""

"Sanjaya says, 'Krishna turns his white chargers, wearing golden armour and swift as the mind, towards Drona's akshauhini. Even as the Kurusattama courses along toward his brothers beset by Drona, Susarman with his brothers ride after him roaring out a challenge.

The ever-victorious Arjuna says to Krishna, "O you of unfading glory, Susarman and his brothers challenge me again! Towards the north, Drona has broken our army once more. Lord, my heart is full of uncertainty. Shall I kill the Samsaptakas now or save my beleaguered troops from further harm? Which shall I do?"

Without a word, Krishna turns the chariot back towards Susarman, king of the Trigartas. Arjuna stabs Susarman deep with seven visceral shafts and breaks both his bow and standard with two more razor-headed arrows. Never pausing, he sends the Trigarta king's brothers to Yama with another six barbs loosed in the space of a wish. Roaring in shock, Susarman looses a serpentine iron naracha at Arjuna, and casts a thunderbolt of a spear at Krishna. Arjuna cuts both missiles down in flight and with a sizzle of arrows strikes Susarman unconscious in his chariot.

Partha turns back and courses again towards your army, lashing it with his mighty volleys like Vasava pouring down rain. And none among your troops ventures to oppose him. Like a fire consuming bales of straw as he comes, he flares on scorching all the Kaurava maharathas with his flaming missiles. As no living creatures can stand the touch of fire, your troops cannot bear the irresistible Arjuna.

Decimating your legions, Arjuna rides at Bhagadatta, king of the Pragjyotishas, like Garuda swooping down on his prey. Kunti's matchless son grasps the Gandiva in his hands, mighty and mystic bow which protects the Pandavas and is deadly to all enemies. Your son Suyodhana, Rajan, brought destruction down on the race of Kshatriyas when he used deceit in the game of dice to achieve his ends. And now, assailed by Partha, your army shatters like a boat striking a great rock.

The ten thousand archers, all brave and fierce, engage Arjuna and with dauntless hearts those maharathas surround him. Unruffled, mighty Arjuna is upon them like an angry elephant of sixty years in musth among a bed of lotuses; he crushes that legion of your army. Bhagadatta on his elephant charges Arjuna, Naravyaghra, who turns calmly to face him.

Fierce and fervid is the encounter between Arjuna's ratha and Bhagadatta's elephant. These two heroes wheel all over the field, one on his chariot and the other on his elephant. Like the lord Indra from his elephant, looking like a mass of clouds, Bhagadatta rains down arrow showers on Dhananjaya. Intrepid Arjuna fluently cuts all these down in flight before they can reach him. Avoiding Arjuna's fire, the king of the Pragjyotishas now strikes both Partha and Krishna with a veritable cloudburst of arrows, overwhelming them. He prods his Supratika forward to trample the two Krishna in the ratha. Seeing the angry elephant come at them like Death himself, Krishna adroitly maneuvers his chariot out of harm's away, keeping the great beast on his left.

Arjuna has the opportunity to kill both Supratika and Bhagadatta from behind, but always remembering the laws of a dharma yuddha, he has no wish to do this cowardly thing. However, when he sees Supratika wildly slaughtering other elephants and horses, crushing chariots that comes in his way, red rage rises in Arjuna.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'Tell me all, O Sanjaya, what does the wrathful Partha, the son of Pandu, do to Bhagadatta? And what Bhagadatta to the son of Pandu?'

Sanjaya says, 'While Partha and Krishna are engrossed with the king of the Pragjyotishas, all around them saw them as if in the very jaws of death. From his perch on the neck of his elephant, Bhagadatta looses gales of arrows down on the chariot borne Krishnas. Drawing his bow in a circle, He pierces Devaki's son with many golden-winged arrows of black iron. These sizzling bolts of fire pass right through Krishna into the earth.

Arjuna then breaks Bhagadatta's bow and kills the warrior who protects his flank; why, the inspired Dhananjaya seem to toy with the Pragjyotisha king. Bhagadatta hurls fourteen formidable spears, bright as sunrays, at Arjuna, who with dazzling virtuosity cuts each lance into three slivers. With a thick swath of shafts, he neatly disjoints the armour that encases Supratika, and the kavacha clatters to the ground. Bare without his coat of mail, grievously wounded by Arjuna's arrows, Supratika looks like a naked mountain without any cloud cover, with red streams frothing down its sides.

Once more Bhagadatta flings a vicious iron spear at Krishna, lance streaked with gold that Arjuna neatly bisects in flight. Cutting down the mountain king's standard and parasol, quicker than seeing, Arjuna, smiling, strikes him with a beautiful volley of ten shafts, winged with kanka feathers. Pierced deep, roaring, the incensed Bhagadatta casts a flurry of thick spears down on Arjuna's head, knocking down his crown. Arjuna calmly picks up his kirita, sets it back on his head and cries up to the ruler of the Pragjyotishas, "Look well on this world! For you will not see it long."

Bhagadatta's fury mounts; he seizes up another bright bow and unleashes a torment of arrows down on both, Arjuna and Govinda. Partha, quick as the mind, breaks Bhagadatta's bow, rends his quivers, and then strikes him with a rage of seventy-two shafts, piercing him deep, lancing agony through all his limbs. Roaring still more loudly, Bhagadatta invokes the Vaishnava astra into his goad with mantras, and hurls it straight at Arjuna's chest.

But Krishna sways into the path of that fatal weapon and, shielding Arjuna, receives the Vaishnavastra himself. Striking Krishna's breast, the astra turns into a triumphal garland of flowers!

Arjuna bleakly asks Kesava, "Sinless one, you said that you would only guide my chariot and not fight the war! O lotus-eyed one, why do you break your word? Only if I am helpless and cannot resist an enemy or a weapon, should you intervene; not when I am still standing and able. You know that I can subdue all these worlds of the Devas, Asuras and Manushas with my bow and arrows."

Krishna replies, "Listen, O Partha, to this secret and ancient itihasa! I have four forms, eternally engaged in protecting the worlds. Dividing my own Self, I maintain the weal of the worlds. One form of mine stays on the earth and is engaged in tapasya. Another sees the good and the evil deeds in the world. My third form is in this world of men, engaged in karma. My fourth form lies in sleep for a thousand years and, upon awakening, grants exceptional boons to deserving men. Once, the Earth, knowing that the time had come, asked me for a boon for her son Naraka. The boon, Partha, was for the Vaishnavastra for her son, so that the Devas and the Asuras could not kill him. "You must give me this astra, she pleaded.

Hearing her prayer, I gave of old the supreme Vaishnavastra to the Earth's son. I also said at that time, 'O Bhumidevi, this astra will protect Naraka. No one will be able to kill him, and your son will be invincible in all the worlds and vanquish his enemies.'

Saying, 'Tathaastu!' the Devi went away, her wish fulfilled. And so Naraka became invincible and always destroyed his enemies.

It was from Naraka, O Partha, that the lord of the Pragjyotishas received my weapon. There is no one in the entire world, not even Indra and Rudra, who cannot be killed with this weapon. So, it was for your very life that I received it upon myself. I have divested the great Asura of that supreme astra. Now kill your invincible enemy Bhagadatta, enemy of the Devas, even as, for the good of the worlds, I slew the Asura Naraka."

Hearing this, Arjuna suddenly overwhelms Bhagadatta with a solid swath of jagged arrows. In a blur, Arjuna looses a long arrow straight into the brow of Supratika, missile that rives the elephant like thunder splitting a mountain and pierces its body up to its wings, like a snake flashing into an anthill. Bhagadatta repeatedly prods it with his iron goad, but even as a poor man's wife will not obey her lord, Supratika does not obey him. Its limbs paralysed, the great beast's legs buckle and it falls forward, its tusks goring the earth. With a last dreadful bellow, the mighty elephant dies.

Never pausing, Arjuna looses a deathly shaft straight into Bhagadatta's chest, killing the king of the Pragjyotishas in a crimson explosion. His bow and arrows fall from his lifeless hands; loosened from his head, his rich and precious turban falls off his head like a petal from a lotus whose stalk is violently shaken. Bhagadatta himself, decked with golden garlands, falls from his immense beast's back like a flowering kinsuka uprooted from a mountaintop by a terrific gale.

Having killed the king who resembled Indra himself in power, Bhagadatta who was Indra's friend, Indra's son Arjuna now sweeps unobstructed through your army devastating it like a great storm tearing down a forest of trees.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After killing Bhagadatta, who was always Indra's favoured friend and a hero of untold tejas, Arjuna circumambulates the fallen warrior, the Earth's grandson, in solemn pradakshina.

The two sons of the Gandhara king, Sakuni's brothers Vrishaka and Achala, subduers of hostile cities, attack Arjuna feverishly. They ride at him from in front and behind and scourge him with ferocious volleys. Magnificent Arjuna, ablaze after killing Bhagadatta, fairly shreds Vrishaka's horses, charioteer, bow, chatra, standard and chariot. With clouds of arrows and diverse other missiles, Arjuna falls upon the Gandhara army, killing five hundred brave and mighty warriors in moments.

Jumping down from his ruined chariot, its horses dead, Vrishaka swiftly mounts his brother's ratha and takes up another bow. From their single chariot, the Gandhara brothers once more mount a raging attack on Arjuna. They cover him with dark arrow clouds even as Vritra or Bala did Indra in time out of mind. Their aim unerring, the two princes, themselves unhurt, strike Arjuna viciously, tormenting him as the two months of summer do the world.

But then, Rajan, Arjuna kills the two princes, those tigers among men, Vrishaka and Achala, cutting both down as they stand side by side in their chariot—with a single arrow! The splendid brothers, both so alike, both red-eyed, both like lions, both beloved of their kinsmen and their friends, fall onto the earth at the same moment, and lie there, spreading sacred fame all around.

Seeing their heroic uncles cut down by Arjuna, your sons rain a fury of fire down on the Pandava. Sakuni, dark and master sorcerer, sees his brothers die and creates sinister illusions of maya to confound the two Krishnas. Cudgels, iron balls, rocks, sataghnis, darts, gadas, spiked maces, swords, spears, mallets, axes, kampanas, curved scimitars, showers of nails, short clubs, flights of razors, arrows with sharp broad heads, nalikas, calf-tooth tipped shafts, arrows with heads of bone, discs, snake-headed shafts, and diverse other weapons, fall upon Arjuna from everywhere. Donkeys, camels, buffaloes, tigers, lions, deer, leopards, bears, wolves, vultures, monkeys, various reptiles, diverse pisachas and swarms of crows, all ravenous and in frenzy, fly at Arjuna. But Dhananjaya, knower of devastras, greets these occult assailants with mystic weapons of his own; crying out in fear and pain, they either vanish or perish.

Now a turgid darkness appears and covers Arjuna's chariot; from within the gloom, harsh voices rebuke Arjuna. He invokes the Jyotishkastra, which dispels Sakuni's awful night of sorcery. Immediately, cataracts of water rush at Arjuna from every side; he vaporises them with an Adityastra.

Smilingly does Arjuna dispel and destroy the mayic weapons that Sakuni repeatedly creates to assail him. Seeing the ease with which the Pandava negates his most powerful and abstruse spells, fear unmans Sakuni and he flees the duel like some low and vulgar coward, borne by swift horses.

Arjuna, transcendent master of war, puts his unearthly genius on display, and continues to raze the Kaurava forces at will. He is like a mountain that cleaves the very Ganga into two streams, as he faces your legions squarely and massacres your men. One of these panicked streams flows towards Drona and the other, with loud cries, towards Duryodhana.

A thick pall of dust rises and covers all the troops, and we cannot see Arjuna. We only hear the reverberant twanging of the Gandiva, echoing above the blare of conches and the beat of drums and the noise of all the other instruments across the field. Then, on the southern part of the field, a fierce battle breaks out between many great Kuru maharathas and Arjuna. However, I followed Drona.

The various akshauhinis of Yudhishtira's army beset the enemy on every part of the field. Arjuna strikes your son's divisions, O Bhaarata, like the hot wind of summer destroying cloud masses in the sky. Arjuna falls on your legions, loosing clouds of arrows, like Vasava pouring down heavy showers of rain; and there is none in your army who can resist that tiger among men.

Struck by the storm of fear, pain and death that is Partha, your warriors flee, trampling so many of their own as they escape. The arrows Arjuna shoots are fletched with kanka feathers and they pierce every armour, and cover earth and sky like a dire locust swarm. Piercing right through horses, rathikas, elephants and foot-soldiers, the shafts enter the earth like snakes plunging into anthills. Arjuna never shoots twice at any elephant, steed or man; every arrow of his is a killer.

With dead men, elephants and horses lying all around, and echoing with the yowls of dogs and jackals, Kurukshetra presents a strange and horrific sight. Wounded by Arjuna's arrows, fathers abandon sons, friends desert friends and sons leave behind fathers as each one flees for his own life. Struck by Partha's shafts, many warriors abandon the very animals that bear them in war.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'What is our state of mind when my akshauhinis are routed and all of you flee the field? To rally broken and fleeing men, who find nowhere to make a stand, is always difficult. Tell me all about it, O Sanjaya!'

Sanjaya says, 'Although your general ranks are broken, Rajan, many great kshatriyas of the world, who fight Duryodhana's cause and want to keep their honour and fame, still follow Drona. In the dreadful pass, they fearlessly follow their senapati, achieving great feats against the Pandava troops and Yudhishtira within striking distance.

Taking swift advantage of a careless oversight from Bhimasena, Satyaki and Dhrishtadyumna, the Kuru leaders fall upon the Pandava army. The Panchalas exhort their troops, chanting, "Drona, Drona! Death to Drona!"

Your sons, however, roar to all the Kurus, "Let not Drona be killed! Let Drona not die!"

One side crying, "Kill Drona!", "Kill the Brahmana!" and the other, "Don't let Drona be killed!", "Let not Drona be slain!" the Kurus and the Pandavas seem to gamble again, now with Drona as their stake.

Dhrishtadyumna, fire-prince of the Panchalas, rides up to all the Panchala maharathas whom Drona seeks to annihilate. The kali yuga come and the war turned feral, they no longer observe any law of dharma yuddha about which enemy each warrior could fairly choose to fight. The battle is appalling with Kshatriya fighting Kshatriya with bestial cries and roars. But now maharathas wipe out phalanxes of foot-soldiers with astras; chariot-warriors hack down horsemen; great heroes crucify lesser soldiers. A new darkness falls on sacred Kurukshetra; all nobility melts away.

Their enemies cannot make the Pandavas flinch; while the sons of Pandu remember all their sufferings, and make their enemies tremble with fear. Though humble, yet agitated by rage, and in the grip of the naked spirit of revenge, and they fight as men possessed, reckless of their very lives, to kill Drona. They fight heroes of immense energy, making a sport of horrible war, with life the only stake. The two hosts falling on each other resemble elemental iron colliding with pristine adamant.

And not the oldest men can remember hearing of, let alone seeing, a battle as brutal as this. Carnage spreads in a great stain across the earth; weighed down with those two enormous hosts, Bhumi shudders; the bedlam raised by your army and theirs paralyses blood-drenched holy ground, pierces the firmament, and rings even in Devaloka.

Coming upon the Pandava forces in their thousands, Drona is everywhere on the field in his magnificent ratha, mowing the enemy down at his supreme ease and will. Seeing the awesome Brahmana cover Kurukshetra in blood, Dhrishtadyumna, the Pandava senapati, rides himself to contain him. Breathtaking is the duel between Drona and the Panchala prince. Ah, Rajan, I am convinced that it has no equal.

Like a fire, of which his bow is the flame and his arrows the flaring sparks, Nila begins to consume the Kuru ranks like heaps of dry grass. Drona's great son Aswatthaman, who always wanted to fight Nila, cries smilingly to him, "O Nila, what honour do you gain by burning so many common soldiers with your astras? Fight me instead!"

Nila, the brightness of whose face resembles the splendour of a full-blown lotus, instantly looses a ferocious volley at Aswatthaman, whose body is like a bank of lotuses and whose eyes are like lotus-petals. Deeply and suddenly struck by Nila, Drona's son breaks his adversary's bow and cuts down his standard with three broad-headed arrows. Leaping down from his chariot, with a shield and a marvellous sword, Nila rushes at Aswatthaman wanting to pluck his head from his neck like a bird bearing away its prey in its talons. But, instead, in a gory flash, Drona's son severs Nila's handsome head, with its fine hooked nose, and long kundalas. The tall mighty Nila, whose face is bright as the full moon, and his complexion of a lotus, sprawls dead never knowing how he was killed.

Shocked and grief-stricken, the Pandava host trembles when Drona's son kills Nila of blazing tejas. The Pandava maharathas all wonder in some despair, "Ah, how will Arjuna save us when he is far away to the south locked in battle with the remnant of the Samsaptakas and the Narayana force?"""

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhima cannot bear to see the slaughter of his army. He attacks Balhika with sixty wrathful arrows and Karna with ten. Drona wants to kill mighty Bhima and excoriates him with twenty-six shafts of untold violence, which plunge into the very vital organs of Vayu's son like snakes of virulent poison.

Karna strikes Bhima with a dozen shafts, Aswatthaman with seven, and Duryodhana also with six more. Dauntless Bhimasena roars like five lions, and unleashes fifty burning arrows at Drona, ten at Karna, a dozen at Duryodhana, and eight thunderbolts at Drona.

Yudhishtira sees his mighty brother, his favourite brother, beset by a host of enemies who all fight reckless of their lives, in that battle where death is so easy to find; the Dharmaraja despatches a cohort of his own maharathas to Bhima's side. These tejasvin Kshatriyas, led by Nakula and Sahadeva, and others led by Satyaki, fly to Bhima's rescue. Full of battle lust, those bulls among men unitedly storm Drona's legions, protected by so many stalwart bowmen, and they are determined to tear the Acharya's forces apart.

Together now, Bhima and the others fall furiously upon Drona's host. But serene Drona, ablaze, easily checks their surging careen, holding them all at bay. The warriors of your army fight the Pandavas without a thought for their own kingdoms, without fear for their lives.

The war burns on; horsemen encounter horsemen, and maharathas other maharathas; arrows fly against arrows, swords clash against swords, and axes ring against axes. Fiercest is the battle of swords, making a terrible carnage. The elephant legions of both sides collide again in earthshaking thunder. Men plunge head first from elephant back and horseback, countless warriors, while others are struck out of their rathas dismembered by arrow showers everywhere.

In the brutal press, some lose their armour and fall to be crushed by elephants, their handsome bodies and noble heads pulped. Indeed, everywhere elephants stamp on fallen men, grinding them into flat patches of blood, flesh and bone; other great beast impale standing men on flashing tusks and fling their corpses high into the air or tear them apart after laying them on the ground. The dark and wild spirit of war possesses man and beast equally and absolutely.

Other elephants, with arrows protruding from their trunks, range madly across the field, goring and crushing men in their hundreds; while others great beasts continue to stamp fallen warriors, horses and smaller elephants cased in armour of black iron, as if these were mere reeds. Many humble and brave kings, their hour having come, lie in the last sleep on beds of pain, overlaid with vultures' feathers.

Battling from chariots, father slays son; and maddened son, also, attacks his father. The wheels of rathas are broken; banners are torn; regal parasols fall onto the earth. Dragging broken yokes, horses run everywhere. Arms still grasping swords, and heads decked with twinkling ear-rings fall continually in macabre rain. The irresistible elephants haul chariots around, then overturn them and smash them into fragments. Waylaid by elephants, horses and their riders are strewn everywhere, maimed, disfigured past recognition.

Savage pandemonium reigns; the merciless war rages on, the battle from which every shred of mercy and nobility have gone so it seems like a contention of demons.

Oh father! Oh son! Where are you, friend? Wait! Where do you go! Strike! Kill this one!—these cries and roars echo all around, as does the deranged laughter of butchery. The blood of men, horses and elephants mingle and flow together in streams, covering all the filed in scarlet. The brave exult and cowards tremble at the heart of unbridled savagery loosed upon the sacred earth.

Here a Kshatriya gets his chariot-wheel entangled with that of another, and at this intimate proximity, smashes the other's head with his mace. Why the bravest, most seasoned warriors wish for safety where there is none; they drag one another by the hair, and fight with fists, teeth and nails. Here a hero's arm upraised, sword in its hand, is hacked off at the elbow; there another's arm is lopped off at the shoulder, the hand still wielding bow, arrow or hook. Here, one roars a ringing challenge at another; and there, another turns his back on the battle and flees. Here, one cuts another's head from his throat, finding him within reach; while another rushes with loud shouts at an enemy. One soldier is filled with fear at another's roar, while another hews down another, who was a dear friend and is now an enemy.

Somewhere, a bull elephant, big as a hill, his heart pierced with an elongated shaft, falls on the field and lies like an island in a river during the summer. Elsewhere, another elephant, with sweat streaming down its body, like a mountain with rivulets flowing down its breast, also lies on the field, having crushed a glorious maharatha and his horses and charioteer when it fell.

Seeing grave and awesome warriors, masters of war, covered in blood and fighting passionately on, the timid and faint-hearted, are sombre, some even swoon. Darkness of spirit and savagery mantle Kurukshetra, as does the pall of dust raised by the teeming hosts. Suddenly, Dhrishtadyumna roars, This is the time! and plunges forward to assail the most vigorous and heroic enemy warriors. Riding after him the Pandavas themselves strike the Kaurava army like a storm of death and fly towards Drona's chariot like swans towards a lake.

Roars and yells of Seize him! Stand firm! Do not run! Do not fear! Hack them to pieces! echo close to of Drona's ratha above the rest of the tumult.

Drona, Kripa, Karna, Aswatthaman, Jayadratha, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti and Salya, rally to thwart the marauding Pandava Kshatriyas. They draw blood from the Panchalas and the Pandavas; but stirred by dharma and the desire for noble revenge, the attacking warriors ride on at Drona. Then Drona, enraged, looses hundreds of arrows and brings a great carnage to the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Pandavas. We hear the twanging of his bowstring and the slaps of his palms on all sides; and they are like peals of thunder and strike fear into the hearts of all.

Meanwhile, Arjuna, having killed a large number of Samsaptakas, storms up to join battle with Drona who sows death so liberally among the Pandava troops. Arjuna fords many lakes of blood, whose fierce waves and eddies are Drona's arrow gales, and arrives at the heart of the dreadful war. Suddenly he erupts on Drona's troops, Vijaya of measureless fame, Dhananjaya splendid as the Sun, flying wild Hanuman on his shining banner, whose roars terrify his enemies. Having dried up the Samsaptaka ocean with his astras, the third son of Pandu now scathes the Kurus as if he is the very Sun that rises at the end of the Yuga; as if he is like the Fire that appears then to devour all creatures.

Elephant-riders, horsemen and rathikas fall before Arjuna's lucific barrages of arrows, leaking blood onto already wet earth Some utter cries of distress while others set up loud shouts. Some struck by the shafts of Partha fall dead. Arjuna still fights the dharma yuddha—he will not shoot at those who have fallen from their mounts or in their chariots; he does not aim at those who flee the battle; he spares those that are unwilling to fight.

Deprived of their chariots and overawed, almost all the Kauravas run from the filed with piteous cries, and call out to Karna to save them. Hearing their shouts and screams, Karna roars his assurance to the Kuru troops, Do not fear! and he dashes up to confront Arjuna.

Karna, greatest among all the Kaurava maharathas, invokes the Agneyastra and unleashes the weapon of fire at Arjuna. Quicker than sight, Arjuna douses it with an astra of his own, of water. Without a moment's pause he looses another elemental missile at Karna, who as swiftly quells it with another astra. A lofty and dangerous contention of devastras ensues between the two, and each is the other's equal. Then Dhrishtadyumna, Bhima and Satyaki all ride at Karna; each one striking him deep with three long and vicious barbs. Even as he fights his towering duel with Arjuna, Karna, incredibly, breaks the bows in the hands of the other three maharathas, leaving them like snakes without fangs.

They fling deadly lances at him from their chariots, with tigerish roars. The fierce and brilliant javelins hurled by mighty arms fly like snakes at Karna's ratha. Unruffled, lightning swift Karna calmly destroys those lances with three of his own, all the while covering Arjuna with arrows; Karna maharatha gives a great roar. Arjuna drills Karna with seven shafts; he kills Karna's young brother Satrunjaya with another six, and with a wedge-headed barb, strikes off Vipatha's head. Before the eyes of the Dhritarashtras and Karna, Arjuna kills Karna's three brothers.

Bhima leaps down from his ratha, fierce as another Garuda, and hacks down fifteen of Karna's followers with his huge sword. Mounting his chariot again in a trice, seizing up another bow, he strikes Karna with ten arrows and his charioteer and horses with five. Dhrishtadyumna also hefts a sword and a dazzling shield, and kills Charmavarman and Brihadkshatra, king of the Nishadas. Remounting his chariot, swooping up another bow, the Panchala prince strikes Karna with a fusillade of seventy-three arrows, and then gives a shattering roar.

Satyaki, splendid as Indra himself, also takes up a fresh bow, strikes Karna with sixty-four barbs, and he also roars like a pride of lions. In wink he severs Karna's bow in his hands and pierces his arms and chest with three shafts like serpents.

Duryodhana, Drona and Jayadratha rush forward to rescue Karna from the Satyaki-ocean, in which he is about to drown. Hundreds of your foot-soldiers, horses, chariots and elephants swarm to where Karna still terrifies his assailants. Dhrishtadyumna, Bhima, Abhimanyu, Arjuna himself, Nakula and Sahadeva dash to Satyaki's defence. The fevered battle between these archers swells towards some unthinkable crescendo.

All fight without any thought for their lives. Infantry, chariots, cavalry and elephants fight against rathas and footsoldiers, while maharathas engage with elephants and men on foot and horsemen; and rathas and infantrymen confront chariots and elephants. We see horses tilt at horses, elephants thunder at other elephants and foot-soldiers run at foot-soldiers. Thus is the horrific battle fought, marked by great bedlam, and hundreds of noble fighting men and beasts perish every moment, to the delight of the blood-drinking pisachas and carnivores that stalk Kurukshetra with burning eyes. Indeed, every moment the grisly war swells the population of Yama's kingdom.

Men, rathas, horses and elephants destroy each other in vast numbers. Elephants kill elephants and chariot-warriors with weapons raised are slain by other rathikas, horsemen by horsemen, and the massacre of foot-soldiers by other foot-soldiers is ceaseless, ubiquitous. But, also, elephants are killed by rathikas, and magnificent steeds gored or trampled by grey tuskers; horsemen mow down foot-soldiers, and cavalrymen are killed by chariotwarriors—all these against the laws of dharma yuddha, for the kali yuga has indeed dawned darkly on the world. With tongues lolling, teeth and eyes gouged out, with coats of mail and ornaments crushed into the dust, the slaughtered creatures fall in hundreds every moment.

Others who are struck or flung down onto the ground are then trampled into the earth by horses' hooves, by the mighty tread of elephants, and mangled and vivisected by heavy chariots and flying chariot wheels. Ah, how the pisachas, jackal and wild dog packs, the wolves, vultures, crows and other birds and beasts of prey delight in the vigorous, endless butchering—for the feast that will follow.

When men and beasts now beyond all count have been sacrificed to Death's maw yawned wide on Kurukshetra, the survivors bathed in blood take panting pause and look glazed-eyed at each other. The Sun sets in the western hills, and slowly both armies, O Bhaarata, retire to their encampments and tents.'"

ABHIMANYU-VADHA PARVA

"Sanjaya says, 'We look upon your warriors as defeated because the invincible Arjuna first breaks them and then Drona fails to keep his vow to capture the well-protected Yudhishtira. All of them, dusty and with rent coats of mail, cast anxious glances around. With Drona's consent they retire from the battlefield, after their flawless enemies vanquish and humiliate them; and, as they march, they hear everyone praise the countless merits of Arjuna and speak about Krishna's friendship with him. They pass the night like men under a curse, reflecting upon the course of events and in perfect silence.

Next morning, from petulance, wrath and distraught at the success of his enemy, Duryodhana, in the hearing of the troops, says to Drona, "Dvijottama, I have no doubt now that you have marked us as your enemies, that we face such defeat. You did not seize Yudhishtira today, though you had him within reach. No foe can escape you once you have him in your sights, not if the Pandavas, helped by the very gods, protect him. You granted me a boon; but now you do not honour it. The noble never betray the hopes of those devoted to them."

Drona is mortified by Duryodhana's words and, says, "You must not even think this let alone speak thus to me. I have always tried to fulfill your wishes. The three worlds with the Devas, the Asuras, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Nagas and the Rakshasas cannot defeat a force that the diadem-decked Arjuna leads. Where Krishna, the Creator of the universe is, and where Arjuna leads the army, whose might can prevail against them, save the three-eyed Mahadeva's? I vow that today that I will slay a maharatha for you, one of the greatest heroes of the Pandavas. Today I will also form a vyuha that the very Devas cannot penetrate. However, Duryodhana, lure Arjuna away from the battle again, for there is nothing that he does not know or cannot achieve in war."

After this, the Samsaptakas once more challenge Arjuna to battle and draw him away to the southern side of the field. There a battle ensues place between Arjuna and Susarman's forces the likes of which has never been seen or heard of before.

Meanwhile, Rajan, the chakra vyuha that Drona forms, is magnificent, why, even hard to look at, like the sun at his zenith when he scorches everything below. At Yudhishtira's command the dashing, invincible Abhimanyu pierces the otherwise impenetrable circular formation. Once inside he kills thousands of the enemy, fighting like a god, until six great Kaurava maharathas face him together. Finally, Abhimanyu succumbs to Dusasana's son and gives up his life. This fills our side with joy and the Pandavas with black grief. After Abhimanyu dies, we withdraw our troops for the night.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Oh Sanjaya, my heart seems to break in pieces when I hear of youthful Abhimanyu's death. Cruel and savage is Kshatriya dharma that the law-givers have laid down, when brave men, who want sovereignty have no scruples and ruthlessly butcher even a child. Tell me how so many maharathas slay that boy who, though raised in luxury, fights so fearlessly? Tell me how our warriors quell Subhadra's son of immeasurable tejas, who stormed into our chakravyuha.'

Sanjaya says, 'Rajan, I will describe the death of Subhadra's son to you in detail. Listen to how, after breaking into our midst, Abhimanyu wields his weapons even as if he were at play, and how he dismays and routs all the irresistible heroes of your army. Like the denizens of a dense forest fear a forest conflagration, Abhimanyu terrifies all the warriors of your army.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The very devas cannot oppose the five sons of Pandu and Krishna, all maharathas, as their feats in battle show. There never was and never will be another man so blessed as Yudhishtira, in dharma, karma, lineage, intelligence, achievements, fame and prosperity. Devoted to satya and dharma and with his passions under control, because of his worship of the Brahmans and other virtues, Yudhishtira always seeks and enjoys the bliss of Swarga.

We also speak of these three as being equal—the Destroyer himself at the end of the Yuga, Jamadagni's son Parasurama, and Bhimasena on his chariot, Of Arjuna, wielder of the Gandiva, who always fulfills his battle vows, I do see no equal on earth. These six qualities—reverence for elders, keeping his own counsel, humility, self-restraint, a handsome and radiant appearance and bravery—are always present in Nakula. In the knowledge of the shastras, gravity, sweetness of temper, dharma and prowess, the heroic Sahadeva is equal to the Aswins themselves.

Yet all the noble qualities that are in Krishna, and all those that the Pandavas possess, together, can be found together only in Abhimanyu. In resolve, he is equal to Yudhishtira, in conduct to Krishna; in exploits, to Bhimasena of terrible deeds; in comeliness, in skill and in knowledge of shastras, he is the equal of Arjuna, and in humility, he is equal to Sahadeva and Nakula.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'I wish, O Suta, to hear in detail, how the invincible Abhimanyu, the son of Subhadra, is slain on the battlefield.'

Sanjaya continues, 'Be calm, Rajan, and endure your insupportable grief. I will tell you about the death of your young and incomparable kinsman.

The Acharya forms the great circular vyuha, a Chakra, and in it he positions all the kings of our side that are each equal to Indra himself. At the entrance, he stations all the princes of sun like refulgence and who have all sworn to stand by one another. They have standards decked with gold, all of them wear red robes with red ornaments, red banners and are adorned with garlands of gold and wildflowers; they are smeared with sandalwood-paste and other scented liniments.

All the renowned Kaurava archers, numbering ten thousand, face Abhimanyu in a body. They set your handsome grandson Lakshmana at their head and all of them are in consort, are comrades in joy and grief, emulate one another in feats of courage, want to excel one another and are also devoted to one another.

Surrounded by the maharathas Karna, Dusasana and Kripa, Duryodhana stands at the heart of his forces and has a white royal chatra over his head. Fanned with yak tails, he is as resplendent as the king of the Devas. At the head of your army is the senapati, Drona like the rising sun. Immovable as Meru stands the striking Jayadratha, ruler of the Sindhus. At his side and led by Aswatthaman, are your thirty sons, resembling the very gods. Also beside Jayadratha, are these maharathas—the gambler Sakuni, king of Gandhara, Salya and Bhurisravas.

The day's battle begins, fierce, breathtaking, making one's hair stand on end, both sides fighting to the death.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Led by Bhimasena the Pandava forces advance on the invincible chakravyuha created by Bharadwaja's son. All of them are seasoned and skilled warriors, wily and full of battle lust, keened for the fight—Satyaki, Chekitana, Dhrishtadyumna, the son of Prishata, Kuntibhoja of great ability, the mighty Drupada, Abhimanyu, Kshatradharman, the valiant Brihadkshatra, Dhrishtaketu, the ruler of the Chedis, the twin sons of Madri, Ghatotkacha, the powerful Yudhamanyu, the unvanquished Sikhandin, the irresistible Uttamaujas, maharatha Virata, the five sons of Draupadi, the valiant son of Sisupala, the Kaikeyas of terrific energy and the Srinjayas in their thousands. These and others, all master warriors at the head of their forces, charge roaring against Bharadwaja's son Drona.

The heroic Drona, however, coolly checks all of them with a torrid storm of arrows. Like a mighty wave striking an impregnable hill, like the surging sea restrained by its shores, Drona drives them back. The Pandavas and the Srinjayas suffer grim losses and cannot sustain their charge against the prodigious Acharya. Seeing Drona advance in fury, a frantic Yudhishtira thinks of what he can do to arrest the Brahmana warrior. Finally, in despair, Yudhishtira places the intolerable burden on the young shoulders of Abhimanyu.

Yudhishtira, who is not less than Vasudeva himself, and whose tejas is superior to Arjuna's, says to Abhimanyu, "My child, fight today so that when Arjuna returns after killing the Samsaptakas, he will not reprove us. We do not know how to break into the chakravyuha. Only you, Arjuna, Krishna, or Pradyumna can pierce the wheeling circle; there is no fifth. Abhimanyu, child, you must accomplish this thing, you must do this for us; it is your sires, your uncles, and all these troops that ask this boon of you. Take up your weapons and destroy Drona's vyuha before Arjuna returns to rebuke us all!"

Abhimanyu says, "I will breach this most difficult vyuha that Drona has formed and bring victory to my vamsa. My father has taught me how to attack and pierce the chakravyuha. However, he has yet to teach me how to come out of it once I am in, if danger overtakes me."

Yudhishtira says, "Break the vyuha once, O maharatha, and make a passage for us. In battle, you are equal to Arjuna himself. Once you break in the rest of us will follow you and protect you from all sides."

Bhima says, "I will follow you close, and Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, the Panchalas and the Prabhadrakas. Once you make the first breach, we will break the chakravyuha apart, and kill the greatest warriors within it."

Abhimanyu says, "I will break into Drona's impenetrable vyuha, why, like a frenzied insect flying into a flame. Today I will do what will benefit both my father and my mother's vamsas. I will make my mother and my uncles proud. Today, everyone will see the endless carnage that I, a boy by himself bring to the teeming enemy. If anyone who faces me in battle today escapes with his life, I will not call myself the son of Arjuna and Subhadra anymore. If from a single chariot I do not truncate the very race of Kshatriyas into eight slivers, I will no longer regard myself the son of Arjuna!"

Yudhishtira says, "Abhimanyu, child of splendour, glorious Kshatriya, let your strength, O son of Subhadra, increase a thousand fold to break Drona's vyuha protected by Naravyaghras, such great and fierce bowmen, warriors that resemble the Sadhyas, the Rudras, or the Maruts, who are like the Vasus, Agni or Aditya himself in prowess!"

When Yudhishtira says this, Abhimanyu cries to his charioteer, Sumitra, "Fly at Drona's vyuha, sarathy!""

"Sanjaya says, 'Abhimanyu charges headlong at Drona's chakravyuha, roaring to his sarathy, "On! Ride on!"

The charioteer says to Abhimanyu, "Ah, you are blessed with length of days, and heavy is the burden the Pandavas have laid upon you! Think well if you are ready to engage Drona, who is an old master of war and all the great astras. While you have been reared in luxury and are new to war."

Abhimanyu replies with a laugh, "O Suta, who is Drona? What is this vast gathering of Kshatriyas? I will defy Indra himself in battle, riding his Airavata and all the devas with him. I feel no anxiety whatever about all these Kshatriyas, for they do not measure up to even a sixteen part of myself. O son of a Suta, fear will not enter my heart even if my uncle Krishna, conqueror of the universe, Vishnu himself, or my father, Arjuna confronts me in battle."

Disregarding the charioteer's advice, Abhimanyu presses on, crying, "Fly like the wind at Drona's army!"

His heart heavy, the charioteer Sumitra whips Abhimanyu's three-year old horses, caparisoned in gold, with greater speed towards Drona. Seeing him dash at them all the Kauravas led by Drona, advance to meet him, while the Pandavas follow Abhimanyu. Wearing golden armour and flying the device of a karnikara tree, Abhimanyu fearlessly attacks those warriors led by Drona, like a lion-cub a herd of elephants!

The elated warriors begin to strike Abhimanyu while he attempts to pierce their vyuha. For a moment, the disturbance there is like the one in the ocean where the Ganga flows into it. Quickly it grows frenzied and appalling; and then in a flash, under Drona's very eye, Abhimanyu breaks into the chakravyuha.

Legion elephants, cavalry, chariots and infantry surround the young hero and attack him all together. The earth resounds with the noise of diverse musical instruments, with shouts and slaps on arm-pits and roars, with yells and leonine shouts, with exclamations of Stop! Stop! with fierce cries Wait! Fight me! with repeated exclamations of Here! I am the enemy! With trumpeting elephants, with the chiming bells and ornaments, with bursts of laughter and the din of horses' hooves and chariot-wheels, the Kaurava warriors lay into Abhimanyu.

But that tremendous young shura, who knows all the marmas of the body, unleashes a keen hot wind of astras at his enemies, missiles that pierce all their vital organs, scorching the advancing warriors, mowing whole legions down in moments with a myriad of astras, so swiftly reducing them to helplessness. Like insects falling upon a blazing fire, they yet ride and run at Abhimanyu; he cuts off thousands of warriors' weapon-bearing arms and scatters the earth with bodies and limbs, like priests strewing the altar at a sacrifice with blades of Kusa grass.

Some of them wear corselets made of iguana skin, some hold bows and shafts, some swords or shields or iron hooks and reins; some, lances, battle axes, maces, iron balls or spears, some, rapiers, crowbars or axes. Several of them grasp short barbs, spiked maces, darts, or kampanas. Many have goads and prodigious conches; some, bearded darts and kachagrahas; a few wield mallets; several others, all manner of missiles—some nooses, some heavy clubs and some stones and bricks. Their arms are decked with amulets and laved with delightful perfumes and lotions; and with these arms dyed brightly with blood, the field of battle soon presents a startling sight, as if strewn with five-headed snakes slain by Garuda.

Abhimanyu casually scatters countless heads, graced with fine noses, faces and hair, and adorned with ear-rings. Blood flows copiously from these heads, their lips bitten with anger. Wearing gorgeous garlands, crowns, turbans, pearls and gems, and splendid as the sun or the moon, they fall like lotuses severed from their stalks. Fragrant with many perfumes, these heads could speak so pleasantly and eloquently while life was in them.

Abhimanyu destroys well-equipped and ethereal looking chariots, fitted with bamboo poles, with grand pennants flying, and their wonderfully crafted janghas, kuvaras, nemis, dasanas, wheels, standards and footboards. He breaks all the instruments of war they carry; blows away the rich cloths with which they are overlaid, and slays by thousands the warriors riding in them. Mangling everything before him with unearthly archery, rampaging Abhimanyu desiccates elephant-warriors and elephants, shredding their standards, hooks, banners, quivers, coats of mail, girths and neck-ropes blankets, bells, trunks, breaking their tusks; and also razing the foot-soldiers who protect the elephants.

We see so many horses of the Vanayu, the Hilly, the Kamboja and the Balhika breeds, with tails, ears, eyes motionless and fixed, fleet, well-trained, and ridden by accomplished warriors armed with swords and lances, lose everything, even the excellent ornaments on their lush tails. Many lie with tongues lolling out and eyes detached from their sockets, entrails and livers gouged out, the rows of bells that adorn them all ruined while the riders on their backs lie lifeless by their sides. Lying thus all over the battlefield, they delight the pisachas, rakshasas and beasts of prey, the blood-drinkers and flesh-eaters.

With the coats of mail and the other leather armour covering their limbs cut open, they lie in dung they excrete themselves. Thus slaying many great horses of your army, Abhimanyu looks splendent. Achieving the most difficult feats, alone, like the inconceivable Vibhu in days of old, Abhimanyu crushes your vast host of chariots, elephants and cavalry, like the three-eyed Mahadeva of immeasurable power crushing the terrible Asura host. Indeed, Abhimanyu, performs feats his enemies cannot match, mowing down whole divisions of your foot-soldiers everywhere.

Seeing him slaughter your army single-handedly, like Skanda the Deva-senapati did the Asuras, your warriors and sons look around vacantly, dazed. Their mouths are dry; their eyes restless; sweat covers their bodies; and their hair stands on end. Fearing complete defeat, they run for their lives. They call one another by their names and the names of their families, abandon wounded sons, fathers, brothers, kinsmen and relatives by marriage on the field, and try only to escape, goading their horses and elephants to their greatest speed.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Abhimanyu of blinding tejas put his army to flight, an angry Duryodhana takes the field against him. At this, Drona roars to all the Kaurava warriors, "Rescue the king! Look where the valiant Abhimanyu kills anyone he wants at will. Go quickly against him, and bravely protect Duryodhana."

Then many grateful, mighty warriors, who fear for Duryodhana, lay a protective ring around your son. Drona, his son, Kripa, Karna, Kritavarman, Subala's son, Brihadbala, Salya of the Madras, Bhuri, Bhurisravas, Sala, Paurava and Vrishasena loose tirades of arrows at Abhimanyu to keep Duryodhana safe. Abhimanyu attacks the maharathas, their charioteers and the horsemen with thick deluges of arrows, and roars in triumph when he makes them turn back. Hearing him roar like a hungry lion, your warriors, with Drona at their head, cannot stand it. They surround him again with a host of chariots and shoot all kinds of arrows at him.

Abhimanyu not only cuts down all their shafts before they reach him, but wounds your warriors with his own barbs, killing many. Ah, his feat is extraordinary and wonderful to behold. Scathed by his arrows like serpents, they encircle him, desperate to kill him. However, Abhimanyu singly holds off the sea of Kaurava troops, like the continent resisting the surging ocean. None among those Kshatriyas, neither Abhimanyu nor his opponents, turns away from the battle.

In that pitched and awesome encounter between a youth and an army, Duhsaha pierces Abhimanyu with nine shafts; Dusasana strikes him with a dozen; Saradwata's son Kripa, with three; Drona strikes him with seventeen arrows, each one a virulent snake; Vivimsati with seventy; Kritavarman with seven; Brihadbala with eight; Aswatthaman with seven shafts; Bhurisravas shoots him with three barbs; the king of the Madras with six, Sakuni with two, and king Duryodhana with three arrows.

The valiant Abhimanyu, however, dancing on his chariot, wounds each of these warriors with three shafts in return, quicker than seeing. Filled with rage at your sons' attempts to frighten him, he displays his wondrous prowess, inborn and honed with long practice. Borne by his marvellous steeds, fleet like Garuda or the Wind and obedient to their sarathy, he confronts the handsome heir of Asmaka, crying Stop! and strikes him first with ten shafts and then with ten more; he kills his horses and charioteer and cuts off his standard, his two arms, breaks his bow and severs his head; so all these fall to the ground, while Abhimanyu smiles all the while.

After Abhimanyu kills the heroic king of the Asmakas the whole of his fickle army quits the field. Then Karna, Kripa, Drona, Drona's son, the ruler of the Gandharas, Sala, Salya, Bhurisravas, Kratha, Somadatta, Vivimsati, Vrishasena, Sushena, Kundavedhin, Pratardana, Vrindaraka, Lalithya, Prabahu, Dirghalochana, and a livid Duryodhana cover the radiant Pandava prince with their arrows. Struck by the many barbs from these great bowmen, Abhimanyu responds by striking Karna deep with shafts that pierce both his armour and body. One arrow passes right through Karna's kavacha and his body and streaks down into the earth like a snake through an anthill. In agony, mighty Karna trembles like a hill during an earthquake.

Still seething, Abhimanyu kills Sushena, Dirghalochana and Kundavedhin, all in a flash. Meanwhile, Karna recovers and pierces Abhimanyu with twenty-five shafts; and Aswatthaman strikes him with twenty, and Kritavarman with seven. Covered all over with arrows stuck into him, Arjuna's son storms all over the field in rage and your troops see him as Yama with his noose.

He attacks Salya, who happens to be near, with a burn of arrows, and raises loud shouts, frightening your men further. Struck deep in his very vital organs by Abhimanyu, Salya gives a sigh and faints on his chariot's platform. Seeing Salya collapse, all your troops flee like a herd of deer attacked by a lion, even as Drona looks on. And Abhimanyu is resplendent, like a sacrificial fire fed with ghee; and the Pitris, the Devas, Charanas and Siddhas, as well as different beings of the earth sing praises of his heroism and unworldly skill.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'While Abhimanyu devastates our best bowmen, which of my warriors try to check him?'

Sanjaya replies, 'Hear, Rajan, of the superb skill the youthful Abhimanyu displays while putting to rout the chariot-ranks of the Kauravas, which Drona himself leads.

Seeing Abhimanyu's volleys unman Salya, the Madra king's younger brother, filled with fury, rushes at the youthful, incredible prince, raining arrows on him. But Abhimanyu kills his charioteer, cuts down his triple bamboo-pole, smashes his seat on the ratha, his chariot-wheels, his yoke, shafts, quiver and his chariot's floorboard, his banner and every other implement of war with which the chariot is equipped; and he beheads Salya's brother as well. All this happens in the space of a thought, so swiftly that none can discern the prince's movements; they occur in another dimension where time stands still before Abhimanyu's staggering genius. Never knowing how he dies, Salya's brother, great Kshatriya, falls headless onto the ground like a hill uprooted by a tornado. His followers flee in all directions. Witnessing this feat, all men and indeed all creatures, O Bhaarata, cry out Uttamam! Wonderful! in their different tongues.

After Salya’s brother is killed, many of his followers, wanting revenge and armed with diverse weapons, with ringing battle cries proclaiming their families, homelands and names, charge Abhimanyu; some of them on rathas, some on horses, some on elephants, while others run at him on foot. All of them are fierce warriors and they rush the son of Arjuna with the loud hum of arrows, the deep rumble of chariot-wheels, fierce whoops, shouts and yells, roars, twanging bowstrings, and the slaps of their palms, crying, Today you will not escape us alive!

Smiling, down those who wounded him earlier. With wonderful astras, diverse, beautiful and swifter than sight, Abhimanyu the shura fights them almost gently, using astras that he has received from Krishna and Arjuna, just as they would have.

With no thought for the great burden he has assumed, untouched by any fear, he looses his missiles in an endless stream. Such is his speed that no one can see any interval between his bending his bow, aiming and loosing his arrows; from every side, one only sees his vibrating bow drawn in a circle, like a blazing disc of the autumn sun. The twang of his bow and the slap of his palms, O Bhaarata, resound like thunder clouds.

Modest, reverential to his elders, ah, so handsome, yet ferocious and passionate in war, Abhimanyu, out of regard for these hostile heroes, merely skirmishes with them. However, beginning gently, Rajan, he soon grows fierce, like the Sun in autumn after the monsoon. Like the Sun himself blazing forth his rays, his battle rage growing by the moment, Abhimanyu soon unleashes thousands of golden-winged shafts. In the very sight of Drona, he covers the chariot-division of the Kaurava army with diverse astras—the Kshurupra, sharp as razors, the Vatsadantas, with heads like the calf’s tooth, the Vipatha, a long, heavy and inflexible missile, the Naracha Ardhachandrabhai, its head a half-moon, Anjalikas with broad-heads.

Harried unbearably by Abhimanyu your army once more turns its back on the fray and runs.”””

"Dhritarashtra says, 'My heart, O Sanjaya, is agitated by both shame and delight, on hearing how Subhadra's son singly curbs my son's army. Once more tell me in detail about the youthful Abhimanyu's exploits which appear to be so like Skanda's battle of old with the Asura host.'

Sanjaya says, 'I will describe to you the fearful encounter, between the radiant prince fighting alone against countless adversaries. Mounted on his chariot, Abhimanyu, with absolute daring, shoots a thick swarm of shafts at your warriors, parantapas all, full of great valour. Charging them with astounding speed, like a circle of fire, he strikes Drona, Karna, Kripa, Salya, and Drona's son, Kritavarman of the Bhoja vamsa, Brihadbala, Duryodhana, Somadatta, mighty Sakuni and various other kings, princes and their troops. As he rages around slaughtering the enemy with his remarkable weapons, Abhimanyu mahatejasvin seems, O Bhaarata, to be everywhere at once.

Seeing this, your soldiers tremble with fear, Drona, his eyes alight with joy, rides up to Kripa and says to him in Duryodhana's hearing, "There comes the youthful Abhimanyu at the head of the Parthas, enthralling his friends, and king Yudhishtira, Nakula, Sahadeva, Bhimasena, his other kinsmen, and all the rest who watch the battle as spectators, taking no part in it. I do not consider any archer on earth to be Abhimanyu's equal. If he wants, he can destroy this vast army by himself. It seems that for some reason, he does not wish it."

It is as if his words eviscerate your son. Duryodhana's eyes turn red and Drona looks at him with a faint and mocking smile. Duryodhana, his very heart on fire, says to Karna, Balhika, Dusasana, Salya and the other leading maharathas of his army, "The Acharaya of the entire Kshatriya varna, the first among all Brahmagyanis, does not want to kill this son of Arjuna. No one in battle can escape the Acharya with his life, not even the Great Destroyer himself, if Drona fights him as an enemy. What, then, to say of any mortal?

I tell you that Abhimanyu is the son of Arjuna, and Arjuna is the Acharya's beloved sishya. It is for this that Drona protects this youth, for their disciples and their sons are always dear to men of dharma, why, dearer than their own sons! Protected by Drona, the callow son of Arjuna regards himself as valorous. He is only a fool to entertain such a high opinion of himself. Ah, kill this foolish brat without delay!"

Goaded by the Kuru king, the already shamed and incensed warriors charge Abhimanyu all together. Dusasana, in particular, that tiger of the Kurus, assures Duryodhana, "Rajan, I say to you that I will kill this prince before the very eyes of the Pandavas and the Panchalas. I will consume Subhadra's son today, like Rahu swallowing Surya."

Once more addressing the Kuru king loudly, Dusasana says, "When the two vain Krishnas hear that I have killed their precious Abhimanyu, they will quit their lives and leave this world of men. Hearing of their death, the other sons of Pandu and all their friends and kinsmen will not last another day from despair. It is plain to me that if we kill this one Abhimanyu, we will kill all your enemies and victory shall be yours. Wish me well, Rajan, and I will despatch this prince swiftly to his dead sires!"

Saying this, your excited Dusasana gives a shattering roar and charges Abhimanyu, covering him with dark arrows. Abhimanyu retaliates in wrath with twenty-six keen shafts. The battle between Dusasana, who is like an infuriated elephant, and Abhimanyu is wild and savage. Both maharathas, they wheel around each other in circles, one to the left and the other to the right. While, with their panavas, mridangas, dundubhis, krakachas, great anakas, bheris and jharjaras, your army makes deafening din, mingled with deep roars, like the very sea!'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Abhimanyu, lacerated by arrows, says smilingly to Dusasana, "It is my good fortune that I see before me the vain, cruel Kshatriya, who has abandoned dharma and lustily shouts his own praises. In the Kuru sabha, in the hearing of king Dhritarashtra, you humiliated and angered Yudhishtira Dharmaraja with your vile conduct and words. Relying on deceit at the game of dice and Sakuni's skill at cheating, and maddened by low success, you taunted great Bhima repeatedly!

You are about to reap the fruits of your arrogance that you dared anger those illustrious ones. O evil-hearted one, you are about to be punished for all your sins—for stealing what does not belong to you, for your haughty wrathfulness, your hatred of peace, your avarice, your ignorance, your enmity towards your kinsmen, for the injustice and persecution you have meted out to them, for depriving my sires, these fierce bowmen, of their kingdom and for your always vicious nature and temper.

I will punish you with my arrows today, wretched Dusasana, in the sight of your whole army. Today, I will unburden myself of the rage which I carry against you and free myself of the debt I owe the angry Krishna and my father Arjuna, who always looks for an opportunity to punish you. Kaurava, today I will free myself of the debt I owe my uncle Bhima. You will not escape me with your life today, if you do not run away from the battle."

Mahabaho Abhimanyu, razer of his enemies, invokes a shaft endued with the splendour of Yama, Agni or Vayu, an astra that will send Dusasana to the next world. Flashing straight at Dusasana's chest, the arrow strikes his shoulder-joint and plunges into his body up to its very wings. His bow drawn to its fullest stretch, Abhimanyu strikes him with twenty-five arrows more, all like fire. Struck deep and in agony, Dusasana sighs, sits down abruptly in his chariot and faints.

His charioteer swiftly bears him away senseless from the field. At this, the Pandavas, the five sons of Draupadi, Virata, the Panchalas and the Kekayas roar their approval and the elated Pandava troops blow their conches and beat their drums. Seeing Abhimanyu's spectacular feat they laugh aloud in exhilaration, especially to watch the proud and violent Dusasana humbled. The mighty sons of Draupadi, who fly banners with the images of Yama, Maruta, Sakra and the twin Aswins, Satyaki, Chekitana, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandin, the Kekayas, Dhrishtaketu, the Matsyas, Panchalas, the Srinjayas and the Pandavas led by Yudhishtira, are all overjoyed. They dash forward now to pierce Drona's chakravyuha, to shatter it. A dreadful battle breaks out at its rim between all these fierce heroes, all bent on victory.

Duryodhana turns to Karna and says, "Look where valiant Dusasana, who until now burned our enemies like the Sun himself, has succumbed to Abhimanyu. Look where the Pandavas, filled with war lust, come hunting us like a pride of lions to rescue Abhimanyu. Karna, do something!"

Always sensitive to Duryodhana's least concern, Karna is quick to blaze up in anger and lashes the invincible Abhimanyu with stinging torrents of arrows. Now roused, gallant Karna, as if in contempt of his young adversary, also strikes the radiant youth's followers with countless exceptional shafts. But the high-souled Abhimanyu has set his sights on Drona, and he unleashes a flurry of seventy-three arrows at Karna, drawing fonts of blood from that hero.

No maharatha of your army succeeds in obstructing Abhimanyu's charge towards Drona; indeed, Arjuna's son, Indra's grandson, brings havoc to them all, even the greatest of them. But recovering in a moment, great Karna, most honoured of all bowmen, scathes Abhimanyu with hundreds of fiery shafts, consuming the young warrior's most formidable astras; Karna bars Abhimanyu's path to Drona.

He bleeds from Karna's awesome archery, but Abhimanyu, the godlike, feels no twinge of pain! He serenely continues to break many great Kaurava heroes' bows in their hands, and also holds Karna at bay. With serpentine narachas, shot from his bow drawn into a circle, Abhimanyu destroys Karna's royal chatra, cuts slivers from his standard, and grievously hurts his sarathy and horses, ah, smiling all the while.

In froth, Karna picks up another bow and looses five immaculate arrows at Abhimanyu, who receives them fearlessly. In a wink, with a single arrow, the scintillating youth breaks both Karna's bow and flagstaff, so they fall onto the ground. Seeing Karna beset, his younger brother drawing his bow with great force, charges Subhadra's overweening son. The Parthas and their followers raise loud cheers and blow their conches and beat their drums again to celebrate the heroism of the peerless, indomitable Abhimanyu.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Roaring, bow in hand, its string stretched full, Karna's younger brother sets himself between the two illustrious warriors. He pierces invincible Abhimanyu with ten shafts, and his chatra, standard, charioteer and horses, smiling the while. Seeing Abhimanyu, who fights with superhuman prowess even like his father and grandfather, wounded, the warriors of your army are delighted. But with a dazzling smile, Abhimanyu bends his bow and with one winged arrow cuts off his adversary's head and drops it onto the ground.

Seeing his brother defeated and slain like a karnikara tree shaken and flung down by the wind from a mountain top, Karna is stricken. Abhimanyu unleashes such a ferocious volley at him that he has to turn away from the battle; immediately, Abhimanyu attacks the other great bowmen and again demolishes the enemy elephants, cavalry, chariots and infantry. With Karna fleeing the carnage on his swift ratha, the Kaurava vyuha is shattered.

Abhimanyu's shafts shroud the sky like dark locust swarms, Rajan, and one can see nothing. All your warrior flee; other than the lone Jayadratha, king of the Sindhus. Abhimanyu, Purusharishabha, blows his conch and falls on the Bharata host like a burning brand thrown into the midst of dry grass. Gleefully, he begins to consume his enemies, charging at will through the Kaurava host. Piercing deep into their vyuha, he mangles chariots, elephants, horses and men with cataracts of shining arrows; he strews the field with headless trunks and trunkless heads. The Kaurava warriors turn tail, running down their comrades.

Arrows, loosed in an endless downpour, miraculous arrows past counting, annihilate maharathas, elephants and horses. Severed arms, decked with angadas and other golden ornaments, hands cased in leathern gloves, arrows, bows, bodies and heads adorned with chariot-rings and garlands of flowers, lie in their thousands on Kurukshetra. Covered over with upaskaras, adhishthanas, akshas, broken wheels and yokes, in thousands upon thousands, and with arrows, bows, swords, fallen standards, shields everywhere, and with the bodies of slain Kshatriyas, horses and elephants, the battlefield is quickly impassable.

Deafening is the noise the princes make, as they call out to one another while Abhimanyu slaughters them, and cowards quail at it. The din, O lord of the Bharatas, fills all the points of the compass. Abhimanyu tears into the Kaurava troops, cutting down the greatest maharathas, horses and elephants and consuming his enemies truly like a fire in the midst of a heap of dry grass. Past count are the men and beasts he kills; as he dashes everywhere at will through the heart of the Kaurava army. Surrounded by our troops and covered with dust, none of us can catch a glimpse of him as he flies joyfully killing horses, elephants and warriors, with no moment's pause. Corpses fall like rain before dreadful, inexorable Abhimanyu of sixteen summers.

Soon after, we see him flare out of the press, still burning his enemies like the meridian sun. Equal to Vasava himself in war, Abhimanyu in the midst of Duryodhana's army is beyond being merely glorious.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'When Abhimanyu, a mere child in years, raised in luxury's lap, proud of the strength of his arms, a wizard at war, absolutely heroic by nature, the perpetuator of his race, and heedless of his life, pierces the Kaurava army with his chariot yoked to three-years old spirited horses, does any maharatha of Yudhishtira's army follow him?'

Sanjaya says, 'Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Sikhandin, Satyaki, Nakula and Sahadeva, Dhrishtadyumna, Virata, Drupada, Kekaya, Dhrishtaketu, and the Matsya warriors all stream fiercely behind him. Abhimanyu's sires, along with uncles, all maharathas, arrayed in battle order, come thundering in his wake, along the very path that he creates. Seeing them come in fearsome tide, your troops back away from the fight.

It is then that your son-in-law, Jayadratha of the Sindhus, his brief time of glory come, faces the Parthas and all their followers, standing at the fateful moment between them and Abhimanyu, and holding them all at bay! Like a lone elephant appeared in a bloody marsh, Vriddhakshatra's formidable son invokes great devastras to arrest the charge of the Pandavas.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Sanjaya, the burden of Jayadratha must have been heavy, for he faced the angry Pandavas by himself, even as they stormed forward to the rescue of their beloved prince. Surely, his might and heroism are more than wonderful. Tell me about that noble Kshatriya's prowess, and how he accomplishes the incredible feat.

What dana has he given, what libations has he poured onto the sacred fire, what sacrifices has he performed, what tapasya has he undergone, that he now succeeds in holding up all the Parthas single-handed?'

Sanjaya says, 'Once, when Jayadratha tried to abduct Draupadi in the forest, Bhimasena crushed and humiliated him savagely. Utterly shamed, Jayadratha went into a deep forest and performed the most arduous tapasya. He restrained his senses, endured hunger, thirst and heat, and he emaciated his body until his veins stood out like blue snakes through his skin. Chanting the eternal mantras of the Vedas, he worshipped Mahadeva.

Finally, the illustrious Siva, who is always kindly towards his devotees, appeared in a dream and said to Jayadratha, "Ask for the boon you want. I am pleased with you, Jayadratha! What do you wish for?"

Bowing down to the Lord with folded hands, Jayadratha said, "Grant that, alone on a single chariot, I once vanquish all the sons of Pandu together, for all their terrible tejas and prowess."

This, O Bhaarata, was the boon he asked for. Mahadeva said to him, "I grant you your boon. Other than Arjuna, you will one day defeat the other four sons of Pandu in battle."

Jayadratha said to the Devadeva, "Tataasthu!" and awoke, O Rajan, from his sleep.

It was because of that boon and also through the power of his devastras that Jayadratha single-handedly arrests the entire Pandava force. The virile twanging of his bowstring and the slaps of his palms as he looses his missiles fill the enemy Kshatriyas with uncanny fear; and they delight your troops. Seeing Jayadratha's astonishing feat, the emboldened Kshatriyas of your army ride back into battle against Yudhishtira's forces.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'You ask me, Rajan, about the prowess of Jayadratha of the Sindhus. I will describe in detail how he opposes the Pandavas.

Great horses of the Sindhu breed, well-trained, fast as the wind and obedient to the commands of his sarathy, are harnessed to his chariot, which looks like a cloud palace in the sky. His flag that bears the device of a large silver boar is striking to behold. He shines like the moon in the firmament with his white chatra and banners, and he is fanned with yak-tails—all the emblems of sovereignty. Pearls, diamonds, rubies and gold deck his iron chariot rails and it glitters like the starry sky. Drawing his ample bow and shooting a fusillade of missiles, quick as thinking, he blocks the breach that Abhimanyu made in the chakravyuha. He pierces Satyaki with three arrows, Vrikodara with eight, Dhrishtadyumna with sixty, Drupada with five, and Sikhandin with ten.

He then draws blood from the Kaikeyas with twenty-five keen bolts. Jayadratha strikes each of the five sons of Draupadi with three arrows; he wounds Yudhishtira with seventy; pierces the other heroes of the Pandava army with thick showers of shafts: ah, a feat altogether wonderful. Rajan, then with a gleaming arrow, Yudhishtira breaks Jayadratha's bow with a smile. However, in the twinkling of an eye, the Sindhu takes up another bow and pierces Yudhishtira with ten sharp barbs and each of the others with three.

Amazed by Jayadratha's newfound dexterity, Bhima cleaves his bow, and knocks down his standard and royal parasol with three wedge-headed shafts. Jayadratha sweeps up another bow, strings it in a flash and fells Bhima's flag, bow and horses, forcing him to abandon his useless chariot. Bhima leaps onto Satyaki's ratha like a lion bounding onto a mountain. Seeing this, your troops applaud Jayadratha, and shout, "Wonderful! Wonderful!"

Indeed, they and all beings repeatedly applaud the feat of the Sindhu king who, single-handedly, holds all the Pandavas together at bay. Jayadratha bestrides and fills the path that Abhimanyu made for the Pandavas by slaughtering so many warriors and elephants. Indeed, with great effort do the mighty Matsyas, Panchalas, Kaikeyas and the Pandavas themselves manage to draw near Jayadratha; but none of them can subdue him. Jayadratha, using Mahadeva's boon, holds up every one of your enemies who tries to break into Drona's chakravyuha.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Jayadratha, king of the Sindhus, effectively halts the onrush Pandavas and the battle between them is marvellous and dreadful. First, the invincible Abhimanyu breaks into the Kaurava array and shakes it like a makara agitating the ocean. Then the principal warriors of the Kaurava army attack him in turns, each according to his rank and precedence. Fierce and bloody is the contention between these powerful maharathas on the one side and Abhimanyu alone on the other.

Surrounded on all sides by the enemy with massed chariots, the splendid prince kills Vrishasena's sarathy and demolishes his bow. He excoriates Vrishasena's horses with a brace of unerring shafts, and those horses swift as the wind bolt, bearing a helpless Vrishasena from the battle. Abhimanyu's charioteer escapes from the thick melee, whisking his young hero away to another part of the field The numerous maharathas who watch this feat are all filled with admiration and exclaim, "Uttamam! Wonderful!"

Seeing the lion Abhimanyu furiously mowing down the Kauravas like some force of nature, Vasatiya charges him and falls upon him. He pierces Abhimanyu with sixty golden-winged shafts and cries, "As long as I am alive, you will not escape with your life."

Although Vasatiya wears an iron kavacha, Abhimanyu blows his heart apart with a single arrow, and that Kshatriya falls dead out of his chariot. Incensed at this, many bulls among Kshatriyas besiege your grandson all together, Rajan, to try and overpower him. Stretching bows of diverse kinds, they assail him and another fierce battle ensues. A vengeful Abhimanyu shreds their bows and arrows, their limbs, and plucks off their heads decked with ear-rings and crowns of flowers. He lops off their arms adorned with various golden ornaments, which still hold swords, spiked maces and battle-axes in fingers cased in leather gloves.

The earth is strewn with garlands, ornaments, fine cloaks, fallen standards, coats of mail, shields, golden chains, diadems, parasols, yak-tails; with upaskaras, adhishthanas, dandakas, banduras, with crushed akshas, broken wheels, and yokes, numbering thousands; with anukarshas, banners, charioteers, horses; and also with broken chariots and felled elephants. The hallowed field spread over so liberally with slain Kshatriya shuras, rulers of different kingdoms, all come here for victory, presents a fearful sight.

When Abhimanyu angrily rides across Kurukshetra, everywhere at will, his very form becomes invisible. One sees only his coat of mail, glimmering with gold, his ornaments, bow and arrows. Indeed, he razes the enemy like the sun himself in his blazing effulgence, and no one can even look at him so bright is he.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Abhimanyu at war resembles the Destroyer, Rudra himself claiming the lives of all creatures upon the advent of the Pralaya. His prowess like his grandsire Indra's, that prince is magnificent, ineffable! He pierces the enemy ranks like Yama and seizes Satvasravas like an angry tiger seizing a deer. Seeing this, many Maharathas, wielding all kinds of weapons, rush at him, calling out, "I will go first! Let me strike first!"

Just as a whale in the sea catches a shoal of small fish with great ease, so does Abhimanyu consume that whole division of Kshatriyas. Like rivers that never retreat as they approach the sea, none among the charging Kshatriyas draw back when they reach Abhimanyu. That legion reels like a boat tossed on the ocean where a mighty tempest rages, its crew panic-stricken by the violence of the wind.

Great Rukmaratha, son of Salya of the Madras, roars, "Kshatriyas, have no fear! When I am here, what is Abhimanyu? I will take him alive."

Riding his beautiful and well-equipped chariot, Rukmaratha dashes at Abhimanyu and bloodies him with three shafts that whistle into his torso, three into the right arm and three the left. Arjuna's son, however, breaks Rukmaratha's bow, and in a blink cuts off his arms and his head with its beautiful eyes and high-arched brows. Seeing Rukmaratha, who vowed to either kill Abhimanyu or take him alive, die gorily, a hundred of his friends, each one a heroic Kshatriya, flying gold adorned pennants, join the battle. These maharathas, stretching their bows that are full six cubits long, surround Abhimanyu and loose tornadoes of arrows at him.

Seeing him besieged by all those great princes, Duryodhana rejoices and considers Abhimanyu already a guest in Yama's halls. The princes shroud Abhimanyu with dense gusts of golden missiles, making him well nigh invisible. We quickly see Abhimanyu with his standard and his chariot covered over with barbs like a great tree with flights of locusts. His blood flowing, his ire rising, he responds like an elephant goaded with an ankusha.

O Bhaarata, he invokes the Gandharvastra and the illusions it creates. Arjuna received this astra from the Gandharva Tumburu and others through tapasya and yagnas; he gave it to his son. Now unleashing it at his enemies Abhimanyu bewilders them. He is a circle of fire and we see him sometimes as one prince, sometimes as a hundred and sometimes as a thousand. Confounding his massed adversaries with the magic illusions of that weapon, he forges ahead on his ratha and vivisects the enemy kings, sending hosts of spirits soaring into the next world while here their bodies fall onto the ground tike tops that spin no more, many cut into a hundred raw sections. He destroys their bows, horses, charioteers, standards, why, their very legions while time seems to stand still for him. He kills the hundred princes like five-year old mango-trees on the point of bearing fruit, swept down by a tempest.

Seeing Abhimanyu single-handedly massacre all these youthful princes, brought up in every luxury and resembling angry snakes, along with their rathikas, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers, fear and blind rage grip Duryodhana and the shocked Kuru king rushes roaring at Abhimanyu. The incendiary duel between them lasts only a short while, before your son, harried past endurance by the resplendent Abhimanyu, is obliged to turn away from the fight.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'What you tell me, O Suta, about the battle between the lustrous Abhimanyu fighting alone against so many enemies, seems wonderful, why, incredible. However, I do not regard such feats as unbelievable marvels in those who have dharma for their refuge. After Duryodhana is beaten back and a hundred princes are slain, what do the warriors of my army do next against Abhimanyu?'

Sanjaya says, 'Their mouths become dry, their eyes restless; sweat covers their bodies, their hair stand on ends and they are ready to quit the field in despair. Abandoning their wounded brothers, fathers, sons, friends, and kinsmen they flee, urging their horses and elephants to their utmost speed. Seeing them broken and in full flight, Drona, Aswatthaman, Brihadbala, Kripa, Duryodhana, Karna, Kritavarman and Subala's son Sakuni come swarming to quell the invincible Abhimanyu. But your grandson, Rajan, routs all of them and only one warrior, Duryodhana's son, the noble Lakshmana, accomplished tejasvin, fearless now because his is both proud and callow, takes the field against Abhimanyu. Anxious for his son, Duryodhana turns back to follow him, as do other maharathas.

Like dark thunderheads inundating a mountain-breast with rain, all of them lash arrow showers over Abhimanyu. Abhimanyu sweeps over them the dry wind in the sky that blows in every direction scattering cloud masses. Then, like one infuriated elephant fighting another, he engages your grandson, the handsome, brave and strapping Lakshmana, who stands near his father with his bow stretched, like a prince of the Yakshas; Lakshmana who strikes Abhimanyu through his arms and his chest with robust shafts that drink his blood.

Abhimanyu Mahabaho is like a snake beaten with a stick. He cries to Lakshmana, "Look well on this world, for you will soon go to the other one. In front of all your kinsmen, I will dispatch you to Yama's realm."

He looses a broad-headed astra that resembles a snake just emerged from its slough, and dissevers Lakshmana's beautiful head, graced with a strong and noble nose, fine eye-brows and handsome curls, and with sparkling kundalas. Seeing Lakshmana killed, your troops cry out in shock and grief.

Blood leaping into his eyes to see his precious son die, Duryodhana howls long and echoingly truly like some dreadful demon, and screams at his Kshatriyas, Kill him!

Six maharathas—Drona, Kripa, Karna, Aswatthaman, Brihadbala and Kritavarman, son of Hridika, surround Abhimanyu. He drills each of them with his burning arrows, and beats them off like a lion might a pack of dogs. The incandescent son of Arjuna falls upon the vast forces of Jayadratha with redoubled ferocity. With their elephant-division, the Kalingas, the Nishadas and the valiant son of Kratha, all clad in gleaming mail, encircle him and block his way ahead. Another pitched battle breaks out and tameless, invincible Abhimanyu quickly melts those forces; he is at them like a hurricane.

Kratha's son showers him with deadly fire, while many other rathikas led by Drona, who returns to the field, rush at him, discharging their violent fusillades at the meridian prince. Containing their assault with some disdain, Abhimanyu looses a flash flood of arrows at Kratha's son, cutting down all his barbs, breaking his bow, severing his arms and then his head with its golden coronet. Seeing Kratha's noble, mighty and famed son, master of astras, die in the incarnadine blasts of Abhimanyu's unworldly shafts, your other maharathas quickly ride away from this terrible prince of tender years.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'While young and invincible Abhimanyu, who never flees a battle, strikes deep into our vyuha, so effortlessly, and achieves feats more than worthy of his lineage, which of my heroes stand up to him?'

Sanjaya answers, 'Once he breaks into the chakravyuha, Abhimanyu brings bloody mayhem to your forces and all your heroes and the kings that fight for your son turn away from Arjuna's prince, for he fights like a god and they cannot bear him. Then it is that the six maharathas surround him again—Drona, Kripa, Karna, Aswatthaman, Brihadbala and Hridika's son Kritavarman of the Yadavas.

The other warriors harry Yudhishtira, to support Jayadratha who single-handedly holds up the Pandavas, Many powerful Kshatriyas draw their six cubit long bows and shower arrows on him like rain. Abhimanyu paralyses all these great archers. He strikes Drona with fifty arrows, Brihadbala with twenty, Kritavarman with eighty, and Kripa with sixty shafts. Abhimanyu draws his bow into a circle and stabs Aswatthaman with ten gold fledged barbs, and Karna with a keen bright, bearded arrow shot with great force.

Cutting down Kripa's horses and both his Parshni charioteers, mighty Abhimanyu bloodies Kripa's chest with ten searing shafts. In the very sight of your heroic sons, he overwhelms the brave Vrindaraka, the pride of the Kurus. While Arjuna's incredible son mows down your greatest warriors, one after another, Aswatthaman strikes him with twenty-five small and clever barbs. Abhimanyu turns on Drona's son with a sizzling volley and Aswatthaman responds with sixty fierce darts. But Abhimanyu stands immovable as the Mainaka mountain.

Mahatejasvin Abhimanyu looses seventy-three gold-winged shafts in a wink at Aswatthaman so he staggers in his ratha. Drona rides to his son's rescue, striking Abhimanyu with a hundred arrows, while Aswatthaman also pierces him with sixty. From another side, Karna strikes him with twenty-two broad-headed shafts; Kritavarman with fourteen; Brihadbala with fifty and Saradwata's son, Kripa, with ten. Abhimanyu, majestic dancer in his chariot, makes each of them a home for ten missiles from his implacable bow.

Brihadbala, king of the Kosalas, drills a slender barbed shaft into Abhimanyu's chest; in a flash, that superlative prince cuts down his antagonist's horses, standard, bow and charioteer. Brihadbala seizes up a great sword and, leaping down from his ruined chariot, runs at Abhimanyu to hew his head off. With one inexorable shining shaft, Abhimanyu find Brihadbala's heart, and that great Kshatriya falls dead without a sound. Seeing this, ten thousand illustrious Kshatriyas break away from the fray and flee, cursing Duryodhana.

Having killed Brihadbala, Abhimanyu courses around the field, sowing death all around him.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Arjuna's dazzling son again strikes Karna with a heavy barbed bolt, then quick as the mind with fifty more. Now Duryodhana pierces Abhimanyu with a relucent clutch of shafts. Covered all over by now with arrows, Abhimanyu presents a striking appearance; mad with rage, he bathes Karna in blood so that he, too, mangled by that astounding prince's archery, wears a burnished look; and both of them resemble a couple of flowering kinsukas. Without a moment's pause, amazing Abhimanyu kills six of Karna's bravest warriors, with their horses and charioteers, and shatters their chariots.

Fear lays no hand on that luminous sixteen-year-old god among men and, never pausing, he shoots the six maharathas with ten more shafts each. With six unerring barbs, he strikes off the head of the youthful Aswaketu, son of the Magadha king, in the same moment killing his four horses and charioteer; no, never pausing, he despatches the Bhoja prince of Martikavata, whose banner has an elephant emblazoned on it. Roaring like several lions, so the field echoes with his strong and youthful voice, Abhimanyu blows like a desert storm of death on Kurukshetra; like a lion in a cattle pen is he.

Dusasana's son scathes Abhimanyu's horses with four shafts, his sarathy with one and Abhimanyu himself with ten; Abhimanyu plunges two smoking barbs into his enemy's body. Red-eyed, he cries, "Your father has fled battle like a coward. It is well that you are not like him. But you will not escape me alive today."

And Abhimanyu looses a long polished arrow at his enemy, but Drona's son cuts it down from a side with three light-like bolts.

Letting Aswatthama alone, Abhimanyu turns on Salya and shreds his chest with nine fierce barbs, vulture-feathered. The riverine arrows from his uncanny weapon break Salya's bow, kill both his Parshni charioteers, and bloody Salya himself, forcing him to quit his chariot and mount another. Tireless Abhimanyu, unchained, kills five maharathas in a blur—Satrunjaya, Chandraketu, Mahamegba, Suvarchas and Suryabhasa; he strikes Sakuni hard making him lurch in his chariot. Subala's evil son drills Abhimanyu with three barbs and says to Duryodhana, "We must attack him all together, or this boy will kill us all today. Rajan, take counsel with Drona and Kripa and think of how this horrible prince can be killed."

Karna asks Drona, "Abhimanyu crushes us all as he pleases. Tell us how we can stop him."

Drona says to all his maharathas, "You have all seen him close, this magnificent youth. Have you found any weakness in him? He careens everywhere among us all, but have any of us seen the faintest frailty in him? Ah, we can only gaze at the unearthly swiftness of this incomparable young lion, while he slaughters us, and gaze on in wonder.

We see his chariot fly among us like a streak of lightning; we see his bow always drawn in a circle; but so quickly does he aim his arrows and shoot them that it seems time is his servant. Ah, this dreadful son of Subhadra delights me, even while he razes our army, and afflicts my very prana, for he is so entirely wonderful. Our greatest maharathas are flabbergasted and I myself enchanted by the skills of Abhimanyu. Truly, I see no flaw in him, no chink to pierce so we might bring him down.

There is no difference between this youth and his father; if anything his son exceeds Arjuna! Look how he fills all the points of the horizon with his mighty shafts."

Still bleeding from Abhimanyu's arrows, Karna says between clenched teeth, "I am sorely wounded by this boy, and I fight on only because I am a true warrior. I fear that my injuries are grave, for the force of his arrows is like none I have ever known, and I fear my wounds weaken my heart."

The Acharya tells Karna, with a smile, "Abhimanyu is young, his prowess is great. His kavacha is impenetrable because I myself taught his father how to wear his coat of mail. This young parantapa surely knows that subtle science completely. Yet with shafts well shot, you can destroy his bow, bowstring, the reins of his horses, the steeds themselves and his two Parshni charioteers.

O Karna, mighty archer, do this if you can and make him turn his back on the fight; and then strike him from behind. With his bow in hand, the very Devas and the Asuras together cannot conquer Abhimanyu. If you want to kill him, first deprive him of his chariot and divest him of his bow."

Not hesitating a moment, Karna cleaves Abhimanyu's bow in his hands, even as that prince continues to vigorously burn his enemies; Kritavarman of the Bhojas kills his horses and Kripa his two Parshni charioteers. After breaking his bow, the six maharathas fall ruthlessly on the now chariot less youth, unleashing a black storm of arrows at him. Bowless and his chariot useless, but always the pure Kshatriya who never knows fear, Abhimanyu takes up a sword and shield and leaps high into the air. He hangs there, using the arcane Kausika way, going freely through the sky like Garuda, prince of all birds!

With thoughts like He will fall upon my sword! the maharathas, their gazes now turned up, continue to loose their arrows at the suspended prince, always wary of him striking down at them. They draw blood from Arjuna's son turned into the ultimate embodiment of a warrior.

Then, with a perfect shaft, mighty Drona breaks Abhimanyu's sword at its jewelled hilt; at the same moment Karna shatters his shield in shards. Abhimanyu falls from a height but lands unhurt on his feet. Undaunted, with never a thought for his life, he pulls a wheel free from his ratha and holding it aloft, runs roaring at the Acharya.

Ah, this world has hardly ever seen any sight equal to Abhimanyu at that moment, covered in dust, but his body shining so brightly through it, with the chariot-wheel in his hands like Krishna's very Sudarshana, and still full of fierce valour. His clothes dyed red with the blood flowing from his countless wounds, his brow knit and formidable with deep furrows, still roaring like a pride of young lions, lord Abhimanyu of immeasurable tejas, is magnificent, splendid, my king, glorious past telling or imagining on heartless Kurukshetra.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Abhimanyu, the joy of Krishna's sister, Abhimanyu the Atiratha, flaunting his wheel like the Sudarshana, is so beautiful; he is like a second Janardana. With his lambent locks flying in the wind, his body alight, and that strangest weapon, so dazzling now in his hands, the very Devas are blinded by that prince and cannot look at his splendour.

Seeing him with the chariot wheel, the unnerved maharathas tremble and, somehow, all together, cut that wheel into a hundred pieces. Peerless Abhimanyu takes up a great mace and runs at Aswatthaman. Seeing the gada aloft, and looking like Indra's Vajra, Aswatthaman, tiger among men, jumps out of his chariot and runs three loping stride to escape that blazing prince. Abhimanyu, like a flame burning brightest just before it is put out, kills Aswathaman's horses and Parshni charioteers with dreadful strokes of his mace.

Pierced all over with arrows, looking like some ethereal porcupine, he smashes Subala's son Kalikeya's head like a red melon; never stopping, never doubting himself, he fells Kalikeya's seventy-seven Gandhara followers with his supernatural mace. Next, he slaughters ten rathikas of the Brahma-Vasatiya vamsa, and then ten massive elephants! Flying then at Dusasana's son, he smashes his chariot along with its horses and pounds them down into the earth.

The indomitable son of Dusasana takes up his own gada and rushes at Abhimanyu, roaring, Stop! Wait! The cousins, the two young Kshatriyas heroes, begin to swing their maces at each other wildly, landing sickening blows. Both have a single thought; both are a single thought—to kill the other. They fight like the three-eyed Mahadeva and the Asura Andhaka in days of old. Finally, at the same instant, both land thunderous blows on each other and both fall at once onto the earth, like two uprooted yupastambas, sacrificial stakes raised in honour of Indra.

But it has been a day as long as several lives for Arjuna's matchless son. Dusasana's son, enhancer of the fame of the Kurus, is first to rise. Even as Abhimanyu begins to haul himself onto his feet, Dusasana's son swings an awful blow of his mace down squarely on the crown of noble Abhimanyu's head, shattering it. With a soft sigh, Parantapa Abhimanyu, sixteen years old, who has killed so many thousands of your greatest warriors by himself, falls dead on sacred Kurukshetra, the hint of a smile still on his bloody lips.

Thus, Rajan, many join together to finally kill this one hero, who by himself razes a vast portion of your army, like an elephant trampling lotus-stalks in a lake. And as he lies dead on the field, Abhimanyu looks like a wild elephant slain by hunters. Your troops surround the fallen Kshatriya who now resembles a raging summer conflagration extinguished after consuming a whole forest; or like a tempest divested of its fury after devastating mountain crests; like the Sun arriving at the western hills after having consumed the Bharata army; or like Soma swallowed by Rahu; or like the Ocean dried of water.

The maharathas of your army gaze at Abhimanyu whose face still has the splendour of the full moon and whose lashes black as the feathers of the raven made his eyes luminous and beautiful, Abhimanyu now lying prone on the bare earth. They are filled with joy and roar in relief and triumph again and again.

Indeed, Rajan, your troops are in transports of joy, while tears fall fast from the eyes of the Pandava heroes. Seeing Abhimanyu lying on the field of battle, like the moon fallen from the sky, diverse beings of the air lament, "Alas, he who fought alone, like an army himself, lies dead on the battlefield, murdered by six mighty maharathas of the Dhartarashtra army, led by Drona and Karna. This killing was not a deed of dharma."

Upon fall of that transplendent prince among the countless corpses he has strewn her with, the earth looks like the star-filled sky with the moon now among the fainter lights. Bhumi assumes a beautiful aspect, covered with wavelets of blood, scattered with innumerable arrows with wings of gold and spread over with the noble heads of Kshatriyas, wearing ear-rings, variegated turbans of great value, with banners, yak-tails, beautiful cloths, priceless jewel-encrusted weapons, with the bright ornaments of chariots, horses, men, elephants; sharp and well-tempered swords looking like snakes freed from their sloughs, bows, broken arrows, spears, swords, kampanas and all kinds of weapons.

The ground in many places is impassable because of the horses that lie upon her dead or dying, all weltering in blood, with their riders lying near them, felled by Subhadra's son. Kurukshetra wears a grim and terrible aspect, with iron hooks and elephants big as hills, with shields, swords and standards, lying everywhere, all cut down by Abhimanyu. Superb chariots deprived of their horses, charioteers and maharathas lie all around in death's final attitudes, some crushed flat by elephants. Ample corpses of foot-soldiers with diverse weapons lie on the bloody ground and the indescribable sight fills all faint hearts with terror.

Seeing Abhimanyu, splendent as the sun or the moon, fallen on the ground, your troops rejoice, while the Pandavas are grief-stricken. When youthful Abhimanyu of sixteen summers falls, the Pandava legions all flee in shock from the very presence of Yudhishtira. Seeing his army breaking up, Yudhishtira addresses his warriors, "The heroic Abhimanyu was killed without retreating from battle, and he has certainly risen into swarga. So stand and fear not, for we shall yet vanquish our enemies."

Endued with great energy and lustre, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, the best of Kshatriyas, attempts to put heart into his stricken men.

He says, "Arjuna's son has given up his life after killing countless enemies princes who were like snakes of virulent poison in battle. Razing ten thousand warriors, Abhimanyu who was like Krishna or Arjuna himself, has assuredly gained the realm of Indra. He destroyed chariots, horses, men and elephants, thousands of them, and was not content with what he did. He fought as no other Kshatriya ever has, and died in battle. We should not grieve so for him for he has attained the bright regions of the righteous, realms that men acquire only through great punya karma.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'And thus, on that momentous day, after killing one of their greatest warriors, after suffering untold losses and injuries at his hands, we return to our camp in the evening, covered in blood. Under the unwavering gaze of our enemy, we slowly leave the battleground, in a stupor for such have been our losses.

The wonderful twilight hour arrives. We hear inauspicious howls of jackals and the Sun, now turned the pale-red of the filaments of a lotus, sinks low on the horizon, having reached the western mountains of Astama. Surya takes with him the brilliance of our swords, arrows, blades, chariot-railings, shields and ornaments. Colouring sky and earth with the same hue, the Sun assumes his favourite form of fire.

Kurukshetra, spread over with the motionless bodies of innumerable dead elephants, looks like the crests of cloud-capped hills riven by thunder, and lying all around are their standards, hooks, and riders fallen from their backs. The earth presents an amazing spectacle with great chariots smashed to pieces, and their warriors, charioteers, ornaments, horses, standards and banners all destroyed, many past recognition. The great rathas look like living creatures whose lives the enemy has taken with his shafts. The field of battle wears a fierce and awful aspect with the legion horses and riders all lying dead, with costly trappings and coverlets of varied kinds torn and scattered about as if by some terrible storm; and tongues, teeth, entrails and eyes of men and beasts falling out of their proper places. Men wearing fine coats of mail, ornaments, bright robes and weapons, lie with dead horses, elephants and broken chariots on bare ground this twilight, although they deserve to sleep on costly beds and sheets.

Dogs, jackals, crows, cranes and other scavenging birds, and wolves, hyenas, ravens, diverse tribes of Rakshasas and sinister hosts of Pisachas arrive on the field of horror; they tear away the skins of the corpses and suck up their fat, blood and marrow, and then begin to feast greedily on their flesh and the vilest among them on all the secretions of rotted corpses. The Rakshasas laugh horribly and sing aloud, dragging dead bodies away in thousands, preventing noble Kshatriyas from having their last rites performed with honour and sanctity. The kali yuga has arrived.

A horrible river flows across the field of death, like the Vaitarani itself. Its waters are blood; chariots are its rafts; elephants its large rocks and the heads of dead men its smaller stones. It is soggy with the loosened flesh of slain steeds, elephants and men. The diverse kinds of beautiful weapons are the garlands floating on it or lying on its banks. The terrible river flows fierce through the heart of the field, bearing its dreadful cargo to the regions of the dead.

Hosts of Pisachas, their forms horrible and repugnant, rejoice as they drink and eat from that scarlet rill; wild dogs, jackals and scavenging birds, vultures, crows and the rest, partake of the same grisly feast, their ghoulish carnival. The warriors, whom death has spared on this day, gaze numbly at the field and its ghastly river, and before their eyes corpses seem to rise up and dance! Then, all those who have survived the apocalyptic day, slowly leave the field, for their eyes fill when they see Abhimanyu, who was like Sakra himself, lying there, his ornaments broken and fallen around him. Dead Abhimanyu looks like a sacrificial fire on an altar no longer fed with ghee.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After the slaying of Abhimanyu, all the Pandava warriors leave their rathas, take off their armour, throw aside their bows, and sit surrounding Yudhishtira, all of them plunged in untold grief, their hearts fixed on one thought—dead Abhimanyu.

Upon the fall of his meteoric nephew, Yudhishtira is unmanned by sorrow and laments aloud. "Alas, Abhimanyu pierced the chakravyuha that Drona formed against me. He put so many mighty bowmen to flight, all of them masters of weapons and well-nigh invincible. He stormed our implacable enemy Dusasana and, striking him senseless, forced him to flee the field. Alas, that gallant son of Arjuna, having crossed the vast sea of Drona's army, is now a guest in Yama's halls, killed by the same Dusasana's son. Ah, how will I face Arjuna, and the blessed Subhadra who has lost her favourite son? How will I break this tragic news to Krishna and Dhananjaya? What hollow words will I speak to them? With what voice?

Wanting victory at any cost, it is I who has done this great evil to Subhadra, Kesava and Arjuna. He who is greedy never sees his own faults. Covetousness springs from folly. Honey-gatherers do not see the fall before them; and I am like them. Alas, we set our prince who was still a child in the van of our army, while he should instead have been cossetted with fine food, carriages and chariots, rich beds and ornaments. How could our child of tender years, unskilled in battle, ride with any hope into such grave danger? Like a noble steed of proud spirit, he sacrificed himself instead of refusing to do what I asked.

Alas, today we too will lay ourselves down on the bare earth, blasted by the glances of grief that the angry Arjuna will cast on us. The very Devas applaud the feats of Arjuna, for he is mighty, handsome, liberal, intelligent, modest, forgiving, a shura who is respectful to his elders and superiors, who is heroic, beloved and devoted to truth—Arjuna of glorious achievements. This Kshatriya slew the Nivatakavachas and the Kalakeyas, Indra's enemies in Hiranyapura. In the twinkling of an eye he slew the Paulomas with all their followers. Yet he grants mercy to even his most inveterate enemies, if they but ask!

And it is his son that we could not protect from danger today. The Dhartarashtras, endued though they might be with great power and strength, will rue this day! For when he hears of Abhimanyu's death, Arjuna exterminate the Kauravas in wrath; and then, foolish Duryodhana, who has vile counsellors, who is the destroyer of his own race and friends, will give up his life in anguish. Seeing this son of Indra's son, with no remote rival in splendour and prowess, lying lifeless on the field, neither victory, sovereignty, immortality, nor living with the very Devas, can anymore fetch me the least delight!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'While Kunti's son Yudhishtira thus laments, the Maharishi Krishna-Dwaipayana Vyasa comes to him. Worshipping him duly, and offering him a seat, the grief-stricken Yudhishtira says, "Mahamuni, while he fought alone, magnificently, several great maharathas surrounded Abhimanyu and killed him treacherously. He was but a child and he fought gloriously against a whole army. I asked him to open a passage for us and he broke into Drona's chakravyuha. We wanted to follow him but Jayadratha, with Siva's boon, barred our way. A dharma yuddha is fought fairly and against an equal adversary. But here Abhimanyu was besieged by an entire army. Ah, my heart is broken when I think that I sent that child to his death, and tears leak from my eyes, and I have no peace of mind."

The illustrious Vyasa says to the distraught, shattered Yudhishtira, "Wise Yudhishtira, men like you, who are masters of yourselves and of all knowledge, never allow any calamity to overwhelm them. Having killed countless enemies, Abhimanyu has risen into swarga. Indeed, though young in years, he fought like a grown and seasoned warrior. Yudhishtira, let alone men, Death takes all Devas, Danavas and Gandharvas, without exception, and his law is inviolable."

Yudhishtira says, "Alas, these lords of earth that lie on the bare earth, slain in the midst of their forces, were all men of great prowess and valour. Some had the strength of ten thousand elephants while others were gifted with the impetuosity and force of the wind. They have all perished in battle, slain by men of their own varna.

They possessed great skills, energy and strength. Alas, the wise Kshatriyas who took daily to the field, always in the hope that they would conquer, now lie dead on Kurukshetra. The meaning of the word Death has today been amply revealed, for almost all these great lords of the earth are dead. These Kshatriyas lie motionless, bereft of vanity, having succumbed to their enemies. Many princes, themselves full of wrath, have been consumed by the fire of their enemies' fury.

A great doubt possesses me—from where comes Death? Whose son is Death? What is Death? Why does Death take away all beings? Pitamaha, O you who are like a god, tell me this."

Vyasa says, "Rajan, let me tell you this ancient story about the origin of Death that Narada once told Akampana, whilst that king suffered great and unbearable grief because his son had died. By listening to this most excellent tale, you will be freed from sorrow and the touch of affection's attachment. Listen well to this Itihasa, for it lengthens one's life, kills grief and bestows health. It is sacred, destroys hosts of enemies and is the most auspicious of all auspicious things. Indeed, this Itihasa is even like the study of the Vedas, Rajan, and every morning the best of kings, who wish for long-lived children and their own weal, should listen to it.

In olden days, there was a great and fearless king named Akampana. Once, on the battlefield, enemies surrounded and overpowered him. He had a son called Hari, equal to Narayana himself in strength. Hari was exceptionally handsome, a master of astras, gifted with great intelligence, and was like Sakra himself in battle. Surrounded by countless enemies, he shot thousands of astras at the warriors and elephants that hemmed him in. When he had achieved the most difficult feats in that battle, Yudhishtira, they finally killed him.

Performing the obsequies for his son, king Akampana purified himself. However, he continued to grieve for his Hari day and night and could regain neither happiness nor peace of mind. Learning of his grief, the Devarishi Narada came to him.

Seeing Narada, the related everything that had happened—his defeat at the hands of his enemies and the killing of his son. Akampana said, "My son was endued with great energy, and equalled Indra or Vishnu himself in splendour. Alas they slew him, who had displayed his prowess on the field against countless enemies! O illustrious one, who is this Death? What is the measure of his energy, strength and prowess? O greatest of intelligent men, I truly wish to hear all this.'

The boon-giving lord Narada said, 'Listen, Rajan, to this long Itihasa which will destroy your grief! In the beginning, the Pitamaha Brahma created all creatures. Invested with mighty energy, he saw that his creation showed no signs of decay. So Brahma began to reflect upon the destruction of the universe but failed to find any method to achieve it. He then became angry and from his anger a fire sprang from the sky. The fire spread in all directions consuming everything in the universe, and flames filled all swarga, akasa and bhumi.

Thus Brahma began to consume the whole universe and to destroy his creatures, mobile and unmoving, terrifying all with his wrath. Then Hara, who is also called Sthanu or Siva, with matted locks on his head, the Lord of all Rakshasas and Asuras, the night-rangers, appealed to the divine Brahma, the Lord of the Devas. When Sthanu fell at Brahma's feet for the good of all creatures, the Supreme Deva said to the Mahayogin blazing with splendour, "What wish of yours can I grant, O you who deserve to have all your wishes fulfilled? O you who have been born of our wish, we will do anything that will please you! Tell me, Sthanu, what is your desire?"'"

"Siva replied, 'O Lord, you took great pains to create and nourish creatures of diverse kinds. However, you now destroy them with your fire. I am filled with pity. O illustrious one, be merciful.'

Brahma said, 'I have no wish to destroy the universe. I only want the good of the Earth, and this is why anger has possessed me. Bhumidevi suffers because of the heavy burden of creatures, and constantly urges me to destroy them. But I could not find the means to put an end to this infinite creation. At this, anger maddened me.'

Rudra said, 'Be merciful, O Lord of the universe; do not annihilate all living beings with your wrath. Let no more creatures, immobile and unmoving, perish. Through your grace, let the three-fold universe, the Future, the Past, and the Present, continue to exist. A fire has sprung from your wrath and even now it consumes rocks, trees, rivers and all kinds of plants and trees. Indeed, the fire devours all the universe and reduces it to ashes.

Be merciful, O Illustrious! Do not give way to anger. This is the boon I seek. Your rage destroys everything that belongs even to you; appease your wrath and quench it in your own self. Look on your creatures with compassion and do good for them. Ensure that creatures with life and the power of generation do not cease to exist.

O Creator of the worlds, you have appointed me their Protector. Let not the mobile and the unmoving universe be destroyed. You are naturally inclined to grace, and it is for this that I plead with you.'

Narada continues, "Hearing what Mahadeva said, Brahma withdrew the fire of his wrath into himself and contained it there—for the weal of the world and all its creatures. Extinguishing the fire, the divine Benefactor of the world, the great Master, declared the dharma of procreation and emancipation. And while the Supreme Deity exterminated the fire born of his wrath, there emerged through the portals of his diverse senses, a young woman, dark, red and tawny, her tongue, face and eyes crimson, and decked with two brilliant ear-rings and diverse other scintillating ornaments. Issuing out of his body, she smilingly looked at the two Lords of the universe and then set out for the southern quarter.

Then Brahma, regulator of creation and destruction, named her Mrityu, and said to her, 'Slay these creatures of mine! You have been born of my wrath which I nourished for the destruction of the universe. Kill all creatures, be they fools or and seers, at my command. By doing this, you will benefit yourself.'

The lotus-devi, called Death, reflected deeply and then wept aloud and piteously in a melodious voice. The Pitamaha caught the tears she shed in his two hands.'"

"Narada said, 'The compassionate young Devi repressed her sorrow and, bending with humility like a vine, with her hands folded, asked the Lord of creation, "O Lord of words, how can I, being a woman, and created by you, do what you ask when I know that it is cruel and evil? I greatly fear adharma, I fear sin. O divine Lord, be merciful. Sons, friends, brothers, fathers and husbands are always dear; if I kill them, I fear that their kin will seek to do me harm.

The thought of the tears that will fall from the eyes of grief-stricken and weeping ones, fills me with dread! I seek your protection, O greatest of Devas, I will not go to Yama's abode. O boon-giving one, with bowed head and folded hands, I beg your clemency. Pitamaha of the worlds, I beg just this one wish from you—with your leave, I want to perform tapasya. Grant me this boon, O Divine One, O Master, if you allow me, I will go to the great asrama of Dhenuka! I will undergo the severest tapasya there and worship only you. I will not be able, O Devadeva, to take the precious prana of living creatures weeping in sorrow. Protect me from sin!'

Brahma said, 'Mrityu, you have been born for achieving the destruction of creatures. Go, kill all living creatures, you need not have any scruples. It must be so. It cannot be otherwise. Do as I say and no one in the world will find fault with you.'

But she was still afraid. Looking into Brahma's face, she stood silently with joined hands. Wanting to do good to all beings, she could not bring herself to set her heart upon their destruction. Brahma also remained silent. And then, soon, the Pitamaha became pleased with himself and smiled looking upon all his creation. Thereupon, living beings were enlivened and continued to breathe as before, untouched by untimely death. When the invincible and illustrious Lord shook off his wrath, the dark and kindly girl left the presence of the wisest Deity.

Leaving Brahma, without having to destroy all creatures, Mrityu quickly went to the asrama called Dhenuka where she performed fierce tapasya and observed the sternest, most austere vratas. She stood there on one leg for sixteen billions of years, and another fifty billions, through pity for living creatures and from her wish to do them good, all the time restraining her senses from their favourite objects.

And once again, Rajan, she stood there on one leg for twenty-one times ten billions of years. And then she wandered for ten times ten thousand billions of years with the creatures of the Earth. Next, going to the sacred Nanda full of cool and pure water, she spent eight thousand years in those waters and performed a great tapasya there as well; at Nanda, she cleansed herself of all her sins.

Then, keeping her vow, she went first of all to the sacred Kausiki. Living only upon air and water, she practised tapasya there. She then went to Panchaganga and after that to Vetasa, where, by different kinds of especial austerities, that pure kanya emaciated her own body. Then she visited Ganga and from there went to great Meru, where she remained motionless like a stone, suspending her breath. Then at the summit of Himavat, where the Devas had performed their yagna in the most ancient days, the auspicious and compassionate girl remained for a billion of years standing on just her toe. Going then to Pushkara, Gokarna, Naimisa and Malaya, she emaciated her body further, practising austerities which satisfied her heart.

Without acknowledging any other God, with steady devotion only to the Pitamaha, she lived and delighted Brahma in every way.

At last, gratified with her, his heart softened and full of delight, the unchangeable Creator of the worlds said to that maiden. 'O Mrityu, why do you perform so severe a tapasya?'

Mrityu replied, 'Living beings exist in health and do not injure one another even through words. I will not be able to kill them. O Lord, I want just this boon from you. I fear sin, and this is why I am engaged in tapasya. Most blessed one, undertake to remove my fears for ever. I am a woman, in distress, and innocent. I beg you, be my protector.'

To her, the divine Brahma, knower of the past, the present and the future, said, 'You will commit no sin, O Mrityu, by killing these creatures. My words can never prove false, O amiable one! Therefore, auspicious girl, kill these creatures of the four kinds. Eternal dharma will always be yours. Yama, the Regent of the world, and the various diseases will become your helpmates. I myself and all the Devas will grant you boons, so that, freed from sin and perfectly cleansed, you will even acquire glory.'

Thus addressed, Rajan, Mrityu, joining her hands and bowing down to him, once more said, 'If, O Lord, this cannot be achieved without me, then I bow my head to your command. But I beg you, listen once more to what I say. Let covetousness, wrath, malice, jealousy, quarrel, folly and shamelessness and other violent passions rend the bodies of all embodied creatures.'

Brahma said, 'O Mrityu, it will be as you say. Meanwhile, do away with living beings appropriately and sin will not be yours, nor will I seek to injure you. Your tear drops that are in my hands will now become diseases, springing from living creatures themselves. They will kill men; and if men are killed, do not fear, for sin will not be yours. Be devoted to dharma, observe your duty, and casting off both desire and anger, take the lives of these mortal beings. This will be your eternal virtue. Sin will destroy men of evil ways. By doing my bidding you will cleanse yourself. It will be your dharma to sink them in their sins. Therefore, cast off both kama and krodha, and kill these beings endued with life.'

Seeing that Brahma persistently called her Death, she feared to do otherwise. In terror of his curse, she said, 'Yes!' Helpless not to obey, casting off desire and wrath, she began to take the lives of living creatures when the time came for their death.

It is only the living that die. Disease spring from living creatures themselves and is an abnormal condition as it causes them distress and pain. So do not indulge in fruitless grief for anyone after they are dead. The senses, after death, go with them to the other world. Achieving their respective functions, they return once more with each individual jiva when the spirit is reborn.

Thus all creatures, including the very Devas, are subject to death; they too are mortal. The awful wind, omnipresent and with infinite energy, with its terrible howl and great strength irresistibly drives the bodies of living creatures. It will not demonstrate active energy, nor will it suspend its functions; but do this naturally. Even all the Devas have the appellation of mortals attached to them.

Therefore, lion among kings, do not grieve, for your son is passing his days in perpetual happiness in swarga for he has attained those delightful regions that are reserved for Kshatriyas. Casting off all sorrows, he has gained the companionship of great souls of dharma. The Creator himself has ordained Death for all beings and when their hour comes, they are destroyed. The death of all beings arises from the creatures themselves for they are responsible for their own deaths.

Death does not kill anyone, armed with her bludgeon! Therefore, those who are wise truly know death to be inevitable because Brahma himself has ordained it. So never grieve for those who are dead; and knowing that the Supreme God has ordained this death, cast off your grief for your dead son!'

Vyasa continues, "Hearing these profound words of advice from Narada, king Akampana said to his friend, 'O illustrious Maharishi, after hearing this Itihasa from you, my grief is gone and I am contented. I am grateful to you and I worship you.'

Hearing this, the Devarishi Narada of immeasurable soul left for the Nandana vana.

The frequent recital of this story to others, and listening to it, is said to be purifying. It leads to fame and heaven, is worthy of approbation, and also enhances the life-span. Now that you have heard this tale, cast off your grief, Yudhishtira. Reflect on the duties of a Kshatriya, and the high state of punya that can be attained by heroes. Abhimanyu, the maharathin the mahatejasvin, has attained swarga after killing numberless enemies in full view of all the mighty archers. He has fallen on the battle field, struck with sword, mace, dart and bow. Sprung from Soma Deva, he has returned into the lunar essence, cleansed of all his impurities.

Therefore, O Pandava, you and your brothers should muster all your courage and without allowing yourselves to be stupefied by sorrow, take the field again, inflamed with fury for battle.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing of the origin of Mrityu and her strange deeds, Yudhishtira humbly addresses Vyasa once more. He says, "There were many kings of dharma in blessed countries, their prowess equal to that of Indra himself. They were rajarishis, O Muni, who were sinless and spoke only truth. Once more, tell me of their feats in ancient times so that I am consoled. What was the extent of the gifts they made at yagnas? Who were these mahatmans, these royal sages of dharma? Tell me all, O illustrious one!"

Vyasa replies, "There was a king named Switya. He had a son called Srinjaya. The Rishis Narada and Parvata were his friends. One day, the two munis came to visit Srinjaya in his palace. Duly worshipped by Srinjaya, they were pleased with him, and continued to stay happily with him. Once, as Srinjaya was seated at his ease with the two rishis, his beautiful daughter came to him, smiling sweetly, and greeted him with reverence. Srinjaya blessed the delightful girl.

Seeing her, Parvata smilingly asked Srinjaya, 'Whose daughter is this girl of restless glances, who has every auspicious mark? Is she the splendour of Surya, or the flame of Agni? Or is she Sri, Hri, Kirti, Dhriti, Pushti or Siddhi, and the lambency of Soma?'

King Srinjaya answered, 'O illustrious one, this girl is my daughter. She seeks my blessings.'

Then Narada asked king Srinjaya, 'If, Rajan, you wish for great fortune for yourself, give your daughter to me as a wife.'

Delighted with the Rishi's proposal, Srinjaya said to Narada, 'I give her to you.'

At this, the other Rishi, Parvata, indignantly said to Narada 'I had in my heart chosen this girl first, but you have taken her as your wife. O Brahmana, you will not go to swarga.'

Narada replied, 'For a man to be a husband he must first give his heart and seek consent. This is followed by the solemn commitments by both parties, and the actual gift is made by the sprinkling of holy water and the recital of the mantras ordained for the taking of the bride's hand. These have been declared as the indications by which one becomes a husband. Even this ceremonial is not all. Above all is the pradakshina of seven paces by the bride circumambulating the groom. Without these your marriage is not complete. You have cursed me, and you will also not go to heaven without me.'

Having cursed each other the two Rishis continued to live there in the palace.

Meanwhile, king Srinjaya, who wanted a son, purified himself and scrupulously entertained the Brahmanas to the very best of his power, with food and clothing, and saw to their every other need and comfort. After some time, those greatest of Brahmanas became pleased with the king and wished a son for him. Together they went to Narada and said to him, 'Give this king a son of the kind he wants.'

Narada replied to them, saying, 'Tathaastu, so be it.'

Then the Devarishi said to Srinjaya, 'O Rajarishi, the Brahmanas are pleased and they wish you a son! Ask them for the boon; tell them what manner of son you want.'

With joined hands, the king asked for a son with every accomplishment, famous, of glorious feats, of great tejas and a parantapa who would vanquish all his enemies. And he further asked that the urine, the excrement, the phlegm and the sweat of that child should be gold! And in due time the king had a son born to him, who came to be named Suvarnashthivin and because of the boon, the child began to increase his father's wealth beyond all calculation.

King Srinjaya had all the objects of his desire to be wrought of gold. His houses, walls, forts, the houses of all Brahmanas within his dominions, and his beds, vehicles, plates, all manners of pots, cups, the palace that he owned, and all implements, utensils, and weapons were made of gold. And in time his fame increased.

Then some thieves heard of the prince and banded together and sought to harm the king. Some among them said, 'Let us seize the king's son for he is his father's gold mine.'

They broke into the king's palace and forcibly abducted prince Suvarnashthivin and made off with him to the forest. There those fools, urged by greed, but not knowing what to with the prince, killed him and cut his body into pieces. They did not see any gold inside him. When the prince was dead, all the rest of the gold, got through the Rishi's boon, also vanished. The thieves began to fight among themselves and killed each other, and with them perished that most wonderful prince. Those evil men plunged down into the most unimaginable and awful hell.

Seeing his son killed, king Srinjaya, in deep sorrow, began to lament piteously. Seeing the king so grief-stricken on account of his son, the Devarishi Narada appeared before him.

Listen, Yudhishtira, to what Narada said to Srinjaya. 'Srinjaya, you will have to die with your desires unfulfilled, although we Brahmavadis live in your house. Even Avikshita's son Marutta had to die.

Annoyed with Brihaspati, Marutta had Samvatta perform his great yagnas! The illustrious lord Mahadeva himself had given wealth in the shape of a golden plateau of Himavat to that royal sage. With that wealth, king Marutta performed various yagnas so that afterwards different groups of gods, the creators of the universe, with Indra himself in their company and with Brihaspati at their head, used to visit him.

All the carpets and furnishings of his yagnasala were made of gold. At his yagnas, the Munis all ate food as they pleased, food that was clean and to their taste. The milk, curds, ghee, honey and other kinds of victuals, were the very best; the robes and ornaments were enviably costly; and the Brahmanas who were masters of the Vedas were gratified.

The very Devas would serve the food in king Marutta's palace, while the Viswedevas were his courtiers. Those dwelling in swarga were happy with the libations of clarified butter and they, in their turn, increased the powerful ruler's wealth of crops with abundant rains. He always contributed to the satisfaction and joy of the Rishis, the Pitris and the Devas, by practising Brahmacharya, studying the Vedas, performing obsequial rites and giving all kinds of gifts.

Such was his immense store of wealth and gold that it was difficult to give away. And he did, in fact, give all his untold wealth away in dakshina to the Brahmanas. Sakra himself used to wish him well. He made his subjects happy by always living in dharma, and he ultimately went to those eternal realms of bliss, which he acquired through his inexhaustible punya.

With his children, counsellors, wives, descendants and kinsmen, king Marutta, in his youth, ruled his kingdom for a thousand years. When such a king died, Srinjaya, who was your superior in the four cardinal virtues—tapasya, truth, compassion and liberality—and who, being superior to you, was far greater than your son? Do not grieve saying, "O Swaitya!", for your son who performed no yagnas nor gave any dakshina at a sacrifice.'

"Narada said, 'O Srinjaya, it is said that King Suhotra also fell prey to death. He was the greatest of Kshatriyas and invincible in battle. The very Devas would come to visit him. Acquiring his kingdom through dharma, he always sought the advice of his Ritwijas, and other domestic priests and Brahmanas and followed their behests. Virtuous and liberal, familiar with the duty of protecting his subjects, king Suhotra performed yagnas, subjugated his enemies and wished to increase his wealth. He worshipped the Devas by the ordinances of the Shastras, and defeated his enemies with his astras. He brought joy to all that lived within his domains through his pure and majestic deeds.

He ruled the earth, freeing her from Mlecchas and forest-brigands. The Deva of the clouds showered gold upon him all the year around. In those times out of mind, the rivers in his kingdom flowed liquid gold and it was available to everyone. The Devas blessed his kingdom with a large number of crocodiles, crabs and fish of different species and countless objects of desire, all made of gold.

The artificial lakes in the king's dominions each measured full two yojanas. Looking at the thousands of dwarfs, humpbacks, alligators, makaras and tortoises, all made of gold, king Suhotra wondered greatly. He performed a yagna at Kurujangala and gave away the unlimited wealth of gold to Brahmanas before the completion of the sacrifice. After he had performed a thousand Aswamedha yagnas, a hundred Rajasuya yagnas, many sacred Kshatriya yagnas, at all of which he gave lavish gifts to Brahmanas, and after countless daily rituals performed for specific wants, the king ultimately obtained a most desirable end.

When, O Srinjaya, the life of such a king who was superior to you in the four cardinal virtues, had to come to an end, and who, being superior to you, was thus far greater than your son, you should not grieve saying, "Oh Swaitya, Oh, Swaitya!" for your son performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial dakshina.'

"Narada said, 'The heroic king Paurava too, O Srinjaya, fell prey to death. This king gave away a thousand times a thousand horses that were all perfectly white. Countless learned Brahmanas, all versed in the principles of Siksha, one of the six Vedangas, and Akshara, the letters of the original alphabet, came from different kingdoms to the Aswamedha yagna that royal sage performed. The king gave priceless gifts to these Brahmanas, purified by the Vedas, by gyana, and by vratas, men of liberal and gracious countenances—fine robes, houses, excellent beds, carpets, carriages and draft-cattle, and actors, dancers and singers who were marvellous exponents of their respective arts, and always entertained them.

At each of his yagnas, in due time, he gave away as sacrificial gifts ten thousand elephants of golden magnificence, with ichor trickling down their bodies, and chariots made of gold with wonderful standards and banners. He also gave away a thousand times a thousand maidens decked with ornaments of gold, chariots, horses and elephants for riding, and mansions, fields, hundreds of thousand of kine and thousands of cowherds—all decked out in gold. They who are acquainted with ancient history, sing this song about the yagna at which king Paurava gave away cows with calves with golden horns and silver hooves, brass milking pots, female slaves, male slaves, asses, camels and sheep, all countless in number, diverse kinds of gems and varied hill-like mounds of food.

Countless yagnas the king of the Angas successively performed, in the order of their merit, and according to his varna dharma, so many auspicious yagnas which yielded every possible object of desire. O Srinjaya, when such a king died, who was better that you in respect of the four cardinal virtues, and who being superior to you, was far greater than your son, you should not lament, "Oh, Swaitya, Oh, Swaitya!" and grieve for your son who performed no yagnas and gave away no dana.'

"Narada said, 'Usinara's son Sibi, too, O Srinjaya, fell prey to death. That king had, as it were, cast a leathern girdle around the Earth, making Bhumi with her mountains, islands, seas and forests resound with the clatter of his chariot. The Parantapa, king Sibi always slew his greatest enemies. He performed many yagnas and gave away gifts in profusion to the Brahmanas. That king of great prowess and intelligence had acquired enormous wealth. In battle, he won the praise of all Kshatriyas. He subjugated the whole world and performed many Aswamedha yagnas, without any impediment, giving away as sacrificial dakshina a thousand crores of golden nishkas and so many elephants, horses, deer, sheep and other animals, and hills of grain, earning him untold punya.

King Sibi also gave away the sacred Earth of diverse kinds of soil to the Brahmanas as dakshina. Indeed, Usinara's son Sibi gave away as many kine as the number of rain-drops that fall on the earth, the number of stars in the firmament, the number of sand-grains on the bed of Ganga, or the number of rocks that constitute the mountain called Meru, the number of gems or fish in the ocean.

The Creator himself had not met with and will not meet in the present or the future, another king who could bear the burdens that king Sibi carried. Many were the sacrifices with every kind of ritual that Sibi performed. In his yagnas, the sacrificial stakes, the carpets, the mansions, the walls and the arches, were all made of gold. Delicious and pure food and drink were served in profusion to the Brahmanas who went there in numbers past all count. With delicacies of every description laid out, one heard nothing but pleasing words like Give away and Take, being spoken there. Milk and curds were collected in lakes. In his yagnasala, there were rivers of drink and white hills of food. Bathe, drink and eat as you like! These were the only words heard there.

Gratified with his righteous karma, Rudra granted Sibi a boon, saying, "As you give away, let your wealth, devotion, fame, dharma, the love that all creatures bear you, and the heaven you attain, all be inexhaustible."

Having obtained these boons, even Sibi, when the time came, left this world for swarga. When, O Srinjaya, he who was superior to and far superior to your son had to die, you should not lament, crying, "Oh, Swaitya, Oh, Swaitya!", and grieve for your son who performed no sacrifice and gave no sacrificial gift.'

"Narada said, 'Srinjaya, Rama, the son of Dasaratha, fell prey to death. His subjects were as much delighted in him, as a father is with the children of his loins. He possessed great tejas and was a home to countless virtues. Of unfading glory, at his father's command, Rama, the elder brother of Lakshmana lived for fourteen years in exile in the forest, with his wife. In Janasthana, that Bharatarishabha slew fourteen thousand Rakshasas for the protection of the munis of the vana.

The Rakshasa called Ravana who, beguiling both him and Lakshmana, abducted his wife Sita, the princess of Videha. Like the three-eyed Mahadeva killing the Asura Andhaka in the olden days, Rama in wrath slew Ravana, the offender of Pulastya's race, with all his kinsmen and followers, Ravana whom even the Devas and the Asuras together could not quell, the evil Ravana who was as a thorn to the Devas and the Brahmanas.

Because of his loving nurture of his subjects, the very Devas worshipped Rama. Filling all the Earth with his achievements, even the Devarishis lauded him. Compassionate to all beings, that king, after conquering different realms and protecting his subjects virtuously, performed a great yagna without hindrance. The lord Rama also performed a hundred Aswamedha yagnas and the mahayagna called Jaruthya. With libations of ghrita he pleased Indra. Through all these, Rama conquered hunger and thirst and all the diseases to which living creatures are subject. He possessed every accomplishment and blazed with his own tejas. Indeed, Rama, the son of Dasaratha, by far outshone all other living creatures.

When Rama ruled his kingdom, the Rishis, the Devas, and Manushyas, all lived together on the Earth, and their lives were never as full and wonderful as during Ramarajya. All life's sacred and mighty breaths, Prana, Apana, Samana, and the others, performed their functions blemishlessly. All luminous bodies shone brighter, and no calamity ever came near. All his subjects had long lives, and none died in their youth.

The dwellers of heaven were highly pleased for they received, according to the vidhis of the four Vedas, libations of clarified butter and other offerings of food made by men. Rama's realm was free from flies, gnats and other pernicious insects; and there were no beasts of prey or poisonous reptiles. There was no adharma; no one was covetous, and none ignorant. The subjects of all the four varnas engaged in acts of dharma and other worthy deeds.

When the Rakshasas in Janasthana obstructed the flow of offerings to the Pitris and the worship of the Devas, Lord Rama killed them. Men were each blessed with a thousand children, and their life-span was a thousand years. Elders had never to perform sraddhas of those younger than them. Youthful in form, with a dark-blue complexion and reddish eyes, Rama had the tread of a mighty elephant in musth. He had a lion's shoulders, untold strength, his arms reached down to his knees, and were great and handsome, and all creatures loved him. Rama ruled his kingdom for eleven thousand years and his subjects always uttered his name.

While Rama ruled his kingdom, the world was full of divine beauty and joy. Having established his own dynasty on earth, consisting of eight royal houses of the Suryavamsa, finally Rama ascended into swarga taking with him, his four kinds of subjects, all the species, men, beasts, birds, insects and plants of every kind.

O Srinjaya, even he who was vastly superior to you in the four cardinal virtues and superior to your son, died. You should not lament, crying, 'Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!' for your son performed no yagna and gave no sacrificial dakshina.'

"Narada said, 'O Srinjaya, we hear that even king Bhagiratha died. He caused the Bhagiratha ghats of the Ganga, so named after him, to be covered with flights of steps made of gold. Surpassing all kings and all princes, he gave the Brahmanas a thousand times a thousand girls decked in ornaments of gold, riding on chariots yoked to four horses, and with a hundred kine behind each chariot, with many goats and sheep behind each cow. King Bhagiratha gave away vast gifts at his yagnas for which an immense gathering of men assembled.

The Ganga was aggrieved by her burden, so she said "Protect Me," and sat down in his lap because of which she, like the Apsara Urvasi, came to be regarded as his daughter and was named Bhagirathi after him. Having become the king's daughter, she became like a son, and thus the means of salvation to his deceased ancestors.

Soft-spoken Gandharvas of celestial splendour, gratified, sang all this in the hearing of the Rishis, the Devas and the Manavas. Thus, O Srinjaya, did the Devi, the ocean-going Ganga choose for her father king Bhagiratha, descendant of Ikshvaku, and performer of yagnas who gave lavish gifts to Brahmanas. The very Devas with Indra at their head always attended his sacrifices. The Devas used to facilitate his yagnas in every way by removing all impediments to them, in order to take their shares of the havis.

Possessed of great punya, Bhagiratha gave the Brahmanas whatever they wanted, wherever they wanted, without requiring them to move. There was nothing which he would withhold from Brahmanas. Every one received from him everything they wished for. Finally, the king ascended to the world of Brahma, through the grace of the Brahmanas. For the very object on which the Rishis who subsisted on the rays of the Sun would wait upon the Sun and the Deity of the Sun, they used to wait upon the lord Bhagiratha, the ornament of the three worlds.

O Srinjaya, when he who was superior to you as regards the four cardinal virtues, and who, being superior to you, was far superior to your son, had to die, you should not grieve, crying, "Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!" for your son performed no yagnas and gave no sacrificial gifts.'

"Narada said, 'Dilipa, the son of Havila, O Srinjaya, we hear, also fell a victim to death. Brahmanas, vested with the knowledge of Truth, devoted to the performance of yagnas, blessed with children and many grandchildren, were present during his hundreds of yagnas. King Dilipa, after performing his yagnas, gave away this very Earth filled with her treasures to those Brahmanas. At Dilipa's yagnas, the roads were all paved with gold and the very Devas, with Indra at their head, would come to visit him, equating him to Dharma himself.

The upper and lower rings of his sacrificial stake were of gold. Eating the Raga-khandavas at his yagnas, many were seen to lie down on the very streets, sated. It was exceedingly wonderful to see that while crossing water, the wheels of his chariot never sank but skimmed upon the water's surface. This never happened to other kings, Even those who witnessed king Dilipa, the indomitable, always truthful in speech, give away lavish gifts at his yagnas, ascended into swarga.

In Khattanga, the home of Dilipa, one always heard these five sounds—the sound of Vedic chanting, the twang of bows, and cries of Drink! Enjoy! and Eat!

O Srinjaya, when even he, who was superior to you in the four cardinal virtues, and therefore far superior to your son, had to die, you should not cry, “Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!” and grieve for your son who performed no yagnas and gave no sacrificial gifts.’

"Narada continued, 'Mandhatri, the son of Yuvanaswa, O Srinjaya, fell prey to death. That king vanquished the Devas, the Asuras and Manavas. The Aswin twins brought him out of his father's belly with magical surgery.

Once upon a time, king Yuvanaswa while hunting deer in the forest became thirsty and his horses were exhausted. Attracted by a wreath of smoke, which turned out to be from a yagna fire, Yuvanaswa went and drank the sacred ghrita that he found lying there. The king, thereupon, conceived. Seeing that Yuvanaswa was advanced with child, the physicians of the Devas, the twin Aswini Kumaras, extracted the child from the king's belly.

Seeing the child of celestial splendour lying on the lap of his father, the Devas said to each other, "What sustenance will support this child?"

At this Vasava said, 'Let the child suck my fingers.'

At which, from the fingers of Indra there issued milk sweet as nectar. And since Indra, from compassion, said, "He will draw his sustenance from me", and showed him that kindness, the Deva named the child Mandhatri. Springs of milk and divine ghee fell into the mouth of Yuvanasva's son from the hand of Indra. The boy grew up sucking nourishment from Indra's fingers. In twelve days he grew to twelve cubits in height and acquired prodigious abilities and prowess.

He conquered the whole of this Earth in a single day. Virtuous, intelligent, heroic, devoted to truth and a master of his passions, Mandhatri with his bow vanquished Sudhanwan, Jaya, Suna, Vrihadratha and Nriga. The lands lying between the mountain Udaya where the Sun rises and the Astama where it sets, are known to this day as the dominion of Mandhatri.

Rajan, after performing a hundred Aswamedha yagnas as well as a hundred Rajasuya yagnas, he gave away to Brahmanas, Rohita fish made of gold that were ten yojanas long and one yojana wide. Others, who came to his yagnas and contributed to their success, ate the mountains of savoury food of diverse kinds, but after he had entertained the Brahmanas. The vast quantities of food, drink, and mountains of rice, looked incredible and delightful where they were piled. Rivers and lakes of ghee, with different kinds of soup for their base, curds for their froth and liquid honey for their water, were beautiful to behold and, wafting honey and milk, encircled mountains of solid viands.

Devas, Asuras, Manushas, Yakshas, Gandharvas, Nagas, Pakshis, and many Brahmanas, accomplished in the Vedas and their angas, and innumerable great Rishis came to Mandhatri's yagnas. No one among those present was illiterate or less than learned.

King Mandhatri, having bestowed the Earth confined by the seas and full of wealth upon the Brahmanas, vanished like the Sun at night. Filling all the points of the compass with his fame, he left for the regions of great souls of dharma. When he, O Srinjaya, who excelled you in the four cardinal virtues and who was thus far superior to your son, had to die, you should not grieve, crying, "Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!" for him who performed no yagna and made no sacrificial gifts.'

"Narada said, 'O Srinjaya, Yayati, the son of Nahusha, was also a victim of Mrityu. He performed a hundred Rajasuyas, a hundred Aswamedha yagnas, a thousand Pundarikas, a hundred Vajapeyas, a thousand Atiratras, innumerable Chaturmasyas, various Agnishtomas and many other kinds of yagnas, at all of which he gave away lavish dakshina and dana to great Brahmanas. Having counted it first, he gifted to Brahmanas all the wealth that existed on the Earth and was in the possession of Mlecchas and other Brahmana-haters.

When the Devas and the Asuras were arrayed for battle, king Yayati went to the Devas' help. He divided the Earth into four parts and gave it away to four great ones. Having performed various yagnas and virtuously fathered admirable offspring upon his wives Devayani, the daughter of Usanas, and Sarmishta, king Yayati, like a Deva, like a second Vasava, roamed through the Nandana vana at his own pleasure.

When Yayati, profound master of all the Vedas, found that indulging his passions did not satisfy him, he, with his wives, retired into the forest, saying, "Even all the paddy, wheat, gold, animals and women there is on Earth is not sufficient to satisfy one man. Considering this, one should cultivate contentment.”

Thus abandoning all his desires and attaining true peace and satisfaction, the lord Yayati, installed his son on his throne and retired into the forest.

When he, O Srinjaya, who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues, and therefore far superior to your son, had to die, you should not cry, “Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!”, and grieve for your son who performed no yagna and made no sacrificial gifts.’

"Narada continued, 'Nabhaga's son Ambarisha, O Srinjaya, we know, fell prey to death. Alone he battled a thousand kings, a thousand times. These enemies, all masters of weapons and desperately wanting victory, attacked him from all sides, with fierce war cries. With the measureless strength, vigour and skill he had acquired through long abhyasa, and his awesome astras, he destroyed his enemies' royal chatras, weapons, standards and chariots and dispelled his own apprehensions.

Throwing off their armour, these men begged him for mercy. They sought his protection, saying, "We yield ourselves to you!"

Reducing them to subjection and conquering the whole Earth, he performed a hundred yagnas of the best kind, according to the rites ordained in the shastras. At these yagnas, people of all varnas ate his pure and delicious fare and they worshipped the Brahmanas and thus greatly pleased them. The Munis ate delectable sweet-meats, purikas, puras, apupas, sashkalis and large karambhas, prithumridwikas, and diverse kinds of other dainties, and drank various kinds of soups, maireyaka, and ate ragakhandavas, and every sort of confectionary, well-prepared, soft and fragrant, as well having as nectarine ghee, honey, milk, water, sweet curds, and many kinds of exotic and succulent fruits and roots.

Those accustomed to wine, drank so many different kinds of intoxicating drinks for their pleasure, and sang and played their musical instruments. Eager revellers by the thousands, intoxicated with drink, danced and merrily sang hymns in praise of Ambarisha; while others, unable to stand, fell down. At these yagnas, king Ambarisha gave, as sacrificial gifts, the kingdoms of hundreds and thousands of kings to the ten million priests he engaged. After he had performed various yagnas the king gave to the Brahmanas, as dakshina, a number of princes and kings whose coronal locks had been washed in the sacred bath, all wearing golden armour, all having white chatras spread over their heads, all seated on golden chariots, all attired in rich robes and having large trains of followers, and all bearing their sceptres and bringing their treasuries.

Seeing this, the Maharishis were highly gratified, and said, "No one in the past has done, and none in future will be able to do, what king Ambarisha of unequalled munificence, does now."

When he, O Srinjaya, who was superior to you in the four cardinal virtues, and therefore far superior to your son, had to die, you should not cry, "Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!" and grieve for him who performed no yagna and made no sacrificial gifts.'

"Narada said, 'O Srinjaya, we hear that king Sasabindu, too, fell prey to death. He was a handsome man of great ability and intelligence and he performed a host of yagnas. The noble king had one hundred thousand wives from each of whom were born a thousand able sons. Proficient in the Vedas, these princes performed millions of yagnas, and many mahayagnas. They wore golden armour and were superlative archers. Every one of them performed Aswamedha yagnas.

Sasabindu at his own Aswamedha yagna gave away as dakshina all these sons of his to the Brahmanas! Behind each of these princes were hundreds upon hundreds of chariots, elephants and gorgeous maidens decked in ornaments of gold. With each maiden were a hundred elephants; with each elephant, a hundred chariots; with each chariot a hundred horses wearing garlands of gold. With each of these horses were a thousand kine; and with each cow were fifty goats. Such was the limitless wealth that the most blessed Sasabindu gave away to the Brahmanas.

The king caused as many sacrificial stakes of gold to be made for his great Aswamedha yagna as were ordained, and he doubled that number of the sacrificial stakes of wood in other yagnas. There were mountains of food and drink some two yojanas high. Upon the completion of his yagna, thirteen such mountains of food and drink remained untouched. His kingdom was free from evil and full of contented, well-fed and perfectly happy people.

Having ruled for many long years, Sasabindu finally ascended to swarga. When he, O Srinjaya, who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues and therefore, far superior to your son, had to die, you should not cry, “Oh, Swaitya! Oh Swaitya!”, and grieve for him who performed no yagna and made no sacrificial gifts.’

"Narada said, 'O Srinjaya, Gaya, the son of Amartarayas, we know, fell a victim to death. He, for a hundred years, ate nothing but the leftovers of the libations of ghee poured into the sacrificial fire. Gratified with his proof of great devotion Agni offered to grant him a boon.

Gaya said, "I wish to have a complete knowledge of the Vedas through tapasya, through the practice of brahmacharya, by observing vratas and niyamas, and through the grace of my superiors. I also want to acquire inexhaustible wealth through practice of the duties of my swadharma and without injury to others. I also wish to be able to make gifts to Brahmanas with veneration. Let me also beget sons upon wives belonging to my own varna and not upon others. Let me be able to give away food with devotion. Let my heart always delight in dharma. O Agni, supreme cleanser, let no impediment overtake me while I am engaged in sacred karma for the attainment of punya."

Saying "Tathaastu", Agni disappeared.

King Gaya got all he had asked for and also subdued his enemies in fair battle. Then, for a full hundred years, he performed a myriad yagnas with generous gifts to the Brahmanas, as well as the vratas called chaturmasyas and many others. Every year, for a century, the king gave the Brahmanas one hundred and sixty thousand kine, ten thousand horses and one crore of gold nishkas—upon rising after the completion of his yagnas. Further, he gave away as Nakshatra-dakshinas under every constellation, the gifts ordained for each of these occasions. Indeed, the king performed his many yagnas like another Soma or Angiras.

At his great Aswamedha yagna, king Gaya made a golden Earth and gave it away to the Brahmanas. His sacrificial stakes were past all calculation in value, being of gold, encrusted with such jewels and gems as fascinated and delighted all beings. Willing to fulfil every wish, Gaya gave those sacred stakes of sacrifice to delighted Brahmanas and other deserving men. He gratified all the different species of beings dwelling in the ocean, the forest, the islands, the rivers, male and female, the tanks, pools and lakes, the towns, the provinces and even in swarga, with the wealth and food distributed at his yagnas. And they all said, "No other yagna can measure up to this one of Gaya's."

The sacrificial altar of Gaya was thirty yojanas long, twenty-six yojanas wide, and twenty yojanas high. It was made entirely of gold and studded with pearls, diamonds and other precious stones. He also gave away this vedi, along with fine clothes and ornaments to the Brahmanas, as well as other gifts of the kind laid down in the shastras. Upon the completion of the yagna twenty-five hillocks of food remained untouched, and many lakes and several beautifully flowing rivulets of exquisite drink, besides many heaps of fine clothes and ornaments. Due to the merit of the great yagna, Gaya came to be renowned through the three worlds. It is because of Gaya's mahayagna that the eternal Pipal tree and the sacred Brahmasaras came into existence.

O Srinjaya, when he, who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues and, therefore, greatly superior to your son, had to die, you should not cry, "Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!" and grieve for him who performed no yagna and made no sacrificial gifts.'

"Narada said, 'Great Rantideva, too, we hear, met with death. The noble king had two hundred thousand cooks to prepare and distribute unmatched food, raw as well as cooked, dishes like amrita, to the Brahmanas who came to his palace as atithis, day and night. He gave away his wealth acquired through deeds of dharma to great Brahmanas. Having studied the Vedas, he quelled his enemies in dharma yuddha. Being of strict vows and always engaged in the performance of yagnas, countless animals, wanting to attain swarga, came to Rantideva of their own accord to become his yagnapasus, his sacrificial beasts.

So large was the number of animal yagnas in the Agnihotra that the secretions flowing from his kitchens from the heaps of skins deposited there, created a veritable river which so came to be called the Charmanwati.

He incessantly gave away thousands of nishkas of bright gold to Brahmanas, saying gently, lovingly, "I give you nishkas. I give you nishkas."

After gifting in a single day one crore of such coins, he thought that he had given away very little and would give more. Who else is there that would be able to give as much as him?

The king gave away wealth, thinking, "If I do not give wealth to the Brahmanas, I will experience great and eternal grief."

For a hundred years, every fortnight, he gave thousands of Brahmanas a golden bull each, followed by a hundred cows and eight hundred pieces of nishkas. All that was needed for his Agnihotra and other yagnas—karukas, water-pots, plates, bedsteads, carpets, carriages, mansions, houses, diverse kinds of trees and various kinds of viands—he gave away to the Rishis.

Whatever utensils and other possessions Rantideva had were of gold. Those who in ancient times saw the phenomenal affluence of Rantideva, sing this song, "We have not seen such treasures even in the abode of Kubera; what then to say of mortal men?"

People wonderingly said, "Undoubtedly, the kingdom of Rantideva is made of sacred Svarna, of gold!"

On such nights, when guests assembled in Rantideva's palace, he sacrificed twenty-thousand and one kine to feed them. Yet the royal cook, adorned with bejewelled earrings, had to cry out, "Drink as much soup as you like, for there is not as much of meat today as on other days."

Rantideva gave away even the gold that remained with him, and was his due, to the Brahmanas during one of his yagnas. In his very presence, the Devas would come down to take the libations of clarified butter poured into the fire for them, and the Pitris the food that was offered to them in Sraddhas. Rantideva was wont to fulfill all the wishes of all true and great Brahmanas.

When he, O Srinjaya, who was superior to you in the four cardinal virtues and, so, vastly superior to your son, had to die, you should not cry, "Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!" and grieve for him who performed no yagna and gave no dakshina or sacrificial gifts.'

"Narada said, 'O Srinjaya, Dushyanta's son Bharata, we know, fell a victim to death. While only a boy living in the vana, he achieved feats no other could. He was so strong that he would bring down snow-white lions, with great fangs and talons, and drag them around like little cats. He would tame tigers also, which were fiercer and more ferocious than the lions. Seizing other mighty beasts of prey, even great elephants, dyed with red arsenic and spotted with other liquid minerals, by their tusks, he would fetch them to their knees or force them to bolt from him. He would drag the mightiest of bison by their horns; he was a master of prides of hundreds of proud lions, and powerful srimaras, horned rhinoceros, and other beasts. He would bind them by their throats, beat them within an inch of their lives and then let them go.

For his feats the regenerate rishis with whom he lived, called him Sarvadamana—the controller of all. Finally, Sakuntala, his mother, forbade him to torment animals in this way.

Gifted with great ability, he performed a hundred Aswamedha yagnas on the banks of the Yamuna, three hundred on the banks of Saraswati, and four hundred on the banks of the Ganga. Having performed these sacrifices, he yet again performed a thousand Aswamedha yagnas and a hundred Rajasuyas, great yagnas in which his gifts to the Brahmanas were more than bounteous. Other yagnas, such as the Agnishtoma, the Atiratra, the Uktha and the Viswajit, he performed, together with thousands and thousands of Vajapeyas, without any impediment, and gratified the Brahmanas with vast gifts of wealth.

The renowned Bharata gave ten thousand billions of coins, made of the purest gold, to Kanwa, who had raised his mother Sakuntala as his own daughter.

The Devas with Indra at their head, accompanied by the Brahmanas, came to his yagna, to set up his sacrificial stake made entirely of gold and measuring a hundred vyamas in width. Bharata, the noblest soul, vanquisher of all his enemies, the king never defeated by anyone, gave away millions and millions of beautifully caparisoned horses, elephants, chariots, decked with gold and exceptional gemstones of all kinds as well as camels, goats, sheep, and slaves, both male and female, and wealth, grain, milch cows with calves, villages, fields, and different kinds of robes, to the Brahmanas.

O Srinjaya, when Bharata, who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues and who was far superior to your son, had to die, you should not cry, "Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!" and grieve for your son who performed no yagna and gave no sacrificial gifts.'

"Narada said, 'O Srinjaya, Vena's son, king Prithu, we know, fell prey to death. In the Rajasuya yagna that he performed, the maharishis installed him as emperor of the world. He vanquished all and his achievements became known throughout the three worlds. For this, he came to be called Prithu, the celebrated. And because he protected all the people from injury, he became a true Kshatriya. Seeing Vena's son Prithu, all his subjects said, "We are pleased with him!"

Due to the love of his subjects, he came to be called a Rajan. During the time of Prithu, the Earth, without being cultivated, yielded crops in plenty, and cows yielded milk whenever they were touched. Every lotus was full of honey, the kusa blades were all of gold, pleasant to the touch, and otherwise delightful so that the subjects of Prithu made clothes and their beds from these grasses.

His subjects lived on fruits, which were all soft and sweet like Amrita, and none of them had ever to starve. All men were joyful, hale and robust, with all their wishes granted and with nothing to fear. They dwelt as they liked upon trees or in caves. His dominions were not divided into provinces and towns and the people lived happily and as they pleased.

When king Prithu stepped into the sea, the waves stood still. The very mountains used to yield him openings so that he might pass through them. The flagpole of his chariot never broke. Once, the tall trees of the forest, the mountains, the Devas, the Asuras, Manushas, the Nagas, the seven Rishis, the Apsaras, and the Pitris, all came to Prithu, who was seated at his ease and said to him, "You are our emperor. You are our king. You are our protector and father. You are our Lord. Therefore, O Rajan, give us the boons that we wish so that we may have gratification and joy forever."

Prithu, the son of Vena, replied, "Tathaastu".

Then taking up his bow, the Ajagava, and some dreadful astras the like of which did not exist other than with him, he reflected for a moment. He then addressed the Earth, saying, 'Come quickly, O Bhumi! Yield to them the milk they wish for. From that, blessed be you, I will give them the food they want.'

The Earth said, "You may, Shura, regard me as your daughter." And she became Prithvi.

Prithu answered, "Tathaastu"! And then the Rajarishi, his passions under perfect control, made arrangements for milking the Earth. Then the entire assembly of living beings began to milk the Earth. First of all, the tall trees of the forest rose to milk her. The Earth, full of love, stood there wanting a calf, someone to milk her, and vessels to hold the milk. The blossoming Sala tree became the calf, the Pipal became the milkman, buds became the milk and the auspicious Nyagrodha became the vessel.

Next, the mountains milked her. The Eastern mountain Udaya, where the Sun rises, became the calf; the prince of mountains, Meru, the one to milk her; the diverse gems and herbs became the milk; and the stones became the vessels to hold that milk.

Next, one of the Devas milked her, and all things that bestow tejas and urjas became the coveted milk.

The Asuras then milked the Earth, having wine for their milk and using an unbaked pot for their vessel. During this milking, Dvimurdha milked her and Virochana became the calf.

The Manavas milked the Earth for cultivation and crops. The self-created Manu became their calf and Prithu himself the milker.

Next, the Nagas milked the Earth, getting poison as milk and using a vessel made of a gourd. Dhritarashtra was the one to milk and Takshaka the calf.

The seven Rishis, who could create everything by their decree, milked the Earth, getting the Vedas as their milk. Brihaspati became the one to milk her; the Chhandas were the vessel and the excellent Soma, the calf.

The Yakshas, milking the Earth, got the power to disappear at will like the milk in an unbaked pot. Vaisravana Kubera was the one to milk her and Vrishadhvaja their calf.

The Gandharvas and the Apsaras milked all fragrant perfumes in a vessel made of a lotus-leaf. Chitraratha became their calf, and the powerful Viswaruchi the one to milk Bhumi.

The Pitris milked the Earth, getting Swaha as their milk in a vessel of silver. Yama, the son of Vivaswat, became their calf and the Destroyer Antaka the one to milk her.

Thus, the assembly of great creatures milked the Earth and all got as milk what each desired. The calves and vessels they employed exist to this day and will always exist. The powerful Prithu, the son of Vena, performed many and diverse yagnas, and gratified the desires of all creatures by gifts of whatever they wanted. He had golden images of everything found on Earth to be made and gifted them to the Brahmanas at his great Aswamedha yagna. The king caused six and sixty thousand elephants to be made of gold as well as this whole Earth to be adorned with jewels, gems and gold and gave her away as dakshina to the Brahmanas.

O Srinjaya when Prithu, who was superior to you in the four cardinal virtues and who, therefore, was far superior to your son, died, you should not, cry, “Oh, Swaitya! Oh, Swaitya!” and grieve for your son who performed no yagna and made no sacrificial gifts.’”

"Narada said, 'Even Jamadagni's son Maharishi Rama, the shura worshipped by all other heroes, he of great fame, will die, without being content with length of his life. Rooting out all evils from the Earth, he ushered in the primeval Satya Yuga. He obtained unrivalled prosperity, and no one could see any fault in him.

The Kshatriyas killed his father and stole his calf, and without any boast, he slew the invincible Kartavirya, whom no enemy had ever bested. With his bow, he killed sixty-four times ten thousand Kshatriyas. In that awesome carnage were included fourteen thousand Brahmana-hating Kshatriyas of the Dantakura country. He massacred a thousand Haihayas with his short club, a thousand with his sword and a thousand by hanging them. Enraged at the murder of his father, the wise Rama killed great warriors and scattered their corpses on the battlefield, with their chariots, horses and elephants.

Rama slaughtered ten thousand Kshatriyas with his Parasu, his battle-axe, because he could not brook their arrogant ways and talk. When many great Brahmanas called out the name of Rama of Bhrigu's race, the valiant son of Jamadagni continued against the Kashmiras, the Daradas, the Kuntis, the Kshudrakas, the Malavas, the Angas, the Vangas, the Kalingas, the Videhas, the Tamraliptakas, the Rakshovahas, the Vitahotras, the Trigartas, the Martikavatas, by the thousands, and slew them all with his astras.

Moving from kingdom to kingdom, province to province, he razed thousands of crores of Kshatriyas. Creating a deluge of blood and filling many lakes with gore as red as indragopakas or the wild fruit bandujiva and subjugating all the eighteen Dwipas of the Earth, he performed a hundred mahayagnas of great punya, all of which he completed and gave profuse dakshina to the Brahmanas.

The sacrificial altar, eighteen nalas high made entirely of gold, and wrought according to the injunctions of the shastra, full of different kinds of jewels, gems, and adorned with hundreds of standards, Kasyapa accepted as the sacrificial dakshina along with this Earth full of her animals, domestic and wild, that Rama, the son of Jamadagni, offered him. Rama also gave him many thousand prodigious elephants, all caparisoned in gold. Indeed, freeing the Earth from all thieves and brigands and filling her with honest and gracious men, Rama gave her away to Kasyapa at his great Aswamedha yagna.

Again, after he had divested the Earth of Kshatriyas twenty-one times and after performing hundreds of yagnas, that puissant Rama gave away this Bhumi to the Brahmanas. And it was Kasyapa who then accepted the Earth with her seven islands from him. Then Kasyapa said to Rama, "I command you to leave this world."

At Kasyapa's word, in obedience to the Brahmana, Rama used his arrows to make the very ocean stand aside, and going to the best of mountains called Mahendra, lived there. Even that enhancer of the fame of the Bhrigus, possessed of numberless virtues, the famed and splendid son of Jamadagni, incalculably superior to your son, will die. Do not, therefore, grieve for your prince who performed no yagna and made no sacrificial gifts. All these men, superior to you in the four cardinal virtues and also a hundred other merits, all these greatest of great men, have died, O Srinjaya, and they who are like them will also die.'"

"Vyasa says, 'Hearing this sacred itihasa of sixteen kings, which can increase the listener's life, king Srinjaya remained silent. The illustrious Rishi Narada then said to the silently seated king, "O you of great majesty, have you heard these tales and understood their purport? Or, are they lost on you like a Sraddha performed by a Muni with a Sudra wife?"

Srinjaya then replied with joined hands, "O Tapodhana, after listening to these great and laudable itihasas of ancient rajarishis, all of whom performed great yagnas with lavish dakshinas to the Brahmanas, wonder has scattered all my grief, like the rays of the sun dispelling darkness. I have been cleansed of my sins, and feel no pain now. Tell me, what I should do next."

Narada said, "It is through good fortune that your grief has been dispelled. Ask any boon that you wish for and it will be granted. I never make false promises nor ever speak an untruth."

Srinjaya said, "O holy one, I am happy that you are gratified with me, for nothing is unattainable here for those with whom you are pleased."

Narada said, “I will bring back your son, whom the brigands senselessly killed like an animal slaughtered in a yagna. I will fetch him back from terrible hell.”

Then Srinjaya’s wonderful and magnificent son appeared, that prince resembling the son of Kubera himself, restored by the gratified Rishi to the bereaved father. King Srinjaya, united again with his son, was overjoyed. Srinjaya’s son had not fulfilled the purusharthas of his life. He had performed no yagnas or given away any generous gifts upon their completion and had sired no children. He had done nothing brave and had perished miserably and not in battle. This was why he could be brought back to life.

As for Abhimanyu, he was valiant and heroic. He had fulfilled the purposes of life, for the brave son of Subhadra annihilated his enemies by the thousands before he left the world, dying on the field of battle. Your son has found even those inaccessible realms that only brahmacharya, gyana, a profound knowledge of the shastras, and the greatest of yagnas bestow.

Men of knowledge always desire swarga through their deeds of dharma. Those who live in swarga never prefer this world to it. Thus, it is not easy to bring back into this world Arjuna’s son slain in battle and now dwelling in heaven; for he has no great purpose that he did not accomplish here. Your son has attained that eternal goal that yogins achieve with eyes shut in dhyana, or performers of great yagnas, or those possessed of great punya. After death, gaining a new body, he shines forth in glory like a king, with his own immortal lustre. Indeed, he has regained his own and true body of Soma rasa that all munis want.

He does not deserve your grief. Knowing this, be quiet, and slay your enemies. O sinless one, bear this with fortitude for it is the living that stand in need of our grief, and not those who have attained to paradise. Rajan, the sins increase of those for whom the living grieve. Therefore, the wise should abandon grief and strive for the good of the dead. The living man should think of the joy, the glory and the happiness of the dead.

Knowing this, the wise never indulge in grief, for grief is painful. Understand this to be the truth. Rise up! Strive to achieve your purpose. Do not grieve. You have heard of the origin of Death, and her unprecedented tapasya, and also of her impartiality towards all creatures. You have heard that prosperity is unstable and fleeting, and how the dead son of Srinjaya was revived. O wise and learned king, do not grieve. Peace be upon you. I go now, farewell!'

Having said this, the holy Vyasa, most eloquent of men, wisest of the wise, whose complexion is like that of the clouded sky, disappears before their eyes. Yudhishtira, with tejas equal to that of Indra himself, derives consolation from what he has heard about the merit and prosperity that accrued from the yagnas performed by those great kings of old, all of whom had acquired wealth by righteous means. The Dharmaraja lauds and worships those illustrious ones in his heart and is freed from grief.

However, with a melancholy heart he asks himself, "What will we tell Arjuna?""

"Sanjaya says, 'When that terrible day, so full of slaughtering, comes to an end with the sunset, soothing twilight spreads itself over earth and sky. The troops of both the armies, Bharatarishabha, retire to their tents. And now the victorious vanara-bannered Arjuna makes his way back towards the Pandava camp on his triumphal chariot, after annihilating a great host of Samsaptakas with his devastras.

As he rides back, suddenly his heart clenches in a knot of grief and tears choke him. His voice low, he asks Krishna, "Why is my heart afraid, O Kesava, and why does my speech falter? I see evil omens and my limbs feel weak. Thoughts of terrible disaster fill my mind. I see everywhere, many kinds of omens and portents, which tell of some terrible tragedy. Is everything well with my brother the king, and all his companions?"

Krishna says, "It is evident that everything is well with your brother and his companions. Do not grieve; some trifling evil might have transpired."

The two shuras, Krishna and Arjuna, worship the twilight sandhya, and continue discussing the day's battle, which had claimed so many Kshatriya lives and during which they had achieved so many extraordinary feats. Finally, they arrive at the Pandava encampment.

Arjuna notices the joyless and melancholy air that hangs over the camp, a stricken pall, and again the pang of fear clutches at his heart. Trembling, he says to Krishna, “Janardana, no one blows the auspicious trumpets today, mingling its blasts with the beat of drums and the boom of conches. I hear no sweet vinanadam or the victorious slapping of palms. Our bards do not sing the auspicious songs of eulogy.

Ah, look how our warriors all turn away from me, with their heads hung down. They do not as usual tell me of the feats they have achieved. Madhava, is all well with my brothers today? Seeing our men all plunged in grief, I have no peace. Does all fare well with the lord of the Panchalas, with Virata, with all our warriors, O you of unfading glory? Alas, Subhadra’s son, ever cheerful, does not come out today with his brothers, smiling radiantly to receive me as he always does.”

Krishna and Arjuna enter their own quarter of the camp and find the Pandavas all plunged in deep sorrow. Seeing his brothers and sons sitting with their heads hung down, in complete silence, Arjuna is quickly distraught, full of awful fear.

Not seeing Abhimanyu there, Arjuna says, “I see that all your faces are pale, and I do not see Abhimanyu. He does not come running to embrace and welcome me as he always does. I heard that Drona formed the chakravyuha today. None among you save my son could break into that formation. I taught him myself, but I did not teach him how to break out of it again. Ah, did you make my boy enter that vyuha?

Did Subhadra’s mighty son go alone into the enemy’s midst? Did he kill countless maharathas there and finally fall to countless enemies combined against him? Oh, tell me how that indomitable hero of mighty arms and red eyes, born into our vamsa like a lion upon the mountain breast, Abhimanyu equal Vishnu himself, perished on the field of battle?”

Moment by moment certainty of the tragedy seizes Arjuna. His voice rises, and he cries desperately, “What warrior, whom Death deprived of his reason, dared kill Subhadra’s beloved son, he who was the favourite of Draupadi and Krishna, the child whom Kunti loved most? He was equal to Krishna himself in prowess, learning and dignity; how has he been slain on the field of war? If I do not see the favourite son of the daughter of the Vrishnis, whom I loved more than my life, I will not live another moment but kill myself!”

No one makes any reply, and like one caught in a deepening nightmare, Arjuna continues, biting his lip, speaking to himself as much as to the others.

"With locks ending in soft curls, of tender years, with eyes like those of a young gazelle, with a tread like that of an elephant in musth, tall like a young Sala tree, of sweet speech, ah, such sweet smiles, quiet, ever obedient to his elders, though so young, always conducting himself like one of mature years, of untold courage and energy, his eyes like lotus-petals, always kind to those who loved him, self-restrained, never doing anything mean, always grateful, learned and wise far beyond his years, a great master of astras, never fleeing from battle, instead always delighting in fight and striking fear into his enemies, ever engaged in his kinsmen's welfare, wishing victory to his sires, never striking first, perfectly fearless in war—if I do not see that son of mine, I will follow him even now to the land of Yama."

Arjuna continues truly like a man in a dreadful dream, "He was a maharatha among maharathas; he was one and a half times the warrior I am. Of tender years, of mighty arms, so very dear to Pradyumna, Kesava and myself—if I do not see my son I must leave you and go to Yama's world.

With a beautiful nose and lofty brow, with startling, brilliant eyes, and arched lips—oh, if I do not see that face, what peace can my heart have? His voice melodious as the voice of the male kokila, enchanting and sweet as the soft, deep sounds of the vina—without hearing his voice, what peace can my heart have?

His beauty is unrivalled, rare even among the Devas. Without casting my eyes on that form, what peace can my heart have? Accomplished in greeting his elders with reverence, and always obedient to the behests of his sires—alas, if I do not see him, what peace can my heart have?

Brave in battle, accustomed to every luxury, deserving of the softest bed—alas, he sleeps today on the bare earth, as if there is none to take care of him, although he is first of those who have protectors. He was attended on by the most beautiful women, in his bed; alas, mangled with arrows, inauspicious jackals, prowling the field, will attend to him today. He who was once roused from his slumbers by singers, bards and panegyrists—alas, today he will be awakened by discordant cries of beasts of prey.

His handsome face that eminently deserves to be shaded by a royal chatra—alas, the dust of the battlefield will soil it today. O my child, unfortunate that I am, death forcibly takes you away from me, who was never sated with looking at you. Today you will illumine the palace of Yama, mansion of delight, which is always the goal of men of dharma, and your brilliance will add to is lustre. Without doubt, Yama, Varuna, Indra and Kubera, finding you their favourite guest, even now make much of you, O my heroic son."

Thus lamenting like a merchant whose vessel has sunk, grief-stricken Arjuna asks Yudhishtira, "O, Kurusthama, has he ascended into Swarga after facing their fiercest warriors in battle and slaughtering the enemy? Ah, while he single-handedly fought the greatest maharathas, countless in number, his heart must have turned towards me seeking help. While set upon by Karna, Drona, Kripa and the others with arrows of every kind, with glittering heads, my son must have repeatedly thought, 'My father will be my rescuer in this peril.'

Even while he thought of me and grieved, I feel sure that savage warriors must have felled him. Or, perhaps, as he was my son, the nephew of Krishna and born to Subhadra, he would not have uttered any lamentation. But oh, my heart is made of the adamant of the Vajra, since it does not break even though I do not see that mighty-armed shura with the red eyes.

How could these cruel maharathas shoot their deep-piercing arrows at my son of such tender years, the child who was Krishna's nephew? Every evening the noble-hearted prince would rush out to greet me when I rode home; where is he today? Terrible certainty grips me that he lies slain and bathed in his own blood on naked ground. Ah, making this bhumi beautiful with his body, my child surely lies like the sun fallen from the sky.

I grieve for Subhadra, who, when she hears of her fearless son's death in battle, will end her own life in sorrow. Missing Abhimanyu, what will she say to me? What will Draupadi say to me? Ravaged by grief as they are, what will I say to them? Surely, my heart is made of the adamantine essence of the very Vajra, since it does not break in a thousand pieces at the sight of my weeping daughter-in-law Uttaraa, impaled on her grief.

I did indeed hear the leonine shouts of the Dhritarashtras swelling with pride. Krishna also heard Yuyutsu censuring the Kshatriyas of the Dhritarashtra army saying, 'Maharathas, why do you rejoice when, unable to vanquish Arjuna, you have killed only a child? Why, having done what is intolerable to Kesava and Arjuna, why do you roar like lions in joy, when in truth it is the hour for sorrow that is come? The fruits of this horrible sin of yours will overtake you swiftly. Heinous is the crime you have perpetrated. How long can it take to bear its fruits?'

Rebuking them in these words, the noble son of Dhritarashtra by his Vaisya wife rode away, flinging aside his weapons, seized by rage and grief. O Krishna, why did you not tell me all this during the battle? I would have consumed all those heartless, bestial maharathas."

Krishna consoles the stricken Arjuna, whose eyes are bathed in tears, "Do not yield so to grief. This is the way of all brave heroes, and especially of Kshatriyas, whose dharma is battle. O Mahabuddhi, such is the goal the authors of our shastras ordain for fearless warriors in war. Death is certain for Kshatriyas who do not retreat. There is no doubt that Abhimanyu has ascended to those lofty realms that are reserved for men of the highest dharma. Bharatarishabha, all brave men wish to die in battle, facing their enemies.

As for Abhimanyu, he killed so many maharathas, before meeting with a death coveted by Kshatriyas. Do not grieve, Naravyaghra, our lawgivers of old have declared the death in battle to be the eternal punya of the Kshatriyas. Best of the Bharatas, your brothers are all forlorn, as is the king, and our friends, to see you plunged in despair. You must not sharpen their grief but comfort them by being calm and brave yourself."

Controlling himself somewhat, Arjuna, his voice still choking, says to Yudhishtira and his brothers, "Lord of the earth, tell me now how my heroic Abhimanyu fought, that shura of eyes like lotus-petals. You will see me annihilate my son's killers with their elephants, chariots, horses and all their followers and kinsmen.

Yet, my great brothers, you are all masters of arms, and you were all armed in battle. How then was Subhadra's son slain, even if it were Vajradhari Indra himself whom he fought?

Alas, if I had known that Pandavas and the Panchalas would not be able to protect my son in war, I myself would have done so. You were mounted on your chariots; you held your bows and loosed your arrows. Alas, how could the enemy kill Abhimanyu, and bring a great carnage to your ranks?

Ah, you have neither manliness nor prowess, since they killed Abhimanyu before your very eyes. Or I should blame myself, because knowing that you all are weak, cowardly and irresolute, I went away! Are your coats of mail and weapons only ornaments to embellish your bodies, and were you given words only to make fine speeches in sabhas, that you failed to protect my son, despite being clad in mail, fully armed and although you gave me your solemn word that you would safeguard my son?"

Arjuna suddenly sits down, his fists clenched around his great bow and fine sword. Indeed, no one can even look at him at that time, for he is like Death himself, repeatedly drawing deep breaths. None of his friends or kinsmen venture to look at or speak to Arjuna, as he sits there, with tears streaming down his face. No one dares address him, save Krishna or Yudhishtira. These two he reveres so much that they are free to speak to him under any circumstances, and at any time.

At last, in that deep and terrible silence, slowly, Yudhishtira speaks to Arjuna.'

'Yudhishtira says, "Mahabaho, after you rode to face the Samsaptakas, Drona did everything he could to capture me. However, we resisted the Acharya at the head of his vyuha, deploying our own forces in a powerful formation. Contained by a large number of our warriors, and I too was well protected, the infuriated Drona began to assail us with his devastras, burning up whole legions of common soldiers. We could not even look at his army, far less face it in battle.

It was then that all of us asked Abhimanyu to break Drona's vyuha! And he unquestioningly sought to fulfil our wish, dreadful though the task was. The brilliant child plunged into the chakravyuha even like Garuda into the sea. As for us, we followed Abhimanyu close, but then suddenly the wretched Jayadratha barred our way, using the boon he had from Siva. Why, by himself the vile Saindhava held all of us at bay!

And then six maharathas, Drona, Kripa, Karna, Aswatthaman, the king of the Kosalas and Kritavarman, surrounded Abhimanyu. Having encircled the child, the six, who proved more than he could contain after all the fighting and killing he had done, shattered his chariot. Abhimanyu battled on foot but finally, by great mischance, Dusasana's son struck him dead.

During the day, Abhimanyu killed many thousands of men, horses and elephants; he destroyed eight thousand chariots and nine hundred elephants more, two thousand Kshatriya princes, and a vast number of warriors, all heroes if unknown to fame, and sent king Brihadbala also to heaven. Finally, through dark misfortune, your glorious son met his death.

Arjuna, that he died alone within the treacherous chakravyuha only makes our grief sharper than it might be otherwise." Yudhishtira's voice is a hoarse whisper now, "My brother, it was thus that your magnificent son, that tiger among all men, ascended to swarga!"

Arjuna moans, "Oh my son!" and heaving a great sigh, keels over on his side, swooning in agony he cannot endure. Their faces dark with sorrow, all the Pandava warriors stand around the unconscious Dhananjaya, and stare mutely at one another.

When Arjuna regains his senses, he awakes in rage that is terrible to see. Sighs like a great serpent's hisses issue from his trembling body; he draws deep shuddering breaths and tears flow in a rill down his face. He casts manic glances around him, eyes darting everywhere, like a madman, like one possessed.

In a truly dreadful voice, Arjuna says, very quietly, "I swear that tomorrow I will kill Jayadratha. If he does not forsake the Dhritarashtras from fear of death, or come to beg for our protection, or for Krishna's protection, or yours, Rajan, I will surely kill him tomorrow.

Forgetting his friendship for me, eager only to please Dhritarashtra's son, the wretch caused the death of my precious child. And tomorrow I will kill the sinner Jayadratha. Whoever faces me in battle tomorrow to protect the vile Saindhava, be it not Drona or Kripa—I will smother them with my arrows. I will kill them if they stand in my way!

O Purusharishabhas, if I do not achieve this in tomorrow's battle, let me not attain the heaven reserved for men of dharma. Why, if I do not kill Jayadratha tomorrow, let me find those hellish realms that sinners do who kill their mothers, or their fathers, or violate their guru's beds, the most vile and evil men, they who are envious of righteous men, they who speak ill of others or appropriate wealth entrusted to their care, betrayers of trusts, who speak ill of their dead wives, or who have slain Brahmanas, or sacred kine, or they who eat payasa, meat or other delicacies without having first dedicated them to the Devas. May those narakas become mine to which men who insult Brahmanas devoted to the study of the Vedas go, or speak harshly to other men worthy of respect, or to their very gurus—if I do not kill Jayadratha tomorrow!

The end that becomes theirs who lay their feet on Brahmanas or sacred fire, those who cast phlegm, excreta and urine into pure water—may even such an end be mine if I do not kill Jayadratha!

Let me find the end which is his who bathes naked in water, or his who does not hospitably entertain a guest, or he who takes bribes, speaks falsehoods and deceives and cheats others, or who offends against his own soul, or who falsely praises others, or of those low sinners who eat fine sweets in the sight of servants, sons, wives and dependents without sharing them—if I do not kill Jayadratha tomorrow!

The end of the cruel brute who does not support an obedient sishya of dharma but casts him off; the end of him who, without giving the offerings in Sraddhas to deserving neighbours, gives them instead to those who do not deserve them in the least; the end which is his who drinks wine, or insults those who are worthy of respect; or one who is ungrateful, or speaks ill of his brothers—let that end swiftly be mine if I do not kill Jayadratha!

I vow that I will immediately attain to the end of all the sinners whom I have mentioned, and also those whom I have not named, if after this night, I do not slay Jayadratha tomorrow.

And listen now to another oath of mine! If tomorrow's Sun sets without my killing that wretch, then even here will I enter a blazing fire and immolate myself! You Asuras, Devas and Manushas, you Pakshis and Nagas, you Pitris and all you Rakshasas, you Maharishis and Devarishis, O all you mobile and immobile creatures—not all of you together will succeed in protecting my enemy from me tomorrow! Even if he enters the Patalas, or rises into Akasa, or runs to the Devas in Swarga, or to the realms of the Daityas, upon the expiration of this night, I will yet with a hundred arrows, sever the head of Abhimanyu's enemy!"

Having said this, Arjuna begins to stretch the Gandiva mightily with both his arms. Echoing beyond Arjuna's voice the sound of the great bow rises and touches the very heavens. After Arjuna swears his oath, Krishna, filled with wrath, blows his conch the Panchajanya, while Arjuna blows the Devadatta. At the reverberant booming of the great Panchajanya, the rulers of the cardinal and the subsidiary points, the nether regions, why, the Lords of the whole universe tremble, as if it is the end of the Yuga. After Arjuna Mahatman has sworn his solemn oath, the sound of thousands of musical instruments and lionish warriors' roars arise from the Pandava camp.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana's spies quickly come to inform their masters of the cause of the great uproar raised by the Pandavas. Jayadratha is overwhelmed by terror, and feels as if he is sinking in a vortex of black despair. He sits plunged in thought for a time, numb, then slowly rises and comes into the assembly of the Dhartarashtra kings. He stands mute for a while in that conclave of those gods among men, and then breathes, "He whom Indra sired in Pandu's soil has sworn to send me to Yamaloka tomorrow! May fortune smile on you, I will return to my home for I have no wish to die. O Kshatriyarishabhas, protect me with your weapons, for Arjuna seeks to kill me. Make me fearless! Drona, Duryodhana, Kripa, Karna, Salya, Balhika, Dusasana and all you others can protect a man from Yama himself. When Phalguna alone threatens me, will these the lords of the earth not join together and protect me?

Great is my fear after hearing the Pandavas shouting loud in joy. My limbs, Bhumipalas, have turned weak like a dying man's. The Gandeevi has sworn to kill me. And that is why the Pandavas are roaring in joy at a time when they should weep! Let alone the rulers of men, the very Devas, Gandharvas, the Asuras, the Uragas and the Rakshasas cannot thwart Arjuna when he has sworn to kill me. And so, you bulls among men, blessed be you, give me leave to depart the Kuru camp for I have no wish to die. Even Arjuna cannot take my life if he does not find me here!"

Thus does the terrified Jayadratha babble in fear, but Duryodhana, always looking to achieve his own ends over everything else, says, "Do not fear, Naravyaghra! Who will dare seek to kill you when you are in the midst of all these Kshatriya tigers? Vikartana's son, Karna, Chitrasena, Vivimsati, Bhurisravas, Sala, Salya, the invincible Vrishasena, Purumitra, Jaya, Bhoja, Sudakshina of the Kambojas, Satyavrata, the Mahabaho Vikarna, Durmukha, Dusasana, Subahu of the Kalingas, and I myself, with weapons raised, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, Drona, Drona's son, and Subala's son Sakuni—all these and many other kings, with their armies, will protect you on all sides. Let the fever of fear in your heart be dispelled.

You are yourself one of the greatest maharathas. O splendid Jayadratha, you are a shura, a magnificent hero. And being what you are, how can you see any cause for fear? My own eleven akshauhinis will fight just to protect you tomorrow. O king of the Sindhus, let your fears be dispelled!"

Comforted somewhat by your son, the king of the Sindhus, along with Duryodhana, goes then to meet Drona, the senapati of the Kuru army. Touching Drona's feet with reverence and taking his seat with humility, Jayadratha earnestly asks the Acharya, "Illustrious one, tell me the difference between Arjuna and myself in striking a target from a distance, in the firmness of our grips, and the force of shooting our arrows. O Acharya, I want to know accurately the difference as bowmen between Arjuna and myself! I beg you, tell me this truthfully, for only you can."

Drona says, "O son I have given both Arjuna and you the same measure of instruction. However, through yoga and because of the hard life that Arjuna has led, he is superior to you. But for no reason should you be afraid of Partha. For have no doubt that I will protect you from what you fear. The very Devas cannot prevail over him whom my arms protect. Tomorrow I will form a vyuha that Partha will not succeed in piercing!

So have no fear and observe your swadharma. O maharatha, walk in the path of your fathers and grandfathers. Having studied the Vedas, you have poured libations, according to the laws, into fire. You have performed many yagnas. Death cannot be an object of terror for you. For if you die, you will acquire the great good fortune which evil men cannot attain and you will gain all those felicitous regions in heaven that only the might of arms can bestow!

The Kauravas, the Pandavas, the Vrishnis and other men, and also my son and I, are all mortal and short-lived. Think of this. One after another, all of us, killed by Kaala which is all powerful, will go to the other world, carrying only our deeds with us—the same regions that munis acquire through severe penances and heroic Kshatriyas who observe their swadharma."

Thus, Bharadwaja's son consoles the king of the Sindhus. Banishing his fear of Partha, he sets his heart on the battle to follow. Then, Rajan, your troops also feel great delight and one hears the loud sounds of musical instruments, mingled with lusty roars."'

"Sanjaya says, 'After Partha vows to kill Jayadratha, Krishna says to Arjuna, "With only your brother's consent and without consulting me, you have sworn to kill the Saindhava. You have been rash to swear this oath and taken a great burden upon yourself. Alas, how will we escape the ridicule of all men? I sent some spies into Duryodhana's camp and my men report that after you vowed to kill the king of the Sindhus, the Dhartarashtras heard our loud roaring, mingled with the sounds of our musical instruments. This terrified them and their well-wishers, and they thought these tigerish shouts could not be without good reason and waited to see what would ensue.

O Mahabaho, a clamour has arisen among the Kauravas, their elephants, horses and foot-soldiers; and we hear the terrible rattle of their chariots. After hearing of the death of Abhimanyu, they fear that you, Arjuna, will set out in the very night, raging for battle!

The Kaurava king waits ready for battle. While preparing themselves, O you of eyes like lotus-petals, they learnt of the vow that you swore to kill Jayadratha. All Duryodhana's counsellors became faint-hearted and frightened like little animals. Jayadratha, king of the Sindhus and the Sauviras, was overwhelmed by fear and hastily called his closest advisors for a consultation.

After consulting them, he went to the assembly of the allied kings and there said to Duryodhana, "Arjuna thinks of me as his son's killer and will challenge me to battle tomorrow. In the midst of his army, he has sworn to kill me. The very Devas, Gandharvas, Asuras, Uragas and Rakshasas cannot frustrate Arjuna's solemn vow. So protect me. Do not let Dhananjaya set his foot on your head, and find his mark, which is my life! Make every arrangement to safeguard me; otherwise, if you think you cannot save me from Arjuna on the field, give me leave to return to my kingdom."

Seeing Jayadratha so terrified, an unhappy Duryodhana sat with his head hung down and reflecting in silence. Seeing the Kuru king distraught, Jayadratha slowly says, "I do not see any archer here who can match Arjuna in war. Who, even if it were Satakratu himself, can stand against Arjuna who has Krishna for his sarathy, and wields the Gandiva? I hear that Partha fought Lord Maheswara himself once on the mountains of Himavat. At Indra's behest, from a single chariot he slew a thousand Danavas of Hiranyapura.

And now that the clever Vasudeva is his ally, I feel certain that Arjuna can destroy the three worlds including their very gods. I beseech you that you either grant me permission to leave Kurukshetra or ensure that the high-souled and heroic Drona with his son will assuredly protect me. I await your pleasure."

O Arjuna, hearing Jayadratha's pitiful plea, Duryodhana also added his voice to humbly beseech Drona to protect the Saindhava. And they have indeed taken every measure in their power to protect Jayadratha. They have deployed all their chariots and cavalry. Karna, Bhurisravas, Drona's son Aswatthaman, the invincible Vrishasena, Kripa, and Salya of the Madras—these six will be in Jayadratha's van. Drona will form a vyuha half of which will be a Sakata, a cart, and half a Padma, a lotus. In the midst of the leaves of that lotus will be a needle-mouthed formation, a suchimukha vyuha. At the eye of the needle, Jayadratha will take his stand, protected by those six greatest Kuru maharathas!

In the use of the bow, and every other weapon, in the ability to kill their enemies, in sheer prowess, and also in lineage, these six maharathas are well nigh without equal. Without first vanquishing these six, you will not be able to reach Jayadratha.

Think, O Arjuna, of the individual prowess of each of the six. When united they cannot be vanquished easily, if at all! And so, for our benefit and our success, we should once again take counsel with our well-wishers, who are familiar with strategy!'"

"Arjuna says, 'The prowess of the six maharathas of Dhritarashtra's army whose united might you think so highly of, I believe is not equal to even half of mine! You will see, O Madhusudana, how I destroy their weapons and render them impotent, when I confront them on my way to kill Jayadratha! In the very sight of Drona and all his men, I will behead the king of the Sindhus, and Duryodhana's whole army will weep and lament.

Even if the Siddhas, the Rudras, the Vasus, with the Aswins, the Maruts, with Indra at their head, the Viswadevas with the other Gods, the Pitris, the Gandharvas, Garuda, the Ocean, the Mountains, the Firmament, Heaven, Earth, the cardinal and subsidiary points of the compass and the regents of those points, all the beasts that are domestic and all that are wild, in fact if all the mobile and the unmoving beings together become the protectors of Jayadratha, O Krishna, you will see me kill him tomorrow with my arrows! I swear by Truth; I touch my weapons and swear by them that I will, at the very outset, face the mighty Drona, who has become the protector of the sinner Jayadratha. Duryodhana believes that this game of war hinges upon Drona. And even so, hewing my way through the very van that Drona himself commands, I will strike at Jayadratha!

Tomorrow you will see the great Acharya blown away by my arrows like the summits of a hill struck by thunder. Blood will flow in rills from the breasts of fallen men, elephants and horses, eviscerated by my showers of shafts falling heavily upon them. The astras shot from the Gandiva, fleet as the mind or the wind, will claim the lives of thousands upon thousands of men, elephants and steeds.

In tomorrow's battle, all men shall see the awesome astras that I have acquired from Yama, Kubera, Varuna, Indra and Rudra. You will witness how my Brahmastra nullifies the weapons of all those who come to protect Jayadratha.

O Krishna, tomorrow you will see the Earth strewn with the heads of kings cut off cleanly by my shafts! Tomorrow I will gratify all the thirst and hunger of all the ravening Rakshasas that stalk Kurukshetra. I will mow down the enemy and gladden my friends, and finally I will cut the head of the ruler of the Sindhus from his throat.

He is a vile and heinous sinner; he has not behaved like a relative; he is born in a sinful country and when I kill him, it will plunge dark grief through all that are his own. Krishna, tomorrow you will see the wretched Jayadratha, who was raised in every luxury, die from my inexorable arrows!

Tomorrow, Krishna, I will do that which will make Duryodhana believe that there is no bowman in the world who is Arjuna's equal. My Gandiva is a celestial bow. I, Arjuna, am the warrior. You, O Hrishikesa, are the charioteer. What can come between me and my prey, who is there that I cannot vanquish? Through your grace, O Holy one, what is there that I cannot achieve in battle? Knowing well that my power is irresistible, why, O Krishna, do you still rebuke me?

As Lakshmi is ever present in Soma, as water is ever present in the ocean, know, O Janardana, that I always accomplish what I have sworn to do. Do not think lightly of my weapons. Do not think lightly of my great bow. Do not think lightly of the might of my arms. Do not think lightly of your Dhananjaya. I will go into battle in such heart that I shall not lose but surely prevail. When I have vowed it, know that Jayadratha has already been slain. Truly, in the Brahmana is truth; in men of dharma is humility; in yagna is prosperity, and always in Narayana is victory!"

Having said these words to Krishna, having said all this to himself, as well, in a deep voice Arjuna once more addresses the Lord Kesava, saying, “Krishna, yet the task before us is grave and not easy, and you must prepare our chariot by the hour of dawn. We must ride forth at break of day and conquer!”’

"Sanjaya says, 'Stricken with sorrow and frequently sighing like two snakes, Krishna and Arjuna both get no sleep that night. Realising that Nara and Narayana are in wrath, the Devas along with Vasava grow anxious and think, "What will come of this?"

Fierce dry winds, foreboding danger, begin to blow, howling, and a headless trunk and a mace appear on the disc of the sun. And although the sky is cloudless, there are frequent peals of thunder, and flashes of lightning. The earth with her mountains, rivers and forests, shake; and the seas, the habitation of makaras, swell in agitation and crash against their shores. And the rivers flow back towards their sources, opposite to their normal course. The lips of chariot-warriors, horses, men and elephants, begin to tremble unaccountably. The animals on the field began to spray urine and dung and utter loud cries, to the delight of Rakshasas and pisachas, and foretelling a great exodus of men to the domain of Yama. Seeing these omens that make the hair stand on end, and hearing of the fierce vow of mighty Arjuna, all your warriors, Bharatarishabha, are desperately agitated.

Arjuna, the mighty-armed son of Indra, says to Krishna, “O Madhava, go and comfort your sister Subhadra, her daughter-in-law Uttaraa and her companions. Speak soothing words to her, words of deep truth and solace.”

Krishna reluctantly makes his way to Arjuna’s tent, and begins to console his sister grieving at the death of her son. Krishna says, “O you of Vrishni’s vamsa, do not grieve, you and Uttaraa, for your son. All creatures have but one end ordained by Time. The end your son has met is the most desirable one for any Kshatriya of proud lineage. Do not grieve, for by good fortune your maharatha of great intelligence, of prowess equal to that of his father, has met with an end that all Kshatriyas covet.

After vanquishing numberless enemies and sending them to Yama’s land, he himself has gone to the eternal realms of men of dharma, worlds that grant the realisation of every wish. Your son has attained the end which men of dharma attain only through tapasya, brahm, knowledge of the shastras and gyana. The mother, the wife, the daughter and a kinsman of such Kshatriyas, O Subhadra, do not grieve for a son who has obtained the supreme end.

The evil king of the Sindhus, my beautiful sister, the murderer of a child, will, with all his friends and kinsmen, find the fruit of his arrogance before the end of this day. Even if he enters Indra’s domain he will not escape Arjuna. Tomorrow you will hear that his head has been cut from his neck to roll dismally on the hem of Samantapanchaka!

Abandon your sorrow and do not grieve, for your valiant son has attained the end that men of dharma who observe the svadharma of a Kshatriya fervently wish for. Your splendid, magnificent Abhimanyu has attained swarga. Drive away this fever of sorrow. Comfort your daughter-in-law, O queen, that, obedient to his fathers and his mother’s kinsmen, the heroic Abhimanyu has slain thousands upon thousands of his enemies before dying a great Kshatriya’s death in the field of war. Do not grieve too much, O Kshatriya woman!

Drive away your grief, gentle Subhadra, for tomorrow will bring great tidings. Arjuna will accomplish what he has sworn to do. It cannot be otherwise, for your husband never fails to do as he has sworn. Even if all Manavas, Nagas, Pisachas, Rakshasas, great Avians, and all the Devas and the Asuras come to help the king of the Sindhus, Jayadratha will still die tomorrow.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'But Subhadra cannot control her terrible grief and wails, "Oh, my son, of prowess equal to your father, O my child, how could you die? Alas, how does your face like a blue lotus, with its perfect teeth and brilliant eyes, look now covered over with battle's dust?

You were so entirely brave, your head so handsome, your neck, arms, your deep chest, your low flat belly, your splendid limbs decked with ornaments, your beautiful sparkling eyes! All creatures looked upon you as the rising moon, and now you have been mutilated, my perfect child, and fallen on the yawning field of death. Alas, your bed was always overlaid with the whitest and costliest sheets; you who deserved every luxury, how do you sleep today on the bare earth, your body mangled with arrows?

The mighty Kshatriya, whom the most beautiful women waited on, has now fallen on the field, to pass his time in the company of jackals! He whom vabdhis and magadhis daily hymned at dawn is today greeted by the savage cries and growls of Rakshasas and beasts of prey.

O my precious son, who killed you, and how, when you had the Pandavas and all the Panchalas for your protectors? Oh my son, O sinless one, I am not yet satisfied with looking at you. Wretched as I am, it is plain that I will have to go to Yama's realm now for my eyes have not seen enough of you. When will I cast my gaze again on your face with its lotus-like eyes and shining locks, the smooth radiant face from which endearing words and the most delicate fragrance constantly issued?

Fie on the strength of Bhimasena, on the archery of Partha, on the prowess of the Vrishni heroes and the might of the Panchalas! Shame on the Kaikeyas, the Chedis, the Matsyas and the Srinjayas, who could not protect you, O my shuravira! I see the Earth as being empty and hollow today, and made of just sorrow and despair. My eyes hurt and stream tears that they do not see my Abhimanyu. You were Krishna's sister's son, the son of the wielder of Gandiva, and yourself an incomparable hero and an atiratha. Alas, how will I look at you dead!

O Kshatriya, to me you were like a treasure that is briefly won and lost in a dream. Oh, everything human is as fleeting as a bubble of water on this river of time. Your young wife is overwhelmed by grief at the evil that has befallen you. And how will I, who am like a cow without her calf, comfort her? O my sweet prince, you have so untimely fled from me, even as your greatness was about to flower and bear wondrous fruit. Oh my son, can you see how my heart is breaking over and over for just a glimpse of your face! Ah, there is no doubt that not the wisest can fathom the inexorable ways of Death, since despite having Krishna for your protector you were killed as if you were quite helpless.

O son, let that end be yours which is theirs that perform yagnas, who are Brahmanas of purified souls, those who have practised brahmacharya, have bathed in all the sacred tirthas, who are grateful and charitable and devoted to the service of their gurus, and those who have given sacrificial dakshina in profusion. The end that is theirs who are intrepid and fearless in battle, or theirs who have fallen most heroically in war, after slaying their enemies—O my Abhimanyu, let that end be yours!

The auspicious end which is theirs who have given away a thousand cows, or theirs who have given lavish dana in yagnas, or theirs who give away houses and mansions, the end which is theirs who give away gems and jewels to deserving Brahmanas, or theirs who are punishers of crime—O, let that end be yours.

The end that Munis of rigid vows attain through brahmacharya, or that which women who remain faithful to one husband, attain—O son, let that end be yours.

The eternal end which kings get by their good deeds, or by those men who have cleansed themselves by leading all the four varnasramas one after another, and by duly observing their dharma, the end of men who are compassionate to the poor and the distressed, or those who equitably divide sweets among themselves and their dependants, or those who are never given to deceit and evil—O my son, let that end be yours!

O child, the end of those who observe chaste vows, or who are virtuous, devoted to the service of their gurus, or those who have never sent away a guest without entertaining them—let that end be yours.

O son, let the end of those who succeed in adversity and of those who have the most difficult trait of preserving the equanimity of their souls, however much they are burnt by the fires of grief, let that end be yours.

O son, let that end be yours which is theirs who are always devoted to the service of their fathers and mothers, or theirs who are exclusively devoted to their own wives.

O son, let that end be yours which those wise men attain who restrain themselves from the wives of others and seek the companionship of only their own wives in season.

O son, let that end be yours which is theirs that look upon all creatures with an eye of peace, or theirs that never give pain to others, or theirs that always forgive.

O son, let that end be yours which is theirs who abstain from honey, meat, wine, pride and falsehood.

Let that goal be yours which they attain who are modest, acquainted with all the shastras, content with knowledge, and have their passions under control."

While the stricken Subhadra thus laments, wildly, Draupadi accompanied by Virata's daughter Uttaraa, comes to her. All of them, in great sorrow, weep copiously and indulge in heart-rending expressions of grief. Quite lost to reason through sorrow, they faint and fall onto the earth. Then Krishna the lotus-eyed one, who stands ready with water, himself deeply affected, sprinkles water over his weeping, unconscious and trembling sister, pierced through her very heart. When she comes to her senses, he attempts to comfort her again, and the others as well.

"Grieve not, Subhadra! O Panchali, console Uttaraa! Abhimanyu, bull among Kshatriyas, has found the most laudable end for himself. O Sumukhi, you of the beautiful face, may all the other men yet alive in our race obtain the end which Abhimanyu of great fame has. We, with all our friends, together only wish to achieve in this war the feats which your son, the atiratha, achieved by himself! So do not grieve for that hero with no remote equal."

Finally, having somewhat consoled his sister, and Draupadi and Uttaraa, through his presence and grace as much as by what he says, Krishna, returns to Arjuna. Saluting the kings, friends and Arjuna himself, Kesava enters the inner apartments of Arjuna's palatial tent while the other kings return to their own tents.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Lord Kesava, of eyes like lotus petals, enters the sprawling tent, Arjuna's unrivalled mansion on Kurukshetra; he touches water, and lays out on the auspicious and even floor for Arjuna an excellent bed of kusa grasses, which are the colour of lapis lazuli. And arranging his majestic weapons around the bed, duly adorns it with garlands of flowers, fried paddy, perfumes and other auspicious things. After Partha also touches water, gentle and attentive attendants bring the nightly yagna offerings for the three-eyed Lord Mahadeva. With a serene soul, Arjuna smears Krishna with perfumes and offers him the sacred nightly offering adorned with flowers.

With a faint smile, Govinda says to Arjuna, "Bless you, Partha, lie down and sleep. I will leave you now."

Seeing that doorkeepers and well-armed guards are in their places, Krishna, followed by Daruka his charioteer, goes to his own tent. There the illustrious one of eyes like lotus petals lies on his white bed and thinks of different ways to dispel Partha's grief and anxiety and enhance his confidence and greatness. Then he, the Supreme Lord of all, Vishnu of universal fame, who always does what is for Arjuna's weal, immerses himself in yoga and dhyana.

Everyone else in the Pandava camp, Rajan, is awake, thinking, "Burning with grief at the death of his son, the Gandivi has swiftly vowed to kill the Saindhava. But how will Arjuna Parantapa accomplish his rash vow? He has sworn a difficult oath, for Jayadratha is invested with great prowess and great protection too. Oh, may Arjuna succeed in fulfilling his dire vow that he swore while he was in the grip of searing grief!

The sons of Dhritarashtra are all mighty warriors and their forces are countless. Duryodhana has assigned all of them to be just Jayadratha's protectors tomorrow. Oh, let Dhananjaya return to our encampment tomorrow after slaying the king of the Sindhus. Let him fulfil his vow. If he fails, he will surely enter the fire and immolate himself, for he never swears a false oath. If Arjuna dies, how will Dharmaputra Yudhishtira, who has reposed all his hopes of victory in Arjuna, succeed in recovering his kingdom? If we have all acquired any punya, if we have ever poured libations of ghrita into fire, let Savyasachin benefit from our punya and vanquish all his enemies!"

Speaking thus amongst themselves, and deeply anxious for the morrow, the Pandava warriors pass that long night.

In the heart of the night, Krishna awakes, remembers Arjuna's vow, and says softly, but in a terrible voice, to his charioteer, "Daruka, grief-stricken at his son's death, Arjuna has vowed, that before tomorrow's sun sets he will kill Jayadratha or take his own life. Hearing this, Duryodhana will surely take counsel with his advisors about how Partha can be prevented from fulfilling his vow. His several akshauhinis will all protect Jayadratha. Drona, too, with his son Aswatthaman, will stand watch over the Saindhava. And even Indra himself, the thousand-eyed scourge of the pride of the Daityas and Danavas, will hardly be able to kill one whom great Drona protects. And if Arjuna does not do as he has sworn he must take his own life. I mean to help Kunti's son to kill Jayadratha before the sun sets.

My wives, my kinsmen, my relatives, none among these are dearer to me than Arjuna. Daruka, I will not be able to look upon an Earth without Arjuna in it for even a single moment. I say to you, the Earth shall not be without Arjuna for I will raze them all, with their horses and elephants, by putting forth my might for Partha's sake. I will kill them all along with Karna and Duryodhana. Tomorrow let the three worlds witness my prowess when I join the fray for Arjuna’s sake, and thousands of kings and hundreds of princes, with their horses, chariots and elephants, flee the battle or die from fear of me.

Daruka, you will see my wrath for I will decimate the army of kings, and the three worlds with the Devas, the Gandharvas, the Pisachas, the Nagas and the Rakshasas, will know me as a true friend of Savyasachin. Those who hate him hate me. Those who follow him, follow me. You are intelligent, Daruka, so know that Arjuna is half of myself.

When morning comes after this night ends, you, Daruka, must equip my chariot with the Kaumodaki, my Sudarshana Chakra, my Saringa and my astras, and everything else I might need, and then you must follow me discreetly into battle. O Suta, make room upon my chariot for my standard and for heroic Garuda thereon, who adorns my chatra. Yoke my horses Balahaka, Meghapushpa, Saibya and Sugriva, after having them cased in golden mail of the splendour of the Sun and Fire; and then put on your own armour and remain in the chariot vigilantly waiting.

When you hear the blast of my Panchajanya blowing the shrill Rishabha note, fly to me. In a single day, Daruka, I will dispel the wrath and the many sorrows of my cousin, the son of my aunt. I will do everything in my power to see that Arjuna kills Jayadratha in the very sight of the Dhartarashtras. Why, Daruka, I say to you that I will ensure that Dhananjaya will surely kill everyone he wants to.”

Daruka says, “He, whose charioteer, O Naravyaghra, you become is certain to be victorious. Indeed, from where can defeat come to him? As for myself, I will do as you have commanded. This night will bring in its wake an auspicious morning for Arjuna’s triumph and glory.’”’

"Sanjaya says, 'Kunti's son, Dhananjaya of inconceivable prowess, also lies thinking of ways to accomplish his vow. He recollects the mantras Vyasa had taught him and chanting them silently is soon lulled into sleep. To the Kshatriya of the Hanuman banner, his heart burning with grief even in slumber, Krishna of the Garuda banner appears in a dream. Arjuna Dharmatma always rises and advances a few steps to greet Krishna in bhakti whenever he sees him. And now in his dream as well he rises and offers Govinda a seat, while he keeps standing himself.

Krishna Mahatejasvin says to Kunti's son, "Let not your heart grieve, O Partha. Time is immutable and it forces all creatures into its inevitable course. Greatest of men, why do you grieve? Grief should never be indulged in, for it is an impediment to action. Fulfil your karma; accomplish what you have sworn to do. Dhananjaya, the grief that makes a man abandon all effort is an enemy of the warrior. By giving in to sorrow, a Kshatriya pleases his enemies and saddens his friends, while he himself is weakened. It does not become you to grieve."

The unvanquished Vijaya of deep learning says, "Grave is the vow that I have sworn, to kill Jayadratha. And tomorrow I will slay the evil one, my son's murderer. This is my solemn vow, Kesava! To frustrate me, the Dhartarashtras will keep Jayadratha at their rear, protected by all their maharathas.

Their army consists of the remnants of eleven akshauhinis of troops, still difficult to vanquish. Surrounded as he will be by all of them and by all their great maharathas besides, how will we even catch a glimpse of the vile Saindhava? O Krishna, I may not be able to fulfil my oath! And if I fail, how can I continue to live, Kesava? Ah, I fear that I will not succeed in keeping the impossible vow that I have sworn, demented as I was by Abhimanyu's death. And this is what makes me grieve.

Besides, at this time of the year, Krishna, the Sun sets early!"

Hearing this, the cause of Arjuna's grief and anxiety, Krishna gently touches water with his fingers and sits with his face turned to the east. The lotus-leaf-eyed One says to his cousin who has sworn to kill Jayadratha the next day, "Partha, there is an inexorable, supreme astra called the Pasupata. With it, the Lord Maheswara once slew all the Daityas! If you meditate upon that final weapon now, you will be able to kill Jayadratha tomorrow. If you do not know that Pasupatastra, worship Maheswara, who has the Bull for his mark. Think of the Mahadeva in your heart and fix your mind on him in dhyana, Arjuna. You are his devotee and through his grace, you will have that invaluable weapon."

Hearing Krishna's words, Arjuna now touches water and sits on the ground in deep dhyana, his thought fixed on the Lord Bhava. It is the auspicious Brahmamuhurta when Arjuna meditates on Siva. Arjuna sees himself journeying through the sky with Krishna, and travelling with the speed of the mind to the sacred foot of Himavat and the Manimat mountain replete with many brilliant gemstones, Manimat frequented by Siddhas and Charanas.

Krishna seems to hold his left arm as they course along, and Arjuna sees many wonderful sights there. Dharmatma Arjuna then finds himself at the White mountain of the north, Sweta, where, in the pleasure-gardens of Kubera, he sees the crystalline exquisite lake, the Bindusaras festooned with lotuses. He also sees the Ganga, greatest of rivers, brimful of pellucid water. Flying on, he arrives at the Mandara mountains covered with unearthly and awesome trees that are always laden with flowers and fruit.

Fine stones lie strewn everywhere in this place; all of them are the finest lucent crystals. Lions, tigers and diverse animals abound here, some truly exotic and found nowhere else, as do auspicious asramas of Munis, which echo with the sweet songs of brightly plumed birds, and also the transcendent songs of Kinnaras. Many golden and silver peaks grace this wondrous realm, and different magical herbs and plants illumine it; and Mandara trees with their gorgeous loads of flowers.

Then Arjuna comes to the mountain called Kala that looks like a great mound of antimony, and its summit Brahmatunga, and flying on, comes to many sparkling rivers and peopled realms, inhabited by men as well as unearthly beings. He comes to Satasringa, and the vana called Sharyati and sees the sacred Horse-head, the realm of Atharvana. He sees that prince of mountains called Vrishadansa, and the great Mandara, graced by Apsaras and Kinnaras.

Wandering on that mountain, Arjuna and Krishna see a place where exquisite fountains plash, a place shimmering with the rarest gold of the gods, lambent like the Moon, and with many shining cities and towns. In this fabulous zone of dreams, he also comes upon uncanny seas of marvellous shapes and diverse mines of untold wealth. And going through the sky, and over the earth, he arrives at the place known as Vishnupada. Like an arrow shot from a bow does Arjuna fly through the vaults of these skies of dream, with Krishna beside him, while below them indescribable landscapes unfold.

Soon Partha sees a mountain whose splendour equals that of the stars, the constellations, or fire. And at the summit of this lone and towering massif, he sees the Great God whose mount and emblem is the Bull. Arjuna sees Lord Siva who is always at tapasya, Mahadeva whose lustre is like that of a thousand suns fused, ah, ablaze with his own effulgence. Siva sits with trident in hand, matted jata upon his awesome head, his complexion white as snow or moonbeams, and wearing bark and deerskin.

Of tejas past telling, Maheswara's body seems to be alight with a thousand mystic eyes. He is seated with Parvati, with many creatures of fantastic and brilliant forms around him, his ganas, while his attendants sing and play musical instruments, full of joy, laughing and dancing in bliss, moving about and stretching their arms as if in waking trance, and often shouting aloud in primeval ecstasy. Divine fragrances perfume that place, and Rishis who worship the Brahman, worship Siva here with exceptional hymns of unfading glory—the God who is the Pasupati, the Lord and Protector of all creatures, who wields the great bow called the Pinaka.

Seeing Rudra, Krishna Mahatman and Arjuna prostrate and touch the earth with their heads, uttering the eternal words of the Veda. Krishna worships with speech, thought, intellect, and by what he does, the God who is the first source of the universe, himself uncreated, the Supreme Lord of unfading glory, who is the highest cause of the mind, who is Akasa and Vayu, who is the cause of all the luminous bodies in the universe, who is the cause of rain, and the Supreme, Primordial Essence of the Earth, who is the object of the adoration of the Devas, the Danavas, the Yakshas, and Manushas; who is the supreme Brahman that Yogins see and the refuge of those who know the Shastras, who is the Creator of all mobile and unmoving creatures and their Destroyer too; who is the Wrath that burns everything at the end of the Yuga; who is the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul; who is Sakra and Surya, and the origin of all the gunas.

Krishna seeks the protection of that Bhava, whom men of knowledge, wanting to attain to that which is called the sukshma and the adhyatma, seek; that Uncreated One who is the Soul of all causes. Arjuna also repeatedly worships the Great God, knowing that He is the Origin of all beings, the Cause of the past, the future and the present.

Seeing those two, Nara and Narayana, arrive, Bhava Anandatman, He of blissful soul, smilingly says, "Welcome greatest of men! Arise and let the tiredness of your journey leave you. What, O heroes, do you wish for? Tell me quickly, what brings you here? I will grant everything you want and do everything that will benefit you besides."

At these words of Siva, Krishna and Arjuna rise and then, with joined hands, the immaculate twain, both of great wisdom, praise that noblest Deity with a most resonant and excellent hymn. Krishna and Arjuna say, "We bow to Bhava, to Sarva, to Rudra, to the boon-giving Siva. We bow to the Pasupati, Lord of all creatures endued with life, to the Deva who is Ugra, fierce, to Him who is called Kapardin!

We bow to Mahadeva, to Bhimasankara, to Tryambaka, to Him who is Satchitananda. We bow to Isana, to Him who is the destroyer of Daksha's yagna.

We salute the slayer of Andhaka, the father of Kumara, to He who is Nilakantha, and the First Creator.

Our salutations to the wielder of the Pinaka, to Him who is worthy of the offering of libations of ghrita, to Him who is Truth, to Him who is All-pervading, to Him who is unvanquished, to Him who has luculent blue jata, to Him who is armed with the Trisula, to Him of celestial vision!

Our greetings to him who is Hotri, to Him who protects all, to Him who has three eyes, to Him who is disease, to Him whose hiranyaretas fell into Agni, to Him who is inconceivable, to him who is the Lord of Ambika, to Him who is adored by all the Devas!

Our salutations to Him who has the Bull for his mark, to Him who is bold, to Him who has matted dreadlocks, to Him who is a Brahmachari, to Him who stands as an ascetic in water, to him who is devoted to the Brahman, who is the Brahman, to Him who has never been conquered, to Him who is the Soul of the universe, to Him who is the Creator of the universe, to Him who lives pervading the whole universe!

We bow to You who are the object of the reverence of all, to You who are the Original Cause of all creatures, to You who are called Brahmachakra, to Sarva, Sankara, and Siva! We bow to You, the Lord of all great beings!

We bow to You who have a thousand heads, to You who have a thousand arms, to You who are called Death, to You who have a thousand eyes and a thousand feet, to You whose great deeds are innumerable!

We bow to You, Hiranyavarna, whose complexion is of gold, to You who are cased in golden kavacha, to You who are always compassionate to your devotees!

O Lord, let our wish be granted."

Having adored Mahadeva thus, Krishna and Arjuna then begin to further gratify Him to have the great Pasupatastra from the God of gods.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Partha, with a full soul and joined hands, his eyes wide with wonder, gazes at the God with the bull for his mount, He who is the home of all tejas. Partha sees the offerings that he makes every night to Krishna lying before the Three-eyed Deity. The son of Pandu worships both Krishna and Sarva in his heart, and says to Siva, "Lord, I wish to have the Pasupatastra from you."

Siva smilingly says to Vasudeva and Arjuna, "Welcome Purushottamas! I know what you want and the reason why you have come here. I will give you what you wish for. Parantapas, there is a lake full of amrita, not far from this place. In it, I left my celestial bow and astra, with which I once slew all the enemies of the Devas. Krishna, go and fetch that divine bow with the arrow fixed to it."

Hearing what Siva says, Vasudeva and Arjuna answer, "Tathaastu, so be it."

Accompanied by all the ganas of Siva, the two heroes set out for the unearthly lake replete with countless heavenly wonders, the sacred lake that can grant every object of desire. Reaching the lake, the Rishis Nara and Narayana, who are Arjuna and Krishna, go fearlessly up to the water bright as the disc of the sun, and see within it a great and terrible snake and yet another enormous, which has a thousand heads, the effulgence of fire and spews flames from all its jaws. Krishna and Partha touch the water, join their hands together, and approach the snakes, bowing in their minds to the God Siva. As they approach, the amazing Nagas, who know the Vedas, chant the hundred hymns of the Veda that praise Lord Rudra, bowing all the while with their devout souls to Bhava of immeasurable power.

Then, all at once, from their worship of Siva, the two awesome serpents abandon their snake-forms and assume the shapes of an enemy-destroying bow and arrow! Gratefully, Krishna and Arjuna seize the bow and arrow of blinding refulgence and bring them back to the illustrious Mahadeva. Now, from one side of Siva's body a Brahmacharin of tawny eyes emerges, who seems to be the very refuge of asceticism. Of blue throat and red jata, he is invested with untold might. Taking up the great bow effortlessly, the Brahmacharin places his feet in alidha, the archer's stance, fixes the brilliant arrow to the bowstring, and begins to stretch the bow.

Watching the way the Brahmacharin stands, holds the bow and draws back the string, and listening to the mantras that Siva recites, Arjuna instantly masters what he watches and hears. The mighty Brahmacharin unleashes the arrow to the same lake from which it was brought and, with a cry, flings the bow into that lake. Arjuna remembers the boon that Siva granted him in the vana when He came as a Kirata; he recalls the Vision of Himself that Siva showed him in the vana and knows that Bhava is pleased with him. Silently, Arjuna prays, "May all this bear fruit."

Understanding this to be his wish, Bhava blesses him with power over the Pasupatastra and the accomplishment of his vow to kill Jayadratha.

Thus having again obtained the Pasupata from the Devadeva, the invincible Arjuna, his hair standing on end, regards his vow as being already fulfilled. Full of joy, Arjuna and Krishna worship Mahadeva by bowing their heads deeply. Then, permitted by Bhava, the two shuras instantly return to their camp on Kurukshetra, in a transport of delight. Their joy is as great as that of Indra and Vishnu when those two Gods, wanting to slay Jambha, had Siva's blessing to kill the great Asura.

All this, Rajan, transpires in Arjuna's dream and Krishna's dhyana.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Krishna and Daruka pass the night in conversation until day dawns. Paniswanikas, Magadhas, Madhuparkikas and Sutas come to sing Yudhishtira's praises, as they do daily, and greet him with music and dance, while sweet-voiced singers sing melodious songs of praise for the Kuru vamsa. Skilled musicians play on mridangas, jharjharas, bheris, panavas, anakas, gomukhas, adambaras, sankhas, loud dundubhis and diverse other instruments. All this joyous sound, deep as the roar of clouds, touches the very heavens and they awaken Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, who lies asleep on his luxurious bed, from his slumber.

The king rises from his bed and proceeds to perform his morning ablutions. A hundred and eight freshly bathed young servants, all attired in white, approach the king with many golden jars filled to the brim with the purest water. Sitting at his ease on a royal throne, wearing a thin cloth, the king bathes in several kinds of water made fragrant with sandalwood and purified with mantras. Strong and well-trained servants wash and rub his shining body with water soaked with diverse kinds of medicinal herbs. He then washes himself with adhivasha water rendered fragrant by various exquisite scents. Yudhishtira ties a long cloth as white as the feathers of the swan, and kept loose before him, around his head to dry the water.

He smears his body with sandalwood-paste, drapes wildflower garlands around his majestic person, puts on clean clothes, and the Mahabaho sits facing the east, his hands joined together and silently says his morning prayers. Then with great humility, he enters the chamber in which the sacred fire is kept. He worships the agni by feeding it pieces of fine wood and with libations of ghee sanctified with mantras. He comes out and enters a second chamber, where many learned Brahmanas, all deep knowers of the Vedas, all self-restrained, purified by the study of the Vedas and by keeping vratas, are gathered after they have taken the ritual bath upon on the completion of the yagnas they have performed.

There are a thousand worshippers of the Sun, as well as eight thousand others of the same varna. The mighty-armed Yudhishtira presents them with honey, clarified butter, auspicious fruits of the best kind, a nishka of gold each, a hundred horses decked with ornaments, costly robes and other such gifts that they like, and in return receives their blessings in clear and distinguished voices. Yudhishtira also gives them gifts of cows that yield milk whenever touched, along with calves with their horns covered with gold and their hooves with silver; after which he circumambulates them in pradakshina. Now looking at and touching auspicious swastika symbols, which increase good fortune, nandyavartas made of gold, flower garlands, water-pots, the sacred fire, vessels full of sun-dried rice, other auspicious offerings, the yellow pigment prepared from the urine of the cow, auspicious and well-adorned virgins, curds, clarified butter, honey, auspicious birds and diverse other things held sacred, he finally comes into the outer chamber.

The attendants waiting in that chamber bring a wonderful round throne of gold, encrusted with pearls and lapis lazuli and overlaid with a priceless rug over which is spread another cloth of the finest loom. This seat is the handiwork of the Viswakarman himself. When the Dharmaraja takes his place, the servants bring him all his invaluable, bright ornaments, which Yudhishtira puts on; and his magnificence is such as to sharpen the envy of his enemies.

The servants fan him with white golden-handled yak-tails luminous like the Moon and Yudhishtira is resplendent like a mass of clouds charged with lightning. Bards begin to sing his praises and panegyrists utter his eulogies; and other singers sing to the delighter of Kuru’s vamsa, and their voices swell harmoniously and resonantly.

We then hear the rumble of chariot-wheels and the drumming of horses’ hooves; and the noise mingles with the chiming of great elephants’ bells, the blare of conches and the tread of numberless men, and the very Earth seems to tremble. One of the guards in charge of the doors, sheathed in armour, youthful in years, wearing brilliant ear-rings, and with his sword strapped to his side, enters the private apartment, kneels on the ground and, bending his head, salutes the Dharmaraja who deserves all worship. The young guardsman announces that Hrishikesa is waiting to enter.

Yudhishtira orders his servitors, “Get ready an excellent throne and prepare an arghya for him.”

Krishna of Vrishni’s race is welcomed warmly and seated on the fine throne. Greeting Madhava with the customary enquiries of welcome, Yudhishtira worships Krishna fervently.’”

"Sanjaya continues, 'Then the royal son of Kunti asks Krishna, "Have you spent the night happily, Madhusudana? Are all your faculties clear, O you of unfading glory?"

Krishna makes similar enquiries of Yudhishtira. Then the guardsman comes again and says that the other Kshatriya warriors are waiting to be announced. Commanded by the king, the man announces a roll of heroes, which consists of Virata, Bhimasena, Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, Dhrishtaketu, the ruler of the Chedis, the Maharathas Drupada and Sikhandin, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, Chekitana, the king of the Kalikayas, Yuyutsu of Kuru's race, Uttamaujas of the Panchalas, Yudhamanyu, Subahu, and the five sons of Draupadi. These and many other Kshatriyas, approach Yudhsihtira Mahatman, that bull among Kshatriyas, and greeting him, sit down on the rich seats provided for them. Krishna and Satyaki sit together on the same wide throne.

Then in the hearing of them all, Yudhishtira addresses the lotus-eyed slayer of Madhu, and says humbly, "Relying on you alone, do we, like the Deva of a thousand eyes, seek victory in battle and eternal happiness. You are aware, O Krishna, of how we were deprived of our kingdom, of our exile at the hands of the enemy, and our various sorrows in exile. O Lord of all, you who are compassionate to those who are devoted to you, the happiness and the very existence of all of us rest solely and entirely on you!

O you of Vrishni's vamsa, do that by which my heart will ever find its rest in you! Also do that, O Lord, by which Arjuna may fulfil his vow. Rescue us today from the sea of grief and rage that confronts us. Madhava, become today a ship for us who wish to cross the dreadful sea. The great maharatha who wants to kill the enemy in battle cannot do what his sarathy can, if the charioteer will exert himself subtly!

Janardana, you always save the Vrishnis from all danger and calamities, and you must save us from this looming distress! Sankhachakragadadhara, become a boat to rescue the sons of Pandu sunk in the fathomless Kuru-sagara.

I bow to you, O God of the lord of the gods, O you who are eternal, O supreme Destroyer, O Vishnu, O Jishnu, O Hari, O Krishna, O Vaikuntha, O best of friends! Narada described you as that ancient and best of Rishis called Narayana, who grants boons, who wields the Saranga, and who is the greatest of all Rishis. O Madhava, prove his words true!"

Krishna, most eloquent of all speakers, replies to Yudhishtira in a voice deep as that of clouds charged with rain, "In all the worlds, including Devaloka, there is no archer equal to Dhananjaya. Mahatejasvin, mahadhanurvan, of great prowess and untold genius, celebrated in battle, always fierce, Arjuna is the greatest of all men. Youthful in years, bull-necked and of long arms, he is endowed with measureless strength. His tread like a lion or a bull's, and divinely handsome he will kill all your enemies for you today.

As for myself, I will do what I can to help Arjuna consume the legions of Dhritarashtra's son like a great forest fire. This very day, Arjuna will despatch vile Jayadratha, sinner and murderer of Subhadra's son down the road from which no traveller returns. Today vultures, kites, ravening jackals and other carnivores will feed on the Saindhava's flesh. Yudhishtira, even if all the gods with Indra become his protectors today, Jayadratha will still leave this world for Yamaloka. And having slain the king of the Sindhus, Jishnu will return triumphantly to you in the evening. Dispel your grief and your heart's fever, Rajan, and be graced with calm and felicity."""

"Sanjaya says, 'While Yudhishtira, Krishna and the others thus converse together, Arjuna enters the auspicious chamber to meet Bharatottama Yudhishtira and also his friends and well-wishers. Solemnly, reverently he salutes his king and brother. Rising, Yudhishtira greets Arjuna with great affection, embracing him and sniffing the top of his head, blessing him warmly.

Smiling, Yudhishtira says, "Judging by your bright and cheerful countenance and from the fact that Krishna is well pleased with you, Arjuna, it is plain that complete and absolute victory awaits you in battle today!"

Now Arjuna says, "Be you blessed, Rajan, through Kesava's grace I have seen something entirely marvellous in the night."

To reassure his brothers and friends, Arjuna relates his dream of the night, and everything about his meeting with the three-eyed Lord Siva. All that listen are filled with amazement; they bend down and touch the earth with their heads to worship Mahadeva whose emblem is the Bull, and cry, "Uttamam! Wonderful!"

Then, at the command of the Dharmaputra, their hearts filled with fury against the enemy the Pandava warriors set out towards the battlefield. Saluting the king, Satyaki, Krishna and Arjuna, set out from Yudhishtira's tent; and Arjuna and Krishna ride together on the same chariot to Arjuna's tent. Arriving, Hrishikesa, like a professional charioteer, begins to prepare Arjuna's ratha, which flies the mark of the prince of the Vanaras. The wonderful chariot with the radiance of molten gold, whose rumble is like the deep roar of thunderheads, shines like the morning sun. Soon enough, Krishna, now wearing armour, comes to inform Partha, who has finished his morning prayers, that his chariot is ready. Arjuna Kiritin, clad in golden mail, his bow and magical quivers in hand, circumambulates the chariot in grave pradakshina.

Now his Brahmanas, mature in tapasya, gyana and years, always engaged in the performance of pujas and yagnas, with passions ever restrained, adore and bless Arjuna. He climbs into his great ratha, which has already been sanctified with mantras to give him victory in battle; he mounts his chariot like Surya Deva ascending the Eastern mountain. Arjuna, the greatest of all maharathas, is truly like the blazing Sun God upon the breast of Meru.

Arjuna, Satyaki and Krishna mount the chariot, like the twin Aswins riding the same chariot with Indra when they attended Saryati's yagna. Govinda, greatest of maharathas, takes the horses' reins even like Matali took the reins of Indra's steeds when he rode to slay Vritra. Mounted on that best of chariots with his two friends, Partha rides out to kill the king of the Sindhus; he goes forth like Soma rising into the sky with Budha and Sukra, to destroy the darkness of night, or like Indra going forth with Varuna and Surya to the great battle against the Asuras when the Daityas abducted Brihaspati's wife Tara.

Bards and musicians sing the praises of heroic Arjuna, as he rides forth to the sound of musical instruments and auspicious hymns of good omen. The sonorous voices of the vabdhis and magadhis uttering resonant blessings for victory and wishing for a triumphant day, mingling with the sounds of the musical instruments, are deeply gratifying to those Kshatriyas. An auspicious and fragrant breeze blows from behind Partha, vitalising him and enervating his enemies. And many propitious omens of various kinds appear, indicating victory for the Pandavas and defeat for your warriors!

Seeing these portents of victory, Arjuna says to the great archer Satyaki, now in his own chariot on the right, “Yuyudhana! Look at all the auspicious omens around us. I will surely have victory today, O bull of Sini’s vamsa. I will ride straight to where Jayadratha waits, fully expecting me to send him to Yamaloka. Satyaki, today it is as much your duty to protect Yudhishtira from Drona as it is mine to ride out and kill the Saindhava. You must guard him as I myself would. I do not see anyone in the world who can vanquish you, for you are Krishna’s equal in battle. The king of the Devas himself cannot defeat you. Reposing this burden on you, and on maharatha Pradyumna, I can hunt Jayadratha down with no anxiety shadowing my heart.

O Satwata, dearest friend, have no fear for me. You must wholeheartedly protect the king. Where this Krishna Mahabaho is, and where I am, together, not the slightest danger can ever befall either him or me.”

Satyaki, the Parantapa replies, “Tathaastu!” He then rides to where Yudhishtira is.’”

JAYADRATHA-VADHA PARVA

"Dhritarashtra says, 'On the day after Abhimanyu was killed, what did the grief-stricken Pandavas do? Who among my warriors gave them battle? Knowing, as they did, the awesome prowess Arjuna, tell me how the Kauravas, having committed such a heinous crime, could remain unafraid? How could they venture even to look at him as Arjuna Naravyaghra advanced upon them like all-destroying Death himself in fury, burning with grief at the murder of his son? Seeing the maharatha with the image of Hanuman on his banner, grieving for his dead son and brandishing his awesome bow, what did my warriors do? What, O Sanjaya, has happened to Duryodhana?

A great sorrow overwhelms us today and I no longer hear any sounds of joy. The enchanting strains of music and celebration that we once heard from Jayadratha's palace here are alas all fallen silent.

In Duryodhana's camp, we no more hear the sounds of countless vabdhis and magadhis singing my sons' praises nor the songs of musicians or the chiming of dancers' anklets. Earlier, such sounds would fall incessantly upon my ears. Alas, as they are plunged in grief, I do not any longer hear these merry noises. Previously, Sanjaya, while sitting in the home of Somadatta, who is devoted to truth, I would always hear such delightful sounds. Alas, how destitute of punya I am, for I hear the palaces of my sons today echoing instead with the sounds of grief and lamentations, and none full of the old life, energy and joy. In the mansions of Vivimsati, Durmukha, Chitrasena, Vikarna and my other sons, I do not hear a single sound of cheer, which they were filled with in the past.

The great archer Drona's son Aswatthaman, who is the refuge of my sons and upon whom Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and a large number of disciples waited, who takes pleasure day and night, in talk, in debate and animated disputation, in the stirring music of different instruments and in various kinds of delightful songs, whom many among the Kurus, the Pandavas and the Satwatas worship—alas, his home is utterly silent today, and no singers sing there or dancers ply their sublime art.

Alas, we no longer hear the clamour of boisterous celebrations that echo in the camp of Vinda and Anuvinda every evening. Today in the camp of the Kaikeyas, we do not hear any songs or hand clapping in which their soldiers, at their music, dance and revelry, daily indulged.

Ah, we no longer hear the reverberant chanting of priests proficient in the performance of yagnas, men who are repositories of pujas, who wait upon Somadatta's son, Bhurisravas. The virile twanging of bowstrings, the sounds of Vedic chanting, the whistling of spears and the humming strokes of swords; the rumble of chariot-wheels, all of which were heard unceasingly in the abode of Drona: we hear none of these from there today. Sanjaya, today we no longer hear the swell of music from diverse kingdoms, or the rhythms and harmonies of musical instruments, which never failed to fill Drona's great and sacred home.

When Janardana of unfading glory came from Upaplavya out of his compassion for every living creature, seeking peace, O Suta, I said to the evil Duryodhana, "My son, use Krishna as the means to arrive at an amicable understanding with the Pandavas. I think it is time to make peace, so do as I say. If you spurn Krishna, who now begs you for peace and entreats you for my welfare, you will never find victory."

But Duryodhana refused Krishna, the bull among all the bowmen of Dasarha's race, Krishna who sought Duryodhana's own good. And by doing this, my foolish son embraced disaster and tragedy. Seized by Death himself, my evil-hearted prince would not obey me but followed Dusasana and Karna instead, into the jaws of doom. I did not approve of the game of dice. Nor did Vidura, Jayadratha, Bhishma, Salya, Bhurisravas, Purumitra, Jaya, Aswatthaman, Kripa or Drona, O Sanjaya! If my son had paid heed to their counsel, he would then have lived for ever in happiness and peace with his kinsmen and friends.

I said to Duryodhana: Charming and delightful in their speech, always saying what is pleasing to their kinsmen, high-born, loved by all, and wise, the sons of Pandu are sure to find success and felicity. The man, who keeps his eye on dharma always, and in all places, will find happiness and he will win great rewards and blessings after his death. The Pandavas are noble and accomplished; they are able and deserve to enjoy half the Earth. The Earth girthed by the seven seas, is as much their ancestral possession as it is of the Kurus. Once they win back sovereignty, the Pandavas will never deviate from the path of dharma.

O child, I have kinsmen to whom the Pandavas will always listen: Salya, Somadatta, the Dharmatman Bhishma, Drona, Vikarna, Balhika, Kripa, and many others among the Bharatas who are illustrious and revered because of their years. If they speak to them on your behalf, the Pandavas will surely do what they ask. Do you think, for a moment, that anyone who is with them will counsel them otherwise? Krishna will never abandon the path of dharma and the Pandavas are all obedient to him. My words of dharma, too, those Kshatriyas will never disobey, for the Pandavas are all righteous men.

Piteously lamenting, Suta, I spoke to my son. Fool that he is, his heart full of darkness, he did not listen to me! I believe that all this is the malignant and inescapable influence of Kaala! Where Vrikodara and Arjuna are, the Vrishni hero Satyaki, Uttamaujas of the Panchalas, the invincible Yudhamanyu, the irrepressible Dhrishtadyumna, the unvanquished Sikhandin, the Asmakas, the Kekayas, Kshatradharman of the Somakas, the ruler of the Chedis, Chekitana, Vibhu, the son of the lord of the Kasis, the sons of Draupadi, Virata, the mighty maharatha Drupada, the Purushavyaghras Nakula and Sahadeva and, most of all, the slayer of Madhu, Krishna himself, is—who is there in this world, or even the next, that can fight them and expect to live?

Who else is there who would dare resist these my formidable enemies when they summon their devastras in war, save the witless Duryodhana, Karna, Sakuni the son of Subala, and Dusasana their base fourth? For I do not see a fifth who is so blind and senseless! They who have Vishnu himself driving their chariot, clad in armour and reins in his divine hands; they who have Arjuna for their warrior—they can never find defeat!

Does Duryodhana not remember my pleas and implorations now, when it is too late? You say that the invincible Bhishma has been cut down. Surely now, my sons grimly recall the prophetic words uttered by the far-seeing Vidura, and lament their folly! Seeing his army overwhelmed by Sini's grandson Satyaki and Arjuna, and seeing their countless empty chariots, my sons surely shed bitter tears today. Ah! Sanjaya, terrible Arjuna will devour my troops even like a raging fire fanned by the gusting wind consumes a heap of dry grass at the close of winter.

Sanjaya, you are a most accomplished narrator. Tell me everything that transpires in the evening after they committed the great wrong to Partha. When Abhimanyu was killed, what was their state of mind? After having grievously offended the Gandivi, my warriors cannot face him in battle. What measures do Duryodhana and Karna decide to take to contain Arjuna? What do Dusasana and Subala's son do? O Sanjaya, what has overtaken all my sons is surely because of the sins of Duryodhana, who walks the way of avarice, whose heart and mind are full of evil, whose judgment anger perverts, who blindly covets sovereignty, who is foolish besides and his reason lost to greed and anger. Tell me, O Sanjaya, what does Duryodhana do now? Are the preparations he makes and the plans he has shortsighted or well-judged?'"

"Sanjaya says, 'I will tell you everything, as I saw it with my own eyes. Listen carefully, for your own guilt in this war is great. Just as an embankment is useless after the waters of the field have drained away, Rajan, your lamentations now are useless! Bharatarishabha, do not grieve. Wonderful and terrible are the decrees of Time the Destroyer, and they cannot be violated. Do not lament, for this is not a recent development. If you had restrained both Yudhishtira and your sons from the game of dice, this calamity would never have overwhelmed you. Again, if you had stopped both the sides who were inflamed by anger, this tragedy would never have occurred.

Indeed, if you had once urged the Kurus to kill the wayward Duryodhana, this disaster would never have come to you, and the Pandavas, the Panchalas, the Vrishnis and the other kings would have never had cause to blame you. Again, if you had done your duty as a father, shown Duryodhana the path of dharma, and led him to tread the way of righteousness, this misfortune would never have beset you.

You are the wisest man on earth. Forsaking sanatana dharma, how could you follow the counsels of Duryodhana, Karna and Sakuni? Therefore,

Rajan, these your lamentations are in truth wedded to worldly wealth, and seem to me to be like honey mixed with poison. Time was when Krishna himself did not regard Yudhishtira or Drona, as much as he respected you. However, when, he found you to have fallen from Rajadharma, Krishna has ceased to look upon you with respect.

Your sons spoke harshly, vilely, to the sons of Pritha, and you sat silent. Nemesis for that grave sin of omission has now overwhelmed you, O Anagha, and your kingdom is in danger.

At best, you will find the shame and bitterness of ruling over a world bestowed upon you by the Pandavas. It is the virtuous Pandus who added to the kingdom and also the fame that the Kurus enjoy. These achievements, however, became fruitless and barren for them when they encountered your greed, for you deprived them of even their ancestral kingdom.

Now, Rajan, when the war has begun, you absolve yourself of all wrongdoing and censure your sons, pointing out their various faults. And this is not becoming. While they fight, Kshatriyas leave off care for their very lives, and plunge fearlessly into the Pandavas' vyuhas. Why, who but the Kauravas would dare fight and army which Krishna, Arjuna, Satyaki and Vrikodara lead? Which mortal archer is there that would dare fight them who have Arjuna for their warrior, Krishna for their adviser and Satyaki and Vrikodara for their protectors? Only your sons and their allies.

The friendly kings, full of heroism and always conscious of Kshatriya dharma, do all that they can, taking their lives in their hands. So now listen to everything that transpires in the savage war between the Naravyaghras, the Kurus and the Pandavas.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'When the night ends and dawn breaks, Drona begins to array his akshauhinis for the battle of the momentous day. One hears diverse sounds, of enraged shuras' voices raised in shouts and roars, all of them eager to be at the enemy and spill blood. Some stretch their bows some strum their bowstrings and some draw deep breaths. And many of them roar in challenge, "Where is Dhananjaya?"

Many warriors throw their glinting swords high into the air and then catch them again, and brandish them, naked blades the colour of the sky, keenly honed, and with beautifully wrought hilts. One sees thousands of brave warriors, their skills perfected through years of practice, swordsmen and bowmen, all keened for battle. Some whirl their great maces decked with bells, smeared with sandalwood paste encrusted with gold and diamonds, and challengingly demand that the sons of Pandu come forth to fight. Other warriors with massive bodies and arms like pillars, intoxicated with the pride of their strength, obscure the sky with their spiked clubs that resemble a forest of great stakes raised in honour of Indra.

Still others, heroes all, wear gorgeous vanamalas, and armed with various other kinds of weapons, takes their positions across the field of fate, and they also roar, "Where is Arjuna? Where is Govinda? Where is proud Bhima? Where are their allies?"

Drona blows his conch, and urging his horses to great speed, moves everywhere with amazing celerity as he deploys all his divisions. When all the troops, every man of them ardent for battle, have taken their stations, Drona says to Jayadratha, "Somadatta's son Bhurisravas, maharatha Karna, Aswatthaman, Salya, Vrishasena and Kripa, with a hundred thousand horsemen, sixty thousand chariots, four and ten thousand elephants in musth, one and twenty thousand foot-soldiers clad in mail, will be positioned behind me to a distance of twelve krosas. You will be behind all of these. When the very gods with Vasava at their head will not be able to attack you where you are, what can the Pandavas do? Take comfort, Jayadratha, O king of the Sindhus."

Thus does Drona comfort Jayadratha who then himself moves to the place Drona indicates, surrounded by many Gandhara warriors and with many mail-clad foot-soldiers armed with paasas, nooses, all ready give their all in battle. Jayadratha's well-trained chariot-horses are all decked with chamari yak-tails and ornaments of gold. Seven thousand such horses and three thousand other steeds of the Sindhu breed go with him.

Your son Durmarshana, eager for combat, stations himself at the head of all the Kaurava troops today, along with a thousand five hundred infuriated elephants of awesome size, covered in mail, and all ridden by well-trained mahamatras. Your two other sons, Dusasana and Vikarna, take up their positions among the vanguard.

The vyuha that Drona forms- part sakata and part a circle is full forty-eight miles long and twenty wide, front to rear. Drona arrays that great formation with countless heroic kings, in a sea of chariots, horses, elephants and foot-soldiers. Behind the sakata vyuha, the formidable cart, is yet another impregnable legion in the form of a lotus, a Padma vyuha. And buried deep that lotus is another dense vyuha, the suchimukha, the needle formation.

Having formed his mighty vyuha thus, Drona takes up his own station. The mouth of the needle is held by the great archer Kritavarman. Next to Kritavarman, stands the ruler of the Kambojas and Jalasandha, and then Duryodhana and Karna. Behind them thousands of dauntless Kshatriyas stand ready for fierce battle, specifically position to protect the eye of the most crucial suchimukha. Behind them all, Rajan, surrounded by a teeming force, is Jayadratha at the far end of the needle.

At the head of the Sakata, is Drona, barring the way into it; behind him the chief of the Bhojas protects Bharadwaja's son. Clad in white armour, with a superb helmet, broad chested and with mighty arms, Drona stands tall, stretching his great bow, like the Death himself in wrath. Seeing Drona's chariot graced with a beautiful standard, bearing red sacrificial altar and a black deerskin, the Kauravas are filled with joy.

Seeing the awesome vyuha Drona forms, which resembles the ocean itself in agitation, the Siddhas and the Charanas in the sky are filled with wonder and all beings think that the vast formation would devour the very Earth with her mountains, seas and forests, Bhumi abounding with life and creatures and everything else she bears. And seeing the mighty and wonderful sakata, packed dense with chariots, foot-soldiers, horses and elephants, trumpeting dreadfully, and hearing its great clamour, which could rive the hearts of his enemies, Duryodhana exults!'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After the akshauhinis of the Kuru army are thus arrayed, a tumult arises from the beating of drums and mridangas, the roars and fierce shouts and the sound of different musical instruments, the blowing of conches. The awful uproar makes one's hair stand on end as the Bharata heroes eager for battle, slowly advance. Then the hour called Rudra sets in and Arjuna makes his appearance.

Many thousands of ravens and crows, O Bhaarata, sport in front of Arjuna's chariot. Various animals, giving terrible cries and inauspicious jackals begin to scream and howl on our right, as we went forward into battle. Thousands of blazing meteors fall out of a clear sky with loud noises, and all the Earth trembles on the dreadful occasion. Dry winds blow in all directions, peals of thunder crack the sky, driving gravel and gusts of little pebbles ahead of him, as Kunti's son comes to begin the days' battle.

Nakula's son Satanika, and Dhrishtadyumna, the two wise and expert warriors, array the Pandava legions into an attacking vyuha. Accompanied by a thousand chariots, a hundred elephants, three thousand Kshatriyas, and ten thousand foot-soldiers, which cover the length of fifteen hundred bows, your son Durmarshana takes up his position at the very van of all the troops, and says, “Like the continent resisting the surging sea, I will today contain the wielder of Gandiva, that irresistible Parantapa in battle today. Today let everyone witness the raging Dhananjaya collide with me, like one stone mountain against another. You maharathas eager for battle, stay back and watch me fight all the Pandavas by myself, watch me enhance my honour and fame today!”

Your noble son, the daring archer says this and stands there prepared and full of valour, surrounded by many other great bowmen.

Then, like an angry Yama, or Vajradhari Indra himself, or like Death’s irresistible self armed with his cudgel and urged on by Time, or like unruffled Mahadeva armed with his trident, or like Varuna with his paasa, or the blazing fire which consumes all creation at the end of the Yuga, the slayer of the Nivatakavachas, inflamed with rage and swelling with might, the ever-victorious Vijaya, clad in mail, armed with a sword, wearing a golden coronet, adorned with garlands of white flowers, attired in white robes, his arms decked with beautiful angadas and ears with brilliant kundalas, faithful to dharma and determined to fulfil his great vow, incomparable Arjuna mounts his incomparable chariot.

The incarnate Nara, with Narayana for his sarathy, holding his Gandiva, shines as brilliantly on Kurukshetra as the risen sun. Setting his ratha, Rajan, at the very van of his army, where densest showers of arrows will fall, Dhananjaya blows an echoing, deafening gives a blast on his conch the Devadatta. Then Krishna, too, fearlessly blows with his great Panchajanya —peal after peal of booming thunder. And all your warriors quail and tremble at the massive twin sound, their hearts feel faint within them and their hair stands on end.

Just as the sound of the thunder fills living creatures with fright, even so does the chasmal booming of those conches terrify your warriors; and all their animals helplessly urinate and excrete. All your army with its animals is filled with dread, Rajan, and the limbs of your fighting men turn weak. Some among them even faint.

And then the Hanuman in his terrifying aspect on Arjuna’s banner, his mouth agape, as well all the fierce spirits and creatures that surround him give vent to the most fearful and macabre sounds, further dismaying your men. But then Drona and the other maharathas of your army collect themselves, raise their conches, horns and anakas and blow resoundingly on them, and the other fighting men follow suit beating drums, clashing cymbals together, and letting out great cheers and loud yells and roars, so that the wave of terror blows away and they are emboldened again. Sounds of other instruments fill earth and sky and further defiant roaring and the loud clapping of hands and armpits. Your maharathas roar leonine challenges at their adversaries and your army is again filled with exhilaration. As that tumult rises, an uproar that raises fear in the hearts of the timid, Arjuna, the son of Pakasasana, filled with great delight, says to him of Dasarha's race, "Urge the horses, O Hrishikesa, to where Durmarshana stands. I will cut our way through his elephant legion and break into the enemy army."

Krishna flicks his reins over his gandharva horses' necks and flashes ahead at Durmarshana. Fierce and tremendous is the encounter that erupts there between one and the many, a savage encounter that destroys chariots, elephants and men. Like a cloud lashing down torrential rain on a mountain breast, Arjuna inundates his enemies with thick showers of shafts. Showing great lightness of hand, the opposing maharathas swiftly envelop Krishna and Dhananjaya in clouds of arrows.

Quickly incensed, Mahabaho Partha begins to slough off great chariot-warriors' heads at his supreme will; he strews the field with noble and handsome heads, decked with earrings and turbans, their lips bitten through, and the eyes upon their faces still dark with anger. Ah, the scattered heads are resplendent like lotuses clipped off their stems, lying everywhere.

Golden coats of mail dyed with gore lie all over the field, looking like cloud masses charged with lightning. The sound, Rajan, of severed heads falling onto the earth resembles the falling of ripened palmyra fruit. In weird pageant, headless trunks arise, some holding bows in hand and some with naked swords upraised in the very act of striking. Those valiant warriors, who swarm forward to have great Arjuna's life, never know when he strikes their heads off!

Then, quickly, the horrific and magnificent field is scattered by the absolute and sublime genius of Arjuna's incredible archery with not just the heads of great warriors but also those of horses and the trunks of elephants, while Kurukshetra rings with their screams, as well the arms, legs and other limbs of both Kshatriyas and their beasts of war. Bloody chaos sweeps your army, O king.

"This one is Partha!"

"Where is Partha? Here is Partha!"

Obsessed with just the single thought of Arjuna, these cries rise from your army. Deprived by Time of their reason and very senses, they see the whole world as being full of just Partha, innumerable Arjunas everywhere. And striking out and loosing their arrows at one another, many of your men perish. Why, some kill themselves in their delirium! With woeful cries, many heroes, not in their right minds, covered with blood and in agony, lay themselves down, calling out piteously to their friends and kinsmen.

Arms, bearing short arrows, or lances, or darts, or swords, or battle-axes, or pointed stakes, or scimitars, or bows, or spears, or other shafts, or maces, and cased in armour, and adorned with angadas and other ornaments, arms that look like large snakes, that resemble thick clubs, hacked off from trunks with mighty weapons leap from their owners, jerk and thrash about with great force, as if in separate rage of their own. Every last man who attacks Partha perishes, body pierced with the fatal shafts of that transcendent shura. While he seems to dance in his ratha, fleeting everywhere, and his bow seems always drawn in a magic circle, no adversary can find the minutest chance to strike him. The speed with which he draws, fits them to his bow, and looses them is inscrutable, a single uninterrupted blur, and fills all his enemies with wonder.

Phalguna strikes elephants and elephant-riders, horses and horsemen, rathikas and their charioteers. There is no one among his enemies, whether facing him, trying to shoot him down from a distance, or wheeling about, whom the son of Pandu does not kill. Even as the sun rising in the sky destroys a thick darkness does Arjuna annihilate Durmarshana's elephant-legion with his uncanny missiles fletched with kanka plumes.

Swiftly, the field that your troops occupy looks like the earth strewn with grey hills at the hour of the pralaya. Just as no creatures can gaze at the midday sun, Dhananjaya's enemies cannot look upon the face of Arjuna tejasvin ablaze. Stricken by Partha's arrow storms, your troops break and flee the dreadful Kshatriya.

Like a towering wind dispersing a bank of clouds, Partha rides at the Kaurava army and puts it to bloody rout, and truly none of them can even look at him as he razes them at will. Whipping and spurring their horses to greater speed, prodding them with their bows to fly faster, with threatening growls and roars at the helpless creatures, their eyes wild and full of fear, your cavalry, chariot-warriors, and your foot-soldiers as well, beset by Arjuna, flee in every direction.

Others, who ride elephants, lumber away from him by digging their sharp hooks and goads cruelly into the sides of their great mounts. Such bedlam grips the field, such panic, that many who seek to escape him run straight at Arjuna instead and are consumed by him. Awful fright, confusion and dismay seize your men entirely.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'When the van of my army is slaughtered by the Kiritin and falls apart and flees, who are the heroes that stand up to him? Do any of them actually fight Arjuna, or do they all abandon courage and run back into the sakata vyuha, to hide behind the fearless Drona, that immovable wall?'

Sanjaya replies, "When Indra's son breaks like a gale of death upon the frontline of your army, Rajan, many Kshatriyas are killed or run. Not one can even look at Arjuna's alight, let alone fight him.

But then, your son Dusasana, Rajan, who has watched the rout, and your men dying and fleeing, is filled with wrath and he dashes straight at Arjuna. Your fierce son, wearing a shimmering coat of golden mail, his head covered by a turban, surrounds the rampaging Partha with his own formidable elephant legion, a force that looks as if it can devour the very world. The Earth, the points of compass and the sky seem to be entirely filled with the sound of the elephant's bells, the blare of conches, the twanging of bowstrings and the deep grunts and bellows of the tuskers.

Now a pitched and ferocious battle ensues. Seeing the angry beasts, with trunks extended, thundering down on him, like winged mountains urged on with goads, Dhananjaya throws back his head and gives a shattering lion's roar. Then, in the twinkling of an eye, he begins to decimate the elephant legion. Like a makara plunging into a surging ocean, Arjuna wades into the elephant-host.

The Vijaya is like the apocalyptic Sun that rises infracting every law of direction and hour on the day of the pralaya. In moments, at his unearthly archery, men and elephants alike have their spirits broken and are deranged by the elemental force they come up against, the cosmic tempest that is Kunti's son. The sound of horses' hooves, the maddening rattle of chariot-wheels, the shouts of warriors, the twanging bowstrings, the cacophony of diverse musical instruments, and most of all the blare of the Panchajanya and the Devadatta and the deafening twang of the Gandiva serves to dement your forces even further.

And Savyasachin shreds men and elephants with his arrow that are like snakes of virulent poison, every one of them claiming a Kaurava life, man's or beast's. Thousands and thousands of deadly shafts flare from the Gandiva spraying blood everywhere, desiccating your elephant legion. Countless great grey beasts fall, shaking the sacred field, their screams echoing in the vaults of the sky; they fall like the mountain of old when Indra sheared their golden wings.

Some hulking beasts he shoots savagely through their mouths, others through their round temporal lobes, and the elephants cry out like cranes as they die. And now, Arjuna begins to clip the heads from the necks of the warriors mounted on the elephants with unerring arrows like lopping lotus flowers from their stalks. The heads shining with earrings, continually falling onto the earth, resemble a multitude of lotuses that Partha offers to his gods. While numberless elephants blunder across the field, one sees warriors hanging from their backs, stripped of armour, grievously wounded, painted in blood as if in a picture.

In some cases, he kills two or three warriors with a single arrow plumed with beautiful feathers and they plunge down to the ground. And so many elephants excoriated by long shafts, continue to fall, vomiting blood, and their riders tumble from their backs. Partha destroys standards, bows, bowstrings, yokes and shafts of the chariot-warriors that oppose him. And still no one can discern when Arjuna draws his arrows, when he fixes them to his bowstring, when he draws back the string or when he shoots them.

All that they see is Partha seemingly dancing on his ratha with his bow always drawn to a circle.

Elephants fall like ranges of hills, one after the other, gored deep, immediately as they are struck, and the blood they vomit seeps across the field of dharma. In the midst of that great carnage, one continues to see innumerable headless trunks standing upright, though their arms have also been dissevered and lie about with bows in grasp, their fingers are cased in leather, some holding swords, and adorned with striking angadas and other golden ornaments.

Kurukshetra is copiously strewn with innumerable upaskaras, adhishthanas, shafts, crowns, crushed chariot-wheels, broken akshas and yokes, warriors armed with shields, bows, wildflower garlands, different sparkling ornaments, fine robes and broken standards. The Earth there assumes a most surreal aspect from the slain elephants, horses and the fallen Kshatriyas. And absolutely routed by Arjuna, Dusasana's forces turn tail. Himself direly injured and in great pain, and now stricken with such terror as he never expected, Dusasana also flees the battle and seeks shelter in the sakata vyuha behind Drona.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After annihilating Dusasana's forces, Arjuna, never pausing, sweeps on towards Drona, for his quarry Jayadratha lies beyond the Acharya and is still far. Nearing Drona at the lip of the sakata vyuha, at Krishna's behest, Arjuna folds his hands to his old master and says, "Wish me well, O Brahmana, and bless me, saying Swasti. Through your grace, I would pierce this unassailable vyuha. I tell you truly, O sinless one, you are like my father to me, or Yudhishtira, or even Krishna. Maharishi, I deserve your blessing and protection even as Aswatthaman does. And with your blessing, I want to kill Jayadratha the Saindhava today. O lord, see that my vow is accomplished."

The Acharya, smiling, replies, "Arjuna, you will not be able to strike at Jayadratha without first vanquishing me."

With this, still smiling, in a flash Drona covers Arjuna, his ratha, horses, standard and charioteer with a great burst of arrows. Arjuna cuts down the flurry of shafts, and strikes his master with nine thought-swift arrows. Drona, too, cuts down Partha's arrows in flight, and pierces both Krishna and Arjuna with clutches of venomous bolts like fire.

Then, while Arjuna is still thinking of destroying Drona's bow with his arrows, the great Brahmana, quicker than thinking, breaks the Pandava's bowstring, and draws blood from him, his horses and sarathy, and cuts slivers from his flagstaff, still with the superior smile on his lips.

Arjuna restrings his bow in a blink and shrugging off his initial hesitation unleashes a storm of six hundred blinding shafts at Drona, as if they were just a single barb; next moment, he looses another seven hundred searing arrows, and then another thousand, all in the space of a wish. He is still not done and follows these with a full ten thousand light like blazing thunderbolts, razing so many warriors of Drona's stolid vyuha, and horses and elephants as well. Maharathas fall out of their great chariots, their horses, standards, weapons and lives lost.

Elephants founder like mountain peaks, or cloud masses, or like towering palaces, loosened, dispersed and incinerated by thunder, wind and fire. Struck by Arjuna's arrows, thousands of horses collapse like swans upon the breast of Himavat struck down by the force of a sudden flashflood. Like the Sun that rises at the end of the Yuga drying up the oceans with his rays turned murderous, the son of Pandu obliterates a vast number of chariot-warriors, cavalry, elephants and foot-soldiers.

Then, like clouds covering that fulminant Sun, the Drona-cloud covers the Pandava-sun with lashing arrow showers; Drona obscures the thick swath of shafts with which Arjuna covers the great Kuru Kshatriyas of the sakata vyuha. The Acharya strikes Dhananjaya deep through his breast with a long shaft unleashed with awful ferocity, an arrow that will take the life of any adversary. Great Arjuna trembles at the force of that barb, his limbs feel faint; he shakes like a mountain during an earthquake.

But only for a moment, after which Indra's son, like whom there is no warrior, in heaven or earth, is back to himself and strikes his forbidding teacher with a volley of golden-winged missiles. Drona, unperturbed, strikes Krishna with five bolts, Arjuna with seventy-three and his standard with three. Having the better of his disciple, in a wink Drona mantles Arjuna, his chariot and sarathy entirely in a dense cloud of arrows. We see the shafts of Bharadwaja's son fly and fall in unbroken lines and his bow present the wonderful aspect of being incessantly drawn to a circle. His vicious projectiles, winged with kanka feathers, fall with the least pause on Dhananjaya and Vasudeva.

Krishna watches the soaring battle between Arjuna and Drona for a short time, then says to his warrior, “Partha we must not waste time here for Jayadratha awaits. You must ride past Drona and on towards your quarry.”

Partha replies, “As you will, O Krishna!”

Now they keep Drona to their right and ride swiftly past him, which Arjuna continues to inundate with his arrows. Drona cries to Arjuna, “Where are you going, O Pandava! Is it not true that you never stop fighting until you have defeated your enemy?”

Arjuna answers, “You are my guru and not my enemy. I am your sishya and, so, like your son. There is no man in this world that can vanquish you in battle.”

With this Arjuna flares on, cleaving your army, bringing death with him. The noble Panchala princes, Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, follow him to protect his chariot wheels.

Rajan, they find themselves facing Jaya and Kritavarman of the Satwata vamsa, and the king of the Kambojas, and Srutayus, who have ten thousand maharathas between them. Clad in glittering mail, a master of all the different forms of warfare, prepared to lose his life, the mighty and brave Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Sibis, the Vasatis, the Mavellakas, the Lalithyas, the Kaikeyas, the Madrakas, the Narayana Gopalas and the various tribes of the Kambojas whom Karna once vanquished, all swarm recklessly at the speeding Arjuna, who comes among them in fury like the great leader of an elephant herd, eager to crush them all, to consume their entire army.

A savage battle erupts between all those heroes on the one side and Arjuna on the other, making one’s hair stand on end. Like a whole host of powerful specifics resisting a raging disease, they combine to stop the inexorable Pandava flaring ahead to have Jayadratha’s life.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Drona swiftly turns his chariot and rides after Arjuna, whom the others attempt to hold in some check. But the son of Pandu is like an army of dread plagues by himself and the arrows that blaze from his Gandiva like rays from the Sun razing those that come in his way. He cuts down warhorses, mauls chariots and riders, brings down elephants, cuts down royal chatras and shatters the wheels of countless rathas. Soon, your men, bloodied, their nerve broken, flee from the irresistible, unearthly storm that is Dhananjaya.

Thus does the furious contention between the massed Kuru warriors and Arjuna unfold, a gory dream in another dimension of pure war, which is shrouded in arrows and where the resplendent Vijaya harries his enemies with inspired perfect archery. Steadfastly devoted to dharma and determined to fulfill his vow, he attacks Drona who has flashed up on his ratha drawn by red horses. The Acharya strikes his disciple with twenty-five immaculate shafts that can eviscerate an enemy; Arjuna cuts them all down. Partha quickly invokes the Brahmastra and confounds Drona's deadly fusillades.

And now we witness Drona's supernal genius unbridled, for Arjuna, putting forth his own, cannot pierce the Acharya with a single shaft. Like a mass of clouds letting fall torrents of rain, Drona lashes down a ceaseless cascade of vicious barbs on the Partha-mountain. Tejasvin Arjuna receives his master's downpour by invoking the shielding Brahmastra and truncates Drona's searing shafts with his own.

The dreadful Brahmana, aroused, strikes Swetavahana with twenty-five arrows and Vasudeva with seventy, barbs that pierce their torsos and arms. Partha serenely contains his invincible Acharya, who rages like the fire at the end of the Yuga.

Nimbly avoiding Drona's brilliant and brutal onslaught, Arjuna begins to slaughter the Bhoja host. Turning away from Drona who stands immovable like the Mainaka mountain, Arjuna rides between Kritavarman and Sudakshina the Kamboja king. Kritavarman, lord of the Bhojas, calmly strikes Partha with ten scorching shafts, kanka-feathered, but Arjuna stuns the Satwata shura with a hundred and three arrows shots in the space of a thought.

Recovering quickly, the Bhojaraja, with a laugh like rolling thunder, strikes Arjuna and Krishna with twenty-five arrows each. Arjuna breaks Kritavarman's bow and stabs him with twenty-one arrows like blazing flames or angry snakes of virulent poison. Kritavarman seizes up another bow and pierces Arjuna's chest, O Bhaarata, with ten arrows swift as light; Partha bloodies his powerful antagonist's breast with nine shafts shot in a neat circle.

Again, Krishna sees his Kshatriya held up by Kritavarman, who is a Satwata fighting for Duryodhana, and cries, "Show Kritavarman no mercy! Do not think of your kinship with him. Kill him, Arjuna!"

Abandoning affection and restraint, Arjuna staggers Kritavarman with some archery for which the Bhoja has no response; Krishna dashes ahead past Kritavarman towards the Kambojas. In red-eyed fury, Kritavarman turns his frustration and ire on the two Panchala princes who guard Arjuna's rear as they follow him everywhere. The Bhoja hero strikes Yudhamanyu with three violent barbs and Uttamaujas with four. The heroic brothers instantly pierce him deep with ten shafts each, and break his bow and cut down his standard as well. Roaring, Kritavarman, son of Hridika, sweeps up another bow and rives the bows of both brothers and covers them with his scathing arrows. Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, quick as thinking, take up fresh bows and loose twin ferocious invectives of shafts at the Satwata.

Arjuna forges ahead, piercing deeper into the enemy army, while the Panchala princes occupy Kritavarman, who holds them up. Swetavahana attacks the akshauhinis drawn up against him but does not kill Kritavarman although he is within reach. Seeing Partha's violent progress the brave king Srutayudha rushes at him, brandishing his big bow and strikes Partha with three arrows, Janardana with seventy and Partha's standard with a razor-headed barb. Arjuna retaliates in fury, piercing his antagonist deep with ninety straight shafts, like a mahout a mighty elephant with his ankush.

Srutayudha, undimmed, finds Arjuna with seventy-seven thunderbolts but Arjuna breaks his bow, shreds his quiver, and in wrath strikes him deep through his chest with seven heavy shafts. An incensed Srutayudha takes up another bow and drills Vasava' son with nine barbs, his arms and chest. Laughing all the while, the Pandava unleashes a gale of thousands of arrows, killing his horses and charioteer. Never pausing, Arjuna bores his antagonist with seventy arrows. Leaping down from his useless chariot, valiant Srutayudha rushes roaring at Arjuna with his mace raised high.

The heroic king Srutayudha is the son of Varuna and Parnasa, the mighty river of cool, limpid waters. His mother, Rajan, once begged Varuna, "Let my son never be killed on earth."

Varuna, well pleased with her, had promised, "I will give him an ayudha, by which your son will not be killed on the ground by any enemy. No man can have immortality, O greatest of rivers, for everyone who is born must inevitably die. This child, however, will always be invincible in war through the power of this weapon. Let the fear in your heart be dispelled."

Varuna then gave Srutayudha, with mantras, a mace, and with his gada, Srutayudha became invincible on earth. However, the illustrious Lord of the waters had also said to him, "This mace should not be cast at anyone who is not actually fighting. If flung at such a one, it will fly back and fall on you, O brilliant, and take your life!"

And now, his hour to die come, Srutayudha violates that injunction. He casts his lethal mace at Krishna, who receives it upon his dark and tremendous shoulder. Like the wind failing to shake the Vindhya mountains, it has no impact on the Avatara. Instead, the occult gada flies back and fells Srutayudha himself, like a powerful spell consuming the sorcerer. Your troops see Srutayudha slain by his own mace and cries of dismay rise from your ranks.

The river Devi Parnasa's beloved son falls with his head and body shattered before the eyes of all the archers, he falls, resplendent, like a tall pipal tree with spreading branches broken by the wind. Seeing Srutayudha perish, panic grips your warriors and they flee.

Brave Sudakshina, son of the king of the Kambojas, now attacks the flashing Arjuna. Partha looses seven arrows at him that pass right through his body and burrow into the ground behind him. Though spouting blood, Sudakshina strikes Arjuna back with ten kanka-feathered shafts, Krishna with three, and Partha again with five. Arjuna severs his bow, lops off this standard and pierces him with two wedge-headed arrows.

Sudakshina stabs Partha again with three sizzling arrows, and gives an echoing roar. He looses a dread iron astra at the Pandava, a weapon decked with little bells, which blazes like a meteor, giving off sparks of fire, strikes the Vijaya squarely and fells him to his chariot floor!

Recovering in a moment, great Arjuna, now licking the corners of his mouth in anger, shoots a dazzle of fourteen barbs, drawing fonts of blood from his enemy, his horses, and charioteer, breaking his standard and bow into shards. With no instant's pause, Partha pulverises Sudakshina's chariot and then looses a mighty arrow, which blows Sudakshina's heart to shreds. With a sigh, the valiant Kamboja prince, his armour ruined, his limbs turned weak, his crown and angadas come loose, falls head first from his ratha, and his spirit departs his mangled body.

Like a beautiful Karnikara tree in the spring with handsome branches lying uprooted by the wind on a mountaintop, Sudakshina of the Kambojas lies on the bare ground lifeless, instead of on the costliest bed, wearing precious ornaments. Handsome, with coppery eyes and on his head a garland of gold, and radiant like a fire, even in death the mighty-armed Sudakshina is splendent as some wonderful mountain.

Seeing Srutayudha and Sudakshina slain, your warriors yet again take to their heels in terror.'"

"Sanjaya says, "After he kills Sudakshina and Srutayudha, and when they recover their courage, your legions set on Arjuna more fiercely than ever. The Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Sibis and the Vasatis loose storms of weapons of every kind at the Kiritin, but Arjuna responds with an awesome volley of six hundred arrows, unleashed in a moment, sprayed in all directions. Struck by panic by his archery the likes of which they have never imagined let alone seen before, your men take flight from this dreadful god come hunting them, like little animals from a great tiger.

However, they soon rally and once more surround Partha, who continues to massacre his enemies at imperious and terrifying ease; arrows flare in a constant stream from the Gandiva, hewing off heads and warriors' arms until there is no inch of the field that is not strewn with these grisly ornaments of death. The flights of crows, vultures and ravens that hover over Kurukshetra form an eerie canopy in the sky.

Seeing their men decimated, Srutayus and Achyutayus are full of belligerence and continue to fight Dhananjaya in wrath. Mighty, strong, proud, heroic, of noble lineage, the two archers, Rajan, anxious to win great fame and victory for your son, by extinguishing the elemental Arjuna, envelop him with arrows from his right and left. A thousand deadly shafts they lash down on Arjuna like two thunderheads filling a lake. Maharatha Srutayus suddenly strikes Dhananjaya with a fell spear and, deeply wounded, Arjuna Parantapa faints, to Krishna's puzzlement.

Immediately, as if to pour acid into his wound, Achyutayus from the other flank drives another javelin into Partha. In excruciating agony, Arjuna totters in the chariot and clutches at his flagstaff to support himself. And all the fighting men give a great jubilant roar, thinking that the Pandava they dread has been killed.

Krishna, grieved to see Partha swoon, soothes him with divine, comforting words. Srutayus and Achyutayus do not cease their onslaught; wheeling around the son of Indra, they mantle the Pandava's chariot with a tempest of missiles so completely that the ratha, its warrior and sarathy and its horses vanish from view. Even the banner of snarling Hanuman cannot be seen anymore.

Meanwhile, Arjuna slowly regains his senses, like someone returning from the very land of the dead. Seeing his ratha with Vasudeva overwhelmed by arrows and finding his two antagonists before him like two blazing fires, Partha the paladin invokes the Indrastra. Thousands of arrows flame forth from it, cutting down their volley in the sky and striking both their heads from their necks in scarlet bursts and they fall like two great trees brought down by the wind. This done, Arjuna ploughs on through the dense enemy, encountering many great warriors, besting them all. Shock sweeps through your ranks at the deaths of Srutayus and Achyutayus; your men stand as if they have seen the ocean dried up. Arjuna effortlessly despatches fifty maharathas who followed the two slain princes, and plunges on strewing the field with corpses of numberless great warriors. Seeing Srutayus and Achyutayus die, O Bhaarata, their sons Niyatayus and Dirghayus charge Arjuna, covering him in a gale of diverse weapons. Invincible Partha Arjuna, in an incarnadine moment, sends both princes to Yama. Arjuna thunders on through the helpless Kuru army like some elephant trampling his way through a red lake of lotuses.

Then thousands of Angas surround Arjuna with their elephant-force. Urged on by Duryodhana, many kings of the west and the south, and many others led by the king of the Kalingas also encircle Arjuna with their great elephants. But Arjuna today is a god on Kurukshetra, and more quickly than I can tell you, Rajan, the field of death is bestrewn with thousands of heads and arms more, all richly ornamented, all struck off by the arrows than radiate endlessly from the magical Gandiva. The severed heads look like golden stones entwined by snakes. Arms lopped off from the elephant riders fall to the ground like birds dropping from trees; while the elephants, pierced by thousands of arrows and flowing blood from their wounds, look like hills in the monsoon with melted red chalk streaming down their sides.

Different kinds of Mlecchas, all variously ugly, wearing garish attire, armed with many strange and crude weapons, sit on the backs of elephants bathed in blood, while others look weirdly resplendent, as they lie prone on the field, having been killed by Arjuna. Thousands of elephants and their riders, and those on foot that urged them forward, all struck by Partha's bolts, vomit blood, scream in agony, and either fall or run in all directions.

Many of the huge beasts, terrified, lumber away from the fearsome Kshatriya and crush their own men, including countless warriors fierce as poisonous snakes. Many terrible Yavanas, Paradas, Sakas, Balhikas and Mlecchas born of the cow belonging to Vasishta, with fierce eyes, accomplished in war and looking like Yamadutas, all of them experts of the mayic powers of the Asuras, many Darvabhisaras, Daradas, Pundras in thousands of bands, and together forming a force that is beyond count, shower their missiles all together over Arjuna aflame.

The wild and skilled Mlecchas pound Arjuna with their arrows. Arjuna fluidly shoots lethal torments of shafts from the Gandiva, barbs like locust swarms which cast a deathly shadow over the Dhartarashtra troops, and mow down almost all the Mlecchas, whose heads are completely shaved or half-shaved or covered with matted locks, who are unclean in all their ways and have crooked faces.

The remaining hill dwellers flee.

In dark glees, ravens, kankas and wolves lap up the blood of elephants, horses and their Mleccha-riders lying upon the field, all felled by the Partha's burning volleys. Partha lets flow a bubbling river of blood; the slain foot-soldiers, horses, chariots and elephants are its banks; the showers of arrows, its rafts; the hair of the dead its moss and weeds and the fingers cut off from warriors' hands its little fishes—ah, river as awful as Death itself at the end of the Yuga. The bloody river flows towards the realm of Yama with the bodies of dead elephants floating on it and slowing its current.

The Earth covered with the blood of Kshatriyas, elephants, horses and their riders, has become a crimson lake, like one formed by Indra's torrential rains when they cover lands both high and low. The Kshatriya bull despatches six thousand horsemen and a thousand of the greatest rathikas into the jaws of death. Thousands of elephants, pierced all over by his arrows, lie prostrate on the field, like hills struck down by thunder and lightning.

Arjuna hurtles across Kurukshetra, an elephant in musth trampling a forest of reeds, killing horse riders, ratha-warriors and elephants with supreme ease. Just as a wind fuels a conflagration that devours a dense forest of trees, creepers, plants, dry wood and grass, Dhananjaya's fire, with shafts for its flames and fanned on by the Krishna-wind, hungrily consumes the forest of your warriors. Emptying chariots in carmine flurries, covering the ground everywhere he goes with corpses, Dhananjaya truly seems to dance, bow in hand, among teeming legions of enemies, flooding the earth with blood with his thunderous shafts.

Energized by all the killing he does, he penetrates deeper into the Bharata host and confronts Srutayudha, king the Ambashtas. Arjuna slaughters his horses with a slew of kanka-feathered arrows; he breaks that king's bow in his hands with a single unerring shaft.

The briefly shaken Ambashtha king picks up a great mace and rushes at Arjuna's chariot and strikes Krishna a stunning blow. Arjuna's eyes turn red and he looses a vicious flight of gold-winged barbs at the Ambashtha, shrouding that hero in a small cloud, shimmering. Arjuna shatters that king's mace with another clutch of arrows, smashing the heavy weapon into dust. Quick as thinking, that king hefts another gada and, undaunted, storming the Pandava's ratha, rains a flurry of heavy blows on both Krishna and Arjuna.

Next moment, Arjuna hacks his opponent's massive arms off at their shoulders with two wedge-headed short arrows, spraying blood in the air. With another shaft, he removes Srutayudha's head from his neck in a bright ruddy blast. That Kshatriya falls like a stake raised to Indra with its ropes cut.

Hundreds of elephants and chariots beyond count surround the battling Pandava and he becomes invisible like the Sun hidden by dark clouds.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Arjuna, his heart set just on killing Jayadratha, furrows deep into the Bharata host, decimating the invincible akshauhinis of both Drona and the Bhojas; he kills prince Sudakshina of the Kambojas, as well as the valiant Srutayudha. Relentlessly he razes the Kuru army and panic takes your forces like a fever.

Seeing his army mown down at the Vijaya's will, Duryodhana rides up to Drona and cries, "Arjuna has already humbled our great army, Acharya; he has already cloven through your sakata vyuha. He brings such carnage to us, you must tell us what to do to stop him! Bless you, Acharya! You are our only refuge; do what you must to see that the Pandava does not kill Jayadratha. Like a raging fire consuming heaps of dry grass and straw, the Dhananjaya conflagration, fanned by the wind of his wrath, devours my troops.

Seeing the son of Kunti burning his way so easily through our legions, the maharathas who guard Jayadratha are full of doubt if they can stop Partha. All the kings say that Arjuna could never defeat Drona. But Pandu's son stormed disdainfully through your vyuha, most splendid one. Ah, my army must be weak indeed, why, even as if I have no warriors of any worth.

O most splendid, blessed Drona, I know that in your heart, you are devoted to the Pandavas, and that is why Arjuna has his way with us. I also seek to please you, Acharya, with everything in my power, and I cannot think of what more I can do. But you seem to disregard all that I do for you. Ah Drona, we are devoted to you but your favour lies only with the Pandavas, although you receive your livelihood from us! I did not know until now that you are a razor hidden in honey. If you had not assured that we would contain, no, even humiliate the Pandavas, I would never have prevented Jayadratha from returning to his own country. I am a fool to expect protection from you.

I assured Jayadratha that he would be safe with us and now I see him being offered up as a yagnapasu, a sacrificial animal to Yama. Any man might escape from death's very jaws, but there will be no escape for Jayadratha once he is within Dhananjaya's reach.

O you of the red horses, do whatever you must to save Jayadratha! I am deranged with anxiety. Pay no heed to my raving at you; I beg you protect the Saindhava from dreadful Arjuna!"

Drona replies, "I do not find fault with what you say. Duryodhana, I tell you truly that you are as dear to me as Aswatthaman. So do what I tell you now, Rajan! Of all charioteers, Krishna is the greatest and his horses are the best of their great pedigree. Arjuna's chariot flashes through the small gap in our forces. Do you not see the countless arrows the Kiritin unleashes from his great Gandiva that fall full two miles behind his ratha as he flies ahead, and every shaft taking a life?

I am old now, child; I cannot ride as swiftly as Pandu's son. Besides, the entire Pandava army is now close upon our van.

Arjuna has left Yudhishtira by himself, and this is my chance to seize their king, as I vowed I would before all our Kshatriyas. I cannot leave the entrance to our vyuha, and so you must fight Phalguna!

Riding with the best support, you can match Arjuna, who is alone and who only is your equal in lineage and achievements. Do not be afraid, go and fight him. You are the sovereign of the world, a great king, a famed Kshatriya and a master of quelling your enemies. O heroic subduer of enemy cities, ride swiftly and face Kunti's son yourself!"

Duryodhana says, "O Acharya, how can I fight Arjuna who passed even you, who are our greatest warrior by far? The lord of the Devas, armed with the Vajra, can be vanquished in battle but not Arjuna Purandara. He has defeated Hridika's son Kritavarman of the Bhojas and you, who are equal to a Deva. He has killed Sudakshina and king Srutayudha; he has killed both Srutayus and Achyutayus and numberless Mlecchas. How can I challenge this invincible son of Pandu, who is like an all-consuming fire? How can you think I am fit to fight Arjuna today? Ah, I am dependent on you like a slave. Protect my honour and my fame, O Drona!"

Drona says, "You rightly say, O scion of Kuru, that Dhananjaya is irresistible. Yet, today I will ensure that you will face him and contain him. Let all the archers in the world witness the wonderful feat of Arjuna being held in check by you in the very presence of Krishna. I will sheath your body in my golden kavacha in a way that no weapon will so much as graze your skin! Even if the three worlds with the Asuras, the Devas, the Yakshas, the Uragas and the Rakshasas, together with all Manavas, take the field against you today, you will still have no cause to fear them. Neither Krishna nor Arjuna, nor any other warrior, will be able to pierce your armour. Cased in this armour, ride swiftly against Arjuna today. He will not resist you!"

Then Drona, the one who knows Brahma the best, touches water, utters some powerful secret Mantras, and quickly fastens his own remarkable kavacha around Duryodhana's, astonishing everyone there, and ensuring the your son will be invincible.

Drona says, "Let the Vedas, Brahman, and the Brahmanas bless you. Let all the greater Nagas bless you, O Bhaarata!

Let Yayati, Nahusha, Dhundhumara, Bhagiratha and the other Rajarishis watch over you and do what benefits you.

Let blessings be upon you from creatures that have but one leg, and from those having many legs and from creatures that have no legs.

Let Swaha, Swadha and Sachi all be with you and help you. O sinless one, let Lakshmi, Arundhati, Asita, Devala, Viswamitra, Angiras, Vasishta and Kasyapa do what is favourable to you.

Let Dhatri, the Lord of the worlds, the points of the compass, the Lokapalas, the regents of those cardinal points, and the six-faced Kartikeya all be benign toward you.

Rajan, let the divine Vivaswat help you completely. Let the four elephants, the Diggajas of the four quarters, Bhumi, Akasa, the Navagraha, the Lord Sesha, the greatest Naga, who is below the Earth and holds her on his head, give you what fetches you weal!

O son of Gandhari, once upon a time, an Asura named Vritra, displaying his prowess, defeated the best of the Devas in battle. Those inhabitants of swarga, led by Indra and numbering thousands upon thousands, their bodies lacerated, sapped of their vitality and strength, and in terror of Vritrasura, went to Brahma and sought his protection.

The gods said, 'O best and foremost of Devas, Vritra has crushed us in battle. Be our refuge now; rescue us from this great dread.'

Addressing Vishnu beside him and the Devas led by Indra, Brahma said to the unhappy ones, these words filled with truth. 'Indeed, I will always protect the gods led by Indra, and the Brahmanas too. The tejas of Tvashtri from which Vritra has been created is invincible. Having in olden days performed tapasya for a million years, Tvashtri then created Vritra with the leave of Maheswara. This mighty enemy of yours has vanquished you through the grace of Mahadeva Siva. You must go to Sankara's abode to see him. Once you behold him, you will be able to defeat Vritra. So go without delay to the mountains of Mandara where the origin of tapasya, the destroyer of Daksha's yagna, the wielder of the Pinaka, the Lord of all creatures, the slayer of the Asura Bhaganetra, lives.'

The Devas flew to Mandara with Brahma, and saw there that mass of energy and light, that Supreme God endued with the splendour of a million suns. Seeing the Devas, Maheswara welcomed them and enquired what he could do for them. Said He, The sight of a radiant person can never be fruitless. Let the fruition of your desires proceed from this.

The dwellers of swarga replied, 'Vritra has deprived us of our tejas and strength. Be the refuge of the swargavasis. Look, O Lord, at our bodies battered and bruised by his blows. We seek your protection. Be our refuge, O Maheswara!'

The God of Devas, called Sarva, said, 'Devas, you well know how this originated from the fervid wish and tapasya of Tvashtri the divine artificer, whose son is Vritra. It is surely my dharma to help you dwellers of heaven. O Indra, take this lustrous armour from my body and, O king of the Devas, put it on while chanting these mantras in your mind.'

And the boon-giving Siva gave Indra the armour with the mantras to be chanted by the wearer. Protected by the armour, Indra went to battle against the army of Vritra and although they cast all kinds of astras at him, the joints of Siva's armour could not be breached. Then Indra slew Vritra, and later he gave Angiras the kavacha, whose joints are made of mantras.

Angiras passed on those mantras to his son Brihaspati, who indeed has knowledge of all mantras. Brihaspati imparted that knowledge to the very intelligent Agnivesya. Agnivesya passed it down to me, and it is with those same mantras, O Duryodhana, best of kings, that I fasten this armour onto your body."

Saying this, Drona, that bull among acharyas, says again to your magnificent son, "Rajan, I sheath your body in this divine, joining its links with the Brahma mantras, even as in olden days Brahma himself fastened this kavacha to Indra's body during the Devasura yuddha sparked by the abduction of Tara. Here, I do now swathe you in the same ancient armour."

Having thus fastened the impenetrable armour onto Duryodhana with the arcane mantras of Brahma, Drona sends the king to battle Arjuna. Now wearing the armour of the Mahatman Acharya, Duryodhana rides at Arjuna's ratha with a thousand mighty war-maddened elephants, a hundred thousand horses and many maharathas. He storms forth to the sound of conches, drums and other instruments, going even like Virochana's son Bali of yore. Then, O Bhaarata, seeing the Kuru king himself go forth a fathomless ocean, a deafening uproar of joy arises among your troops.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After Duryodhana sallies forth to hunt down Partha and Krishna, who have penetrated deep into the Kaurava army, the Pandavas, accompanied by the Somakas, charge Drona with loud shouts. A ferocious battle erupts between the Kurus and the Pandavas at the portal to the sakata vyuha, the sight of which fills all onlookers with awe and makes their hair stand on end. Rajan, the sun is in the meridian and the encounter between the two forces is truly such that we have never seen or heard of its like before.

Led by Dhrishtadyumna, the Parthas all in immaculate battle array cover Drona's legions with heavy showers of arrows. We, too, with the maharatha Drona leading us, envelop the Pandava forces under Prishata's son Dhrishtadyumna, with our missiles.

The two hosts, massed with rathas, are past magnificent, like two immense clouds in the summer sky, driven at each other by opposing winds. Locking in bloody battle, they fight wildly, recklessly, like the Ganga and Yamuna swollen with rainwater during the monsoon hurtling into confluence. Their myriad weapons are like the winds that blow before them; their legions are packed dense with elephants, horses and chariots and the maces the warriors wield their lightning that charges the awesome dark cloud formed by the Kuru host, whirled on by the Drona-tempest, and pouring incessant shafts: lashing torrents of rain that seek to quench the blazing Pandava-fire.

Like a spinning, blasting summer typhoon agitating the ocean, Drona blows at the Pandava host. The Pandavas rush towards the Acharya with terrific energy, to breach his vyuha, like a driving flood dashing against a strong embankment, to sweep it away. But Drona resists the furious Pandavas, Panchalas and Kekayas like a mountain stopping the fiercest tide. Quickly, many other avid and great kings of your army attack the Pandavas from all sides.

Then, rallying the Pandavas, Naravyaghra Dhrishtadyumna repeatedly attacks Drona, fervently trying to pierce his stolid defences. Indeed, as Drona showers his arrows on Prishata's son, so does he on Drona. With blades and swords for the winds that blow before it, richly furnished with arrows, spears and sabres, with the bowstring its lightning, and its twang its thunderclaps, the Dhrishtadyumna-cloud decants on all sides, killing many Kaurava maharathas and large number of horses, and swamps the hostile akshauhinis with his ceaseless gales of arrows.

Dhrishtadyumna stops Drona in his tracks, as the Brahmana attempts to scythe through the chariot-divisions of the Pandavas, felling their rathikas with his extraordinary thunderbolts. Although Drona struggles valiantly, his army, on encountering the fire-prince Dhrishtadyumna is truncated into three columns. One of these retreats towards Kritavarman, the Bhoja king; another towards Jalasandha; and the third, savagely set upon by the Pandavas, retreats towards Drona himself.

Drona repeatedly rallies his troops but every time Dhrishtadyumna splits them again. And the Pandavas and the Srinjayas massacre the Dhartarashtra army divided into three, like many beasts of prey a herd of cattle left unprotected by its herdsmen in a forest. Such is the slaughtering that it is as if Death himself swoops down to swallow Drona's warriors after Dhrishtadyumna first stuns them. As famine, pestilence and robbers destroy the kingdom of a weak or evil king, the Pandavas consume your army. The rays of the sun reflected by the warriors' weapons and the pall of dust raised by the fighting men blind and sting the eyes of all.

Seeing the Kaurava forces rent in three parts by Dhrishtadyumna and then butchered by the Pandavas, Drona, stirred to great wrath, begins to denude the Panchalas with his elemental astras of fire, water and wind. The Brahmana burns like the fire at the end of the Yuga. He shatters chariots, strikes down elephants, steeds and foot-soldiers, each with just a single missile. No warrior in the Pandava army can withstand Drona's grievous archery.

Scorched by the sun and blasted by the astras of Drona, the Pandava akshauhinis reel and give way on abysmal Kurukshetra. And your host, too, ravaged by Dhrishtadyumna, seems to burst into flames all around like a dry forest on fire. While both Drona and Dhrishtadyumna decimate the two vast hosts, killing untold numbers, the maharathas, the great warriors of both armies, in utter disregard for their lives, continue to fight manfully everywhere. Neither in your army, nor in that of the enemy, O Bharatarishabha, is there a single warrior who flees that hellish carnage through fear.

The brothers Vivimsati and Chitrasena and the maharatha Vikarna surround Bhimasena, while Vinda, Anuvinda of Avanti and Kshemadhurti of marvellous skill support your three sons who engage the incomparable Bhimasena.

The noble and energetic king Balhika, with his troops, fights the sons of Draupadi. Saibya, lord of the Govasanas, with a thousand of his best warriors, faces the son of the great warrior king of the Kasis and resists him. Salya, king of the Madras, surrounds Dharmaraja Yudhishtira with his legion, gentle Yudhishtira who today is a blazing fire on the abysmal harrowing field. Brave and choleric Dusasana, ably supported by his own akshauhini, as always in fury, his brow knit darkly, rides against the matchless Satyaki.

Rajan, I led my own troops, all in armour, well armed and supported by four hundred of the finest bowmen, to fight Chekitana.

Sakuni with seven hundred Gandhara warriors armed with bows, darts and swords, faces Sahadeva the son of Madri. The two great archers, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, fight Virata, king of the Matsyas, with no care for their lives, fighting for their friend Duryodhana. King Balhika furiously confronts the mighty Sikhandin, son of Yajnasena. The lord of Avanti, with the Sauviras and the cruel Prabhadrakas fend off the rampaging Dhrishtadyumna of the Panchalas.

The fierce-faced Rakshasa Alambusha rushes, fangs bared, at the feral and heroic Ghatotkacha, Bhima's son who comes like Death into battle. The maharatha Kuntibhoja, with a large force, attacks the horrible Alambusha. Thus, O Bhaarata, hundreds of separate duels break out between the warriors of your army and theirs.

Meanwhile, Rajan, Jayadratha remains at the rear of the Kuru army protected by so many great archers and maharathas; among them is Kripa whose chariot wheels are guarded by Aswatthaman on his right, and Karna the Sutaputra on the left. Behind Jayadratha, protecting his rear, is a small host of heroes led by Kripa, Somadatta's son, Vrishasena, Sala and the invincible Salya, who are all masters of every aspect of warfare. After making these arrangements for the protection of Jayadratha, the Kuru army continues the tremendous battle against the Pandavas.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Listen further to that astounding encounter between the Kurus and the Pandavas. Flying straight at Drona, who stands at the lip of his great vyuha, the Pandavas put forth all their might to break into the fortress like formations. Drona and his legions fight staunchly, in rage and inspiration to keep them at bay.

Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, fighting for your son, unleash ten torrid shafts at Virata and a terrific battle ensues between them. Blood sprays in the sunlight and flows like water during that contention that resembles an encounter in the forest between a lion and a pair of wild elephants in musth.

The powerful son of Yajnasena strikes king Balhika with excruciating arrows piercing his innards, and Balhika drills Drupada's son with nine coruscating shafts fletched with golden wings. Indescribably brutal is the duel between those two, one that swells the delight of the brave and makes the timid wilt in terror. The dark deluges of arrows they loose over each other shroud the sky and all the points of the compass, so that darkness falls on Kurukshetra and nothing can be seen.

Saibya, king of the Govasanas, leads his fearless and wild men against the prince of the Kasis, and they lock in battle like two bull elephants.

The belligerent king of the Balhikas is glorious indeed, as he faces all five of Draupadi's sons; their unrestrained encounter is like that of the battle between the mind and the five senses! Loosing torrents of arrows from all sides Draupadi's warrior princes are like the objects of the senses constantly besieging the body.

Your son Dusasana strikes Satyaki deeply with nine keen bolts so the Vrishni almost swoons. Recovering quickly, Satyaki stabs your son deep with ten kanka-feather winged shafts. Lacerating each other, their blood flying, the two look as splendid as two kinsukas in bloom.

Mauled by the arrows of Kuntibhoja, an angry Alambusha also looks like a beautiful flowering kinsuka. The pale Rakshasa, fighting at the head of your army, begins to roar most horribly and gashes Kuntibhoja with a squall of wooden barbs. The two resemble Sakra and the Asura Jambha of old.

The two sons of Madri meanwhile find Sakuni, whom they most loathe, and a violent, hate-filled encounter erupts between them; the twins fetch carnage to Sakuni's Gandhara troops.

The fire of the Pandava's wrath, which you kindled, which Karna stoked and your sons fanned into a conflagration, blazes now as if it will surely consume the entire world. Forced to turn his back on the fight against Nakula and Sahadeva, so ferocious is their onslaught on him, Sakuni stands briefly bemused, not knowing what to do. Seeing him turn back, the fearsome twins again lash down their arrows on him like two thunderheads upon a dimmed mountain. Subala's son, overwhelmed, sorely wounded by countless powerful shafts, turns his chariot and flees towards Drona for refuge!

Magnificent, black Ghatotkacha dashes towards the vile Alambusha with gusto and the duel between the two Rakshasas is like the one between Rama and Ravana of old.

Having struck Salya of the Madras with all of five hundred arrows in a dazzle of bowmanship, Yudhishtira pierces him deep with seven more. The duel between them swells to breathtaking proportions, and is like the one between the Asura Sambara and Indra of the Devas in olden days.

Your sons Vivimsati, Chitrasena and Vikarna, at the head of a large force, skirmish with Bhimasena.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The Pandavas wildly beset the Kauravas who have been divided into three divisions. With blood-curdling roars, Bhimasena rushes against the mighty-armed Jalasandha; Yudhishtira leads his legions against Kritavarman; and Dhrishtadyumna tears into Drona, Rajan, and his arrows flaring at the Brahmana like sunrays.

Now the individual duels cease and a great and general battle begins between all the archers of the Kuru and the Pandava armies, every man of them bright-eyed with battle lust, and an unprecedented bloodbath ensues. Great Drona looses a dense swarm of missiles at Dhrishtadyumna and his legions, and a gasp goes up from both armies. In a moment, which seems to occur in another dimension of time, Drona's virulent shafts sever the heads of some thousands of fighting men and they roll in macabre pageant on the battlefield, which then resembles a forest of ghoulish lotuses.

Fine robes, ornaments, weapons, standards and coats of mail are strewn on the ground everywhere amidst every division of the armies. Coats of golden mail, dyed with blood, appear like clouds charged with lightning.

Other mighty maharathas, drawing great swords measuring full six cubits long, shoot down elephants, horses and men. In that frightful melee, one sees swords, shields, bows, heads and coats of mail lying scattered all around; one sees innumerable headless trunks rise up weirdly, Rajan, in the midst of the horrific battle and vultures, kankas, jackals and swarms of other carnivores rending at the flesh of fallen men, horses and elephants, drinking their blood, or dragging them by their hair, or licking up their marrow through bones bitten through, or hauling whole corpses and severed limbs, or rolling their heads on the ground.

Masters of war, seeking only fame, fight at the ends of their strength and skills. Many warriors wheel across the field, displaying various incredible maneuvers of swordsmen. The noblest men butcher one another in frenzy, with swords, darts, lances, spears, axes, maces, spiked clubs and other uncommon weapons, why they strangle each other with bare hands until tongues loll out blue, eyes roll up in their sockets and fierce spirits finally quit their manly bodies.

Maharathas fight other chariot-warriors, horsemen against horsemen, elephants other elephants and foot-soldiers fall upon foot-soldiers. The elephants present the most dramatic and gory spectacle, maddened and trumpeting shrilly, as they gore each other viciously in the manner they do in sporting arenas.

All mercy and dharma have departed Kurukshetra, on this fourth day of the kali yuga of wrath unleashed, and the greatest warriors fight like senseless beasts rather than highborn heroes. Dhrishtadyumna horses are entangled with those of Drona. Those steeds fleet as the wind, the former's white as doves and the latter's red as blood, are still so beautiful, even at the grim heart of darkness; they are like stunning clouds charged with lightning.

O Bhaarata, abruptly Prishasta's son parantapa Dhrishtadyumna sees Drona again, and in froth, flings down his bow and engages him the most difficult kind of combat—hand-to-hand, with sword and shield. Seizing the shaft of Drona's ratha, he vaults onto it, sometimes leaping onto the middle of the yoke, sometimes on its joints and sometimes just behind the horses.

And as the fire-prince moves nimbly from place to place, even upon the very back of Drona's red horses, Drona finds no opportunity or opening to strike at him. All of us watch this in amazement! Indeed, Dhrishtadyumna's sudden attack is like the strike of a hunting hawk in the forest.

Recovering from his initial surprise, Drona first smashes Dhrishtadyumna's shield, emblazoned with a hundred moons, next his sword with ten more shafts, and finally with four and sixty arrows, kills his horses. With a few broad-headed shafts, the Brahmana fells the Panchala prince's standard, his royal chatra and then kills both his Parshni charioteers. The terrible Acharya now draws his bowstring to his ear and looses a fatal arrow straight at Dhrishtadyumna standing on his horses' necks, even like Indra casting his Vajra at an enemy.

Even as the deadly shaft flies to claim the life of the prince born to kill the grand Drona, Satyaki from a side cuts it in slivers with fourteen perfect arrows. The bull of the Sinis saves the prince of the Panchalas whom the greatest of acharyas had seized like a deer held by a lion in its jaws. Seeing Dhrishtadyumna saved, Drona in fury shoots twenty-six arrows at Satyaki, to which now the emboldened, relieved Panchala, having leapt gratefully off Drona's chariot horses, replies with precisely twenty-six of his own that thud squarely into Drona's chest in a neat round clump, even while the Brahmana turns to slaughtering the Srinjayas.

All the Panchala maharathas, agog to see the inspired Satyaki vanquish the Kuru Acharya and senapati, quickly converge and whisk their own prince Dhrishtadyumna away from immediate danger.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'O Sanjaya, after Satyaki saves Dhrishtadyumna's life, what does Drona do against that Naravyaghra Satyaki, the grandson of Sini?'

Sanjaya replies, 'Like a mighty Naga, with wrath for his venom, his stretched bow his yawning jaws, his sharp shafts his fangs, his eyes red as copper from the frenzy of battle, and breathing hard, Drona, his red chargers seeming to soar into the sky to scale a mountain top, turns viciously on Satyaki, covering the Vrishni who has deprived him of his most precious prey with a tempest of golden-winged arrows.

Seeing the irresistible Drona cloudburst, with the rumble of chariot-wheels its roar, the twanging of its always bent bow its thunderclaps, long arrows its lightning-flashes, the Brahmana's fury its gale winds and flying at him upon the horses that are the hurricane that impel it, Satyaki coolly rushes ahead to meet it, smilingly saying to his charioteer, 'O Suta, whip the horses to fly at this Brahmana fallen from his swadharma, this refuge of Dhritarashtra's son, the dispeller of the Kuru king's sorrows and fear, the acharya of all the princes, the warrior always so proud of his skill.'

At which, Satyaki's superb silver horses, with the speed of the wind, hurtle directly towards Drona. The two Parantapas collide, and each rains down thousands of arrows at the other, shafts that fill the firmament and obscure the ten points of the compass. Like two clouds are they, which empty themselves over the Earth at summer's end. The sun becomes invisible, the very wind ceases to blow and an endless thick pall of gloom descends on the battlefield, so that, blinded, all the other warriors on Kurukshetra are forced to stop fighting.

The thunder of the fusillades of the awesome twain is no less than that of Indra's Vajra striking. Pierced all over with long shafts, O Bhaarata, both look as if they are covered by nests of snakes. Brave warriors hear the incessant twanging of their bows and the sounds that their palms make, and to them it is just like the crash of thunder falling upon mountaintops.

The rathas of both warriors, their horses and their charioteers pierced by barbs of golden wings, are beautiful to behold. Fierce and incessant is the downpour of bright straight arrows, splendent like snakes freshly freed from their sloughs. Their canopies and their standards are shredded; their glorious bodies are bathed in blood, but spurred by the single thought of victory, they continue to strike each other with deadly shafts. With blood flowing down their limbs, they resemble a pair of elephants in musth, ichor streaming from lust rent temples.

The roars, shouts and other cries of the soldiers, the blast of conches and the beat of drums all cease, Rajan, for no one make the slightest sound. All the akshauhinis fall silent, and all their warriors stop fighting and become spectators of that single duel. Maharathas, elephant riders, horsemen and foot-soldiers surround these two bulls among men and witness their duel with unwinking eyes. The elephant-divisions, the horse-divisions, and the chariot-akshauhinis, all stand still in their ranks, like figures in a painting of war. Adorned with gems and gold, studded profusely with pearls and corals, with flags waving, with coats of shining golden mail, with triumphal banners and richly caparisoned elephants, with fine cloaks and robes, with bright and sharp weapons glinting, with the heads of horses ornamented with chamaras, yak-tails and with gold and silver, with wildflower garlands draped around the frontal lobes of elephants and shimmering rings round their tusks—the Kuru and Pandava armies look like a vast gathering of cloud banks at the close of summer, decked with rows of cranes and myriads of fire-flies under them and embellished with rainbows and flashes of lightning.

Riveted, our men as well as those of Yudhishtira watch the battle between Satyaki and the noble Drona, as do the Devas led by Brahma, Soma, the Siddhas, the Charanas, the Vidyadharas, and the great Nagas, from their invisible wondrous vimanas in the sky. All that watch are wonderstruck by the two lions among men who dash forward and fall back, striking at each other all the while.

Both of untold prowess and skill, Drona and Satyaki put their astounding genius at battle on display, and draw gushing fonts of blood from each other, always as if in sport! Satyaki cuts down a rash of Drona's powerful missiles in flight, and next moment breaks the Acharya's bow in his hands. In the twinkling of an eye, Bharadwaja's son sweeps up another and strings it, but Satyaki cleaves that one too.

Drona picks up another bow in a wink, but no sooner does he string it than Satyaki splits it; and this happens a full nine and seven times!

Watching Satyaki fight, Drona thinks, "Such prodigious archery that this greatest of the Satwatas shows may be found in Rama and Arjuna, in Kartavirya and the Purushavyaghra Bhishma! But hardly in anyone else."

In his heart he applauds the prowess of Satyaki. Seeing the Vrishni prodigy's dexterity as being equal to that of Vasava himself, Drona, greatest of all masters of weapons, is deeply stirred and gratified. So, too, are the Devas above with Indra at their head, for they have never seen another archer of such brilliance and light like swiftness of hand as Satyaki although they, the Siddhas and the Charanas are acquainted with Drona's feats.

Finally, Drona, that scourge of Kshatriyas, strings a fresh bow and launches an astra of profound maya at Satyaki. The Vrishni hero baffles that recondite weapon with a hermetic astra of his own; and then he continues to lash Drona with his arrow storms. In truth, Rajan, I have no words with which to describe the superhuman skill and unworldly feats of the two heroes, one old and the other still young. I have never before seen such a duel, which all the most knowing among both your warriors and the Pandavas' cheer and applaud. Satyaki and Drona both summon the exact same astras at the very same moments, and when they themselves become aware of this, they fight with somewhat diminished fury, as if acknowledging each other's unequalled greatness. It seems their spirits turn mild for a moment.

Then, Rajan, his wrath returning, Drona begins to invoke the most potent devastras to kill Satyaki. Seeing the dreadful foe-slaughtering Agneyastra, Satyaki invokes the Varuna. Seeing them both now summon celestial weapons, loud cries of alarm are heard and the very birds of the sky cease to fly through it. The two astras flare out at each other at the same moment and locking on high are extinguished against each other, falling away in embers and a drizzle.

Just at this time, the sun begins to sink toward the western horizon. Anxious for Satyaki, Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Nakula, and Sahadeva charge Drona bringing the Matsyas and the Salweya troops with them. At which, thousands of Kuru princes led by Dusasana at their head, rally to protect Drona who is now surrounded by his enemies. Another pitched and tumultuous battle breaks out. The earth is quickly covered with a thick skin of dust and showers of arrows shot by both sides; and nothing is visible anymore. The battle rages on complete disregard of life and limb, of kinship and friendship.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The sun moves into his downward course towards the summit of the Asta hills, Surya turns cool, the sky is covered with dust, and the day begins to fade fast. As for the soldiers, some rest, some fight, some return to the field they have let in fear, now to vie again for victory. As the great war burns on behind them, Arjuna and Krishna fly on towards Jayadratha. With his irresistible arrows, Arjuna creates a path through the enemy forces, wide enough for his chariot and Krishna plunges his ratha along that narrow way. Awesome is the Parthasarathy's skill, quicksilver, as he flashes expertly along the narrowest openings. Your troops give way to Krishna blazing with lustre.

Arjuna's arrows, each one engraved with his name, some of bamboo, others of iron, of long range, flame from his Gandiva like the yuga fire, every last one claiming an enemy life, drinking the blood of living men and their beasts, killing scavengers and birds of prey and ill omen as well, who rend at the noble blood and swill thirstily from the river of gore flowing on Kurukshetra. Standing tall and erect upon his chariot, Arjuna shoots his arrows full two miles ahead of him, and his chariot driven by his divine sarathy arrives where he aims even as the shafts pierce and dispatch his enemies!

Hrishikesa drives his ratha, yoked to gandharva horses swift as Garuda or the wind, with such speed that the whole universe marvels to watch him. Indeed, Rajan, the chariot of Surya himself, or those of Rudra or Vaisravana, have never gone as fast. No chariot has ever before been driven with such speed in war, as Arjuna's moving with the swiftness of a wish cherished in the mind. However, as Krishna and Arjuna race along through the enemy ranks, the superb horses begin to tire. Hunger and thirst afflict them as do the countless barbs that have pierced their sides along their careen. Yet, the wonderful beasts prance as they flash along flying over slain enemies' bodies, over dead horses, over broken chariots and even the massive corpses of fallen elephants.

Rajan, the two heroic brothers of Avanti, Vinda and Anuvinda at the head of their forces, notice that Arjuna's horses are tired, challenge him and strike him with sixty-four sizzling shafts, Janardana with seventy, and their four horses with a hundred. Infuriated, Arjuna, with his knowledge of the marmas of the body, pierces them with nine perfectly aimed barbs, striking them deep through the most critical and painful parts of their bodies. Roaring like two tigers, the brothers drown Krishna and Arjuna in a flood of arrows.

With two wedge-headed arrows Arjuna Swetavahana of the white steeds seamlessly breaks Vinda and Anuvinda's wonderful bows, and cuts down their standards bright as gold. The Avantis seize up fresh bows and resume their onslaught but great Partha easily frustrates their fire upon him. Never pausing he kills their horses, their charioteers, the two rathikas that protect their backs and the others that follow them.

Next, with another broad-headed arrow, sharp as a razor, he severs the older brother's head and Vinda falls out of his ratha like a tree broken by the wind. His eyes turning crimson to see his precious brother die, Anuvinda abandons all restraint, leaps down from his horseless chariot, mace raised high, and rushes towards Arjuna to wreak vengeance on him. He strikes Krishna on his brow, but the Avatara stands unmoved as the Mainaka mountain. In a blur of six arrows, Arjuna cuts away his legs, his arms and head and blows his wide chest apart, and Anuvinda falls onto the hallowed field like a riven hillock.

Seeing both the brothers dead, their followers, mad with grief, attack Arjuna, shooting hundreds of arrows in frenzy. Arjuna, resplendent as a fire consuming a forest at the end of winter, consumes them all in a few moments. He trundles over the fallen troops with some difficulty, shining bright like the rising sun destroying the clouds that had hidden it. Fear fills the Kauravas but seeing that he is tired and that Jayadratha is still far away, they recover quickly and surround him, shouting and roaring.

Arjuna says softly to Krishna, "Our horses are injured and tired and Jayadratha is still far away. Tell me, O Krishna, wisest of men, what should we do now? With you for their vision, the Pandavas will vanquish their enemies. I think that we should unyoke the horses and draw out luck the arrows that are stuck in them."

Kesava replies, "I too think the same, O Partha."

Arjuna then says, "I will hold the enemy forces at bay, O Kesava, while you tend to the horses."

Alighting from his chariot, Dhananjaya takes up his Gandiva, and stands fearlessly there like an immovable hill. Seeing him stand alone on the ground, the Kuru Kshatriyas, scenting victory, roar louder and surround him with a number of chariots; all of them stretch their bows and shower arrows over him. Filled with battle lust, they brandish their weapons and entirely shroud Partha with their shafts like clouds shrouding the sun. The great warriors rush impetuously at him like angry elephants attacking a lion.

And now the might of Partha that we witness is more extraordinary than ever, as he stands alone holding those countless warriors at bay. Cutting down his enemies' multitudinous shafts, he covers them all with a maelstrom of fire. The banks of shafts colliding in the sky sets the azure vaults ablaze, cascading rivers of sparks down on the field below. The air on Kurukshetra is steamy with the hot breath of Kshatriyas covered in blood, and their horses' heaving breath, and the gasping trumpeting elephants; that great crush of warriors and their beasts resounds with yells, shout, neighing, and wild roars.

That impassable, limitless, surging and implacable ocean of chariots has arrows for its tide, standards for its eddies, elephants for its crocodiles, foot-soldiers for its countless fishes, the blare of conches and the beat of drums for its roar, rathas for its surging waves, helmets for its tortoises, chatras and banners for its froth, and the bodies of slain elephants for its submarine rocks. With his arrows, Partha contains the advance of this sea like a continent.

Now Krishna says to Arjuna, “There is no well here on the field, O Arjuna, for our horses to drink from. They do not want a bath but thirst for water to drink.”

Arjuna cheerfully replies, “Here it is!” And he pierces the earth with an astra and creates a wonderful lake from which the horses can drink! Swans glide on the magic lake, ducks and chakravakas; and it is wide, full of crystalline water with the finest of full-blown lotuses, and teeming with all kinds of fish. Fathomless, it is the resort of many a Rishi; and the Devarishi Narada comes there to look at Arjuna’s lake of wonder. And Partha, who is capable of achieving marvels even like the celestial artificer Tvashtri himself, creates a hall of arrows there, arrows its beams and rafters, arrows its pillars, and arrows for its roof.

Smiling in joy, Krishna cries, “Uttamam! Wonderful!””

"Sanjaya says, 'After the noble son of Kunti creates the lake, even while holding off the enemy, after he creates the hall of arrows, Krishna alights from the chariot and unyokes the horses lacerated by arrows. Watching this extraordinary sight, the Siddhas, the Charanas and all the Kuru warriors, too, applaud loudly.

The maharathas ranged against Arjuna cannot defend themselves against him, even when he fights on foot. It is wonderful to see that although myriads of chariots, elephants and horses attack him, Partha does not flinch but battles on as if he has juts begun his day of war, and prevails over all his enemies. The hostile kings shoot a solid swath of arrows at him, but the son of Vasava, in no anxiety whatever, seems to receive the hundreds of arrows, maces and lances cast at him as the ocean does the hundreds and hundreds of rivers flowing into it, even gladly.

Mahabaho Partha serenely receives all the weapons that the greatest of the enemy warriors loose at him in utmost fury. Fighting from the ground, he still confounds all the kings massed against him on their chariots—like that one fault, avarice, destroying a host of accomplishments!

The Kauravas, Rajan, applaud the astonishing prowess of Partha and Vasudeva, saying, "What more wonderful thing has ever been seen in this world, or will ever be than this that Partha and Govinda, in the very thick battle, have unyoked their horses? These maharathas inspire us with their energy and unshakeable assurance!"

Then Krishna, of eyes like lotus-petals, smiling as if he is in the midst of a group of women and not armed enemies, leads the horses into the hall of arrows, in the very sight of all your troops, and there takes away their fatigue, pain, their trembling and heals their wounds. At his ease, he plucks out the arrows that stick in them and, rubbing them down with his tender hands, makes them trot around slowly and coaxes them to drink. After quenching their thirst and removing their tiredness and pain, he once more carefully yokes them to the wonderful chariot. This done, Sauri, greatest of all living men, mahatejasvin Krishna, mounts the ratha again along with Arjuna and they ride back into battle, swifter then ever.

Seeing the chariot of the two Krishnas fly back into the war, its horses now refreshed, the Kauravas are crestfallen. They sigh, O Rajan, like snakes whose fangs have been pulled out, and say, "Oh, shame, shame on us! Partha and Krishna storm our ranks again slaughtering our troops even like boys playing with a toy. Shame on us that, despite all our best efforts, they vanquish us with such ease and disdain."

Other warriors cry, "O brave Kauravas, kill Krishna and the Kiritin! For their horses have drunk and been refreshed and they fly closer to Jayadratha every moment, decimating us on their way."

Some great lords, Rajan, having seen the never before witnessed sight at the very heart of a war, say among themselves, "Alas, through Duryodhana's sins, king Dhritarashtra's warriors, the other mighty Kshatriyas, and the very Earth has been plunged into calamity and are being destroyed. But ah, Duryodhana still does not understand it."

Thus speak many redoubtable Kshatriyas. Others, O Bhaarata, say, "Jayadratha has already been despatched to Yama. Let the small-minded Duryodhana, with diminished resources, prepare for the funeral obsequies of the Saindhava, his brother-in-law."

Meanwhile, Arjuna sees the sun rapidly westering and Krishna urges his heartened steeds to still greater speed. The Kuru warriors cannot impede his progress at all, as Partha furrows a bloody trail through them, menacing them all like a lion a herd of deer, killing thousands on his inexorable way, drawing nearer a quailing Jayadratha with each moment as he races the Sun to the horizon.

Krishna now whips his fabulous horses and blows a reverberant blast on his Panchajanya the colour of clouds. So swiftly do the gandharva horses fly along now that they overtake Arjuna's arrows!

Seeing danger draw nearer, many Dhartarashtra kings and other Kshatriyas group together and surround Arjuna in some frenzy. Thus confronted by them all, Arjuna has to stop for a moment and now Duryodhana races up and catches up with his lustrous cousin. Seeing the chariot whose rumble is the roar of thunderheads, the ratha that flies the terrible standard bearing Hanuman animated upon it, howling and roaring terribly at them, your forces are quickly unnerved. And when the sun is almost entirely shrouded by the dust that the armies raise, the Kuru warriors, wounded and bleeding from awesome Arjuna's onslaught can no longer bear to even look at the two blindingly splendid Krishnas.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Rajan! I watch Vasudeva and Dhananjaya penetrate deep into our forces, after overrunning many akshauhinis, with their captains running away in fear. A little later, however, the Maharathas, filled with excitement and shame, and spurred on by their innate valour, regain their composure and begin to defy Arjuna again. However, the men who now ride against Arjuna do not return, like the rivers that never return from the ocean. Seeing this, many ignoble Kshatriyas incur sin and hell by turning their backs and running away, like atheists turning away from the Vedas.

Blasting their way through the squadron of Kuru chariots, the two bulls among men finally issue out of it, looking like the Sun and the Moon freed from the jaws of Rahu. The two Krishnas, their tiredness dispelled come through the great host of enemies like two fish passing through a strong net. Truly, they look like Yuga-suns risen in the sky, like men who have escaped from a raging conflagration, or like two fish emerging from the jaws of a makara. And they agitate the Kuru host like a pair of antediluvian makaras agitating the ocean.

While Partha and Krishna were in the midst of Drona's division, your warriors and sons thought that they would never emerge from it. However, now seeing them blithely dash out of its confines, they no longer have hopes for Jayadratha's life. They had thought that the two Krishnas would never be able to escape Drona and Hridika's son Kritavarman. Frustrating their hopes, the two Parantapas, Rajan, slice through Drona's division, and also the impenetrable Bhoja akshauhini. Seeing them, lick their way through the formidable akshauhinis like two blazing fires, your men despair and no longer hope to save Jayadratha's life. Then the intrepid Krishna and Dhananjaya begin to discuss among themselves how they could kill Jayadratha.

Arjuna says, "Six of the very greatest maharathas among the Dhartarashtras have set Jayadratha in their midst. But today, if I only see him, he will not escape me even if Indra with all the Devas become his protectors."

Thus, do the two Krishnas talk, O Mahabaho, while constantly looking for Jayadratha. Hearing them, for they speak freely and aloud, your sons set up a loud outcry. These two Krishna look like a pair of thirsty thunderous elephants, refreshed by drinking water after having crossed a desert. Beyond death and above decay, they look like two merchants who have crossed a mountainous country infested with tigers, lions and wild elephants. Indeed, seeing them free of Drona and Kritavarman and the dreadful light on Partha and Krishna's face, your warriors set up a loud bewailing from all sides.

Having shaken off Drona who is like a deadly poisonous snake or a great fire, as well as the other lords of the Earth, Partha and Krishna are like two blazing suns. Indeed, free of Drona's ocean-like division, they are full of joy like men who have safely crossed the vast deep itself. Free from the dense showers of shafts from the Drona and Kritavarman and their legions, Kesava and Arjuna look like Indra and Agni, or Suns of blinding effulgence. Pierced by the arrows of Bharadwaja's son, and their dark bodies dripping blood, they are as glorious as two mountains covered with flowering karnikaras.

Having crossed the vast lake, of which Drona is the crocodile, numberless arrows the fierce water-snakes and makaras, and great Kshatriyas the deep waters; having emerged out of the cloud of Drona's astras, whose thunder is the twanging of bows and the lightning the flashes of maces and swords, Partha and Krishna are like the Sun and Moon liberated from an engulfing darkness.

Crossing the field which Drona's arms had barred, all beings regard the dark splendid twain as men who have forded the five rivers—the Satadru, the Vipasa, the Ravi, the Chandrabhaga and the Vitasta—, with the ocean for their sixth, all in spate during the monsoon, and full of crocodiles. Wanting to kill Jayadratha who is no longer far from them, the two heroes look like two tigers waiting to fall upon a ruru deer. Their very faces make your warriors, Rajan, think of Jayadratha as one already dead.

Krishna and Arjuna together, with red eyes, are bursting with excitement and joy, and give vent to a battery of jubilant shouts and roars at their first sight of Jayadratha. Indeed, Rajan, the splendour then of Krishna, standing with reins in hand, and of Partha armed with his bow, is like that of Surya or Agni. Free from Drona's restraint, their joy at sight of Jayadratha not far off is like that of two fierce hawks at the sight of a piece of flesh; and even like a pair of hunting hawks do they swoop down on the hapless Saindhava.

But seeing Hrishikesa and Dhananjaya rout Drona's divisions, your valiant son, the king Duryodhana, whose mystic armour Drona has fastened to his majestic form with Brahma's own mantras, dashes forward in a single chariot to protect Jayadratha. He overtakes Krishna and Partha and wheels back to face Kesava of the lotus-like eyes. Seeing this incredible happening, your troops joyfully blow on horns and conches and beat a hundred thousand drums and utter deafening roars to match. Those who stand like burning fires around Jayadratha as his final guardians are also filled with joy on seeing your son.

Seeing Duryodhana confront them, now with his followers rallied behind him, Krishna speaks softly to Arjuna.'

'Krishna says, "Look Arjuna, how wonderfully Duryodhana overtook us! There is no maharatha equal to him. He is a great bowman and can shoot his arrows to a great distance. He is a master warrior, almost invincible in battle, and knows all the different arts of war. Raised in luxury, he is held in great esteem by even the most renowned maharathas. Partha, he has always hated the Pandavas and it is best that you fight him now. For upon him rests, even as on a stake at dice, victory or defeat. Arjuna, expend the venom of your wrath which you have nurtured so long against Duryodhana. He is the root of all the wrongs the Pandavas have suffered and he is now within reach of your arrows. Trust your prowess.

Why has Duryodhana come to do battle with you? Fortune has brought him to you; Dhananjaya, kill him. He was born into a great palace, and he has never known want or deprivation. O bull among men, he also does not know your true might in battle. When there is none in the three worlds of the Devas, the Asuras and Manushyas who can vanquish you in battle, what can one Duryodhana do? Partha, now that he is within range of your ratha, kill him as Purandara slew Vritra.

Duryodhana has always tried to harm you. He cheated Yudhishtira at dice, and this prince with a sinful soul has sinned in many ways against the Dharmaraja. Arjuna, have no scruple, and kill this evil, wrathful and cruel man who is the very embodiment of avarice. Remember the theft of your kingdom through vile deceit; think of your exile in the forest; remember the shame of Draupadi; and remembering all that, put forth your strength and kill this most evil prince.

He has come to bar your way to Jayadratha. Providence has fetched him to you and he is within range of your arrows. He knows that he will have to fight you and today all your purposes, even those that you have not thought of, will be crowned with success. Arjuna, destroy this wretch of his race, the son of Dhritarashtra, even as Indra did of old the Asura Jambha at the Devasura yuddha. If you kill Duryodhana, you can then easily pierce through this headless army. Cut the very root of this evil one, and perform the avabhrita snana, the final cleansing bath of this war, with his blood."

Having heard Krishna out, Arjuna says, "Tathaastu! I will do what you say. Ignore everything else and ride at Duryodhana. I will cut off the head of this devil, who has enjoyed our kingdom for too long without a qualm. Will I not succeed, O Kesava, in avenging myself against this sinner who had Draupadi dragged by her hair into the Kuru sabha when she was in her period and had done no wrong herself?"

Speaking thus among themselves, the two Krishnas are filled with exultation; they urge their great white steeds towards Duryodhana. As for your son, Bharatarishabha, as he nears Partha and Krishna, he feels no fear, even though the occasion is charged to inspire dread. The Kshatriyas of your army applaud him for his daring; indeed, the entire Kuru host roars in exhilaration to watch their king dash forward to bar Arjuna and Krishna's way.

Held up by your son with his bow upraised, Arjuna is furious, and Duryodhana, too, is no less in fury. All the fierce Kshatriyas stop to watch their duel. Duryodhana, Arjuna and Krishna, all eager for the fight, roar and the three of them together raise their conches to their lips and blow resounding blasts on them. Hearing the deep boom of the Panchajanya and the Devadatta drown Duryodhana's lesser sankha, dread quickly seizes your warriors, who are certain that your son will die; they regard him already as a libation poured into the mouth of the sacred fire.

Your warriors cry in fear, "The king is slain! Our king is slain!"

But Duryodhana roars at them, “Dispel your fears! I will send the two Krishnas to Yama.” Feeling certain of victory, wearing Bramha’s magic kavacha, he further cries to Arjuna, “If, Partha, you are truly Pandu’s son loose all your weapons, of this world and unworldly, at me. Let me see your much vaunted manliness today that wins the praise of so many great Kshatriyas.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Roaring out his challenge, Duryodhana strikes Arjuna with three lethal shafts that can excoriate an enemy; with four more, he pierces his enemy's four horses; and with another ten searing missiles he bloodies Krishna's chest and shoots the whip out of the Blue One's hands.

Partha, calm as ever, swift as ever, looses fourteen searing barbs at Duryodhana, stone-whetted and beautifully fletched with shining feathers. They fly true to their mark but every one of them glances harmlessly off the armour that Duryodhana wears. In some surprise, Arjuna shoots another nine and five keen arrows at his hated enemy. But these, too, glance mildly off Duryodhana's kavacha.

Krishna says to Arjuna, "Ah, this is passing strange, even as if mountains moved! Your arrows, O Partha, have turned weak. Has your Gandiva lost its power? Tell me, have the might of your grip and the power of your arms grown womanish? Will this not to be your last meeting with Duryodhana? For I am amazed to watch your terrible shafts fall soft as flowers on Duryodhana. What misfortune is this that your astras filled with the power of thunder and which never fail to pierce an enemy now glance so kindly off this sinner?"

Arjuna replies, "Krishna, I feel certain that Drona has wrapped Duryodhana in his own armour, his ancient kavacha which has the powers of the three worlds, whose secret only the Acharya knows, and which he once shared with me. None of my weapons can pierce this armour; not Indra can pierce it with his Vajra.

But you know all this too well, Krishna! Then why do you berate and provoke me? You know everything that has ever happened in all the worlds, in the past, the present, and what is in the womb of future. Madhusudana, no one knows all this as you do! Duryodhana wearing Drona's armour is fearless in battle. Yet, he does not know what one wearing this kavacha should do for he wears it only like a woman.

Watch now, Janardana, the might of my arms and of my bow. Even though he wears this greatest coat of mail, I will still vanquish Duryodhana. Brahma himself gave this golden armour to Angiras, who gave it to Brihaspati. Purandara had this kavacha from Brihaspati, and Indra once showed it to me with the mantras to be chanted while putting it on. Krishna, though this armour is divine, though Brahma himself created it, it will still not protect the wretched Duryodhana from my arrows."

Saying this, Arjuna invokes an inexorable astra with potent mantras and fits it to his bowstring. But even as he draws back the string of the Gandiva, from a long way off Aswatthaman burns up Arjuna's weapon in his very hand with another astra of untold power. Seeing Aswatthaman, the Brahmavadi, consume his occult weapon from a distance, a stricken Arjuna Swetavahana says to Kesava, "Janardana, I cannot use this astra twice, for if I do it will turn itself on me and kill me and all our troops."

Meanwhile, Rajan, Duryodhana pierces each of the Krishnas with nine barbs like venom-spitting serpents, and then showers down a veritable storm of other shafts over them. Your warriors exult to see this and blow on conches and horns and beat deafening rhythms on their drums; and their roaring fills earth and sky. A fuming Partha, licking the corners of his mouth, closely examines his enemy's body but sees no part that is not covered by the impenetrable armour.

Nothing else for it, the Vijaya in a savage flash kills his adversary's horses, his two Parshni charioteers, and then cleaves Duryodhana's bow and cuts away his leather finger guards, with a perfect incredible volley. The Pandava shatters the Kaurava's chariot next and, having cut away his gloves, strikes him agonisingly through his fingers and palms!

Seeing Duryodhana stricken by Arjuna's canny brilliance, seeing him with his chariot ruined and his bow broken and wringing his hands in pain, a host of Kuru warriors rush to rescue him and surround Arjuna's chariot with thousands of rathas, elephants and horses, and also with teeming legions of foot-soldiers, so that they can no longer be seen.

Dauntless, serene Partha begins to massacre the maharathas, other warriors and elephants, in their hundreds, striking off limbs and heads at his mighty will, so they fall thick and fast on the field. Slain, or in the very moment of being killed, they all fail to reach Arjuna's chariot which stands motionless full two miles from the besieging force on every side.

Now Krishna says urgently to his warrior of light, "Draw your bow forcefully, Partha, and raze the enemy as swiftly as you can, and I will blow my conch!"

Arjuna then draws his bow Gandiva to the fullest stretch and begins to decimate the enemy horribly, in a tide of blood. Meanwhile, his face covered with dust, Krishna raises his Panchajanya to his lips and blows reverberantly on it so all Kurukshetra shakes at the sound. From the thunderous twanging of the Gandiva and the awful blast of the Panchajanya, the Kuru warriors all around, their bodies turning weak, all fall down on the ground.

Arjuna's chariot, suddenly freed from the encircling press, flashes ahead like a bright cloud driven by the wind. Seeing Arjuna flare at them, the protectors of Jayadratha and their followers, all maharathas and mighty bowmen, are shaken and shout aloud. They unleash tempests of arrows at the lone chariot descending so swiftly upon them, and fill the field of the great hunt with the whistling of their arrows, the blare of their conches and other fierce noises—all this in as much fear as wrath!

Hearing the awful uproar that your troops raise, Krishna and Arjuna blow their conches, Rajan, and the twin sound seems to fill all the Earth, with her mountains, seas, islands and the nether worlds. The blast echoes through all the points of the compass, and is echoed back by both the armies. Your maharathas are at first terrified to see Krishna and Dhananjaya but they soon recover and continue to fight. The sight of the two most blessed Krishnas charging towards them is a wonderful one!'"

"Sanjaya says, 'When your greatest warriors finally see those greatest of all the heroes of the Vrishni–Andhaka and the Kuru races, they lose no time, each striving to be the first, in engaging them in battle. On their great rattling chariots, decked with gold, spread with tiger-skins, resembling blazing fires and drawn by mettlesome steeds, they charge, illumining the ten points of the compass, brandishing their bows, the backs of whose staves are chased with dazzling gold. With terrible roars, eight great chariot-warriors, Bhurisravas, Sala, Karna, Vrishasena, Jayadratha, Kripa, Salya and Aswatthaman attack as if they will devour the sky and illuminate the world around in their splendid chariots, adorned with golden moons.

Fighting inspired, on the edge of madness even, they envelop Arjuna on every side with eight gales of fire. Their shining chariots, which rumble like thunderheads, are drawn by the very best horses of different species bred in diverse countries, some in mountainous realms, some in the land of rivers, and some in that of the Sindhus. And other Kuru maharathas converge on Arjuna's chariot to protect your son Duryodhana.

These great warriors, Rajan, take up their conches and blow them, filling the sky, the earth and her seas, with their booming blare. Then Vasudeva blows his Panchajanya and Dhananjaya his Devadatta, those best of all conches on Earth. The blast of the Devadatta fills the world, the sky and the ten cardinal points; and the Panchajanya, surpassing all sounds, fills the highest heaven and the deepest earth. The awesome and appalling clamour persists, filling the timid with fear and the brave with excitement.

Thousands of great maharathas, matchless bowmen, kings from diverse realms, some fighting for the Kuru cause and other for the Pandavas, beat drums, jharjharas, cymbals and mridangas. And the Kuru heroes, filled with rage, for they cannot stand the blasting of Arjuna and Krishna's unworldly conches, also blow great conches, while their troops roar behind them in support.

Though being urged forward by the blare of conches, the chariot-warriors, elephants and horses of the Kuru army are yet full of fear, and indeed, O lord, they look ill. The booming conches of Krishna and Arjuna agitate the Kuru host and their bravest warriors seem to be like the very heavens fallen down through some vast convulsion of nature. The stunning din, Rajan, resounds all around and affrights your troops as if this is some critical moment and event at the end of the Yuga terrifying all living creatures.

Then Duryodhana and the eight great maharathas chosen to protect Jayadratha all surround Arjuna. Aswatthaman strikes Krishna with three and seventy shafts, and Arjuna with three broad-headed ones, and their standard and four horses with five others. Seeing Krishna injured, a furious Arjuna looses a hundred arrows at Drona's son. Then piercing Karna with ten arrows and Vrishasena with three, Dhananjaya destroys Salya's bow with arrows fitted to its string. Salya takes up another bow and stabs the son of Pandu with a blistering barb, while Bhurisravas cuts him sharp with three stone-whetted shafts, golden-winged.

Karna strikes Arjuna with thirty-two arrows and Vrishasena with seven. Jayadratha himself pierces Arjuna with three and seventy shafts and Kripa with ten. The king of the Madras also lacerates Arjuna with ten shafts and the son of Drona first with sixty arrows, and again with five arrows; Aswatthaman makes Krishna a home for twenty more of his scathing barbs. Unruffled, Arjuna of the white steeds, displaying supernal dexterity, and speed that is past believing, strikes Karna with a dozen shafts, Vrishasena with three, and Partha breaks Salya's bow at the grip.

Shooting the son of Somadatta with three arrows and Salya with ten, he strikes Kripa with five and twenty thunderbolts, Jayadratha with a hundred, and Drona's son with seventy: all in what seems, what is, a single moment. A battling, wrathful Bhurisravas cracks the goad in Krishna's hand, and bloodies Arjuna with three and twenty shafts. Dhananjaya retaliates with a flashflood of missiles, hundreds and hundreds of arrows, like a tempest tearing at some masses of clouds.'"

"Dhritarashtra says almost abstractedly, 'Describe to me, O Sanjaya, the beautiful and resplendent standards which both the Parthas and our warriors fly.'

Sanjaya says, 'Then listen, Rajan, as I describe to you the banners that blaze on that field of death like fire and are flaunted there. They are made entirely of gold thread, or chased with strings of gold, and look like the fulvid Mount Meru. Attached to them all around are the most striking banners of different colours. Fluttering in the wind, seeming to float on the breeze, the banners of the maharathas are like exquisite women dancing in an arena of pleasure; they are magnificent like the rainbow.

Arjuna's standard, with the image of Hanuman on its main flag, the great Vanara his face snarling and a lion's tail, and also adorned with many other banners, all with strange and dreadful spirits animated upon them, which cry out and roar and screech chillingly, terrifies the Kuru host.

The lion-tail pennant atop Aswatthaman's ratha shines with the lustre of the rising sun. Decked with gold, wondrous like the rainbow, it floats and flaps in the wind high above, inspiring the greatest Kuru warriors.

The standard of Adhiratha's son Karna bears the motif of a golden elephant-rope and seems to fill the entire sky. Adorned with banners of gold and garlands, it appears to dance upon his chariot when the wind shakes it.

Kripa, son of Gotama, and the first Acharya of the Pandavas, the Brahmana given to tapasya, has for his emblem a superb bull and Kripa looks as glorious as Mahadeva the destroyer of the Tripura with his bull.

Vrishasena's pennant is always in the van of the army and his emblem is a peacock calling out, made of gold and embellished with jewels and gems. Rajan, it glows like the ratha of Skanda the celestial Senapati. Shining with his brilliant mayura and with a beautiful golden ploughshare, Vrishasena looks resplendent on his chariot, like a great flame.

Salya, the ruler of the Madras, has on his standard-top an image like Annalakshmi, the Goddess of corn, lovely and bountiful. Salya's standard also shows a huge silver elephant with golden peacocks on every side. His great presence graces your army like the immense white elephant Airavata adorning the host of the celestial king.

A silver boar adorns the top of Jayadratha's flagstaff, which is wound about with golden chains, and shimmers like white crystal and glorious as Surya in the battle between the Devas and the Asuras of long ago.

The standard of Somadatta's son, who is devoted to yagnas, bears the sign of a golden sacrificial stake, shining like the sun or the moon and it glitters like the lofty yupastamba erected in the greatest of sacrifices, the Rajasuya.

On king Duryodhana's towering standard chased with gold is a great black elephant encrusted with glittering jewels. Tinkling with the sound of a hundred bells, it waves on top of his chariot and, Rajan, your son, that bull among the Kurus, looks magnificent.

These nine excellent standards stand tallest among your divisions. The tenth great banner is Arjuna's, with the terrific Vanara and with it Arjuna looks like Himavat with a blazing fire on his summit.

These mighty chariot-warriors, all parantapas, take up their wonderful, bright and colossal bows to face Arjuna. Partha, too, achiever of celestial feats, raises his incomparable, enemy-destroying Gandiva—all because of your evil policy, Rajan. And because of you, so many royal warriors, rulers of men from different kingdoms called to arms by your sons, will be slain in battle and with them countless noble, blameless horses and elephants.

The maharathas led by Duryodhana on one side and the bull of the Pandavas on the other, utter loud shouts and roars and begin the encounter. And astounding and unearthly is the feat that Arjuna, with Krishna for his charioteer, achieves there by battling all your great warriors single-handed. Resplendent is the mighty-armed hero as he stretches his Gandiva, determined to vanquish all your maharathas in order to kill Jayadratha.

In a supernatural shimmer of archery, Arjuna casts a mantle of arrows, thousands upon thousands of deadly arrows, over your forces so that they become invisible. On their part, they respond with a haze of shafts loosed from every side. Seeing Arjuna engulfed, obscured, your troops set up a loud cheer.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'O Sanjaya, once Arjuna has Jayadratha in sight, what do Krishna and he do?'

Sanjaya says, 'It is late afternoon of the momentous day, Rajan, in the battle between the Panchalas and the Kurus, when Drona becomes the wager for which each side fights to win or lose. Intent on killing the Acharya, the Panchalas, roaring all together besiege him with multitudinous volleys. Fierce, dreadful and extraordinary as the battle of yore between the Devas and the Asuras is the encounter between the forces of Drupada and his inveterate enemy, the meridian son of Bharadwaja.

All the Panchalas with the Pandavas, finding Drona's chariot within reach, unleash many great astras in their feverish attempt to breach and destroy his vyuha. Chariot-warriors ride slowly, purposefully Drona's ratha, making the earth tremble, and loosing rivers of arrows at the master.

Brihadkshatra, the Kaikeya maharatha, attacks Drona incessantly with heavy shafts forceful as thunderbolts. The famed Kshemadhurti quickly comes between Brihadkshatra and Drona, firing scathes of razor-headed barbs at Kshemadhurti. Seeing this, the mighty Dhrishtaketu, bull among the Chedis, also swiftly assails Kshemadhurti, quite as Mahendra did the Asura Sambara. Seeing him dash forward, like the Yama himself with mouth agape, the mighty Viradhanwan confronts him.

Meanwhile, resolved to win the war by himself, Drona rides at Yudhishtira. Your son, the gifted, fearless Vikarna, confronts the marauding, potent Nakula. Parantapa Durmukha covers the onrushing Sahadeva with thousands of light-swift barbs. The heroic Vyaghradatta manfully faces Satyaki the Naravyaghra, making him repeatedly tremble with bolts like fire. Bhurisravas, son of Somadatta, stands firm against the five maharatha sons of Draupadi, he also lashes them with gales of arrows.

The sinister and powerful maharatha, the Rakshasa Alambusha, Rishyasringa's fierce son of awful mien, confronts the charging Bhimasena. That encounter between manusha and rakshasa, Rajan, resembles the mythic battle of old between Rama and Ravana.

Yudhishtira, lord of the Bharatas, strikes Drona with ninety perfectly aimed arrows in all his vital organs. The enraged Drona bloodies the Dharmaraja's chest with five and twenty excruciating shafts. In sight of all the archers, Drona looses twenty arrows at Ajatasatru's horses, charioteer and standard, but Yudhishtira, truly a majestic Kshatriya at war today, cuts them all down in flight.

Further incensed, Drona breaks Yudhishtira's bow in his hands and covers the Dharmaputra with a thousand barbs shot in a moment. Seeing the king engulfed by Drona's dark torrent, men of both armies believe that the Pandava is either dead or has fled the battle. Many Pandava warriors cry out in despair, "Oh, the Brahmana has killed our king!"

In some strife, Yudhishtira puts down the bow that Drona broke and takes up another, stronger and of exceptional brightness. Now, raising his won archery, he quite easily burns up Drona's dense tirades in the air. Rajan, the son of Dharma is altogether breathtaking to watch and, having consumed all Drona's shafts, a red-eyed Yudhishtira invokes a great astra that can rive Yudhishtira mountain. With a golden shaft, eight bells attached to it, of awesome appearance and entirely terrible, the mighty Yudhishtira raises his bow with this weapon fitted to it and gives such a roar that all the living tremble at it.

Seeing the astra that Yudhishtira holds aloft, all creatures, in accord, pray, "May Drona be saved!"

Loosed by the king, that missile like a snake just freed from its slough, flies at Drona, illumining the sky and all the directions cardinal and subsidiary, like a Nagina with a fiery mouth. Watching the Nagastra flare towards him, Drona the master invokes the Brahmastra, which flies at Yudhishtira's chariot blowing the Nagastra to dust on its way. Yudhishtira Quicker than thinking, Yudhishtira summons his own Brahmastra and the two great ayudhas extinguish each other in the sky. Not pausing, Ajatasatru pierces Drona deep with five immaculate shafts and, with a sixth razor-faced arrow, he breaks Drona's great bow.

With a growl, Drona, the Kshatriya-grinder, flings aside his broken bow and hurls a mace like a thunderbolt at Yudhishtira. Instantly the Pandava snatches up a mace of his own and casts it at his master's gada. The two mighty weapons explode against each other showering an effusion of sparks all around Yudhishtira. His rage mounting by the moment, Drona kills Yudhishtira's horses, with four unerring deadly barbs, and with another broad-headed shaft, he breaks the king's regal bow, which is like a stake erected to worship Indra.

With another arrow, he cuts down Yudhishtira's banner and with three more, he injures the Pandava himself. Yudhishtira leaps down from his ratha and stands weaponless and with his arms raised, helpless.

O Bharatarishabha, seeing Yudhishtira without a chariot and unarmed, Drona startles his enemies, why both armies, by cleaving to the base vow he had sworn to Duryodhana and, violating every dharma of war, continues to shoot deadly showers of arrows at the Dharmaraja and charges towards him like a lion bounding at a deer.

Cries of Oh! and Alas! arise from the Pandava army.

Many cry, "Bharadwaja's son has killed our king!"

O Bhaarata, these and other loud wails go up from the Pandava forces. But before Drona can reach his brother, Sahadeva dashes up on his chariot and, mounting it with alacrity, Yudhishtira flees the field, escaping the dangerous Brahmana, who is left howling in frustration.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Kshemadhurti strikes the valorous Brihadkshatra in his chest with several arrows, and the advancing prince of the Kaikeyas strikes him back with ninety deadly straight barbs. The Kshemadhurti smashes Brihadkshatra's bow with a broad-tipped shaft and immediately stabs him deep with another longer arrow, drawing a gush of blood. Great Brihadkshatra takes up another bow and, smiling at his enemy, kills maharatha Kshemadhurti's horses, charioteer and ruins his chariot, in a flurry. Then, with another wedge-headed shafts, he cleanly dissevers his royal antagonist head, with its sparkling ear-rings, and graced with wavy locks and a crown; the noble head rolls onto the ground, shimmering like a star fallen from the sky. Having slain his enemy, the triumphant Brihadkshatra falls upon your troops with great ferocity.

The seasoned Viradhanwan flies to check Dhrishtaketu who rides intently against Drona. The two heroes lash each other with thousands of arrows. Those two Naravyaghras fight like two leaders of elephant herds in the deep jungle, both determined to kill the other, or two angry tigers in a mountain-cave, and their duel is one to be seen, O Rajan, breathtaking it is.

The very Siddhas and the Charanas, in great numbers, gaze down at it raptly.

Then, with a rumbling laugh, Viradhanwan shatters Dhrishtaketu's bow with a thick and heavy arrow. Throwing down the broken bow, the king of the Chedis seizes an iron spear, its head of gold, and casts it with immense force at Viradhanwan's chariot. The lance strikes Viradhanwan squarely through his heart he falls dead, his blood spraying from both his breast and back.

After the fall of the Trigarta maharatha, the Pandavas break right through your army. Your son Durmukha looses sixty slender shafts at Sahadeva, and roars out an echoing challenge. Sahadeva, unmoved, indeed smiling, drills your son, his cousin, with a squall of arrows, flinging him back against his flagstaff. The mighty Sahadeva, roused, never pausing, gores Durmukha with nine powerful barbs, then cuts down his proud standard and fells his four horses. As his cousin stands stunned, Madri's son now beheads his sarathy, and in the same instant breaks your prince's bows in his hands grown weak.

Still not desisting, Sahadeva pierces Durmukha himself with a sizzle of five molten arrows, at which your son jumps down from his horseless chariot, and clambers onto Niramitra, prince of the Trigartas', ratha. Sahadeva kills Niramitra in the very midst of his army with a thick arrow; that prince falls headless from his chariot, plunging your army in grief. Slaying him, the mighty-armed Sahadeva looks as glorious as Dasaratha's son Rama, after he killed the feral and mighty Rakshasa Khara. O Rajan, seeing maharatha Niramitra die, loud cries of lamentation rise among the Trigarta warriors.

Nakula, in a moment, amazingly vanquishes your son, the large eyed Vikarna.

With a cloud of arrows, Vyaghradatta makes Satyaki and his horses, charioteer and standard invisible in the midst of his forces. However, Sini's mighty grandson cuts down all those missiles, and in a great scarlet eruption kills Vyaghradatta along with his horses, charioteer, felling his standard as well. At the fall of that prince, the Magadhas, fighting vigorously, surround Satyaki from all sides, covering him with their arrows and spears by the thousands, as also with mallets, thick clubs and keen lances. The invincible Satyaki, bull among men, with the greatest ease, laughing, vanquishes and annihilates almost all of them. A small remnant escapes from the field.

Seeing this, your army, already distressed by Yuyudhana's fearsome shafts, breaks apart, my lord!

After slaughtering your troops, Satyaki raises his bow high and shakes it in triumph and he is resplendent. Your army shrinks from the radiant Vrishni hero and none dare approach him. Then a fuming Drona, rolling his eyes, charges the uncontainable Satyaki.'"

"Sanjaya says 'The illustrious son of Somadatta strikes each of the sons of Draupadi, all great archers, with five arrows, and then seven more. Badly wounded by that fierce shura, they are dazed and for a while do not know what to do. Then Satanika, Nakula's son, strikes Somadatta's son with two searing shafts and gives a ringing roar. At once, his other brothers also resume battle and draw copious spurts of blood from Somadatta's son, each with three arrows.

That Kshatriya shoots five terrific barbs, piercing each son of Draupadi viciously. The five brothers surround him and bloody him savagely with their arrows. Arjuna's son by Draupadi despatches Saumadatti's four horses to the land of Yama, while Bhimasena's son destroys his bow, and with a loud shout transfixes his enemy with razorine barbs. The son of Yudhishtira fells his standard, while Nakula's son kills his charioteer from his ratha.

Now Sahadeva's son sees that the enemy is on the point of leaving the field and cuts off his head with a crescent-tipped shaft. The head of that illustrious warrior, decked with earrings of gold, falls on the ground and adorns the field like the burning sun that rises at the end of the Yuga. Seeing this, your troops, O Rajan, are overcome by stark terror and run in all directions.

The Rakshasa Alambusha, Rishyasringa's son, fights the mighty Bhimasena in frenzy; their contention is like Ravana's son Indrajit's encounter with Lakshmana. Seeing the Rakshasa fight the human warrior, all are enthralled and wonderstruck. An amused Bhima wounds the fiend with nine heavy arrows making the Rakshasa scream in the most hideous way. He charges Bhima with all his followers. Alambusha strikes Bhima with five thunderbolts and quickly destroys thirty rathas that support him. He blasts another four hundred of Bhima's rathas all the while lacerating Bhimasena himself with a barrage of barbarous winged missiles.

Ah, the mighty Bhima, struck deeply by the Rakshasa, swoons and sits down on the deck of his ratha. However, the son of Vayu recovers quickly and leaping up, crimson-eyed with rage, draws his tremendous bow and strikes Alambusha in every part of his body, with arrows like thunder. And the Rakshasa, who resembles a great mass of antimony, looks resplendent, O Rajan, indeed like a flowering kinsuka in full bloom.

While being struck by the shafts that fly from Bhima's bow, the Rakshasa remembers the slaying of his brother Baka by the titanic Pandava. Assuming an awful, monstrous form, he says to Bhima, "Fight a little longer, Pandava, and behold my prowess today! Evil-hearted one, the best of Rakshasas, the mighty Baka was my brother. It is true that you killed him but that was when I was away."

Saying this, Alambusha makes himself invisible with maya, and covers Bhimasena with a black storm of arrows. But Bhima, O Rajan, covers the very sky with a tremendous fusillade and forces Alambusha back to his chariot. But, next moment, the Rakshasa uses sorcery again to dive deep underground, and then once more soars high into the sky.

Alambusha assumes myriad uncanny forms, now becoming tiny and then enormous, filling earth and sky with his dreadful roaring. From above he chants many dark spells so thousands of fell arrow showers flare down on Bhima and his men, as well as kunapas, lances, spiked maces, short barbs, scimitars, swords and bolts of thunder. These eerie weapons raze Bhima's troops as well as countless elephants, horses and foot-soldiers.

Another river of blood flows, with rathas for its eddies, elephants its crocodiles, the chatras of maharathas its swans, and the flesh and marrow of animals, its mire and severed human arms its snakes. Hordes of Rakshasas, pisachas and other blood-drinkers and flesh-eaters stalk the banks of the darkling river and carry away numberless Chedis, Panchalas and Srinjayas.

Seeing Alambusha haunt the field so fearlessly, and his dark prowess, the Pandavas are full anxious; while joy fills the hearts of your troops. Amongst your army turned irrevocably to evil, hair raising sounds of musical instruments blares cacophonously, which the Pandavas cannot bear even as a snake cannot bear the clap of human palms.

Bhima, the son of the Wind-god, his eyes red as copper with rage, with glances that like fire consumes everything, invokes the astra called Tvashtri, like the divine artificer himself doing so, and millions of arrows flash out from his ratha in every direction. Bhima aroused puts your dense legions to rout, mowing them down all around him. The Tvashtrastra dissolves the maya with which Alambusha has mantled Kurukshetra; it direly wound the Rakshasa himself.

Struck violently through every part of his body, Alambusha abandons the fight and takes refuge with Drona's akshauhini. At the defeat of that prince of the Rakshasas by the noble Bhima, the Pandavas fill every point of the compass with leonine roars and joyously worship the mighty son of Marut, even like the Maruts worshipping Sakra after the defeat of Prahlada in the ancient war between Deva and Asura.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After escaping from Bhima, Alambusha fights fearfully in another part of the field, where he confronts Hidimbi's son Ghatotkacha, and harries him viciously with a spate of flaming arrows. A horrific duel breaks out between those two lions among Rakshasas. As Indra and Sambara did in olden days, they fight with deep sorcery, spells of maya, and their battle resembles that between Rama and Ravana on Lanka!

Ghatotkacha strikes Alambusha through his chest with twenty exceptionally long arrows, and repeatedly roars like a tiger. Also roaring shatteringly, and smiling to show curved fangs, Alambusha strikes back viciously. Quickly, both mighty Rakshasas, in mounting frenzy, use their powers of maya in a duel of sorcery, but neither gains any advantage so equally matched are they. Each a powerful mayavi, they create a hundred sinister spells, and bewilder the other.

Seeing Alambusha dissolve all Ghatotkacha's conjurations with his own spectres, the Pandavas are anxious and many of their foremost maharathas surround him in a protective cordon. Bhimasena and others all attack Alambusha and, hemming him in from all sides with their rathas, rain astras on him, like men in a forest cornering an elephant with blazing brands.

Annulling their arrow storms with his maya shakti, Alambusha frees himself from that press of chariots like an elephant escaping a forest fire. Drawing his terrible bow whose twang resembles Indra's Vajra striking, he pierces Bhima with twenty-five sizzling shafts, Ghatotkacha with five, Yudhishtira with three, Sahadeva with seven, Nakula with three and seventy, and each of the five sons of Draupadi with five arrows, and gives a weird and bloodcurdling scream.

Bhimasena strikes him square with arrows with the power of the wind, Sahadeva with five, Yudhishtira with a hundred, Nakula with three and Ghatotkacha with five hundred. Alambusha, unmoved, returns their fire, goring Ghatotkacha with seventy wicked barbs, and pale devil gives another horrible bellow shakes the Earth, O Rajan, with her mountains, forests, trees and waters.

Deeply wounded by those maharathas, Alambusha pierces with five arrows each, and then he swiftly covers Ghatotkacha with countless sable-hued missiles, fletched with wings of gold and whetted on stone. Every barb burns into Ghatotkacha, like angry snakes a mountain summit.

The anxious Pandavas and Ghatotkacha continue to pour on their firetides, from every side. Wounded by the Pandavas, Alambusha mortal as he is, soon does not know what to do and his chariot in flames and he himself flows blood from a thousand wounds. Seeing this, Bhima's terrific son sees the time come to kill Alambusha. He leaps out of his own ratha and, rushing up to Alambusha's ratha, which now resembles a burnt mountain peak or a broken heap of antimony, seizes his dreadful enemy, snatching him down from it like Garuda snatching up a snake in his talons.

Ghatotkacha lifts Alambusha high with his mighty hands, whirls him round over his head, so like his awesome father Bhima does his enemies, and smashes him down onto the hard ground so his body is blown apart like an earthen pot flung against a rock. Such an eruption of flesh and blood, O Rajan! Roar after roar of triumph erupts from the triumphant son of Bhima, in absolute frenzy, drenched with his enemy's blood and spattered with pieces of his flesh from head to foot, and your troops tremble, whimper like small boys and many sully themselves. Alambusha, so terrible and indomitable a moment ago, lies like a tall sala tree uprooted and shattered by a wrathful wind.

Upon the slaughtering of the wanderer of the night, the Parthas are ecstatic, give vent to a vast chorus of roars, and wave their bright scarves and other cloths in the air. Your brave warriors, however, see the mighty Alambusha, prince of the Rakshasas, lying like a crushed mountain, and cry out and howl in shock and defeat. Many curious ones go up to look closely at the shattered body lying like some great piece of charcoal, no longer able to burn.

Ghatotkacha roars reverberantly like Vasava after slaying the Asura Bala. His sires and other kinsmen applaud him for felling the Rakshasa, like an alambusha fruit, and he celebrates with his friends, and there arises a loud tumult in the Pandava army of conches and arrows being rattled together. Hearing that noise the enraged Kauravas shout back in anger, filling the whole world with echoing tumult.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me, Sanjaya, how Satyaki Yuyudhana battles Drona so valiantly. I feel a great curiosity to hear about it.'

Sanjaya says, "Listen, O wise one, to an account of the hair-raising battle between Drona and the Pandavas led by Yuyudhana. Seeing the Kuru army slaughtered by Satyaki, Drona himself attacks the brilliant Vrishni hero. Satyaki swiftly assails him with blistering ferocity with five and twenty short and savage barbs. Drona pierces Satyaki, with five perfect golden-winged shafts, which plunge through his resilient mail, and drinking his blood, enter the earth behind him like hissing serpents.

Like an elephant prodded hard with a goad, an inflamed Satyaki gores Drona with fifty long shafts that are like flames. Drona responds with fervid volleys, wounding Yuyudhana direly so the Satwata's radiant face suddenly shows anxiety, while Drona continues to loose his tide of burning arrows. Seeing Satyaki stagger in his chariot and even lower his bow, your sons and troops, O Rajan, exult and roar repeatedly.

Some way off, Yudhishtira hears that celebrant uproar and sees Satyaki in danger. He cries to all his soldiers, 'Drona is about to devour Satyaki even as Rahu does the Sun. Ride swiftly, you must save our Yuyudhana from the dreadful Acharya."

Yudhishtira cries to Dhrishtadyumna, "Why do you linger, Dhrishtadyumna? Don't you see the great peril that has already arisen from Drona? He toys with Satyaki like a cruel boy does with a bird tied with a string. Fly all of you, with Bhima, to Satyaki. I will follow with my men. Satyaki is in the very jaws of death. Do not waste a moment but go and snatch him away from the murderous Brahmana!"

And not hesitating a moment himself, Yudhishtira, with his troops behind him, charges towards Drona. Bless you, my king, but the Pandavas and the Srinjayas attack Drona all together, surrounding him, and unleash torrents of arrows at him, winged with kanka and peacock feathers shimmering in the gloom.

The Acharya receives them smiling, even like a householder welcoming honoured guests with seats and water! And he satisfies them amply with his extravagant hospitality of arrows. And none of them can even gaze at him, who is like the thousand-rayed Surya at midday who scorches all those great bowmen with lavish banks of arrows, like the Sun burning everything below him with his rays.

Struck like ten deadly storms by Drona, the Pandavas and the Srinjayas find no protector, like elephants sunk in a quagmire. And indeed the mighty arrows of the Brahmana Drona are like the scalding rays of the sun blasting everything around. In moments, he has slain five and twenty of Dhrishtadyumna's Panchala maharathas, as all the Pandava and Panchala legions are helpless onlookers. He continues to raze their greatest warriors like children before him.

After slaughtering a hundred Kekaya warriors and routing their army, Drona stands, Rajan, like Yama with maw agape, still hungry. The Brahmana vanquishes the Panchalas, the Srinjayas, the Matsyas and the Kekayas. Millions of living men suddenly breathing no more because the dreadful Acharya has hewn off their heads or blown their hearts to shreds. Their teeming troops invaded by his arrows cry out pitifully like the denizens of a forest engulfed by a conflagration. But Satyaki is rescued.

Above, riveted, the Devas, Gandharvas, and the Pitris say, "Look, the Panchalas and the Pandavas, with all their troops, are running away from Bharadwaja's son."

As Drona annihilates the Somakas, none venture to stand up to him and none succeed in wounding him in the least. While the Brahmana turned from his swadharma calmly butchers maharathas, past all count by now, Yudhishtira suddenly hears a faint tone of the great Panchajanya that Krishna blows. Such bedlam reigns on Kurukshetra, as the heroic protectors of Jayadratha fight Arjuna, and while the Dhartarashtras roar and shout before the great ratha of the two Krishna surging toward the Saindhava, that even the virile twang of the of the Gandiva is inaudible.

Yudhishtira feels faint, thinking, “Ah, Arjuna fares darkly! For I do not hear the Panchajanya anymore and the Kauravas roar so lustily and gleefully!”

Stricken with anxiety, a dazed Yudhishtira says to Satyaki, “O Yuyudhana, the time for that sanatana dharma which the mahatmans of old said that friends must do for their friends has come. Satyaki, none among all my warriors is a greater well-wisher of ours than you. Only one who is always courteous, obedient and valorous beyond all common measure should be entrusted with a grave mission in times of trouble. As Krishna is ever the refuge of the Pandavas, so are you, who are equal to him in prowess and affection.

And so I will lay a burden on you knowing that you will not frustrate my purpose. Arjuna is your brother, friend and acharya, O bull among men, so go to his help now when he is in distress, O Satwata. Mahatman, you are devoted to truth. You are a great Kshatriya. You are the dispeller of the fears of friends and celebrated in the world for your deeds and as one who is always truthful. Satyaki, he who casts away his body while fighting for friends is equal to him who gives away the Earth to Brahmanas. We have heard of many kings who are in heaven for giving away this Earth as dakshina to Brahmanas, with due rites. I beg you with folded hands, that you too attain the rewards of giving away the very Earth to Brahmanas, or something even higher, by incurring danger to yourself for Arjuna’s sake.

Krishna, the dispeller of the fears of his friends, is ever willing to sacrifice himself for them. You, Satyaki, are another such. None but a hero can help another hero by fighting valorously in battle purely for fame. An ordinary man cannot do this. And now there is none but you who can protect Arjuna. Once, while lauding your many great feats, Arjuna gave me much pleasure by recounting them repeatedly. He said of you that you are gifted with unearthly dexterity of hand, and that you are a master of every manner of warfare, that you are a man of great abilities and great deeds.

My brother said, “Satyaki is endued with great wisdom, he knows every weapon thoroughly, is a true hero, and is never baffled in battle. With his powerful neck and broad chest, with mighty arms and wide face, with awesome strength and prowess, Satyaki is a maharatha among maharathas and he is the noblest of men. Yuyudhana is my disciple and my friend; I am dear to him and he is dear to me. Becoming my ally, Sini’s grandson will crush the Kauravas.

Even if Krishna, Rama, and Aniruddha, the mighty Pradyumna, Gada, Sarana, Samba, with all the Vrishnis, arm themselves to fight for us, I will only appoint Satyaki, tiger among men, Satyaki of unfazed prowess, to the task, for there is none equal to him.”

This is what Dhananjaya told me in the Dwaita vana while extolling your merits in an assembly of Rishis. It is only appropriate that you now live up to Arjuna’s expectation, as well as Bhima’s and mine! When we were on our way back from the various tirthas, I witnessed your reverence for Arjuna in Dwaraka. While we were at Upaplavya, I saw no one else who showed us as much affection as you did. You are of noble lineage and bear us both respect and love. And so, O Vrishni hero, out of your love and regard for Arjuna, who is your friend and your guru, you must do what is demanded in this critical hour by, O great bowman, your friendship, your genius, your noble lineage and truthfulness.

O Satyaki of Madhu’s vamsa, Duryodhana wearing Drona’s armour has gone in pursuit of Arjuna! The other great Kaurava maharathas already hunt Arjuna and I hear a great tumult in the vicinity of Arjuna’s ratha. Satyaki, you must ride there like the wind for your guru is in mortal peril. Bhimasena and the rest of us will resist Drona with all our forces, if he advances against you.

Ah, look where the Kaurava troops are fleeing the battle, wailing as they run. Like the ocean at full tide agitated by a mighty tempest, Arjuna stirs the Dhartarashtra host. Look at the cloud of dust that rises and spreads across the field from the men and rathas that dash about. Ah, look where the Sindhu–Sauviras, armed with spikes, lances surround Arjuna with their horsemen.

Arjuna will never be able to kill Jayadratha without first vanquishing this host of ferocious fighters for every man of them will lay down his life for the Saindhava king before allowing Partha near him. Look at the invincible Dhartarashtra force stationed there bristling with arrows, spears, their tall standards, and teeming with cavalry and elephants. Listen to the beat of their drums and the blare of their conches, their tremendous roars, and the earthshaking rumble of their chariot-wheels. Listen to the deep grunts and trumpeting of their elephants, the heavy tread of their foot-soldiers, and the hoof-beats of their charging horses, al of which make Bhumi devi herself tremble.

Facing Arjuna is Jayadratha's akshauhini, and behind him is Drona's. The enemy is so great in numbers that it would dismay the Lord of the Devas himself. Plunged in the midst of this fathomless host, Arjuna could well lose his life. And if he is killed, how can I live on? Oh Satyaki, is this calamity to befall me when you are alive? The son of Pandu is dark-blue in colour, young in years, with wavy locks and exceptionally handsome. Vigorous in battle and familiar with every kind of warfare, the mighty-armed Arjuna penetrated the Bharata host at sunrise. The day is about to end, Satyaki, and I do not know whether he lives or not. The vast Kuru host is like the ocean and Arjuna has breached it on his own, the army which even the gods cannot overcome. My mind is clouded and Drona attacks my forces with irresistible might! You see, O Mahabaho, how the Acharya fights.

You are discerning when several tasks present themselves at once. And it must be you who take this critical task upon yourself, none other. I am certain that going to the embattled Arjuna's help and rescuing him must be our first priority. I have no fear for Krishna of Dasarha's race because he is the Protector and the Lord of the Universe. When this Naravyaghra can vanquish the three worlds assembled together, what need be said of this insignificant Dhritarashtra host? But Krishna is sworn not to fight.

Arjuna however, Satyaki, faces the most in today's battle and may lose his life. This is what fills me with dread and grief. So go to him, mighty, Satyaki, for men like you should follow men like him, at a time like this, sent forth by one like me.

Among the greatest of the Vrishni vamsa, we regard two as Atirathas. They are the mighty-armed Pradyumna and yourself, O Satyaki great renown. In the mastery of weapons, you are equal to Narayana himself, and in strength to Sankarshana. O Naravyaghra, in courage you are equal to Dhananjaya, and exceed Bhishma and Drona and all the other greatest warriors. The wise say of you, 'There is nothing that Satyaki cannot accomplish.'

So accede to the wishes of all of us here, of myself and of Arjuna. It would not be dharma, O Mahabaho, to refuse what we ask of you today. Reckless of your very life, ride into battle like the great hero you are. The scions of Dasarha's race never care to protect their lives in war by avoiding the most dangerous battle, or fighting from behind breast-works, or fleeing an encounter—Dasarhas never adopt the ways of cowards.

The virtuous Arjuna is your superior, and Krishna is superior to both of you. And I also say to you that I am the superior of your superiors and Arjuna agrees with me in this matter. Go then to Arjuna and, at my behest, penetrate the army of Dhritarashtra's evil son. Challenge the great maharathas who protect Jayadratha and accomplish, O Satyaki, feats you are worthy of!"'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing these warm and loving words from Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, Satyaki, the Sini bull, says, "O you of unfading glory, I have heard you well, and what you say to me is just, delights my heart and inspires me to earn fame and honour for myself by fighting Arjuna's grave cause.

At a time like this, it is high dharma and ineluctable fate that you find me, who am devoted to you, to command at your will, as you would Arjuna himself. As for myself, I am always prepared to give my life for Arjuna, without a thought!

Lord, at your command what is there I would not do in battle let alone to Dhritarashtra's weakling army? At your command, I would go into battle against the three worlds, with the Devas, the Asuras and Manushyas massed together. Why, for your sake today I will raze Duryodhana's entire army. I vow to you, O Yudhishtira, king of kings, that I will fight my way to Arjuna and return to you only after Jayadratha is dead.

Yet, Rajan, I must also tell you of what both Krishna and Arjuna said repeatedly to me before all our warriors.

Arjuna said, “Today, O Satyaki, noble and determined in battle, protect my brother the king with your very life until I kill Jayadratha! By entrusting Yudhishtira’s safety to you, or to maharatha Pradyumna, I can hunt Jayadratha down with an easy heart. You know that Drona is the greatest warrior among the Kurus. You also know the vow he has sworn to take Yudhishtira alive, which he is well capable of doing. So I charge you with his protection while I go today to kill Jayadratha.

Ensure that Drona does not succeed in seizing Yudhishtira for if that happens I will not be able to kill Jayadratha, and grief will break my heart and take my very life from me. If Drona takes my brother, we will have to return to the forest and my killing Jayadratha will be of no avail. Therefore, Mahabaho Satyaki, for my sake as well as for the success of my enterprise and my honour, protect the king today at all costs!’

You see, Rajan, Arjuna has left you to me to defend for he is in constant fear of Drona. O Dharmaraja, I myself daily see that there is none, save Rukmini’s son Pradyumna, who can match Drona in battle. I am also regarded to be a match for the Brahmana. Great Yudhishtira, I find myself torn between two choices: I must either obey my master Arjuna or ride after him, leaving your side, thus obeying you and disregarding what his command!

Once he corners you, Maharajan, Acharya Drona will toy with you as a child with a little bird. If Krishna’s son Pradyumna, flying the Makara on his banner were here, I could entrust you to him, for he would protect you like Arjuna himself. But I do not see him here and if I leave you who will protect you from Drona?

Rajan, do not be anxious on Arjuna’s account for no burden can vanquish him. All his opponents together, the Sauvirakas and the Sindhava–Pauravas warriors, those from the north and those from the south, and those led by Karna, whom I regard as the greatest maharatha—all these together do not constitute even a sixteenth part of Arjuna. The very Earth rising up against him, with the Devas, the Asuras, and Manushyas, with all the tribes of Rakshasas with the Kinnaras, the great Nagas, and in fact, all the mobile and the immobile beings massed together, would be no match for Arjuna. Know this, Rajan, and dispel your fears on Arjuna’s account.

Wherever the two potent and inexorable Krishnas are, no obstacle can prevent them from accomplishing their mission. Think of their celestial power, their mastery over weapons, their resourcefulness, their fury in battle, their gratitude and the compassion of your brother. And think also, Rajan, of the mighty prowess of Drona, if I leave to ride out to Arjuna. The Acharya is eager to seize you for he is proud and determine to fulfill his vow, O Bhaarata!

Think first of your own safety. Who will watch over you in my absence and to whom can I entrust your protection so that I can go to Arjuna? I say to that I will not ride after Arjuna without first ensuring that you will be safe. Employ your great intelligence, O Yudhishtira Mahabuddhi; reflect on this from every angle, and then command me after deciding what is for your greatest good!"

Yudhishtira says, "It is as you say, Mahabaho! However, for all that, my heart is uneasy on Arjuna's account. I will take the greatest precaution in protecting myself; so, at my command, go without delay to Arjuna. Weighing my own safety against Arjuna's dire need, my judgment tells me that your going to Arjuna's side is the first need of the hour. Therefore, Satyaki, prepare to ride to Arjuna.

The mighty Bhima as well as Prishata's son Dhrishtadyumna, with all his brothers, our other mighty kings, and the sons of Draupadi will not fail to protect me. The five Kekaya brothers, and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, Virata, Drupada, and the maharatha Sikhandin, the powerful Dhrishtaketu, Kuntibhoja, Nakula and Sahadeva, the Panchalas, the Srinjayas—all of them are with me and I will be safe in their midst. Not Drona at the head of his troops, or even Kritavarman, will succeed in defeating us or harming me.

Parantapa Dhrishtadyumna will contain the raging Drona even like the continent the sea, and however he fights, Drona will never overcome our troops. Dhrishtadyumna sprang from the fire clad in mail, armed with bow, arrows and sword, and wearing unworldly ornaments; he was born just to kill Drona. Go, O grandson of Sini, with an easy heart; do not be anxious on my account. Dhrishtadyumna can always defy Drona in battle.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Satyaki still fears the censure of Arjuna if he leaves the king. However, he is certain that he will be called a coward if he disobeys Yudhishtira, and says to himself, "Let no one say that I am afraid of riding out to help Arjuna."

Reflecting repeatedly on this, that invincible Vrishni hero says to Yudhishtira, "If you think that these arrangements will suffice to keep you safe, I will do your bidding and follow Arjuna. I tell you truly that there is no one in the three worlds who is dearer to me than he, and I will follow in his wake because you command me to and because there is nothing that I will not do for you.

O best of men, the commands of my guru always weigh with me, but yours are still more important. Your brothers, Krishna and Arjuna, always do what pleases you. I too accept your command, and I will ride out for Arjuna's sake, cleaving my way through this impenetrable host of Drona, like a fish through the sea, to where Jayadratha, supported by his troops, hides in fear of Arjuna, protected by the maharathas Aswatthaman, Karna and Kripa.

O Rajan, the distance from here to where Partha forging ahead to kill Jayadratha is three yojanas, I will follow in his trail with a brave heart, and support him until Jayadratha dies. Who goes into battle without the command of his superiors? Dharmaraja, who will not fight if you command him, as I have been? I know the place where I must go, teeming as this ocean-like enemy does with ploughshares, darts, maces, shields, scimitars, swords, lances and the most potent shafts, this ocean that I will agitate today.

The enemy's elephant legion consists of a thousand elephants of the formidable Anjana breed, ridden by Mlecchas who love battle and are accomplished fighters. These musth-maddened elephants that shed their juice of rut like rain from dark clouds never retreat if goaded forward by the warriors upon their backs. They cannot be vanquished unless one kills them.

Rajan, the chariot-warriors you see, also numbering thousands, are all of royal lineage and maharathas all. They are called Rukmarathas and are all impressive warriors who fight from rathas as well as from elephant-back. They are masters of weapons as also of hand-to-hand combat. Skilled mace-fighters, they are also masters of the art of close combat, and are equally adroit with scimitars, sword, and shield.

They are brave, learned and animated by an intense spirit of rivalry and every day they vanquish a vast number of men in battle. Karna commands them and they are devoted to Dusasana; even Krishna lauds them as great maharathas. Always solicitous of Karna's welfare, they are ever obedient to him. It is at Karna's command that, after turning back from their pursuit of Arjuna, fresh as when they began and with no trace of tiredness, these heroes, wearing impenetrable armour and armed with exceptional bows, certainly wait for me, as Duryodhana also wants. I will crush them in battle for you, Yudhishtira, and then follow in Arjuna's trail.

Rajan, Kiratas ride these other seven hundred elephants that you see, all covered in armour and with ornaments, which the king of the Kiratas, fearing for his life, gifted to Arjuna together with many servitors. They were once in your employ. Behold the vicissitudes that time brings, for they now fight against you. Kiratas are sprung from the race of Agni, and they are all expert elephant warriors and they and their beast are well nigh impossible to defeat. Arjuna once quelled them all in battle and, never having forgotten the shame of that, they now stand in wait for me, under Duryodhana's command. These Kiratas, too, I will kill with my arrows and follow Arjuna as he nears Jayadratha to have the wretched Saindhava's life.

Those other hulking elephants of impenetrable hides have sprung from the race of the great elephant sire Arjuna. Caparisoned entirely in gold, with ichor running down from their rent temples and mouth, they resemble Airavata himself and are even more formidable in battle. They have come from the northern hills, and fierce bandits of mighty limbs and sinews ride them, wearing steel coats of mail. These men are great warriors, brigands though they are.

Among them are men born of the cow, the ape, diverse other creatures, as well as of humans. Look how they appear at a distance to be of a smoky hue, these terrible Mlecchas, sinners all who hail from the fastnesses of Himavat.

With these and countless great Kshatriyas, as well as Kripa and Drona, foremost of maharathas, and Karna, also, to protect him, Jayadratha thinks lightly of the Pandavas. Impelled by fate, he regards himself already crowned with success. These whom I have named will soon be within reach of my arrows. They will not escape me, O son of Kunti, even if they acquire the speed of the mind. Duryodhana, the prince who depends upon the abilities of others, regards them highly, but I say to you that when my arrows cover these warriors they will find destruction.

These other chariot-warriors with golden standards, O Rajan, whom you see, are the Kambojas. They are brave and skilled, and devoted to the astra shastra, the science of weaponry. They are close knit, firmly united and constitute a full akshauhini of furious warriors, O Bhaarata; and are on the alert, with their eyes on me and wait well protected by the Kuru heroes. I will destroy them all, like fire consuming a bale of straw.

Therefore, O Rajan, let our attendants prepare my ratha and equip it well with bows, swords, spears, arrows, quivers, every other kind of weapon and all else that I will need to take dreadful war against our enemies.

Let my chariot be furnished with weapons five times more than what acharyas of military science direct, for I will have to encounter the Kambojas and the Kiratas who are armed with diverse, and both of whom are like serpents of virulent poison, accomplished in war, and fiercely loyal to Duryodhana who has always treated them well. I will also have to fight the Sakas who are as powerful as Sakra himself, and are ferocious and difficult to extinguish as a burning forest fire. Yudhishtira, I will face many indomitable warriors today; and for this let renowned horses of the best breed with auspicious markings be yoked to my ratha, after grooming them and slaking their thirst."

Yudhishtira ensures that quivers full of arrows, all manner of weapons, and everything else that he might need are placed in Satyaki's ratha. The attendants give his four superb horses water to drink and feed them; and then after they are walked, bathed and adorned with golden chains, and the arrows stuck in them drawn out, these well-trained, fleet, docile, steeds of golden complexion are yoked again to Satyaki's ratha.

Then a tall standard with the symbol of a lion with a golden mane is mounted on the ratha embellished with gold, which carries a heavy load of weapons, and flies banners of the hue of white clouds. Then, Daruka's younger brother, who is the charioteer and the dear friend of Satyaki, comes and reports to him that the ratha is ready: like Matali reporting to Vasava himself.

Having bathed and purified himself with every auspicious ceremony, Satyaki gives nishkas of gold to a thousand Snataka Brahmanas who shower their blessings on him. With these, the radiantly handsome Satyaki, hero worthy of our worship, drinks two jars of rich, invigorating kairata and honey, and ah, he is resplendent and rolls reddened eyes in some intoxication. He touches a brazen mirror and is filled with great joy, his energy doubled, and he looks truly like a blazing fire.

Picking up his bow and strapping a quiver full of arrows across his lion's shoulders, putting on his shimmering mail and sparkling, priceless ornaments, Yuyudhana has the Rishis perform for him the profound rites of propitiation. Fair lovely young virgins honour him by showering fried paddy over him, daubing him with delicate perfume and draping vanamalas over his rippling body.

Then, with folded hands, he worships the feet of Yudhishtira, and Yudhishtira nuzzles and sniffs the top of his head in deep affection. Finally, Satyaki mounts his grand chariot. His horses, good natured, strong, swift as the wind and invincible, belong to the Sindhu breed, and bear him forward on that triumphal ratha.

Bhimasena, too, honoured by Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, reverentially salutes the king and sets out with Satyaki. Watching those two warriors advance to engage your army, your troops all stand waiting for them, with Drona at their head. When Satyaki sees Bhima cased in mail and following him, he salutes him and with every limb filled with joy, says, “O Bhima, do you protect the king for that is your first duty and I will cleave my way through this host whose hour has come. Whether now or later, the king’s protection is your highest dharma. You know my ability and you wish me well, so return, O Bhima!”

Bhima replies, “Go then, and achieve your purpose, O best of men. I will protect the king.”

Satyaki replies, “Go back, O Bhima! As for me, I am certain to succeed, for today all my merits are obedient to my wishes. Indeed, the omens all around tell me that I shall be victorious. After the noble Arjuna kills the sinner Jayadratha, I will embrace Dharmaraja Yudhishtira.”

Saying these words to Bhima and releasing him with an embrace, the illustrious Satyaki eyes your troops like a tiger eyeing a herd of deer. Seeing his dreadful gaze, your troops tremble. And then, Satyaki dashes forward in his ratha and bursts upon your army like some dreadful plague.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'O Rajan, when Satyaki attacks your troops, Yudhishtira and his forces follow him to get at Drona's ratha. The indomitable Dhrishtadyumna, the son of the Panchala king, and king Vasudana both loudly exhort the Pandava host, crying, "Come, let us be at the enemy so that Satyaki can pass easily through the Kaurava host. For many maharathas will put forth their might to vanquish him."

At this, the mighty maharathas of the Pandava army fall wildly on their enemies saying, "We will crush those that try to stop Satyaki."

Then one hears a loud pandemonium near Satyaki's ratha. Your son's host, overwhelmed by Yuyudhana's tempestuous onslaught, turns tail and runs from the terrible Yadava. With such archery as we have not yet seen, Sini's grandson truncates the united Kuru army into a hundred portions, and then straightaway beheads seven great maharathas in stunned van of Drona's vyuha. With banks of lustrous, flaming shafts, he dispatches hundreds of heroes and kings of diverse realms.

At one moment he pierces a hundred warriors with a single arrow, and at others one great maharatha with a hundred arrows. Even like Rudra devouring living beings at yuganta, Satyaki the Vrishni slaughters elephant-riders and chariot-warriors, horses and horsemen. Quickly, none among your troops dares face Satyaki, who shows blinding lightness of hand and covers them with storm clouds of fire. Panic-stricken, ravaged by the Kshatriya of long arms, all your bravest run away on seeing that radiant Kshatriya come hunting them like a god. His energy dazes them, and they see a thousand Satyakis everywhere, all come to take their lives.

The field is a horrible work of art with demolished chariots, their broken seats and wheels, with fallen canopies, standards, anukarshas, banners, with helmets decked with gold, human arms smeared with sandalwood-paste and adorned with angadas, with human thighs that resemble the trunks of elephants or the tapering bodies of great pythons, and with faces handsome as the Moon and twinkling with the kundalas of large-eyed warriors, lying all across Kurukshetra where Satyaki the Yadava holds sway.

The Earth is littered with the huge bodies of fallen elephants, cut up in diverse ways, like a plain strewn with hills. Carved by Satyaki, the carcasses of dead horses, of handsome breed and build, look striking in their traces made of burnished gold hung with rows of pearls. After razing your various troops, Satyaki of the Satwata vamsa breaches your army's ranks, agitating and routing them as he flies along unobstructed, following the very trail that Arjuna blazed.

Then Drona confronts him and, facing the son of Bharadwaja, rage flares up in Satyaki, and at first, like a tidal wave flashing past an ineffectual embankment he sweeps past the great Brahmana. Doubling back, Drona strikes him deep with five shafts like bolts of lightning. Satyaki, pausing, lacerates the Acharya with seven stone-whetted arrows, fletched with golden wings and the feathers of the kanka and peacock. Drona draws blood from the Yadava, his horses and charioteer, with six thunderous missiles.

Beside himself now, and roaring like a full pride of lions, maharatha Satyaki stabs the Brahmana with three volleys of ten, six and eight barbs, which lance agony through the Kaurava Senapati. Never pausing, glorious Yuyudhana drills Drona with ten more shafts, his charioteer with one and his four horses with four; and with another thick shafts strikes Drona's standard. Drona, his eyes crimson, envelops Satyaki, his ratha, horses, charioteer, and standard, with a locust swarm of dark arrows. Fearless Satyaki responds in kind, shrouding the Acharya in a blizzard of arrows.

Now Drona says to the Yadava, "Your master Arjuna avoids fighting me like a coward. He passed me by in fear. If you do not do the same, O grandson of Sini, you will not escape with your life!"

It is as if Drona himself tells Satyaki what he should wisely do. Satyaki says to the towering Brahmana, "I follow in Arjuna's wake at the command of Dharmaraja Yudhishtira. Bless you, O Brahmana, much as I would love to continue this battle, I will lose time if I fight you. A sishya must always follow his guru, and if Arjuna rode past you, I will do the same. Farewell, O Drona!"

Saying this, Satyaki quickly dodges past Drona and says to his sarathy, "Drona will try everything he can to stop us so go carefully and cleverly, O Suta. There you see the splendid Avanti horde and next to them the mighty army of the Southerners, and beside that, the great host of the Balhikas. Next to the Balhikas stands majestic Karna, with his powerful forces.

Suta, all these forces are dissimilar, but on the battlefield, they depend on one another for support and protection and fight as one. So guide your horses towards the open space between these divisions at a moderate speed, and aim for the place where the Balhikas stand with diverse weapons, and the countless Southerners led by the Sutaputra's division presents a serried array of elephants, cavalry and rathas and foot-soldiers from various kingdoms."

They ride on and Satyaki says again, "Now fly through the gap between those two divisions towards the Karna's fierce and mighty host!"

A wrathful Drona, however, pursues him closely, loosing countless arrows after the Vrishni shura, but the most blessed Satyaki rides on and finds no need to turn back to face the Brahmana. Smiting the great host of Karna with hurricanes of arrows, Satyaki penetrates into the vast and limitless army of the Bharatas, who flee at his advent.

A fuming incensed Kritavarman rushes up to contain Satyaki, but in a flash the inspired Yuyudhana strikes Kritavarman with six shafts and kills his four horses with four more. He unerringly finds Kritavarman's chest with four more arrows, and, all in the space of a wish, drills him with another sixteen of ferocious velocity. Kritavarman cannot bear this and, drawing his bowstring to his ear, plunges a calf-toothed astra, serpentine and swift as the wind, into Satyaki's breast drawing a geyser of blood. That weapon of beautiful feathers pierces Yuyudhana's golden kavacha, bores its way through his body and enters the ground behind him, dyed in blood.

O Rajan, heartened to see his adversary stagger in his chariot, Kritavarman unleashes a clutch of stormy arrows, and desiccates Satyaki's great bow with keen barbs fitted. In exhilaration, roaring, Kritavarman adorns Satyaki's chest with a bunch of ten thudding shafts.

Satyaki, his bow broken, hurls a spear at Kritavarman's right arm, and quickly taking up and drawing a stronger bow, he unleashes a dense cloud of fire, thousands of shafts loosed in the twinkling of an eye, and entirely shrouds Kritavarman and his ratha. With no instant's pause, he decapitates his enemy's sarathy with a wedge-headed missile so the suta falls dead from his seat. Kritavarman's horses bolt and the distraught hero is forced to take their reins and control them himself.

Yet undaunted, and bow in hand, heroic Kritavarman stands upon his chariot ready for battle again. Seeing this feat, his troops cheer deafeningly and, after drawing a few moments' breath, Kritavarman guides his fine horses and resumes fighting. Devoid of fear, he strikes fear into his enemies.

However, by this time, Satyaki has left him behind. A thwarted, frustrated Kritavarman does not pursue him anymore but instead charges Bhimasena. Blasting his scarlet way out of the legion of the Bhojas, Satyaki swoops down on the mighty Kamboja akshauhini. Many maharathas challenge him all together, and Satyaki cannot advance at all.

Meanwhile, Drona, having regrouped and arrayed his troops again, gives charge of them to Kritavarman of the Bhojas, and rides after Satyaki. Seeing Drona pursue Yuyudhana once more, the greatest Pandava warriors combine to thwart the Acharya. The Panchalas, led by Bhimasena, challenge Hridika's son Kritavarman. He displays his prowess, and holds them all up; faced with his prodigious archery, they still fight back with some vigour.

Kritavarman violently attacks his enemies' horses and elephants. However, though sorely beset by him, his valiant foemen stand firm like high-born warriors they are, resolved to vanquish the entire Bhoja akshauhini, for fame and honour.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, our army too can boast of many outstanding attributes. Our forces are regarded as being equally superior, equally well arrayed, and equally numerous! We always treat our soldiers well, and they are always devoted to us. They are beyond count and their skill is exceptional and proven. Our men are neither too old nor very young, nor are they overly lean or corpulent. They are energetic, well built and strong, and free from disease.

They are all sheathed in excellent mail, well-armed and subject themselves to stern disciplines and arduous training. My fighters are adept in mounting and alighting from the backs of elephants, in marching, advancing, retreating, and striking with the utmost effectiveness. They have been often tested in managing elephants, horses and riding chariots. Our warriors are recruited only after passing stringent tests, and not merely because of their lineage, or from favoritism or nepotism. They are not a rabble come of their own accord, nor have they been admitted into my army without handsome payment.

My army consists of well-born and honourable men, who are contented, well fed, and obedient. They are generously rewarded and are all famed and intelligent. They are, besides, led and protected by many of our foremost advisers and other men of dharma, all of whom are the best of men, and are like the very regents of the world. They are also led by innumerable rulers of the world, seeking to please us and who have, out of sheer goodwill and friendship, allied themselves to us with their forces and followers.

Indeed, our army is like the vast ocean filled with the waters of countless rivers flowing from all directions. It has a plenitude of horses and chariots, which, though wingless, fly like the very birds of the air. We also have an abundance of war elephants in musth. Sanjaya, only destiny can destroy such an army.

Ocean-like, the vast numbers of warriors are its interminable waters, the horses and other animals its terrible waves, the numberless swords, maces, darts, arrows and lances are the oars plied on this ocean, and the abundant standards, ornaments and the pearls and gems of the warriors represent the lotuses that adorn it, and the running horses and elephants, the winds that agitate it into fury.

Drona is the fathomless cavern of that ocean, Kritavarman its vortex, Jalasandha its mighty makara, and Karna the Moon that makes it swell in tide with pride and energy.

When Arjuna, the Pandava bull on his single chariot, has battled his way so swiftly and with such aplomb through my oceanic army, and when Satyaki has also followed him, I do not, O Sanjaya, nurture any hope that these two will leave the smallest remnant of my legions alive. Seeing that these two mahatejasvins have scythed their way through the packed van and heart of my forces, and seeing that now Jayadratha is also within reach of the shafts from the Gandiva, what measures do the Kauravas, driven by rough fate, now adopt?

What has become of my sons during this intense battle? Ah, I believe that Death himself has overcome the massed Kurus. Their prowess no longer appears to be what it once was. Krishna and Arjuna have both breached the Kuru host unharmed. There is none in our army, O Sanjaya, who is capable of resisting them. We recruited so many of our great maharathas after a careful evaluation. We honour them with the remuneration each deserves and others with accolades. There is no one among my legions who is not rewarded and each receives his assigned payment and rations according to the extent and nature of his services. Sanjaya, there is none in my army who is unskilled in battle, none who receives payment less than what he deserves, none who does not receive any wage at all. I have acknowledged the soldiers to the best of my ability with gifts, honours and position. My sons, my kinsmen and my friends behave in the same manner towards them. Yet, Arjuna and Satyaki's mere approach has vanquished them. What can this be but Destiny ranged against us?

The protected and those who protect them all go the same way! Seeing Arjuna arrive where Jayadratha is secreted, what measures does my foolish son adopt? Seeing Satyaki also furrow a bloody path into the Kuru host, what does Duryodhana think appropriate to do? Seeing these two maharathas, who are invincible to all weapons, breach my host, what decision do my warriors take?

For myself, I must believe that the sight of both Krishna and now Satyaki engaged in Arjuna's cause, and mowing their gory way through my teeming ranks, fills my sons with shock and grief. I fear that they must be saddened and benumbed to watch their greatest maharathas flee in all directions, that they must truly despair of vanquishing the enemy. I fear they themselves must now think only of escaping with their lives.

Surely, my sons must be heartbroken to watch their thousands upon thousands of cavalry, elephants, chariots and heroic warriors run from the battle in abject fear. Surely, Duryodhana's heart must bleed to watch his great war-elephants excoriated by Arjuna's fiery tides of arrows, and turn tail, while others fall dead all around them shaking the earth.

I feel sure that, seeing Satyaki and Arjuna deprive horses of riders and warriors of rathas, and seeing Madhava and Partha rout and kill vast numbers of horses, my sons are stricken by grief.

I am certain, that seeing whole divisions of foot-soldiers flee in all directions, my sons, despairing of success, are grief-stricken.

Seeing those two heroes pass through Drona's vyuha, unvanquished, in mere moments, I am sure that my sons are full of grief.

I am shocked and aghast, O Sanjaya, to hear that Krishna and Dhananjaya, heroes of unfading glory, and Satyaki, as well, have penetrated my host. After maharatha Satyaki storms through the Bhojas, what do the Kauravas do? Tell me also, Sanjaya, about the battle where Drona disconcerts the Pandavas. Drona is imbued with immense power; he is the foremost of all warriors, and unconquerable in battle. How did the Panchalas quell this great bowman in the fight? The Panchalas and Drona are sworn enemies in Arjuna's quest for victory.

O Sanjaya, you are an eloquent raconteur; tell me everything that Arjuna does to bring death to Jayadratha.'

Sanjaya says, 'O Bharatarishabha, you should not indulge in such lamentations like an ordinary man, when you are overwhelmed by a calamity that is the result of your own sins. Years ago, many of your wise well-wishers, including Vidura, told you, 'Do not, O king, abandon the sons of Pandu.'

But at that time, you paid no heed to what they said and the man who ignores the advice of well-wishers will weep when he falls into great despair. O Rajan, he of Dasarha's vamsa came to beg you to make peace. For all that, Krishna of universal fame, could not get you to listen to his plea and the Lord of all the worlds himself realised your worthlessness, your jealousy of the Pandavas, and understood your malicious intentions towards them.

He calmly heard out your delirious protestation and then caused the flame of war to blaze forth among the Kurus. This enormous destruction has overtaken you solely because of your own guilt. It is not correct to impute the fault to Duryodhana because no merit can be attributed to you either in the beginning, the middle, or at the end in the unfolding of events. This bitter defeat is entirely due to you. Therefore, knowing as you do the truth about this world, quieten yourself and hear about the apocalyptic war on Kurukshetra, the Mahabharata yuddha that is even akin to the Devasura yuddha of time out of mind.

After the scintillating Satyaki pierces deep into your army, the Parthas led by Bhimasena also attack your troops. However, the maharatha Kritavarman, by himself, resists the Pandavas who take the furious offensive against your host. As the continent resists the surging sea, even so does Kritavarman, son of Hridika, resist the Pandava legions and he displays such wonderful skill that the united Parthas cannot defeat him.

Then the mighty-armed Bhima strikes Kritavarman with three dreadful shafts and blows his conch resoundingly, gladdening the hearts of all the Pandavas. Sahadeva strikes the Bhoja with twenty arrows, Yudhishtira with five, Nakula with a hundred, the sons of Draupadi with three and seventy, Ghatotkacha with seven, Virata and Drupada and Dhrishtadyumna each with five spiteful shafts, and Sikhandin, first with five, and again with twenty-five brutal barbs.

Seamlessly, Kritavarman strikes every one of those maharathas with five arrows, and Bhima with seven. He fells Bhima's chariot from his chariot, breaks his bow in his hands and quickly gores him with seventy barbs through his massive chest. Deeply wounded, the mighty Bhima trembles on his ratha like a mountain in an earthquake.

Seeing Bhima in danger, the Parthas led by Yudhishtira surround Kritavarman in fury, covering him in fire to protect Vayu's son. The Vayuputra recovers swiftly casts a steely spear with a golden shaft at Kritavarman's ratha. That fierce spear hurled so powerfully from Bhima's hands is like a snake freed from its slough and blazes as it flies at Kritavarman. Seeing the dart invested with the brilliance of the Yuga-fire coursing towards him, Kritavarman slices it in two as it falls onto the ground, still burning, like a meteor from the sky, illumining the ten points of the compass.

Seeing his occult lance cut down, Bhima roars in anger and, sweeping up another stronger bow, its twang like thunder, bloodies Kritavarman's chest with five throbbing shafts.

All this, Rajan, is the result of your evil policy!

Kritavarman, king of the Bhojas, lacerated in every limb by Bhimasena, is resplendent like a red asoka tree covered with flowers. Roaring himself like a hunt of lions, he plunges three fervent shafts into Bhima, and slashes every maharatha ranged against him, with three passionate barbs. They strike him back with seven arrows.

Then, with a razor-tipped shaft, the battling Bhoja breaks Sikhandin's bow, but the Panchala quickly takes up a sword and a bright shield adorned with gold and a hundred moons; whirling the sword in his hands, he flings it like a dagger at Kritavarman's ratha, riving his bow with a mighty astra fitted to it, so it falls onto the earth like a star come loose from the sky, burning briefly there before dying out.

The other maharathas also cover Kritavarman with their stern shafts; upon which, casting aside the broken bow, he takes up another and strikes each of the Pandavas with three shafts like streaks of lightning. He strikes Sikhandin first with three, and then with five shafts. The illustrious Sikhandin takes up another bow, and responds with a barrage of fleet barbs fitted with heads like tortoise nails. Inflamed, Kritavarman rushes recklessly at the powerful Sikhandin, son of Yajnasena, who was the cause of a great fall in the battlefield. He dashes at Drupada's son like a tiger at an elephant.

The two parantapas, who resemble a couple of wild elephants or two blazing fires, clash in a shower of arrows. They use their best bows and shoot their arrows in hundreds, like twin suns shedding their rays and they shine in glory like two suns appearing at the end of the Yuga.

Kritavarman pierces Sikhandin first with three and seventy shafts and again with seven. Deeply wounded, Sikhandin sits down in his ratha in shock and pain, drops his bow and arrows, and faints. Seeing this, your troops hail Kritavarman and wave their bright cloaks and scarves in the air. Sikhandin's charioteer quickly takes him out of the battle.

Watching this, the Parthas encircle Kritavarman with their rathas. The maharatha Kritavarman then demonstrates a feat of great wonder there, as, by himself, he holds all the Pandavas and their followers at bay. He vanquishes the Chedis, the Panchalas, the Srinjayas, and the Kekayas. The Pandava forces scatter; they cannot bear the flaming Kritavarman. Having defeated the sons of Pandu led by Bhimasena himself, the son of Hridika shines forth like Agni himself on Kurukshetra, and all the Pandava maharathas, soundly beaten by the Bhoja's torrents of arrows, cannot find the heart to face him.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After Kritavarman, the noble son of Hridika, routs the enemy and humiliates the Parthas, your troops are jubilant. Hearing the uproar from your army, Sini's grandson Satyaki, protector of the Pandavas when they sink in that fathomless sea of distress in this awful war, quickly turns back and attacks Kritavarman who covers him with a torment of arrows. Satyaki looses a wide-tipped shaft at the Bhoja and follows this with four more terrific arrows, which kill his horses and destroy his bow. He inundates Kritavarman's charioteer and the warriors who protect his back with a deluge of shafts. They cannot withstand the lustrous Vrishni, and fall apart. The incomparable shura Yuyudhana quickly turns his chariot around and continues on his way towards his master Arjuna.

Now listen, O Rajan, to what Satyaki does to your army. After fording the sea that is Drona's division, and triumphant after vanquishing Kritavarman, he says to his charioteer, "Go with care but fearlessly."

However, he then sees your thronging army of rathas, cavalry, elephants and foot-soldiers, and says again to his sarathy, "This great legion, dark as clouds that you see on the left of Drona's vyuha, consists of a vast contingent of elephants led by Rukmaratha, and is difficult to subdue.

Positioned there by Duryodhana, these warriors belong to the country of the Trigartas, are of princely birth, are great bowmen, skilled in battle, and they are all illustrious maharathas, with their standards decked with gold. All of them are prepared to die fighting. These heroes seek battle with me, so drive your horses at them swiftly! I will fight the Trigartas in the very sight of Bharadwaja's son."

His sarathy, Daruka's brother, always obedient to Satyaki, cracks his whip over his superlative steeds, white as silver or the kunda flower, swift as the mind, and the shining ratha that flies a flag bright as the sun, flies towards the elephant legion of great Rukmaratha. The elephants surround that chariot, and their riders lash down all manner of arrows over the raiding Satyaki.

Satyaki, shooting up at them, covers them in a storm-cloud of radiant fire, shredding the great beasts' flesh, felling many outright, felling their riders from their backs, all in a moment, a violent dream. Their caparisons and blankets coming loose, their very tusks cloven, their huge bodies covered in blood, their round temples split open, the flapping ears, great faces and trunks sliced in slivers, their shrill screams echoing across the grim field, the mastodons lumber away in terror from this dread god come hunting them.

The Satwata ablaze mangles the grey beasts with arrows long as spears, with calf-tooth-headed bolts, broad-headed shafts, anjalikas, razor-faced and crescent-tipped barbs, and they flee from him in perfect terror, spraying urine and dung as they go. Some of them limp away as quickly as they can for the fearsome warrior has lamed them, some just fall, and others, fleeing, are pale with tears flowing down their faces. Stricken by mighty Yuyudhana with astras that are like the sun or fire, the elephant division bolts in all directions.

When Satyaki has put Rukmaratha's elephant legion to flight, when he has slaughtered so many of the beasts, the mighty Jalasandha nonchalantly lumbers up on his elephant to confront Satyaki's ratha drawn by white horses. Wearing a golden angadas, with kundala and kirita, armed with a huge curved sword, smeared with red sandalwood-paste, his brow wreathed with a shining chain of gold, his breast covered with a brilliant kavacha, his neck also adorned with a golden chain, Jalasandha, Kshatriya of sinless soul, enthroned upon the neck of his outsized elephant, shaking his gold-inlaid bow, is as glorious as a cloud charged with lightning.

As the continent checks the surging sea, Satyaki checks the Magadha king's Jalasandha's exceptional elephant that bears down on him in fury. Finding his elephant hesitate against Satyaki's tirade of arrows, Jalasandha's eyes turn red and he strikes Yuyudhana through his chest with an angry volley. Shooting down at his adversary, the Magadhan shatters Satyaki's bow in his hands, and then drills five more serpentine shafts down into the Yadava's body.

Ah, Rajan, it is wonderful to see how the mighty-armed Satyaki hardly winces though struck so violently. Seizing up a fresh bow, and actually smiling, he makes a mess of blood on Jalasandha's wide chest with sixty shafts loosed up at his in a blink, then breaks his bow at its very grip with another razor-headed shaft, and strikes him hard with three more barbs that thud into his breast again like a single shaft.

Jalasandha flings aside his bow and hurls a terrible lance at Satyaki, which passes right through his left arm and enters the earth, like a hissing snake of gigantic proportion. Heedless of his gaping wound, the invincible Satyaki drives another thirty keen arrows deep into Jalasandha's body already covered in blood. Jalasandha takes up his sword and a large bull's hide shield embellished with a hundred moons, whirls the great blade round and casts it like summer lightning at the Satwata, demolishing his bow. The occult sword then lies upon the earth like a circle of fire.

A wrathful Satyaki takes up another bow big as a sala-offshoot, the sound of its bowstring like Indra's Vajra; drawing it in a circle he strikes Jalasandha with a heavy, ferocious arrow, stunning the Magadhan. Next moment, with two razor-sharp, crescent-headed shafts he cleanly hews off Jalasandha's ornamented arms like spiked maces at their shoulders, so they fall from the elephant's back like two thick squirming five-headed snakes falling from a mountain cliff. With a third razorine shaft Satyaki severs his antagonist's great head, with shining perfect teeth and sparkling earrings, in a carmine blast. The macabre trunk still astride the elephant dyes Jalasandha's hulking beast with gushing blood.

Rajan, Yuyudhana quickly fells the wooden warrior's frame and its rider's throne-like seat from that beast's lofty back, so that, bathed in his master's blood, Jalasandha's elephant suffers the costly seat to hang from his back, and wounded terribly by Satyaki's arrows, in absolute anguish, he blunders across the field trampling Jalasandha's own ranks to pulp, all the while trumpeting wildly in pain.

At the sight of Jalasandha slain by the Vrishni bull, wails of woe arise among your troops; and your warriors, turning their faces, flee in all directions, despairing entirely of success. Meanwhile, Drona advances again on Satyaki, on his red chargers. Many other Kuru warriors, seeing Satyaki swollen with rage and pride, furiously follow Drona. Then commences a battle, O Rajan, between the Kurus and Drona on one side and Satyaki on the other, that is yet another like the one of old between the Devas and the Asuras.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'O king, shooting clouds of arrows, all these seasoned warriors cautiously advance on Satyaki. Drona strikes him with seven and seventy shafts, Durmarshana with a dozen, Dusasana with ten and Vikarna pierces him through his side as well as his chest with thirty keen kanka-feathered arrows.

Durmukha strikes him with ten shafts, Dusasana with eight, Chitrasena with two; Duryodhana and many other heroes also draw blood from Sini's sublime grandson with their dense fire. Though they surround him and lash him with their arrows, Satyaki the magnificent makes the bodies of every last one a home for his robust missiles.

He pierces Drona savagely with three, Dusasana with nine, Vikarna with five and twenty, Chitrasena with seven, Durmarshana with a dozen, Vivimsati with eight, Satyavrata with nine, and Vijaya with ten sinewy barbs. After striking Rukmangada also, Satyaki, shaking his bow, swiftly attacks Duryodhana and, in the sight of all that teem there, draws deep fonts of blood from your son. A relucent duel breaks out between the two and, each renders the other invisible with thick arrow shrouds.

Injured by the Kuru king, and blood flowing freely down his body, Satyaki soon looks like a sandalwood tree bleeding its ruddy juices. Your son too, struck often by Yuyudhana, is conspicuous, like a stake set up at a yagna, decked with gold. Then, with an imperious smile, Satyaki breaks Duryodhana's bow and strikes him with a flurry of arrows, past counting.

But Duryodhana is far from ready to concede defeat. Snatching up a fresh bow, he gashes the Vrishni hero with a hundred shafts shot like one. Stabbed deep by your mighty son's barbs, Satyaki blazes up in dreadful anger. He launches such an intense assault on your son that your other maharathas, fearing for his life, rush in to pour down opaque gales of missiles, mantling the menacing Vrishni with their fierce fire.

Satyaki pierces each of them first with five arrows, and again with seven more. He strikes Duryodhana with eight scorching arrows and serenely breaks your son's massive bow that frightens all enemies. With a few arrows more, he fells the king's standard adorned with the jewelled black elephant; and with another four arrows kills Duryodhana's four horses and then his charioteer with a razor-faced shaft. Elated by his success, Satyaki strikes Duryodhana deep with some slender missiles that pierce into his very vitals.

Rajan, wounded by Satyaki's great shafts, Duryodhana leaps out of his ratha and runs to mount Chitrasena's chariot, and arms himself with another bow. Seeing Satyaki overwhelm Duryodhana, indeed like Rahu swallowing the Moon, cries of woe arise from every part of the Kuru host. Hearing that great lament, maharatha Kritavarman quickly rides up to where Satyaki, the puissant Madhava, rules the war. Shaking his bow, crying to his charioteer, "Go! Fly at Satyaki!" comes the dauntless Kritavarman.

Seeing Kritavarman racing towards him like Death himself with jaws agape, Satyaki says to his sarathy, "Look where Kritavarman comes dashing at us. Ride to meet his charge, O Suta!"

His horses spurred to their greatest speed, Satyaki meets the king of the Bhojas, Kritavarman first among all bowmen. The two naravyaghras, both inflamed with rage, and like fire, encounter each other like two raging tigers. Kritavarman strikes Satyaki first with six and twenty whetted and keen arrows, and his sarathy with five; he stabs Satyaki's four superb steeds of the Sindhu breed with four cruel shafts. Flying a standard decked with gold, and wearing golden mail, and his arrows all golden-winged, Kritavarman, shaking his formidable bow, stops the storming Satyaki in his tracks.

Satyaki is by now more than eager to arrive at Arjuna's side. He raises his archery and plunges eight truly dreadful shafts into Kritavarman, wounding him so fiercely that invincible warrior begins to tremble like a hill during an earthquake. Fluidly, Satyaki strikes Kritavarman's four horses with three and sixty keen missiles and his sarathy with seven; he then aims another astra of golden wings that emits flames and resembles an angry snake, or the rod of Yama himself, and pierces Kritavarman with it. The flaming ayudha burns through Kritavarman's effulgent armour, his body, and enters the ground behind him.

Gravely wounded now and bathed in blood, Kritavarman, the lion-toothed hero of untold prowess, that bull among men, drops his bow and arrows and falls on his knees in his ratha. Having stopped Kritavarman who is like the thousand-armed Kartaviryarjuna of old, or the Ocean himself of immeasurable might, Satyaki dashes on once more. Mowing easily through Kritavarman's division bristling with swords, darts and bows, and thick with elephants, horses and rathas, and out of the ground mired in the blood shed by hundreds and hundreds of the best Kshatriyas, the bull of the Sinis forges on like Indra through the fell Asura legions.

Meanwhile, Kritavarman recovers, and taking up another huge bow, remains where he is, giving up his chase of Satyaki and fighting the Pandavas instead.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'As Satyaki storms through the Kuru host, Drona engulfs him with a dense bank of arrows. Another pitched battle erupts between them before all the troops, even like that between Bali and Vasava in days of old.

Drona strikes Yuyudhana's forehead with three shimmering iron quarrels that are like snakes of virulent poison and Sini's grandson briefly looks like a mountain with three peaks. Drona continues to pour fire over him, shafts that roar like Indra's Vajra.

Satyaki strikes back with two beautifully winged arrows, after he cuts down all Drona's shafts in flight. Drona sees his young adversary's dexterity, and with a smile, looses thirty arrows at him in a wink, and now showing even greater speed of hand than Satyaki, in two blurred instants he strikes him first with fifty shafts and then with a hundred more. These deadly shafts spume from Drona's ratha like angry snakes boring through an anthill.

And Satyaki, not outdone, covers the Brahmana's ratha with thousands of blood-drinking missiles. None that watch the duel can mark any difference between the skills of the Acharya and the Satwata; both bulls among men, they appear to be perfectly equal.

A fiery Satyaki strikes Drona and his standard with nine straight arrows, and in Drona's sight, he berates his suta with a hundred shafts. Drona pierces Satyaki's charioteer with seventy barbs, and each of his four horses with three; with a single flawless missile he cuts down Drona's proud standard, and with another broad-headed arrow, streaked with gold, he shatters his bow.

His rage mounting by the moment, Satyaki hefts a heavy mace and hurls it like lightning at Bharadwaja's son. However, Drona smashes it to dust with an imperious volley. Satyaki picks up another bow, drills Drona with a clutch of strident shafts, and gives a deafening shout. Drona cannot bear that roar and he launches a golden-shafted lance, charged with an astra, at the Vrishni hero. But the lethal weapon passes through Satyaki's ratha never touching Sini's grandson, and plunges into the earth, and is extinguished with a loud report.

Satyaki ravages the Acharya with a still more fervid volley, drawing geysers of blood from the Brahmana, and especially his right arm. Invincible Drona once more severs Yuyudhana's great bow with one of his favoured crescent-tipped shafts and also gores his sarathy with such ferocity that the suta collapses briefly on his chariot-head.

O Rajan, what Satyaki does next is surely superhuman, for he snatches up the reins from his supine charioteer's hands, and continues to battle great Drona while guiding his own horses! Indeed, he strikes the Brahmana with a hundred arrows, and rejoices at his own marvelous feat, which even his enemies applaud. Drona unleashes five ferocious barbs at his brilliant antagonist; they pierce his armour and drink his blood.

Resorting to cunning, Satyaki looses a squall of arrows directly at Drona, absorbing him, but with a single shaft in its midst beheads the Brahmana's sarathy; Drona's already lacerated horses panic, and their reins hanging loose, careen wildly across the field, dragging the Brahmana's bright chariot in wide circles, like an unrestrained sun in chaotic motion. All the kings and princes of the Kaurava host cry out, "Quick, seize Drona's horses!"

And leaving Satyaki, all the Kuru maharathas rush towards Drona's ratha. Your troops see this and think that they are fleeing from Satyaki and yet again their spirits plummet. Meanwhile, borne far away from Satyaki by his maddened horses, Drona, in some resignation, returns to the mouth of his vyuha. There he finds that the Pandavas and Panchalas have smashed the great cart formation; he makes no further attempt to follow Yuyudhana but employs himself in rallying his broken vyuha. Turning on the Pandava and the Panchala legions, the Drona fire, blazing up in wrath, remains there consuming all around him with dreadful astras never used against common soldiers. He burns like the uncommon Sun that rises at the end of the Yuga.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'O Kurusthama, after vanquishing Drona and other warriors of your army that Hridika's son Kritavarman leads, Satyaki, the Sini bull, jocularly tells his charioteer, "O Suta, Kesava and Phalguna have already consumed our enemies, and in vanquishing them, we are merely the apparent instrument. Already slain by Nararishabha Arjuna, the son of Indra, we have but slain the dead."

Satyaki presses on, continuing to raze the Kaurava ranks all around him, arrowing on like a hawk in search of prey. Although the Kuru warriors still attack him from all sides, they cannot stop him from surging ahead, borne by his horses white as the moon or a conch, like the sun of a thousand rays. Indeed, O Bhaarata, no one can oppose the irresistible Satyaki of valour equal to that of the thousand-eyed Indra, and looking like the autumnal sun in the sky.

Then the great king maharatha Sudarshana rides at the racing Satyaki and attempts to stop him. Another calescent duel breaks out, which both your warriors and the Somakas acclaim as being like the one between Vritra and Vasava. Sudarshana looses hundreds of arrows at Satyaki from a distance, while cutting down the handful of shafts that Yuyudhana blazes at him.

But consummate Satyaki easily thwarts Sudarshana's volleys, and enraged by his enemy's disdain, fierce Sudarshana draws his bow into a circle and unleashes three exceptional astras of fire at the Vrishni hero. These burn through Satyaki's kavacha and pass through his body, momentarily fetching him up. In a flash, Sudarshana plunges four burning shafts into Satyaki's silver steeds.

But the Vrishni is as powerful as Indra himself, and, unperturbed, he slaughters Sudarshana's horses in four scarlet explosions and roars like four tigers. Next moment, he hacks off Sudarshana's sarathy's head and then, with a razor-faced arrow like the Yuga-fire, strikes off Sudarshana's own head radiant as the full moon, indeed again like Indra once did the head of the mighty Bala in that battle of long ago.

Satyaki, karmayogin, noble bull of the Yadus, is exultant after he kills prince Sudarshana and shines on Kurukshetra like the king of the Devas himself. Not pausing, he flares on along Arjuna's trail, thwarting all your troops with firetides of arrows, and filling all with amazement as he goes. All the greatest warriors gathered there, even his enemies, applaud his amazing feats, for he consumes all that come within the reach of his arrows, like a sweeping forest fire fanned by the wind.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Having killed Sudarshana, Satyaki speaks again to his charioteer, "We have forded the impassible ocean of Drona's vyuha, teeming with rathas, horsemen and elephants, whose waves are arrows and darts, its fishes swords and scimitars and its makaras maces, the great sea that roars with the songs of astras and the thunder of diverse weapons colliding, the ocean of terror, death and blood which resounds with the noise of conches and drums, whose touch is unbearable, and whose shores fierce Rakshasas and carnivores infest.

I think, beloved Suta, that now we can easily cross what remains of the vyuha, which is like a poor stream of willow water. Urge your horses on without reserve or fear, for I feel certain that I am very near Arjuna. Yes, having vanquished the invincible Drona and his legions, and the mighty Kritavarman, I do believe I cannot be too distant from my master Arjuna.

I never feel fear even if I see countless enemies before me. To me they are like a heap of straw and dry grass to a blazing conflagration in the forest. This is the path by which Arjuna Kiritin, the greatest of the Pandavas, has gone and numberless corpses of foot-soldiers and horses, chariot-warriors and elephants have rendered the earth uneven. Look at the Kaurava army running away, routed by the noblest warrior. Look, Suta, at the brown dust the fleeing chariots, elephants and horses raise.

Yes, I am very near to the Swetavahana, Arjuna who has Krishna for his sarathy. Ah, listen! The sweet thunder of the Gandiva! From the omens I see all around me, I am certain that Arjuna will kill Jayadratha before the sun sets.

Without tiring our horses, now guide them slowly to where the warriors led by Duryodhana, their hands cased in leather gauntlets stand; and there, where the Kambojas of fierce deeds and the Yavanas with their marvellous bows; and towards the Sakas and Daradas and Barbaras and Tamraliptakas, and countless other Mlecchas, armed with diverse strange weapons. All these, with vile Duryodhana at their head, wait with their faces turned towards me, excited at the prospect of doing battle against me.

Suta, think of us as already having passed through this fierce fastness, having slain all these legions with their chariots, elephants, horses and footsoldiers."

His charioteer replies, "O you of Vrishni's vamsa, I too have no fear. Why, O indomitable one, if you face Jamadagni's son Parasurama himself in anger, or Drona, best of maharathas, or the king of the Madras, fear will not enter my heart, as long as I have the shade of your protection.

Parantapa, you have already decimated countless invincible Kambojas, invincible in battle, as many intrepid Yavanas, including Sakas, Daradas, Tamraliptakas, and many other Mlecchas armed with their myriad weapons. Never have I experienced fear in any battle. Why will I then be afraid in this miserable fray?

O you who are blessed with long life, by which route should I take you to where Dhananjaya is? With whom are you angry, and who are they that will run away from battle, when they see you demonstrate the prowess of the Destroyer himself as he appears at the end of the Yuga? O Mahabaho, who are they of whom king Vaivaswata is thinking today?"

Satyaki replies, "Like Vasava destroying the Danavas I will slay these Kamboja warriors with shaved heads and fulfil my vow. Take me there and causing a great carnage among them, I will join Arjuna. The Kauravas, with Duryodhana at their head, will see my prowess today, when I exterminate this legion of Mlecchas of shaved heads and put the whole Kaurava army to the greatest grief. Today, hearing the loud wails of the Kaurava host, mangled and broken by me in battle, Duryodhana will suffer the grief he deserves.

Today I will show my guru, the noble Swetavahana, my skill with weapons that I acquired from him. When he sees thousands of mighty warriors slain by my arrows, king Duryodhana will be plunged into great grief. The Kauravas will behold the bow in my hands to resemble a circle of fire when, light-handed, I stretch the bowstring to loose multitudes of missiles. Seeing the incessant slaughter of his troops, their bodies covered with blood and pierced all over with my arrows, Duryodhana will be filled with sorrow. While I kill the foremost Kuru warriors today, he will see not one but two Arjunas. Seeing me dispatch thousands of kings in battle, intolerable pain will fill his body and heart. Slaying those thousands of kings today, I will show my love and devotion to the noble sons of Pandu. And the Kauravas will know the measure of my might and energy, and my gratitude to the Pandavas."

The charioteer then urges his coursers of the hue of the moon to their utmost speed. The excellent steeds, swift as the wind or thought, fly forward as if to devour the very skies, and bear Satyaki to where the Yavanas are stationed. The numerous Yavanas, expert archers all, envelop the charging Satyaki with showers of arrows. The wrathful Satyaki, Rajan, destroys all their shafts and other weapons; with hosts of arrows, winged with gold and vulture's feathers he dismembers the Yavanas, striking off their heads and arms so they fall like eerie hail. Many of his shafts pass through their iron or brass coats of mail, and stick in the earth. The Mlecchas perish in hundreds; his arrows flowing in spate, a torrid river from his bow drawn to its fullest stretch, he fells five, six, seven, or eight Yavanas at a time.

Satyaki massacres thousands of Kambojas, Sakas, and Barbaras, and the great carnage makes the earth impassable with a horrible sludge of flesh and blood.

The battlefield looks exotic like a sky covered with coppery clouds, with the strewn helmets of the Mlecchas and their shaven heads, which with their long beards look like featherless birds; and the field is also covered even more thickly with headless trunks dyed in blood. Slaughtered by Satyaki, whose touch is like that of Indra's thunder, the dead Yavanas sprawl everywhere, cover the earth with their dead. The small living remnant of those warriors, Rajan, and their spirit broken, face to face with death, they whips their horses and flee in all directions, overwhelmed by the terror of Satyaki.

Thus, the insuperable Satyaki routs the invincible Kamboja host as well as the Yavana army and the large force of the Sakas, and crowned with victory, cries to his charioteer, “On! Fly!”

Seeing his indescribable feats in this battle, never achieved by anyone before, the Charanas and the Gandharvas in the sky applaud him. Indeed, O king, the Charanas, and your warriors, seeing Satyaki flying to help Arjuna, are filled with delight at his heroism.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Having vanquished the Yavanas and the Kambojas, Satyaki, most magnificent maharatha, courses on towards Arjuna, blasting his way through your terrified troops, decimating them on every side at his great will. Brandishing his glorious bow, which many moons adorn, he forges on irresistibly.

Golden angadas deck his arms; his helmet is adorned with gold; his body is covered in golden mail and his standard and bow too are embellished with gold, so that he shines like the summit of Meru. So lustrous is he, with the bow always bent into a circle, that he does resemble a second Surya in autumn. Yuyudhana, with his mighty shoulders, tread and lion's gaze, looks like a bull in a cow-pen in the midst of your troops.

Your warriors surround him again, Sini's grandson who stands so tall and proud, radiant in his chariot, like some incomparable tusker with rent temples. Indeed, after he ploughs through Drona's division, and the unfordable Bhoja division; after he wades through the sea of Jalasandha's troops as well as the host of the Kambojas; after he escapes Kritavarman the makara, after he traverses the entire oceanic Kuru host, once more many infuriated chariot-warriors of your army attack the Yadava. Duryodhana, Chitrasena, Dusasana, Vivimsati, Sauna, Duhsaha, the youthful Durdharshana, Kratha, and many other great warriors, all difficult to defeat, wrathfully chase Satyaki as he dashes on, nearer and nearer Arjuna with each moment.

Then, O Sire, loud is the uproar that arises among your troops, like that of the ocean at full tide when lashed into fury by a tempest. Seeing all those warriors dashing at him, Satyaki smilingly says to his charioteer, "Drive slowly, Suta. Swollen with rage and pride, and swarming with elephants, horsemen, rathas and foot-soldiers, rushes towards me, filling the ten points of the compass with deep rumble of its chariots and making the earth, the sky, and the very seas to tremble.

This sea of troops, O Suta, will I contend with in a great battle, like the continent resisting the ocean risen to its height at full moon. Watch my prowess, O friend, which is equal to that of Indra himself for I will devour this hostile force with my arrows. Look at the foot-soldiers, horsemen, chariot-warriors, and elephants I slew in thousands, their bodies pierced by my fiery arrows."

While he speaks to his charioteer, the enemy host breaks upon the unassailable Satyaki. They come with a deafening din, and roars of Kill him! fill the field of dharma. Satyaki kills three hundred horsemen and four hundred elephants of those brave warriors in less time than it takes to tell. The exchange of arrows between the enemy bowmen and Satyaki is yet again comparable to that between the Devas and the Asuras in the days of old. Carnage rules the field; Yuyudhana's astras are like venomous snakes, not one failing to find its target and he shrouds them with his missiles in an unearthly cloudburst.

The surging sea of troops, seething with chariots rathas, elephants, cavalry and foot-soldiers, which are its waves, is stilled as soon as it comes upon the Satyaki Dwipa. Such slaughtering does he bring to them, that in no time they break ranks and flee, utterly shattered, in a daze, trembling as if struck by the icy winds of winter.

We see no foot-soldier or chariot-warrior or elephant or horseman or a horse that Yuyudhana's arrows do not strike. Not even Arjuna, O Rajan, has brought such carnage there as the dauntless Satyaki!

Then Duryodhana strikes Satyaki's charioteer with three keen arrows, his four horses with four, and Satyaki himself first with three and again with eight. Dusasana pierces him with sixteen, Sakuni with five and twenty arrows, Chitrasena with five; Dusasana drills fifteen thunderbolts into his chest. The Vrishni never flinches but proudly wounds each of them with three arrows. Yet, fiercely wounded, by enemy shafts, maharatha, mahatejasvin Satyaki flits all over the battlefield with the speed of a hawk.

He demolishes Sakuni's bow and shreds his leathern gloves, bloodies Duryodhana's chest with three shafts, Chitrasena with a hundred arrows, Duhsaha with ten, and Dusasana with twenty. Your brother-in-law Sakuni takes up another bow and strikes Satyaki first with eight arrows and again with five; Dusasana wounds him with three, Durmukha with a dozen, Duryodhana with three and seventy and then his charioteer with three keening barbs.

Satyaki excoriates each of those maharathas with five blazing shafts. He swiftly strikes Duryodhana's charioteer with a broad-headed shaft, and drops him dead on the field. At this your son's horses bolt, bearing Duryodhana madly away from the field of battle, quick as the wind. Seeing this, your other sons and warriors flee in their hundreds. Satyaki unleashes burning arrow storms after the fleeing enemy, golden-winged and shimmering.

Thus routing all your legions, thousands and thousands of men, Satyaki again courses on towards Arjuna's ratha. If truth be told, Dhritarashtra, your troops worship Satyaki, when they see him loose his gales of arrows, even while protecting his charioteer and himself. They have never before seen archery like this, or valour!'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Seeing Satyaki fight his way towards Arjuna, smashing the large force as he went, Sanjaya, what do my shameless sons do? When he who is equal to Savyasachin himself confronts them, how can these wretches, face to face with death, feel any eagerness to fight? What do all those Kshatriyas, routed in battle, then do? Yet, how can Satyaki of renown pass through our ranks when my sons still live? Tell me all this, O Sanjaya, for I am astonished to hear about this encounter between a single hero and the many maharathas.

O Suta, fate has surely turned against my sons, that one warrior of the Satwata vamsa has killed so many mighty maharathas. Alas, my army is no match for even this one Satyaki inflamed. Let all the Pandavas hang up their weapons. Vanquishing Drona himself, Satyaki will kill all my sons, like a great lion hunting little animals. So many maharathas, Kritavarman the first among them, all fighting vigorously, cannot stop Yuyudhana. The Vrishni will surely slay my sons. Truly, Arjuna himself does not fight as the renowned Satyaki does!'

Sanjaya replies, 'All this, O Rajan, is the consequence of your evil counsels and the sins of Duryodhana. Listen attentively to what I say.

At the command of your son, the Samsaptakas now rally once more, all determined to fight to the death. Three thousand archers led by Duryodhana, with a number of Sakas, Kambojas, Balhikas, Yavanas, Paradas, Kalingas, Tanganas, Ambashtas, Pisachas, Barbaras and mountain-men—inflamed with rage and armed with stones—all rush in frenzy at Satyaki, like insects into a blazing fire. Five hundred other warriors also charge Yuyudhana. Another mighty contingent of a thousand chariots, a hundred maharathas, a thousand elephants, two thousand Kshatriyas and countless foot-soldiers also attack him. Dusasana urges all these warriors on, crying, "Surround Satyaki and cut him down like a dog!"

And then still more grand and wonderful is the fight that we see from Sini's grandson, as he fights alone against these innumerable enemies. He kills the entire body of maharathas, the elephant force, all the horsemen and the Mlecchas. Like the autumn sky spangled with stars, the battlefield is strewn with chariot-wheels his mighty weapons break apart with volleys of innumerable akshas; and reduce beautifully wrought chariot-shafts to fragments; like the star-strewn autumn sky is Kurukshetra with felled elephants and fallen standards, with coats of mail and shields scattered all around, with garlands and ornaments and fine cloaks and anukarshas, O great King!

Many hilly elephants, born of the race of Anjana or Vamana or of other noble lines, so many immense tuskers lie there on the ground, unbreathing, and their eyes shut forever. Satyaki kills the great horses of the Vanayu, the Malaya, the Kamboja and the Balhika breeds: in thousands. He razes hundreds of thousands of foot-soldiers, born in various kingdoms and belonging to diverse nations.

Even while all these men and beasts are being slaughtered, Dusasana exhorts the virile Mleccha brigands, "You warriors who know no dharma, fight now as savagely as you can! Why do you retreat? This is just one man, cut him to pieces and feed on his flesh!"

But they ignore him and just run. Now Dusasana turns to the mountain men, the wild stone-fighters, saying, "You are masters of fighting with stones and slingshots, while Satyaki knows nothing of this way of battle. So stop this Vrishni. The Kauravas also know nothing of your method of fighting. If you rush fearlessly at Satyaki, he will be helpless against you."

Those mountain-dwelling Kshatriyas, all masters at the unusual art of fighting with stones, run towards Satyaki like ministers towards a king, with stones big as elephants' heads raised in their hands. Others, urged by your son, and wanting to kill Yuyudhana, surround him, also armed with rocks. Satyaki pulverizes the heavy cascade of rocks and stones they fling so expertly at him; he kills many of the mountain Kshatriyas, while the shattering rock fragments pierce others in hundreds blowing heads asunder, smashing open brawny chests, and countless more fall dead. Next moment, he hacks off the arms of five hundred stone-throwers, so scarlet geysers spray from their armpits, while their hands still clasp great rocks.

Never pausing, growing more fierce by the moment, Satyaki kills a thousand mountain men next, and then a whole hundred thousand, all of them never coming near him, all with their rough weapons raised above their heads, even as he strikes off those heads. It is an exceptional and incredible feat that the Yadava on fire accomplished quick as seeing.

The hordes of stone-throwers continue to rush at Satyaki in waves, for they are numerous, and he continues to kill them as they come. Many Daradas, Tanganas, Khasas, Lampakas and Pulindas fling swords and lances at him for what they believe to be a safe distance. Satyaki carves all these in flight, the rocks exploding with loud reports, which frighten horses, and elephants that flee yet again, while bedlam reigns with Satyaki its dreadful heart. The shattering fragments continue to sting and kill countless men and beasts, even as if cobras are stinging them.

The small remnant of the elephants that attacked Satyaki also flees from the Vrishni's ratha, covered with blood, their heads and frontal lobes split open. While he annihilates your legions in an unprecedented carnage, a loud and deep wailing rises from your troops, even as if the Earth herself bellowed in agony, or the sea at full tide.

Hearing the great and dismal sound, Drona says to his charioteer, "O Suta, Satyaki fights like Yama himself enraged and annihilates our forces. Ride to where this great tumult has arisen. I have no doubt that Yuyudhana decimates the mountain men who fight with rocks and stone. And look where our maharathas also flee everywhere in terror of the Yadava. Look where they fall, the wounded and the dead, while the charioteers cannot restrain their horses."

His sarathy tells Drona, the greatest of wielders of weapons, "O you who are blessed with length of days, look at the Kaurava troops flee and all our warriors, routed by one hero, run in all directions. And here, the Panchalas and the Pandavas, united, converge on you from every side to have your life. You must decide which of these should have your first attention? Should we stay here to face the advancing Pandavas or should we find Satyaki who is so far from us?"

Even as his charioteer says this to Drona, Satyaki suddenly appears in hot pursuit of a large number of rathikas who are fleeing from him towards Drona's army. Some other chariot-warriors, Dusasana's troops, all panic-stricken, also fly towards Drona's ratha.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Dusasana's chariot near his, Drona asks him, "Why are all these rathas fleeing? Is the king not well? Is Jayadratha still alive? You are a prince, a king's brother, a maharatha. Why do you run away from battle? Hand the throne over to your brother and become the Prince Regent. You once told Draupadi, "We have won you at dice; you are our slave. Do not limit yourself to your husbands; set aside your chastity and take these robes to the king, my brother Duryodhana. Your husbands are all good as dead; they are as worthless as grains of sesame without their kernels."

And now you run away from battle? Having provoked such fierce enmity with the Panchalas and the Pandavas, why are you afraid to fight a lone Satyaki? When you took up the dice in the Kuru sabha, could you not divine that one day they would transform themselves into fierce arrows? It was you that abused the Pandavas. You are the cause of Draupadi's torment. Where is your pride now, your insolence and your brag? After stirring their wrath, now why do you run away from the Pandavas who are like terrible snakes of virulent poison?

As a brave brother of Suyodhana, you should protect the routed, panic-stricken Kaurava army with your might, instead of running like a common coward. With this dastardliness you will increase the joy of your enemies. O Parantapa, when you who are the leader of your host, flee like this, who else will stay to fight? When you, its refuge, are frightened, who in our army will not be afraid?

You run in terror from just one Satwata warrior. Kaurava, what will you do when you face Arjuna the Gandivi in battle, or Bhima, or Madri's twins? Satyaki's arrows from which you flee in terror are hardly equal to Arjuna's astras, which are like the Sun or Fire.

If you are bent on escape, let us declare peace and hand over the sovereignty of the Earth to Dharmaraja Yudhishtira. Make peace with the Pandavas before Arjuna's astras like thunderbolts enter your body. Before the noble Parthas kill your hundred brothers and wrest the Earth from you by force, make peace with the Pandavas. Before king Yudhishtira is truly enraged, and Krishna, who delights in battle, also, make peace with the sons of Pandu.

Before the Mahabaho Bhima blasts his terrible way through our vast army and seizes your brothers like a lion seizes lambs, Dusasana, make peace with the Pandavas.

Bhishma once said to your brother Duryodhana, 'The Pandavas are unconquerable in war, so make peace with them.'

Your evil brother did not listen to him. So now set your heart firmly on war and fight the Pandavas with all your might, fearless for your life. Go, coward, fly to where Satyaki is. Without you, O Bhaarata, this host will melt away. For your own sake, fly and fight the indomitable Satyaki."

Thus addressed by Drona, your son Dusasana, his heart burning with shame, says not a word in reply, feigning not to have heard him. However, taking a large force of brave Mlecchas with him, Dusasana rides at Satyaki, burning like the yuga-fire on Kurukshetra, and engages him in a pitched battle. Heartened by this, Drona turns back to attack the Pandavas and the Panchalas again.

Loudly announcing himself, that he is the great and invincible Drona, son of Bharadwaja, he plunged straight into the midst of the enemy, and begins to decimate their forces, killing thousands and thousands of fighting men. He brings another dreadful carnage to the Pandavas, the Panchalas, and the Matsyas.

The illustrious Viraketu, another son of Drupada, faces Drona boldly and strikes the Brahmana with five sizzling barbs, sticks another deep into his flagstaff and rakes his sarathy with another seven. It is an amazing sight, Rajan, to watch Drona exert himself vigorously and yet not be able to approach, let alone vanquish that Panchala prince!

The other Panchalas swoop down to surround the beleaguered Acharya, and they lash him with dense smoking gusts of fiery shafts, with whistling spears flung from all around and other powerful missiles. Cutting all these down with his own banks of astras, like the wind driving away masses of clouds in the sky, Drona is magnificent. Then he looses an astra blazing like Surya or Agni at Viraketu; the shafts of fire flames its way right through that prince and burns into the ground behind him, simmering blood. Viraketu falls dead from his ratha like a champaka tree uprooted by the wind.

The Panchalas all rush in rage at Drona—Chitraketu, Sudhanwan, Chitravarman and Chitraratha, covering him with a wrath of arrows to avenge their slain brother. Struck from all sides by these royal maharathas, the Brahmana bull summons all his energy and anger.

Drona rakes them with a hurricane of fire from his bow drawn into a circle, and they are dazed and have no reply to this awesome onslaught. Then the angry Brahmana, his lips curled in a grim smile, kills their horses and charioteers, he shatters their rathas; and before they even realise what is happening, with his favourite crescent-headed arrows he plucks their handsome heads from their throats like flowers from their stems. The Panchala princes fall out of their chariots even like the Danavas of old during the Devasura yuddha.

Roaring, Drona raises his golden-backed bow high and shakes it in triumph. He has killed five sons of his great enemy Drupada.

An anguished Dhrishtadyumna sheds tears for his brothers, who were like gods among the Panchalas; losing all control of himself, he wildly attacks Drona. So violent is the assault that a great and fearful cry goes up from your troops, for they are certain that the fire-prince, the Pandava Senapati, will have the Brahmana's life.

But Drona, smiling all the while, continues to battle, triumphant and unperturbed. Blood leaping into his eyes, Dhrishtadyumna drills a rash of terrific shafts into Drona's chest and the Acharya faints in his ratha. Seeing him swooned, Dhrishtadyumna flings down his bow and, seizing up a sword, leaps off his own chariot and running forward mounts Drona's ratha, intent on having the Brahmana's head for his trophy.

Meanwhile, Drona regains his senses, snatches up his bow and unleashes a scathing volley of special short barbs meant just for such a duel at close range at Dhrishtadyumna, wounding him deep and sharply. Dhrishtadyumna finding himself thwarted, jumps down again from Drona's chariot, runs back to his own, and again picking up a great bow once more covers Drona with savage fire.

The two duel like Indra and Prahlada once did for the sovereignty of the three worlds. Their chariots wheel and flash everywhere and torrents of arrows issue from both, cover earth, sky and all the directions, and also drawing copious blood from each other. Watching, the rest of the greatest Kshatriyas, O Rajan, and all the other warriors as well marvel at the unworldly skills of the two.

The hopeful Panchalas exclaim, "Drona fights Dhrishtadyumna who was born to kill him. The Brahmana's end is here!"

But then, like a man plucking a ripe fruit from a tree, Drona takes the head of Dhrishtadyumna's charioteer from his neck with a crescent-tipped shaft; the Panchala's horses bolt, leaving Drona to annihilate the Panchalas and the Srinjayas. After slaughtering so many of these, Drona resumes his lordly station at the heart of his own vyuha. And the Pandavas, my lord, do not venture to challenge him.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Meanwhile, Rajan, Dusasana attacks Satyaki with some vehemence. He strikes the Vrishni first with sixty arrows and then with sixteen, but fails to shake the shura who stands immovable as the Mainaka mountain. Leading a large group of rathas from various kingdoms, Dusasana fills the field with his roars deep as rumbling clouds.

Seeing the Kaurava come to battle, the mighty Satyaki flashes straight at him, covering him with arrows. Those in the van of Dusasana army all flee in terror and only your son, Rajan, remains and faces the irradiant Vrishni hero fearlessly. He pierces Satyaki's horses with aggressive shafts, his charioteer with three, and Satyaki himself with a hundred and roars yet again, challengingly. An incensed Satyaki quickly shrouds Dusasana's ratha, sarathy, banner and your son himself in a cloud of shafts, making him invisible. Yuyudhana is like a spider entangling an insect in its web.

Watching this, Duryodhana despatches a legion of Trigartas at Satyaki's ratha to bolster Dusasana. Three thousand fierce Trigarta maharathas, seasoned warriors all, surround Satyaki with their chariots, resolved to engage him and vowing not to retreat. In a trice Satyaki shoots down five hundred of their leading warriors. They fall from their rathas like tall trees from mountaintops, uprooted by a tempest.

O Rajan, Kurukshetra, strewn with mangled elephants, dead horses decked in trappings of gold and torn to shreds by Satyaki's arrows, weltering in blood and littered with fallen standards, presents a striking appearance, like a ghastly garden overgrown with flowering kinsukas. Slaughtered by Satyaki, your soldiers can find no refuge; they are as elephants sunk in mire. And all of them turn back in haste towards Drona's ratha, like mighty snakes making for their holes from fear of the hunting prince of birds. After killing those five hundred, Satyaki again makes his majestic way towards Arjuna.

As he goes, Dusasana strikes him with nine fine shafts. Turning, Satyaki pierces Dusasana with five golden-winged vulture-feathered arrows. Dusasana, smiling, shoots back three bolts, followed by another five, to which Satyaki replies with five of his own that smash your son's bow in his hands; and a smiling Yuyudhana rides on towards Arjuna. An incensed Dusasana hurls an iron spear, which Satyaki destroys with kanka-feathered shafts.

Rajan, your son takes up another bow, rakes Satyaki with a clutch of arrows and gives a lion's roar. Satyaki, aroused, turns back and plunges five arrows that burst into flames, and then eight more thick iron shafts. Dusasana, bestirred by Drona's censure, heroically lacerates the Yadava with twenty stinging shafts.

Yuyudhana, roaring now, finds Dusasana's chest with three vicious barbs; next moment, he kills Satyaki's horses. With another broad-headed arrow he cleaves your son's bow, and with five more slim missiles, shreds his leather gauntlet. Satyaki, master of weapons, severs Dusasana's standard and the wooden shafts of his chariot and kills both his Parshni charioteers in crimson eruptions.

Left without a bow, a ratha, horses and charioteer, Dusasana is rescued by the lord of the Trigartas on his ratha. O Bhaarata, Satyaki pursues him briefly and has him at his mercy, but does not kill him for he remembers the vow that Bhima swore in the Kuru sabha that he would kill all hundred of your sons. Thus, having vanquished and shamed Dusasana, Satyaki again courses ahead in Arjuna's trail.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, are there no mighty maharathas in my army who can stop or defy Satyaki as he scythes his way towards Arjuna? Why, the Yadava's exploits are like those of Indra himself when he fought the Danavas! Perhaps, the path Satyaki rode was not defended? But no, the truth is that he has superior prowess and skills and by himself annihilates countless of our warriors. Tell me how this grandson of Sini, all alone, cleaves through the vast force facing him?'

Sanjaya replies, 'Rajan, the fierce effort and the uproar of your army, which teems with numberless chariots, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers, resembles what one sees at the end of the yuga. When your army assembles daily, it seems to me that one has never seen another such a vast gathering of men and beasts on Earth. The Devas and the Charanas who watch from above say, "This muster will be the last of its kind on Bhumi."

Truly, never has such a vyuha been formed in the past as the one that Drona has on this day of Jayadratha's killing. The din made by the vast multitude of soldiers meeting each other in battle is no less than that of the ocean lashed into fury by the tempest. In your host, as well as that of the Pandavas, are hundreds of thousands of kings. The sound these inflamed heroes of fierce deeds make while battling each other is hair-raising.

Now Bhimasena, Dhrishtadyumna, Nakula, Sahadeva and Dharmaraja Yudhishtira all cry variously, "Forward! Charge! Strike! For Krishna and Arjuna have broken into the enemy army! Do whatever we must so that they easily find Jayadratha's ratha."

Dhrishtadyumna says, "If Satyaki and Arjuna are killed, the Kurus will achieve their objective and we will be defeated. All of you unite quickly and agitate their oceanic army, like impetuous winds stirring the very deep."

And responding to their great commanders' call, the Pandava warriors surge forward in tide and, heedless of their own lives, smother the Kauravas. All of them are not merely prepared but even eager to die for their friends and lords, at either the point or the edge of the sword, expecting swarga as a reward. So also, do your warriors too crave fame and stand ready, determined to fight to the end, to kill or be killed.

In the midst of this fierce and horrible battle, Satyaki, after besting all his opponents, drives on towards Arjuna. The glare of the sun reflects from the bright armour of the warriors and dazzles all the combatants. Duryodhana, too, Rajan, pierces the mighty army of the noble Pandavas and fights dreadfully there, bringing great and dire butchery with him."

Dhritarashtra asks, 'Duryodhana must be hard-pressed while fighting the Pandava army. I hope he does not turn his back on the battle, O Suta! The contention between him and the Pandava army seems to me to be a most unequal one. Besides, Duryodhana has been raised in great luxury, in wealth and possessions and now he is a king of men. Encountering so many alone, I truly hope he does not turn back from the fight.'

Sanjaya replies, 'Listen to me, Rajan, as I describe your son's wonderful feats. Duryodhana agitates the Pandava army like an elephant stirring a bank of lotus-stalks in a lake. Seeing their forces being mown down at will by your son, the Panchalas led by Bhimasena rush at him. Duryodhana pierces Bhimasena with ten arrows, each of the twins with three, Yudhishtira with seven, Virata and Drupada with six, Sikhandin with a hundred, Dhrishtadyumna with twenty arrows and he strikes each of the five sons of Draupadi with three.

With his astras, meanwhile, he slaughters hundreds of lesser warriors, and elephants and many other maharathas, too, like an angry Yama. His bow appears to be drawn to a circle, whether while aiming or loosing his shafts. Indeed, his formidable bow, inlaid with gold, is always seen as a circle, while he destroys his enemies with it.

Then, Yudhishtira, with a brace of broad-tipped arrows, rives your son's bow and with another ten exceptional shafts strikes your son lustily. However, on touching Duryodhana's armour, Yudhishtira's arrows shatter into dust. The Parthas, filled with delight, surround Yudhishtira, like the Devas and the great Rishis in olden days surrounding Sakra when he killed Vritra. Taking up another bow, your son roars at Yudhishtira, "Stop and fight me!" and attacks him.

Seeing Duryodhana charge headlong at Yudhishtira, the Panchalas, hope of victory surging in their hearts, eagerly rush forward to meet his charge. However, Drona intercepts the onrushing Panchalas, like a mountain looming in the path of a mass of wind driven, rain-charged clouds. Brutal, O king, the ensuing bloodletting, why, like the sport of Rudra at the end of the Yuga.

Then, above every other sound in the general bedlam, there arises a spine-chilling uproar from where Arjuna is fighting.

Thus, O Mahabaho, the battle develops between Arjuna and your archers, the contention between Satyaki and your men at the heart of your army, and thus continues the bloodshed between Drona and his antagonists at the lip of his vyuha. Thus, indeed, O lord of the world, the carnage on this Earth continues, with Arjuna and Drona and Satyaki, all afire.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Beyond noon, O Rajan, another dreadful battle, marked by roars and bellows, deep as those of thunderheads, ensues between Drona and the Somakas. Drona, keened for a bloodbath, advances against the Pandavas. The pot-born magnificent son of Bharadwaja, always serving your cause, cuts down many leading enemy warriors, why, even as if he sports in battle.

Then the mighty maharatha of the Kaikeyas, irresistible Brihadkshatra, the eldest of five brothers, challenges him. Like a great cloud mass emptying itself over Gandhamadana, he lashes torrents of arrows down on Drona. Drona looses five and ten stone-whetted, golden-winged barbs at Brihadkshatra but the Kekaya prince shatter them all in flight. Drona, the Brahmana bull shoots eight whistling shafts at him; these, too, Brihadkshatra cuts down.

Your troops are filled with amazement at the prince's feat. Applauding Brihadkshatra himself, Drona invokes the Brahmastra and looses that celestial ayudha at the Kekaya prince, who, quicker than thinking, extinguishes it with a Brahmastra of his own. Immediately, he strikes the surprised Acharya with a terrific volley of sixty glittering shafts. Drona, provoked, unleashes a formidable missile at his adversary, a bolt of lightning that plunges through Brihadkshatra's armour, his body and flies on like a black cobra, hissing into the earth behind him.

Pain screaming through his every nerve, filled with rage and rolling his handsome eyes, Brihadkshatra drills Drona with seventy arrows; with another, he gores the Brahmana's sarathy through his very vitals. Lifting his archery, Drona now shoots so ferociously at the Kekaya prince that Brihadkshatra staggers in his chariot, his limbs turning weak.

In a flash, Drona kills his horses, his sarathy, cuts down that brave prince's standard and regal chatra. And then, as Brihadkshatra stands helpless, shocked by the raging Brahmana's tirade, Drona serenely blows his heart to shreds with another perfect arrow and that radiant hero falls dead.

Seeing Brihadkshatra die, Dhrishtaketu, son of the Kaikeya maharatha Sisupala whom Krishna killed at Yudhishtira's Rajasuya yagna, cries to his charioteer, "Suta, take me to where Drona stands, slaughtering the Kaikeya and the Panchala hosts!"

His charioteer turns his fleet of Kamboja horses towards Drona, and Dhrishtaketu, king of the Chedis, swelling with fury and prowess, flies at the dreadful Brahmana, like an insect towards a blazing fire to be consumed. And like a man rousing a tiger from sleep, he rakes Drona, his red chargers, his ratha and standard first with a burst of sixty shafts and again with many others. Drona the tiger responds with a razor-faced arrow winged with vulture feathers, neatly bisecting Dhrishtaketu's bow. The Chedi picks up another bow and draws blood from Drona with a flurry of shafts winged with the shiny feathers of kankas and peacocks.

Drona kills Dhrishtaketu's noble horses, strikes off his sarathy's head and wounds him direly with another five and twenty robust arrows. Dhrishtaketu jumps down from his ratha with a mace and hurls it at Drona like an angry naga. Seeing the heavy gada, hard as adamant and inlaid with gold, fly towards him like Death, Drona smashes it to dust with a thousands shafts loosed in the heart of an instant; the earth echoes with the report of that weapon being blown apart.

Now the wrathful and fearless Dhrishtaketu hurls a spear embellished with gold at the Brahmana. Drona slices the lance into slivers with five breathtaking shafts; and it falls onto the ground like a serpent mangled by Garuda. Not pausing, Drona looses another keen barb that cleaves the Chedi king's kavacha, his muscled chest and dives into the earth behind him like a swan into a lake overgrown with lotuses. And Sisupala's son keels over, dead. As a hungry blue jay seizes and devours a little insect so does Drona take the life of Dhrishtaketu.

When Dhrishtaketu dies, his enraged son, a considerable warrior himself, attacks Drona. Him Drona smilingly despatches to Yamaloka, like a great tiger in the deep vana killing a fawn.

While the Pandavas, O Bhaarata, are thus being thinned, the heroic son of Jarasandha charges Drona and covers the Acharya with such an opacity of arrows that the Brahmana is briefly invisible, like the sun hidden by black clouds. Then Drona, the scourge of the Kshatriyas, looses a hundred thousand deadly shafts at the gifted prince and kills him in the very sight of all the other great archers.

Truly, Drona is like Yama the Destroyer, jaws agape, swallowing every warrior who dares confront him. Once again roaring out his own name and his lineage in ringing proclamation and challenge, the Brahmana who has abandoned is swadharma and is far more terrible than any Kshatriya, swathes the Pandava host with millions of arrows. Each of these is engraved with his name and they massacre men, elephants and horses in thousands like the Asuras were once slain by Sakra; the Panchalas begin to tremble like a herd of cattle beset with winter's cold.

Indeed, an awful bewailing arises from the terrified Panchalas, scorched by the sun above and made ashes by Drona below. Benumbed by Drona, the greatest Panchala maharathas feel like men whose thighs have been seized by makaras.

Then, Rajan, the Chedis, the Srinjayas, the Kasis and the Kosalas band together and, with great heart attack Drona all together, roaring to one another to embolden themselves, "Drona is slain! Drona is dead!"

These Naravyaghras fall upon the illustrious Drona, bent on sending the fulminant Brahmana to Yama. But the implacable Drona annihilates those brave warriors, especially the greatest ones among the Chedis; and, struck brutally by Drona's shafts, the Panchalas quail.

They call loudly to Bhimasena and Dhrishtadyumna, crying, "This Brahmana has performed the most terrible tapasya and acquired great punya, for now, inflamed by rage, he consumes the greatest Kshatriyas. A Kshatriya's dharma is battle; a Brahmana's, mahatapasya. A Brahmana galvanized by tapasya and gyana can make ashes of anything with just his angry gaze. Here countless great Kshatriyas, O Bhaarata, have been blasted by the fire of Drona's astras. The illustrious Drona has abandoned all restraint and devours our troops as he pleases, while none can stand before him."

At this, Kshatradharman, Dhrishtadyumna's mighty son, severs Drona's bow in his hands with a crescent-tipped shaft such as the Acharya himself favours. Drona, bane of the Kshatriyas, is further incensed, and takes up another bright bow and in a blur transfixes Kshatradharman to his flagstaff with an arrow through his heart.

Now the Pandava troops quake with fear. The redoubtable Chekitana falls upon Drona and bloodies his torso with ten fulvid arrows; he pierces Drona's charioteer with four shafts and his chestnut horses with another four. The Acharya ablaze pierces Chekitana's right arm with sixteen arrows, his standard with another sixteen, and his charioteer with seven. With his charioteer killed, Chekitana's horses bolt, dragging his chariot with them, and filling the Panchalas and the Pandavas with more panic yet. And dominating, resplendent, terrifying Drona routs the united forces of the Panchalas and the Srinjayas all around him. Ah, Raja, he is beyond being merely magnificent.

The venerable Drona, full five and eighty years of age, dark in complexion and with pure white hair, dashes all over the battlefield like a youth of sixteen. Rajan, his enemies look upon him as none else than Vajradhari Indra himself come to hunt them.

Then the mighty-armed and intelligent Drupada says, "This vile and dreadful Brahmana is killing noble Kshatriyas like a hungry tiger killing small animals. The sinful Duryodhana will surely find the most vicious hell for himself in the next world. It is through his greed that countless great Kshatriyas lie dead the field like mangled bulls, weltering in their own blood and becoming food for dogs and jackals."

Saying this, O Rajan, Drupada, the lord of an akshauhini, sets the Parthas at its head, and rides with great speed towards Drona.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'When the Pandava army is set upon from all sides, the Parthas, the Panchalas and the Somakas retreat to a great distance. O Bhaarata, during this harrowing battle, reminiscent of the pralaya at yuga's end, Drona, straddling the field, repeatedly roars, shaking earth and sky and continues to obliterate the Panchalas and the Pandavas.

And when Yudhishtira can find no succour in his extreme distress, he begins to wonder how the war can ever be won as long as the Brahmana, his old Acharya, is alive. Looking around him desperately for Arjuna, Yudhishtira sees neither him nor Krishna. Not finding the Naravyaghra who flies Hanuman on his banner and not hearing the twang of the Gandiva, and not seeing Satyaki anywhere either, the Dharmaraja loses all peace of mind.

Yudhishtira, fearing the world's censure, begins to think of Satyaki. "I sent the brilliant Satyaki, dispeller of the fears of friends, to follow Arjuna. Earlier I had only one source of anxiety, but now I have two. I should have some tidings of both Satyaki and Dhananjaya by now. Having sent Satyaki to follow Arjuna, whom can I now send to follow Satyaki? If I try to find intelligence only of my brother without enquiring after Satyaki, the world will reproach me. They will say, 'Yudhishtira Dharmaputra seeks only his brother and leaves Satyaki of Vrishni's vamsa, the hero of unfailing prowess, to his fate!'

Fearing as I do the reproach of the world, I will send Bhimasena to find the noble Yuyudhana. The love I bear for the invincible Satwata is no less than the love I have for Arjuna, the Parantapa. Ah, I fear I have set the delighter of the Sinis a task more difficult than he can accomplish on his own. Yet, either at a friend's request or for honour, he has pierced deep into the Bharata army like a great Makara into the ocean. Loud is the outcry I hear from enemy heroes, fighting together against him. They appear to be too many for him and I must think quickly of rescuing him.

Bhimasena should go to the two mighty maharathas. There is nothing on earth that Vrikodara cannot face and if he fights with resolve, he is a match for all the archers in the world and with the might of his arms he can stand by himself against all his enemies. It is relying on the strength of arms of noble Bhima in the wilds that we returned from our exile and have never been vanquished in battle.

If Bhimasena joins Satyaki, both Satyaki and Arjuna will find great and real support, and I will be anxious for them anymore. Both of them are masters of weapons and Krishna protects them both. Yet, I will allay my own anxiety and send Bhima after Arjuna and Satyaki. No one can then accuse me of being carless of Yuyudhana's life."

Making up his mind, Yudhishtira tells his charioteer, "Drive me to Bhima."

His sarathy does as he is told. Typically, once he sees Bhima before him, Yudhishtira is filled with remorse, and begins to press Bhima with diverse solicitations. Finally he says, "O Bhima, I do not see Arjuna's standard—he who on a single ratha vanquished all the Devas, the Gandharvas and Asuras!"

Bhimasena replies, "Never before have I seen or heard you so agitated. Indeed, in the past, when we were stricken with grief, it was you who were our comforter. O King of kings, stop your prevarication and command me what I should do, for there is nothing that I cannot do for you. O Kurusathama! Do not be unhappy."

Then, with a sorrowful face and his eyes bathed in tears, and sighing like a cobra, Yudhishtira says to Bhimasena, "We hear the repeated blasts on Panchajanya that Krishna wrathfully blows. Ah, I fear they are telling us that your brother Arjuna lies dead on the field and that Krishna is fighting.

Our Arjuna, to whom we always turn when in trouble even as the Devas to thousand-eyed Indra, has fought his way deep into the Kuru army on his quest for Jayadratha. I know this, my Bhima, but he has not returned.

Dark in complexion, youthful in years, with wavy locks, exceedingly handsome, broad of chest and with long arms, with the tread of an angry elephant, with eyes like chakras the colour of burnished copper, the mightiest maharatha, this brother of yours, Arjuna, always terrifies his enemies. This is the cause of my grief, Parantapa! My pain increases like a fire fed with libations of ghee, because of Arjuna, as well as for Satyaki. I am dazed with sorrow for I do not see his banner emblazoned with great Hanuman.

Oh, I have no doubt that he has been killed and that it is Krishna who now fights. Know also, Bhima, that I fear that the other tiger among men, the mighty Satyaki, is also slain. Alas! Satyaki followed in the wake of Arjuna out of his great love. Without seeing Satyaki, too, I am benumbed by grief.

O Kaunteya, if you think it your dharma to obey me, you must rush to Arjuna and Satyaki. O you who know dharma well, remember that I am your eldest brother. You should consider Satyaki dearer to you than Arjuna himself. Satyaki went forth after Arjuna for my sake, following a trail that only the noblest men can tread. Now you must follow after Yuyudhana and upon finding the two Krishnas and Satyaki of the Satwata vamsa, safe, send me a message, O son of Pandu, beloved Bhima, by giving a loud roar."

Bhima replies, "The two Krishnas have gone in the ratha which once carried Brahma, Isana, Indra and Varuna to battle, so they can be in no danger. However, to obey your command, my brother, look, I too ride after them! Do not be anxious. As soon as I meet those Naravyaghras, I will send you the message you want with a roar of joy.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhima prepares to set out and repeatedly entrusts Yudhishtira's care to Dhrishtadyumna and other friends, saying, "You know how Drona is always looking to seize Yudhishtira by any means. Indeed, O son of Drupada, I should never set my riding out to help Arjuna and Satyaki above my duty to protect the king. But because he has himself commanded me to go, I cannot disobey him. I will go where Jayadratha, the wretched king of the Sindhus waits in the suchimukha vyuha, at the point of death. In truth, I should only do what Arjuna and Satyaki asked me to, and remain here beside Yudhishtira. But, my dearest friend Dhrishtadyumna, I am helpless and entrust my brother's care to you. You must protect him at any cost. Of all tasks, this is your highest duty today."

To this, Dhrishtadyumna replies, "I will do as you wish. Go, O son of Kunti, without anxiety of any kind. Without killing me, Drona will never harm or take Yudhishtira. And Drona fears me more than any other warrior for he knows that his death is written at my hands."

Thus entrusting Yudhishtira to Dhrishtadyumna and saluting his elder brother, Bhimasena rides forth in search of Arjuna. Before he leaves, Yudhishtira embraces Bhimasena and sniffs his head affectionately and blesses him, for it is well known that Bhima has always been his favourite brother. After worshipping a number of Brahmanas, circumambulating them in pradakshina; after gratifying them with many gifts; after touching the eight kinds of auspicious articles and drinking potent kairataka honey, Bhimasena, the shura of all shuras, the corners of whose eyes have turned red with intoxication, feels that his natural, boundless strength has doubled.

The Brahmanas perform propitiatory ceremonies for him, various omens indicating success greet him; and seeing all this, he already feels the delight of anticipated victory. Favourable winds begin to blow to predict his success. Then, Mahabaho Bhimasena, foremost of maharathas, strongest man on earth, decked with earrings and angadas, and his hands cased in leather gauntlets, mounts his excellent ratha. His priceless armour made of black steel inlaid with gold, looks like a cloud charged with lightning. Yellow, red, black and white robes gracefully cover his great body. Also wearing a coloured cuirass that protects his neck, Bhimasena is as resplendent as a cloud ornamented with a rainbow.

Just as Bhimasena is on the point of setting out, we hear the fierce blasts of Panchajanya again, which can fill the three worlds with fear. Yudhishtira says to Bhima, "The Vrishni hero blows his conch again and fills the earth and sky with its thunder. Surely, Arjuna has fallen and Krishna now fights the Kurus. I am certain that Kunti, Draupadi and Subhadra, with their relatives and friends, have all seen inauspicious omens today. So fly to Arjuna, my brother, for all the world seems empty to my eyes that long to see Dhananjaya and Satyaki."

Bhima puts on his leather gloves, takes up his bow, calls for the drums to be beaten, blows his conch with great force and roaring like ten lions, pulls on his bowstring, shaking the field and making his enemies' hearts tremble. Assuming a dreadful form, he rides out in his great chariot yoked to horses of the finest breed, gifted with the speed of the wind or thought, their reins held by Visoka and whinnying furiously as they dash ahead into the fray.

Losing a gale of arrows, powerful as his father the Wind, be quickly begins to raze the enemy vyuha, while the valiant Panchalas and the Somakas follow him, like the Devas following Maghavat.

The brothers Dusasana, Chitrasena, Kundabhedin, Vivimsati, Durmukha, Duhsaha, Sala, Vinda, Anuvinda, Sumukha, Dirghabahu, Sudarshana, Suhasta, Sushena, Dirghalochana, Abhaya, Raudrakarman, Suvarman and Durvimochana surround him and these resplendent shuras attack him with their troops. Bhima is at them with the wild imperiousness of a lion hunting herds of deer. They loose devastras and other incandescent arrows that cover him like clouds shrouding the sun.

Blasting them out of his way, truly like some towering gale of his father Vayu, Bhima attacks Drona's elephant-force and covers them with fire. In no time, the Vayuputra demolishes that division and those that remain alive bolt in all directions. Like animals in the forest terrified at the roar of a Sarabha, the elephants all run, with frightful cries. Racing along, Bhima comes upon Drona's main host.

The Acharya checks his advance, like the continent resisting the surging sea and, smiling, strikes Bhimasena on his forehead with a shaft whereupon he looks like the sun with his rays streaming up. Drona thinks that Bhima will show him reverence as Arjuna had, and says to him, "Mighty Bhimasena, you cannot enter my vyuha without vanquishing me! Krishna, with your brother, went into my army with my consent, but you will never succeed."

Bhima, enraged, his eyes the colour of blood, red or burnished copper, replies roughly, "O wretch of a Brahmana, it cannot be that Arjuna entered this host with your consent. He is invisible and can break into an army commanded by Sakra himself. If he offered you reverence, it was only because he respects you. But know, O Drona, that I am not compassionate like Arjuna. I am Bhimasena your enemy.

We regarded you as our father, Acharya, and ourselves as your sons and so we were always humble before you. However, when you speak to us as you do today, and fight us with devastras, all that is a thing of the past. You regard yourself as our enemy, so let it be as you wish. I am Bhima and I will now show you the force of my enmity!"

And Bhima whirls a great mace, like Yama himself twirling his danda, and hurls it at Drona like lightning. Drona leaps out of his chariot in the nick of time and Bhima's massive gada shatters the Brahmana's ratha, killing his horses and sarathy in an explosion of wood and blood. Then Bhima destroys countless Kuru warriors, truly like a tempest felling trees. Your sons once more surround him while Drona, mounting another chariot, returns to the mouth of his vyuha and remains there, recovering himself, waiting for Bhima to come to him again.

The infuriated Bhima covers the chariot-division before him with showers of arrows, with force not yet seen on the field. Your sons, the maharathas, fight back manfully. Dusasana casts an iron spear at his cousin; Bhima divides it neatly, marvellously along its length as it flies towards him. With three immaculate shafts he kills your sons Kundabhedin, Sushena and Dirghanetra; he beheads your heroic son Vrindaraka, pride of the Kurus. He next despatches your sons Abhaya, Raudrakarman and Durvimochana.

Your other princes then surround Bhima, and shower fulminations of arrows over him, like lashing rain upon the mountain breast at summer's end. And like the mountain does Bhima receive those heavy salvos. Bhima feels no pain and smiling awfully sends your sons Vinda, Anuvinda and Suvarman to Yama. He does not pause and blows your son Sudarshana's chest apart, killing him instantly.

The titanic Pandava trains his wrath on the rathas of your army, and within moments overwhelms them with his fury and they flee in all directions. Like a herd of frightened deer, your sons terrified by Bhimasena, all turn and flee from their dreadful cousin. He, however, goes coursing after their vast legion and careening everywhere as he belabours your warriors from every side. Your best soldiers spur their horses, as swiftly as they can go, away from the force of nature that is Bhima come hunting them.

Stupendous Bhimasena gives roar after shattering roar, slaps his armpits like peals of thunder, further deranging your rathikas, and flares on towards Drona's main vyuha, trampling over the corpses with which he has scattered the field.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After Bhima mows down the chariot-division, Drona, smiling, shrouds him in a downpour of arrows to stop his furious progress. However, Bhimasena confounds your army with his powers of maya and absorbs the Acharya's fusillade, while your sons attack him again. Inspired by your princes, many kings, all great archers, rush to surround him.

Bhima grins fearsomely, gives a great roar and casts a mace at them like a thunderflash, like Indra's very Vajra. Blazing with splendour, emitting streaks of lightning, that mace fills the whole world with a deafening sound and overwhelms your soldiers. It terrifies your sons and your other warriors flee again in alarm, with loud cries. Many foot-soldiers fall where they stand at the unbearable sound made by the fierce gada; many maharathas fall out of their chariots.

The occult and magical mace flies everywhere, killing hundreds; it flies back into Bhima's hands and he casts it, again and again. Slaughtered by Bhimasena's great gada, once given him by Mayaa Danava, all your warriors run away in fear, like deer attacked by a monstrous tiger. The colossal Bhima demolishes the enemy, blasting his way through their ranks in a furrow of blood. He tears his way through your army like Garuda of the beautiful feathers.

Rajan, while Bhimasena, the great leader of chariot-divisions, brings bloody carnage to your troops, Drona rushes at him again and stops him still with a supernatural volley of shining arrows; Bharadwaja's son roars in triumph and fear seizes the Pandavas. Yet another feverish duel develops between Drona and Bhima, this one also like the Devasura yuddha of yore.

Drona's luciferous astras consume brave Pandava warriors, thousands of them. Losing all control of himself, with a roar like none heard before during this war, Bhima shuts his eyes, leaps down from his chariot and runs straight at Drona's ratha, ignoring all the arrows that pierce him on his mad way like a massive bull might the rain that falls upon him.

Staggering Bhima seizes Drona's ratha by the shaft, and lifts it above his head and flings it down smashing it into shards. However, Drona nimbly jumps out of his chariot just before Bhima seizes it, and running with some celerity, quickly mounts another chariot and with his sarathy whipping his horses to great speed, the Acharya retreats, mildly dazed by Bhima, to defend the entrance to his vyuha again. Who has ever thought of a feat like the one Bhima performs, let alone seen such a thing?

Bhima quickly remounts his ratha and once more advances imperiously towards your son's army, defying all the enemy warriors like a mountain a surging sea. As he forges on, he destroys the Kshatriyas before him like a tornado uprooting rows of trees.

Bhimasena now erupts on the Bhoja troops led by Kritavarman, and flattens them. He affrights them with the very sound of clapping his huge hands; he overwhelms them like a tiger a herd of cattle. Blasting through the Bhoja division, with blood spraying all around him as he goes, and through the Kambojas as well as countless tribes of Mlecchas, he sees some way ahead of him the splendid Satyaki, fighting like an army by himself! Bhimasena flashes on relentlessly, anxious now to catch sight of Arjuna.

After he effortlessly blows his way through all your warriors, in scarcely any time at all, the gale that is Bhimasena finally sights Arjuna, fighting fervidly to reach and kill Jayadratha. And seeing his brother, Bhima gives the roar that Yudhishtira wanted of him; he roars and roars as the greatest thunderheads do during the monsoon, exhilarating his own forces and making his enemies' blood run cold.

At the heart of the raging battle, Arjuna and Krishna hear those awesome roars, and they reply with roars of their own, elated and eager to lay eyes on Vrikodara. Then, they resume their hot charge to discover Jayadratha, for their time is short. Far away, Yudhishtira clearly hears Bhima's roars and then in delight he hears Arjuna and Krishna roaring as well. In a moment, all Yudhishtira's anxiety leaves him and, a smile wreathing his noble face, he repeatedly prays for Dhananjaya's success.

While Bhima continues to bellow out his roars, to make certain that his brother has heard him above the bedlam of the war, Yudhishtira happily says to himself, "Bhima my brother, you have indeed sent me the message I asked for. You have indeed fulfilled the wish of your brother. Those who have you for their enemy can never be victorious!

It is our great good fortune that Arjuna Savyasachin is still alive and the heroic Satyaki as well.

It is my great good fortune that I hear both Vasudeva and Dhananjaya roaring as they do. Arjuna, who vanquished Sakra himself in battle and gratified Agni in the Khandava vana, still lives and my hope surges high within me again that we shall yet win this horrible war.

A benign providence has kept Arjuna Parantapa, on whose might we rely, alive.

Truly, it is kindly fate smiling on our cause that Partha, who vanquished the Nivatakavachas, whom the gods themselves could not kill, still lives.

It is through good fortune that Dhananjaya, who crushed all the Kauravas come to seize Virata's kine outside the Matsya king's city, still lives.

Ah, the Partha who slew fourteen thousand Kalakeyas, still lives—through sheer good fortune and against all likelihood.

It is because of great destiny that the Vijaya, who for Duryodhana's sake vanquished Chitraratha, the Gandharva king in the forest, still lives.

Only providence has kept my Arjuna, always dear to me, who wears the kirita and golden garlands, who is Swetavahana of the white steeds, with Krishna himself for his sarathy, alive.

Ah, I am still anxious. Will Arjuna, burning with grief over the death of his son, succeed in his most difficult mission to kill Jayadratha? After he fulfills his vow, protected by Vasudeva, will I see Arjuna again before the sun sets?

Will the killing of Jayadratha, who is devoted to Duryodhana, break our enemies' spirit? Will they make peace with us when Jayadratha dies? Seeing his brothers all killed by Bhimasena, will he make peace with us? Seeing other great warriors lying prone on the ground in the piquant postures of death, will the dark-hearted and obdurate Suyodhana give way to remorse? Will our enmity not cease with the single sacrifice of Bhishma? Will Duryodhana make peace with us to save the remnants of what is still left to him and us?"

Diverse reflections of this kind pass through the mind of Yudhishtira, who is overwhelmed with compassion. Meanwhile, the war between the Pandavas and the Kauravas continues to rage.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'While mighty Bhimasena roars repeatedly and loud as thunder, which of our heroes surround him? I do not know of a warrior in the three worlds, Sanjaya, who can face an angry Bhimasena armed with a gada and resembling Death himself. Not even Sakra himself can stand against our Bhima, who can destroy a ratha with a ratha and an elephant with an elephant.

Who among those devoted to Duryodhana dares to do battle with an incensed Bhimasena, ardently engaged in slaughtering my sons, like a forest fire consuming dry leaves and grass? Who are they that encircle Bhima after seeing him slay my sons one after another like Yama himself? I do not fear Arjuna, Krishna, Satyaki or the fire-born Dhrishtadyumna as much as I do Bhima. Tell me, O Sanjaya, who are the heroes that attack the conflagration that is Bhima, who devours my sons?'

Sanjaya says, 'While maharatha Bhimasena roars and roars, the great Karna cannot bear it and rushes at him with a shout. Karna bends his bow forcefully, reveals his vehement prowess, and stops Bhima's rampage like a lone great tree withstanding a hurricane. And Bhima, finding Vikartana's son before him, flares up in wrath and charges at him, unleashing a thick torrent of arrows at the Sutaputra.

Karna serenely faces all these thunderbolts and shoots as many back at Bhima. All the other warriors, maharathas and horsemen, tremble when they hear the resounding twanging of the bowstrings of those two. Indeed, to all the great Kshatriyas there the dreadful bellowing of Bhimasena seems to fill all the earth and the sky, so both quake with it. All around him, bows clasped in the hands of warriors drop from their hands turned weak by the Pandava's terrific yells and roars. And horses and elephants, O Rajan, spray urine and dung in fear.

Various fearsome evil omens make their appearance. The sky swarms with dark flights of vultures and kankas during the remarkable duel between Bhima and Karna. Then Karna strikes Bhima with twenty arrows and quickly pierces his charioteer also with five. Mighty Bhima, with a smile, looses four and sixty sizzling shafts at Karna. Karna responds, O Rajan, with four flaming astras, which Bhima adroitly smashes into fragments. Now Karna covers him with dense showers of arrows, and Bhima breaks Karna's bow and strikes the Suta's son with ten perfect arrows.

Maharatha Karna, of terrible deeds, takes up another bow and stringing it quickly, strikes Bhima savagely with countless cruel barbs. A livid Bhima drills three straight and vigorous shafts into Karna's chest. O Bharatarishabha, with these barbs protruding from his breast, Karna looks as stunning as a mountain with three peaks; blood begins to flow from his wounds like rills of red chalk flowing down the mountain.

Wounded and bleeding, Karna is a little distraught. He strikes Bhima with one shaft of exceptional force, then assails him with hundreds, why, thousands of quicksilver barbs. Suddenly shrouded in Karna's torrid arrows, Bhima, unperturbed, almost playfully severs Karna's bowstring; then, with a broad-headed arrow, he strikes off Karna's charioteer's head in a red burst and, next moment, kills the Sutaputra's four horses. Karna, his pride sorely wounded, is forced to jump down from his chariot and hastily mount Vrishasena's ratha.

And after vanquishing Karna, the roar that erupts from Bhima is louder than any gone before; it is like booming thunder. Hearing that roar, Yudhishtira is elated knowing that Bhimasena has defeated Karna. The warriors of the Pandava army also blow their conches from all sides and your warriors, hearing this noise, shout and roar back defiantly, and sound their horns and conches. Arjuna pulls resonantly on the bowstring of the Gandiva and Krishna blows the Panchajanya. Yet, drowning all these sounds, all Kurukshetra hears the bellowing of Bhima, O Sire!

Karna and Bhima loose storms of flawless arrows at each other. While the son of Radha shoots his arrows calmly, the son of Pandu does so with great force.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After routing your army, Arjuna and Bhimasena go after Jayadratha, while your son Duryodhana rides to Drona astride his single ratha, thinking on the way about what he must say and do. His ratha endued with the speed of the wind, flies along towards Drona. His eyes red with anger, your son tells the Acharya, "O Parantapa, Arjuna, Bhimasena, the invincible Satyaki and many other maharathas have put our troops to rout and are nearing Jayadratha by the moment.

O bestower of honours, how have both Satyaki and Bhima bested you? Foremost of Brahmanas, your defeat at the hands of Satyaki, Arjuna, and of Bhimasena is like the ocean drying up: incredible to us all. All our warriors blame you and ask loudly, 'How has Drona, the greatest master of the astra shastra, been vanquished?'

When three maharathas have vanquished you in succession, it seems that I will surely lose this war. Acharya, tell me now what you have to say on what awaits us since what has happened is past and irretrievable. Think now of what remains and say quickly what we should do next to save Jayadratha's life."

Drona replies, "I have reflected upon this, Duryodhana, and listen to what I have to say. As yet only three great maharathas among the Pandavas have overwhelmed us. We have as much to fear from those behind these three, as we have to dread those that have gone ahead. Where Krishna and Dhananjaya are, our fear must be greatest. They have attacked the Bharata army, both on the front and now from behind. Surely, now protecting Jayadratha is our main task. The Sindhu is terrified of Arjuna and deserves our protection. And now the fearless Satyaki and Bhima both hunt Jayadratha. And all this is the result of the game of dice that Sakuni contrived.

Nothing of final worth was won or lost in the Kuru sabha during the game of dice. But this sport that we are engaged in now will fetch real victory or defeat. The apparently innocent die, which Sakuni cast in the Kuru sabha, have turned into deadly arrows that claim millions of lives. Today, O Rajan, Kshatriya warriors are the dice players, their lethal arrows are the long dice, and the wager is Jayadratha's life.

There is only one thing for us to do: without care for our lives, we must fight to save him from Arjuna. Today the game has become real; and here on Kurukshetra, where our greatest warriors guard Jayadratha, is where we will find final victory or defeat. So, ride with all speed to support the maharathas who are already engaged in saving his life. I myself will stay here and direct other assistance to you, while holding up the joint advance of the Pandavas and the Srinjayas."

At the Acharya's command, Duryodhana flies with his legions towards Jayadratha, now determined to accomplish the difficult task of saving him. Meanwhile, the two guardians of Arjuna's chariot-wheels, the Panchala princes Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, are attempting to rejoin Arjuna by skirting around the Kuru array. You may remember, O Dhritarashtra, that earlier, while Arjuna penetrated into your host, Kritavarman stopped the Panchala brothers. Now, seeing them go around his army, Duryodhana loses no time in engaging them in fierce battle.

Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, both known to be great maharathas, stretch their bows and attack Duryodhana fiercely. Yudhamanyu strikes Duryodhana with twenty arrows, and his horses with four shafts. But, with a single arrow, Duryodhana demolishes Yudhamanyu's standard, with another his bow, and finally with a wedge-headed arrow, fells Yudhamanyu's charioteer from his niche, stunning but not killing him. Again, he rakes Duryodhana's horses with four more arrows, and then, in ferocious inspiration, plunges thirty barbs in a blink straight into your son's chest.

Equally animated, Uttamaujas kills Duryodhana's sarathy with gold-embellished arrows. Duryodhana in rage brutally kills Uttamaujas' four horses and his two Parshni charioteers. Uttamaujas quickly jumps down from his useless ratha and clambers onto his brother Yudhamanyu's chariot. Red-eyed, he kills Duryodhana's horses.

Yudhamanyu immediately severs Duryodhana's bow and shreds his leather shooting gloves. Your son, the bull among men, leaps down roaring from his ratha with a great mace in his hand and rushes headlong at the Panchala princes. Seeing him come at them, like Yama himself with his cudgel, Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas hastily jump out of their ratha.

Then Duryodhana, wrath incarnate, pulverizes the chariot in frenzy; with manic blow after dreadful blow he makes a pulp of blood and bone of the horses and their charioteer. Continuing to vent his blind fury, he shatters the gold-inlaid wooden ratha into fragments, which he then drives down into the earth with an uncontrolled barrage of blows. Finally spent, Duryodhana, his eyes still red as plums, climbs onto Salya's nearby chariot.

Meanwhile, those two Panchala maharathas also mount two other chariots and drive on towards Arjuna.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'At the chaotic heart of the general pandemonium, Karna and Bhima duel again, like two great wild elephants in rut in the heart of a wild jungle.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me about the duel between Bhima and Karna, as they fight not far from Arjuna's chariot. Earlier Bhimasena defeated Karna, so how does the mighty Karna now fight Bhima? How does Bhima fight the Suta's son, whom so many say is the greatest maharatha on earth? Dharmaputra Yudhishtira, having prevailed over Bhishma and Drona, does not fear anybody more than he does Karna; indeed, he passes sleepless nights from fear thinking of him.

So say, O Sanjaya, how Bhima faces great Karna, who is always devoted to Brahmanas and never flees a battle? Karna now knows that he is the Pandavas' brother, and feels kindly towards them. He also remembers the solemn word he gave Kunti that he would not kill any of her sons other than Arjuna. Then how will he vanquish mighty Bhima? As for Bhima, he only remembers all that the Suta's son inflicted on him, his brothers and their beloved Panchali. Tell me how he fights Karna.

My son Duryodhana has put his faith most of all in Karna to overcome all the Pandavas in this war. How does Radheya, in whom my wretched son rests his hope of victory, fight Bhimasena of terrible deeds?

How does Bhima fight the Sutaputra, relying upon whom my sons chose to fight this war against the maharatha sons of Pandu? Burning within himself to recall all the indignity and injuries that Karna has heaped upon the Pandavas, how does Bhima contend with him?

How, indeed, does Bhima face Karna in single combat, Karna is endowed with such valour that he subjugated all this Earth on a single ratha, for Duryodhana's sake? How does Bhima fight this son of a Suta, who was born wearing blazing golden kundalas like drops of the fiery sun?

You are a masterly narrator, O Sanjaya! Tell me, therefore, in detail, how the duel unfolds between these two incomparable heroes; tell me who among them is victorious?'

Sanjaya replies, 'Maharatha Bhimasena is anxious to leave Karna behind him and join Krishna and Dhananjaya. However, the Sutaputra lashes him with relentless flights of arrows, and holds him up. The mighty son of Adhiratha, his face handsome, radiant as a full-blown lotus, and lit up with a smile, challenges Bhimasena to fight him again.

Karna says, "O Bhima, I did not in my dreams ever think that you were a coward who would show his back to a battle. But why else do you run from me in such haste to find Arjuna? O delighter of the Pandavas, this is not becoming of a son of Kunti. Stay and show me your valour, if indeed you are at all valiant. Come, loose your fiercest arrows at me!"

Bhimasena, expectedly, is cut to the quick by Karna's sneering challenge; growling, he turns his chariot around and rushes fuming at Karna. Bhima Parantapa, Pandu's choleric son who has killed so many of your princes, my lord, looses a windstorm of arrows like his father Vayu at the calm Sutaputra. The titanic Vayuputra now wants to kill Karna as quickly as he can.

O Rajan, Karna, with the tread of a royal elephant, effortlessly cuts down Bhima's frenetic torrents with just a handful of astras. With his superior knowledge of the art of war, Karna takes on the aspect of a great Acharya. He seems to mock and even toy with Bhimasena with his light-swift, feather-light touch, as the infuriated Pandava fights with great prowess but little finesse or restraint. Bhima seethes at Karna's amusement, which the many brave warriors gathered all around to watch this duel, witness.

Roaring and his eyes bulging, Bhima strikes Karna through his chest with a tempestuous clutch of calf-toothed barbs. He pierces the Suta's son, who now wears rainbow-hued armour after Indra took the golden kavacha he was born with, with three and seventy powerful shot arrows of beautiful feathers; he strikes Karna's horses sheathed in golden armour, each with five stormy barbs.

Then, in the twinkling of the eye, Karna raises his archery to a supernal level, covering Bhima, his chariot, his horses and sarathy with a network of arrows as delicate and perfect as it is violent. Next moment, with untold ferocity, the Sutaputra pierces the Pandava's impenetrable armour with sixty-four lethal barbs that plunge deep into the hulking Bhimasena's massive body.

Briefly startled, Mahabaho Vrikodara entirely disregards the onslaught, for he who once drank Nagamrita feels no pain whatever at being struck deep by Karna's missiles like serpents of virulent venom. Never flinching, Bhima rakes Karna with thirty-two flat-headed shafts, loosed with indescribable force. Mighty Karna shrugs off these arrows with the greatest disdain and again envelops Bhima in a cloud of fire.

In truth, Karna, who is beyond compare and who knows that Bhima is his brother, fights Bhima with mildness, while Bhima, his heart burning with remembering old wrongs, fights with utmost ferocity. Further incensed by Karna's cool manner, his maddening, almost tender smile for which he does not know the cause, wrathful Bhimasena unleashes a swarm of arrows at his enemy that plummet down on him like hunting falcons. Golden-winged and keen, Bhima's shafts cover the superior son of Radha like a flight of insects covering a roaring fire, and are all consumed.

Karna, still languidly, returns Bhima's fire, shaft for shaft, and Bhima cuts all these arrows down with a slew of broad-headed thunderbolts, before they can reach him. Karna, son of Vikartana, chastiser of foes, again swathes Bhimasena with some more intense volleys, indeed, now so profusely that the Pandava begins to resemble a porcupine with its quills erect.

Like the sun containing his own rays, Bhima remains unmoved by the dense clusters of golden-winged, stone-whetted barbs that protrude from him all over. With all his limbs bathed in blood, Bhimasena looks resplendent as an asoka tree in spring, bearing its flowery burden.

But he cannot countenance what Karna does, still playfully, and, rolling his eyes in rage, he strikes Karna with twenty-five great and long shafts, with all his might. At which, Karna looks like a white mountain with countless snakes hanging from its sides. And once more, Bhimasena, endowed with the skill of a Deva, pierces the undaunted Sutaputra, always ready to lay down his life for honour, with fourteen more stinging shafts.

As Karna receives these, Bhima, now smiling to himself and exerting himself truly to the fullest, breaks Karna's bow, kills his horses, his sarathy and ruptures the Sutaputra's chest with a host of elongated arrows brilliant as the sun. Those winged shafts pierce through Karna's body and into the earth, like rays of the sun piercing through the clouds.

Stricken by these arrows and with his bow destroyed, the haughty Karna's face turns red and, in considerable pain, he takes to another ratha and rides briefly away.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, what does Duryodhana say when he sees Karna, upon whom my sons have reposed all their hopes of victory, turn away from the field? How did the mighty Bhima, arrogant of his prowess, fight on? What does Karna do after he faces Bhimasena in that fiery encounter?'

Sanjaya replies, 'Mounting another ratha that is swiftly prepared for him, Karna comes storming back to confront Bhima again; he comes with the fury of the ocean stirred by a tempest; now he comes in rage. Seeing the Sutaputra like that, his brow dark and his face set grim, your sons, Rajan, consider Bhimasena as having been already poured as a libation on the Karna fire.

Furiously pulling on his bowstring and making terrifying sounds with his palms, Karna sends scathing volleys of shafts of dire intent at Bhimasena's chariot. And once more, a pitched and awful duel erupts between the two. Both equally stirred now, both great mahabahos intent on killing the other, they glare at each other as if to consume the other with their very gaze. Their eyes are red as roses and both breathe fiercely, like a couple of snakes.

Like two fighting or two angry Sarabhas, they set upon each other, drawing gushes of blood, mangling each other. Bhima again recalls all that he endured during the game of dice, during his exile in the vana and in Virata's city; he remembers how your sons robbed the Pandavas of their kingdom full of riches; dark images of all their sufferings of the past fourteen years and before, flash before his eyes: all the numerous wrongs inflicted on his brothers and himself and Panchali by you and Karna.

Bhima remembers how you conspired to immolate Kunti and her sons in the house of lac; most of all he remembers the torment of Draupadi in the Kuru sabha. He recalls clearly, as if it were happening again before his eyes, how the bestial Dusasana dragged a wailing Panchali into the hallowed Kuru court, and what Karna said to her then rings in his ears as if all the war around them has fallen hushed: "Take another husband, for your husbands are all dead! The sons of Pritha have sunk into hell and are like sesame seeds without kernels."

Awesome Bhimasena also remembers everything your sons said to the pure Draupadi, telling her that she was now their slave and they would enjoy her as one. Bhima recalls the harsh words that Karna spoke to the sons of Pandu when, attired in deer-skins, they were about to be banished to the vana; he recalls the coarse and unbridled joy that your wrathful, envious and foolish son showed, when he himself was prosperous and the sons of Pritha were plunged in distress. The virtuous Bhima, terrible Parantapa, remembers these and indeed all the sorrows he has suffered since his very childhood, and he is beside himself in a moment, utterly reckless of his very life. He sees Karna before him and Vrikodara, wolf-belly, wants to devour him at once!

Bhima draws his gold inlaid, redoubtable bow and that tiger of Bharata's vamsa, utterly reckless of his life, bears down on Karna, covering him with shining storms of arrows, obscuring the sun. A smiling Karna destroys Bhimasena's arrow showers and pierces him with nine keen formidable bolts. Struck by these like an elephant prodded viciously with a hook, Bhima yet continues to rush at him like an angry elephant.

Blowing his conch then, whose blast is like the sound of a hundred trumpets, Karna turns his fire on Bhima's legion of elephants, horses, chariots and foot-soldiers, agitating them, like a tempest the sea. Bhima undeterred continues to attack the Suta's son with a ceaseless tirade. Now Karna artfully entangles his snow-white horses with Bhima's coloured like black bears of the Himalaya, and still envelops him with his shining river of arrows.

Seeing the traces of Bhimasena's steeds snarled with those of Karna's, loud shouts arise from your troops. Tangled together, the eight horses look like white and black clouds blown together in the sky. Watching both the heroes in their frenzied duel, the maharathas of your army begin to tremble, as the battlefield, liberally strewn all around with the corpses of men and beasts, is quickly as dreadful as Yama's dark and horrible realms.

The greatest maharathas of your army look upon that terrible duel, like spectators watching some gory sport in an arena, and they see that neither awesome warrior has any advantage over his adversary. They only see the clash of mighty weapons, all this, Rajan, I remind you again, is the fruit of the evil policy of you and your sons.

Both slayers of their foes, both gifted with wonderful strength and skill, they continue to assail each other in absolute ferocity, filling the air and sky with their arrows, razing one another's troops all around. Ah, past glorious is the duel between Karna and Bhima; the sky is alight with the lustre of their arrows like meteors, arrows that are like flights of cranes in the autumn sky.

Krishna and Arjuna also see the fearsome contention between Karna and Bhima, and think that Bhima might be in danger. All around Karna and Bhima, the arrows they loose at each other fell thousands of elephants, horses and men—bloody mayhem rules the field. Blood blows in streams, corpses cover the earth darkly.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Bhimasena is surely an archer of great skill if he succeeds in balking Karna, who is a greater warrior than anyone. Sanjaya, tell me why Karna, who can challenge the very Devas, with the Yakshas and Asuras, let alone men, could not vanquish Bhima. Tell me more about their duel, for I now believe that either could kill the other.

It is relying upon great Karna that Duryodhana went to war against the Pandavas and Krishna and the Satwatas. But hearing how Bhima repeatedly defeats Karna, I feel faint, O Suta; why, I fear that the Kauravas are already as good as slain because of my son's sins.'

I fear that Karna will not succeed in overcoming the sons of Pritha. In all the battles that Karna fought the sons of Pandu, they have invariably defeated him. Ah, I do believe now that not the Devas led by Indra can quell these Pandavas. Alas that my evil son Duryodhana does not know this. Having vilely robbed Yudhishtira, who is like Kubera himself, of his kingdom and his wealth, my son of little intelligence is like a honey gatherer climbing a tree overhanging a cliff. He still does not see the fall that lies ahead.

Steeped in deceit, he regards the treasures that are not rightfully his belonging to him forever; and in his delusion, he continues to provoke and insult the Pandavas and dharma itself. Sanjaya, I too am a crude soul and ruled by my blind love for my children. I also showed no scruple when I betrayed Pandu's noble sons who observe dharma. Yudhishtira, with great foresight, always wants peace but my sons foolishly think of him as being weak and despise him.

And with all the sufferings and shame they have endured at our hands, the mighty-armed Bhimasena fights Karna. Tell me, Sanjaya, how Bhima and Karna do battle, each intent on killing the other.'

Sanjaya replies, 'Then listen, Rajan, to how the battle develops between Karna and Bhima. By now in considerable rage, Karna, son of Vikartana, lifts his archery and powerfully strikes Bhima with thirty golden arrows; no longer does the Sutaputra fight with any mildness. But the wild and raging Bhima breaks Karna's bow with three exquisite arrows; with a wedge-headed shaft he fells Karna's sarathy from his seat.

In a smooth blur, Karna seizes up a magnificent spear, adorned with gold and lapis lazuli, a thing of beauty but one that is most of all a missile of death. Like Indra casting down his Vajra, Karna hurls that spear at Bhima with force enough to kill the Pandava, and then the Sutaputra roars like a pride of lions! Your sons are exultant to hear that roar; they believe Bhima will die.

However, for all his bulk, Bhima strikes down Karna's spear bright as the sun or fire, deadly as a snake that has just shed its old skin, with seven arrows too swift to see. With no moment's pause, Bhima unleashes a sizzle of splendid arrows, all golden-winged and peacock-feathered, all of which are like Yama's danda.

Mahatejasvin Karna takes up another intimidating bow, its back inlaid with gold, and, stretching it, looses a barrage of arrows at Bhima, who cuts them all down with nine true barbs and he also roars like ten lions. Roaring, and bellowing at each other like two bulls for a cow in season, or like two tigers for the same meat, they continue to loose rivers of arrows at each other, always seeking a fatal lacuna through which they can kill the other.

At times they stand still and glare at each other like bulls pawing the earth, resting briefly. Then, again, the gales of arrows from bows drawn round.

They do their utmost, Rajan, their worst; they scorch each other always with blazing anger and hatred in their eyes, for, they are pure warriors, absorbed in battle, and in the moment all else is forgotten, indeed ceases to exist. Sometimes laughing at each other, at others taunting and mocking each other, and occasionally blowing their conches, they continue to duel upon the very edge of life and death.

Then Bhima breaks Karna's bow at the grip again, and sends his white horses to Yama in a crimson flurry; he fells the Sutaputra's sarathy as well. Finding himself without horses or charioteer and bleeding freely from al his limbs, Karna is plunged into swift anxiety and does not know what to do.

Seeing Karna, dearer to him than his brothers, stricken and helpless, Duryodhana blazes up in anger and commands his brother Durjaya, "Look where the beast Bhima is about to devour the son of Radha. Kill that beardless Pandava, and put heart into Karna!"

Crying "Tathaastu!" Durjaya rushes at Bhima and strikes him with nine searing shafts, his horses with eight, his charioteer with six, his standard with three, and Bhima once more with seven. Turning away from Karna with a terrible growl, red-eyed Bhima plunges a lethal volley into Durjaya's body, striking all his vital organs at once, and that brave son of yours falls, dying in agony. Seeing this, Karna, with tears flowing down his great face, circumambulates Durjaya, who, adorned with regal ornaments, lies on the earth, writhing like a snake in death's last throes.

Having destroyed Karna's chariot, Bhima, grinning awfully, covers him with arrows and makes him look like a sataghni with numberless spikes on it. Yet, Atiratha Karna, though pierced all over direly, makes no attempt to escape the preening Bhima.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The chariot-less Karna, yet again comprehensively beaten by Bhima, mounts another ratha and flies at the Pandava again. Like elephants goring each other with tusks, they strike one another with arrows shot from bows drawn to the fullest stretch. Karna scathes Bhimasena with a scorching volley, roars, then bloodies the Pandava's brawny breast.

Bhima, in return, first rakes Karna with ten deadly straight arrows and then again with twenty. Karna pierces Bhima with nine arrows and takes a substantial shard from his standard with a flat-headed shaft. The Pandava responds quick as light with three and sixty arrows, like a mahout stabbing an elephant with his goad, or a rider whipping his horse.

Bleeding profusely, Karna begins to lick the corners of his mouth, and his eyes turn redder than ever. Beside himself by now, Karna looses an extreme missile, now in deadly earnest to have his brother's life. The shaft flares from his bow, passes through Bhima, and plunges deep into the earth. Bhima, whose eyes can turn no redder, suddenly hurls a huge and heavy six-sided gilded mace, measuring full four cubits in length, and kills all four of Karna's horses.

With two razor-faced arrows, he cuts down Karna's standard and with another savage volley, kills his enemy's charioteer. Yet again, Karna must leap down from his ratha and stands bared on the ground, drawing his bow. But now the prowess that we see from Radha's son is wondrous in the extreme, as he continues to hold off the chariot-mounted Bhima.

Seeing that Karna has lost his chariot again, Duryodhana cries to his brother, "The animal Bhima has deprived Radheya of his ratha again. Take your chariot to him, my brother. Fly!"

Durmukha rushes up to support Karna and envelops Bhima with his arrows. Bhima is delighted to see your son and begins to lick the corners of his mouth. Then, even as he fends off Karna's incessant fire, he whirls his chariot round and dashes straight at Durmukha and in a flash, Rajan, slaughters him with nine irresistible shafts. Bhima, triumphant on his ratha is like the blazing sun. Seeing Durmukha sprawled dead, his powerful body blown apart by Bhima, Karna lowers his bow, stops the duel momentarily, and weeps.

Circumambulating the fallen Durmukha and leaving him there, the heroic Karna begins to draw long, hot breaths and stands dazed, not knowing what to do. Seizing the opportunity, Bhimasena strikes him deep with fourteen long barbs, vulture-feathered. Those blood-drinking shafts of golden wings, infused with great power, illuminate the ten directions of the sky as they blaze into Karna, pass right through him, drink his blood and bore their glittering way into the earth behind him.

Karna shoots back fourteen golden arrows, which pass through Bhima's right arm and dive into the earth like birds a grove of trees. Sticking in the ground, those shafts shine like the rays of the sun while he sinks towards the Asta mountains of sunset. Bhima's arm spouts blood like a mountain stream of water. Bhima, never unnerved, strikes Karna with three shafts imbued with the impetuosity of Garuda and then his charioteer with seven.

O Rajan, wounded by Bhima's might, Karna finally loses heart and that illustrious warrior abandons the battle, borne away by his fleet horses. Roaring in triumph, Atiratha Bhimasena continues to stretch his bow and radiates arrows, sowing death all around him. Like a great fire he blazes, gloriously.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Ah, I do believe now that destiny is supreme. Fie on men's prowess and striving, which is all in vain if Adhiratha's son Karna cannot vanquish Bhimasena, despite fighting so resolutely. Karna boasts that he can vanquish all the Parthas with Krishna. I often hear Duryodhana maintain that he has not seen another warrior like Karna in the world!

Indeed, Sanjaya, the wretched Duryodhana often told me, "Karna is no Sutaputra but a mighty Kshatriya, an unyielding archer who never feels fatigue. If I have the Vasusena for my ally, the very Devas cannot vanquish me, what then need be said of the sons of Pandu?"

So tell me what Duryodhana says when he sees Karna defeated, and flee the field like a snake that has lost its venom. Alas, mindlessly Duryodhana sends Durmukha, who has no experience of battle, alone to face Bhima, like an insect into a great fire.

O Sanjaya, even Aswatthaman, Salya and Kripa, united together, cannot stand up to Bhimasena. Even they know the terrible might of Bhima, equal to that of ten thousand elephants; they know he is endowed with the tejas of Vayu himself, as well as his brutal intentions. Why did they provoke the savage hero of cruel deeds; why did they stoke the fire of that Kshatriya who, when roused, is like Yama himself at the end of the Yuga? And then only the dauntless Karna dared fight Bhima by himself. Ah, no one can quell this son of Pandu who routed Karna in battle like Purandara vanquishing an Asura.

Who is there that can face dreadful Bhima and hope to live? Bhima who ploughs his bloody way through my army by himself, after brushing aside even Drona, Bhima who rides in quest of his brother Arjuna? Indeed who in my army, O Sanjaya, will dare to face titanic Bhimasena? Who among the Asuras will venture to face the great Indra with his thunderbolt, the Vajra, in his hand?

A man may return from the land of the dead, but no one can return alive after doing battle with Bhimasena Vayuputra! These men of little strength who senselessly rush into battle against the wrathful Bhima are truly like insects flying into a blazing fire. When I think of the gruesome oath that this Pandava swore in the Kuru sabha on the day of the game of dice that he would kill all my hundred sons, and when I hear about how he put mighty Karna to flight, I have no doubt that Duryodhana and his brothers are terrified to fight Bhima.

My evil son repeatedly bragged in our court, "Karna, Dusasana and I together will vanquish the Pandavas in battle." After seeing Bhima rout Karna thrice and deprive him of his chariot, Duryodhana is now consumed by grief not only because Draupadi rejected his suit but also to see Bhimasena butcher his brothers in battle, one after the other, as a result of his own heinous crimes.

Who that values his life will ride against Panduputra Bhima, when he straddles the field like Yama himself, burning with wrath and armed with terrible astras? A man may escape from the very jaws of the Badava fire, but I am convinced that no one can escape from Bhima. Indeed, neither Partha nor the Panchalas, nor Kesava, nor Satyaki, all excited with battle lust, shows the least care for their lives. O Suta, the lives of all my sons are in danger.'

Sanjaya replies, 'O Kaurava, you who now grieve like this after hearing of the carnage your enemies bring to your army are yourself the real root of this destruction of the world! Obedient to the sinful counsels of your sons, it is you who have yourself provoked this ghastly war. Though your well-wishers repeatedly advised you against this enormous folly, you were like a sick man who is fated to die and will not accept the only medicine that can save his life. O Rajan, best of men, having drunk the most virulent poison, now you must accept its consequences.

Your warriors all fight to the best of their abilities, putting their lives at risk. Yet, sitting here, you speak ill of them. But now listen to me and I will describe to you how the war for truth rages on.

Seeing Karna defeated by Bhimasena, five of your sons, Durmarshana, Duhsaha, Durmada, Durdhara and Jaya, all clad in beautiful armour, surround Bhimasena and shroud him with their shafts like locust swarms. Bhimasena stands smiling before these princes of celestial handsomeness. Karna dashes into battle again, losing torrents of golden-winged shafts, so that Bhima turns to face Karna, although your sons are attacking him.

Your sons continue to cover Bhimasena with showers of precise shafts. But then, with an earth-shaking roar, Bhima unleashes twenty-five lethal arrows from his massive bow and sends your five sons, with their horses and charioteers to Yama, their blood spraying in the westering sun. They fall from their rathas along with their charioteers, like large trees uprooted by a hurricane because of the weight of their variegated flowers.

And wonderful is Bhima's grisly feat for he achieves it even as he battles Karna. Attacked from every side by Bhima wheeling around him, a shocked Karna can only gaze at the massive Pandava in some disbelief that he is such an archer as well. Bhimasena, too, with eyes crimson, glowers at Karna, while stretching his awesome bow.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing your sons lying dead on the field, a surge of fresh rage fills Karna. He no longer cares for his life for he considers himself responsible for the death of your sons, slain before his eyes by Bhima. Bhimasena, meanwhile, always sees images from the past of the sufferings of the Pandavas and Panchali before his mind's eye. Full of rancour, he continues to loose flaming, unerring arrows at the Sutaputra.

Smiling, or still sneering, Karna rakes Bhima first with five arrows and again with seventy razor-sharp ones with golden wings. Brushing aside the cascade of barbs that Karna pours over him, Bhima strikes him with a hundred perfect arrows, followed by five more which plunge deep into his body, and finally, with a wedge-headed arrow, he severs his bow. The dispirited Karna takes up another bow and envelops Bhimasena with some luminous archery. But indomitable Bhima gives a dreadful laugh, which rocks the field and, easily cutting down Karna's shafts in flight, yet again kills his horses, charioteer, and, with reverberant twang of his bowstring breaks great Karna's golden-backed bow once more.

Karna leaps down from his chariot with a mace in his hand that he hurls furiously at Bhima. In full view of all your troops, Rajan, Bhima blows that gada into powder with a thought-swift volley, and immediately looses a thousand arrows at Karna. Karna cuts them all down, then cuts away Bhima's armour, disjointing it neatly with some perfect shafts, and then strikes Bhima's body with twenty-five vicious short arrows.

All this, Rajan, occurs as if time has paused for the two heroes; it takes one's breath away. His fury always mounting, Bhima looses nine intense barbs at Karna, piercing his armour and his right arm and then flashing on down into the earth. Shrouded with showers of shafts from Bhimasena's bow, Karna yet again escapes by running away on foot.

Seeing this, Duryodhana tells his brothers, "Fly! Protect Karna from every side. Surround Bhima and kill him."

Your sons Chitra, Upachitra, Charuchitra, Sarasan, Chitrayudha and Chitravarman charge Bhimasena, shooting a solid swath of arrows at him. And now Bhima, showing himself to be truly the son of Vayu; Bhima who is only half-human, kills these six sons of yours, Rajan, with a single incredible arrow! And now, Karna, tears springing to his eyes again, ruefully remembers what Vidura said in dire warning fourteen years ago.

Mounting yet another ratha, Karna sweeps back into battle, to face Bhima again. The two duel feverishly, covering one another with clouds of golden missiles; they both look splendid like two cloud masses pierced by the rays of the sun.

Now Bhima cuts away Karna's armour with six and thirty flat-headed arrows shot with utmost force. The mighty-armed Karna gores Bhima with fifty immaculate barbs and, smeared with red sandalwood paste and streaming blood from all their limbs, the two resemble the newly risen sun and bronze moon. Their armour cut away, their bared bodies covered in blood, Karna and Bhima look like a couple of snakes just freed from their sloughs.

The two Naravyaghras maul each other with their shafts, like two tigers tearing into one another with fangs and talons. Circling each other in their rathas, they cover each other in ceaseless fire, drawing blood, slicing off shreds of flesh, roaring like two mythic tigers, bellowing like two massive bulls battling over a cow in season. Indeed, they are two lions from bygone times, their eyes crimson as they battle like Indra and Virochana's son Prahlada.

Bhima, thunderhead charged with lightning, mantles Karna, the mountain, with a downpour of a thousand harsh kanaka-feathered arrows.

Your sons watch Bhima incredulously, for they had never imagined their cousin was such a bowman; Arjuna watches him in delight, as do Krishna and Satyaki and Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas. Your sons are awed; they are all dismayed for it seems that the dreadful Pandava will indeed keep the vow that he swore.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing the twang of Bhimasena's bow and the sound of his palms striking each other, Karna cannot bear what he sees and experiences, no more than a maddened wild elephant can the trumpeting of a rival. Turning away for a moment from Bhimasena, Karna looks with deep sorrow at the corpses of your sons whom Bhimasena has killed. Drawing hot, long breaths, he once more takes up arms against the second son of Pandu, the son of the Wind.

Eyes burning like copper, and sighing in fury like a mighty snake, Karna, as he shoots his arrows, is as resplendent as his natural father, Surya Deva, radiating his rays. Vrikodara, bristling with the shining shafts shot from Karna's bow, looks like a plant reflecting the rays of the sun. The beautiful shafts fitted with peacock-feathers penetrate every part of Bhima's majestic body, like birds entering a tree to roost there. Karna's golden winged arrows, falling incessantly, resemble an infinite flight of cranes. So numerous are they, that they seem to issue not from his bow alone but from his standard, his royal parasol, the shaft, yoke and base of his ratha! Karna shoots his sky-ranging golden shafts fitted with vulture feathers so he fills the sky with them.

Seeing him so galvanised with fury and now rushing towards him like Yama himself, Bhima still neither wavers nor feels the least trace of fear. Instead, becoming utterly reckless of his life, he strikes Karna with nine meridian missiles and stops Karna's onrush. He strikes the radiant Sutaputra, the Suryaputra, with twenty more brutal arrows. Indeed, swiftly he shrouds Karna with as many arrows as his antagonist did him a moment ago.

Seeing the prowess of Bhimasena, your warriors, as well as the Charanas on high, are filled with joy and applaud him. O Rajan, Bhurisravas, Kripa, Aswatthaman, Salya of the Madras, Uttamaujas, Yudhamanyu, Kesava, and Arjuna, all these great maharathas, among both the Kurus and the Pandavas, loudly cheer Bhima, crying, "Uttamam! Wonderful!" and they shout aloud and roar in exhilaration, friend and foe alike, for they are all noble Kshatriyas and master warriors and recognise the extraordinary archery of Bhimasena the Pandava against his redoubtable adversary.

When this pandemonium breaks out, Duryodhana tells all the kings and princes and particularly his brothers, "Bless you all, mighty ones! Ride swiftly to Karna's rescue, or Bhima will have his life today."

At this, seven of his brothers, Rajan, rush forward and surround Bhimasena, enveloping him with torrents of arrows; they assail Vrikodara like the seven planets afflicting the moon at the hour of the Pralaya. But the son of Kunti kills them all in a moment with seven luminous shafts. His lustrous shafts pass cleanly, lethally through their bodies, taking their lives with them, and soar up into the sky like birds of superb, now incarnadine plumage.

Your seven sons whom Bhima kills are Satrunjaya, Satrusaha, Chitra, Chitrayudha, Dridha, Chitrasena and Vikarna. But Bhimasena grieves bitterly for Vikarna who was dear to him. And he says in grief, his bloodshot eyes glimmering with tears, "It is only for the oath I swore that I would kill all of you in this war, O Vikarna, that I have taken your life. O Shura, you came to fight to discharge your dharma as a Kshatriya. Otherwise, you alone among your brother always wished us well, Kaurava, and you especially loved Yudhishtira. I have kept my vow as a Kshatriya and I should not grieve but my heart does grieve, for you were noble and illustrious, my cousin!"

Having killed those seven princes, O Rajan, before Karna's very eyes, Bhimasena again gives a fulminant roar, which informs Yudhishtira at a distance that victory is his. Indeed, hearing Bhima's tremendous shout, Yudhishtira feels joy course through him in the midst of the gory battle and he responds with loud conches booming and batteries of drums being beaten. Elated to hear his brother Vrikodara's echoing message across the field, Yudhishtira, emboldened, launches an attack against Drona.

Duryodhana on the other hand, seeing one and thirty of your sons, his brothers slain, recollects the wise words of Vidura and in some anguish he thinks, "Vidura's prophecy is being realised!"

Thinking this, Duryodhana is benumbed. All that your foolish and black-hearted son, with Karna at his side, said to the princess of Panchala during the game of dice, after having Draupadi hauled roughly into the Kuru sabha, all the harsh, coarse words that Karna said to Panchali, in your presence, O Dhritarashtra, and what was said to the sons of Pandu, returns to haunt Duryodhana and paralyses him.

O Draupadi, the Pandavas are lost and have sunk into eternal hell, so choose other husbands for yourself!

Alas, my king, the bitter fruit of all that now manifests itself. On that day your despicable sons said so many vile things, calling the noble Pandavas sesame seeds without kernels. Today, Bhimasena spews forth the fire of wrath, which he has restrained for thirteen years, and massacres your haughty sons. Oh Rajan, despite his repeated pleas, his many lamentations, Vidura failed to persuade you towards peace.

O King of the Bharatas, now reap the harvest of all that you and your sons have sown. You are mature, patient, and entirely capable of foreseeing the consequences of all deeds. So it truly seems that your refusal to follow the sage counsel of your well-wishers is the result of fate. Ah, do not grieve, O Naravyaghra! All this is your fault. In my opinion, you are yourself the cause of the destruction of your sons.

Vikarna has fallen, as has Chitrasena of great prowess. Many other maharathas and the greatest among your sons have also fallen. Yes, whichever of your sons Bhima found within range, he killed in a trice. It is for you, to narrate this horrific war to you, day after day, that I had to see our vyuha annihilated by Pandu's son Bhima!'" “Dhritarashtra says, ‘O Sanjaya, I do believe that it is my evil rule that is responsible for the terrible consequences that now overtake us. I have so far thought only about the past, but what should I do now? I am calm again, so tell me how this slaughter of Kshatriyas continues.’

Sanjaya replies, ‘Rajan, Karna and Bhima continue to discharge arrows at each other like two rain-charged clouds. The shafts winged with gold, whetted on stone and marked with Bhima’s name, strike Karna and pierce his body, as if piercing into his very life. Similarly, Bhima is shrouded by Karna’s arrows in their hundreds and thousands, each one a venomous serpent. With their arrows falling on all sides, an agitation like that of the very ocean is created among the troops. The arrows Bhima shoots from his grand bow kill countless men of your army. Bestrewn with fallen elephants and horses, and the corpses of men, Kurukshetra is like a field of trees broken by a tornado. Mown down on every side by Bhima’s arrows, your warriors flee, screaming, “Ah, what is this?”

The army of the Sindhus, the Sauviras and the Kauravas are afflicted by the shafts of both Karna and Bhima, and withdraw to a great distance. The remnant of these brave soldiers, with their steeds and elephants killed, flee in all directions away from both Karna and Bhima, crying out, “Truly, the Devas are confounding us for the sake of the Pandavas, for the arrows shot by both Bhima and Karna are razing our forces!”

Your frightened troops run away beyond the range of Karna and Bhima’s arrows and stand at a safe distance to watch the blazing duel. While, on Kurukshetra another river of terror flows, a river that makes heroes exult and cowards quail, a river flowing the blood of elephants, horses and men. The Earth, O Bhaarata, is weirdly resplendent covered with the lifeless forms of men, elephants and horses along with their ornaments, with flagstaffs and the bases of chariots, with broken rathas and wheels and akshas and kuveras, with bows inlaid with gold, and gold-winged arrows in millions shot by Karna and Bhima, with countless javelins, spears, swords, battleaxes, with maces and clubs all adorned with gold, with standards of diverse shapes, with darts and spiked cudgels, and with beautiful sataghnis.

The field of war looks like the sky scattered with stars, being strewn all over with earrings, necklaces of gold, bracelets loosened from wrists, rings, precious gems worn on diadems and crowns, helmets, golden ornaments of diverse kinds, coats of mail, leather gauntlets, elephants’ ropes, broken chatras, Yak-tail fans, with the shredded bodies of elephants, horses and men, with blood-dyed arrows, and with diverse other objects, lying loosened from their true and living places.

Watching the inconceivable feats of those two warriors, the Charanas and the Siddhas above are full of amazement. Like a great fire, fanned by the wind, courses through a heap of dry grass, Karna engages fiercely with Bhima. Both of them shoot down countless standards and rathas, slay horses, elephants, and men: like a pair of fighting elephants trampling a forest of reeds. Your host looks like a mass of clouds, Rajan, and great is the scarlet carnage Karna and Bhima cause.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Rajan, Karna pierces Bhima with three arrows and deluges him with a relentless downpour of shafts. The mighty-armed Bhimasena stands unmoved like a mountain. In return, he rakes Karna's ear with a barbed arrow rubbed with oil and Karna's large and exquisite kundala falls from his lobe like a star from the sky.

Smiling in mockery, Vrikodara stabs Karna through his chest with another broad-headed arrow, and swiftly follows these with ten long shafts, which strike Karna's brow and pierce it like snakes entering an anthill. With these shafts protruding from his forehead, the Suta's son looks quite stunning, as if with a chaplet of blue lotuses encircling his lofty brow.

Hurt deep, Karna lurches, supports himself on the kuxara of his ratha, and shuts his eyes in a brief swoon. He soon regains consciousness and, with his face and body bathed in blood, he seems to lose all restraint and rushes roaring and wild-eyed at Bhima, unleashing a hundred vulture-winged shafts at him.

Bhima, however, ignores this tirade of shafts and looses his own scathing volley at Karna. The suddenly energised Karna strikes Bhima with nine arrows through his torso. Both Naravyaghras, roaring and growling like two tremendous tigers, continue to belabour each other with endless banks of arrows. They seek to unnerve each other by sudden bursts of thunderous hand clapping, and with uncanny missiles rarely used or seen. Then Bhima severs Karna's bow with a razor-faced arrow, and gives a bloodcurdling roar.

Throwing away the broken bow, the Suta's son seizes up another stronger one. Karna's body blazes with strange effulgence as he looks in anger at the slaughter of the Kuru, the Sauvira, and the Sindhu Kshatriyas, seeing coats of mail, standards, discarded weapons as well as the lifeless forms of elephants, foot-soldiers, horsemen and rathikas lying all around, covering the Earth. Stretching his fresh bow into a circle, he eyes Bhima wrathfully and begins to unleash his anger at him, looking like the autumn sun dazzling at mid-day.

None that watch him can see when he draws an arrow from his quiver, fits it to his bowstring, draws the string back and looses his shaft; Karna's archery is like a river in spate, his bow always drawn in a ring of fire and arrows flowing in tide from it all around him, covering the sky and dimming the sun. Karna's volleys are like flights of thousands of cranes in the sky, like locust swarms, why like a single ubiquitous missile that never stops. A raging Karna swathes Bhima with his vulture-feathered, golden-winged barbs.

And your sons, O Bhaarata, and their troops see the strength, energy, prowess and fortitude of Bhima, for with scant regard for the arrows pouring down on him, continues to attack Karna like a raging sea. Bhima stretches his bow and shoots his arrows with such ferocious speed that it seems like a second bow of Indra, his weapon also incessantly drawn to a circle. The golden shafts issuing from it form a continuous line in the sky and appear like a bright garland of gold.

Bhimasena marvellously cuts down Karna's torrents in the air, and sparks cascade down onto the field below. The sun is shrouded, the wind ceases to blow, and nothing can be seen.

Then, both atirathas raise their archery so that the very sky seems to catch fire: a conflagration on high! Karna, straining himself, unleashes a volley of golden-winged scintillating barbs at Bhima in rage, but Bhima truncates every one of them into three neat slivers and roars in jubilation.

Pandu's tremendous son afire harries his enemy with his own savage streaks of lightning. Their leather gauntlets slapping against their bowstrings, their clapping palms, their terrible roaring, the deep rumble of their chariot-wheels and the deafening twang of their bowstrings all create absolute pandemonium. All the other warriors stop fighting and stand rooted, with eyes peeled, to watch this duel that exceeds all duels. The Devarishis, Siddhas and Gandharvas applaud them, saying, “Uttamam! Wonderful!” The tribes of Vidyadharas rain flowers on them.

Cutting down Karna’s incendiary shafts, Bhima lacerates his opponent with a handful of arrows. Karna, also, confounds most of Bhimasena’s fire on him; he plunges nine long barbs deep into the great Pandava’s vast body. Bhima, unmoved, replies with his own shafts that rake Karna sorely.

Suddenly, Bhima unleashes an astra like Yama’s danda, why, like Yama himself at Karna, who with a superior smile smashes it into shards in flight with three light-like arrows. Bhima, roaring louder than ever so Kurukshetra trembles, again looses a firetide of barbs that Karna serenely douses in the air. Next moment, he shreds Bhima’s quivers so the arrows fall out of them; he breaks his bow and severs the reins of his horse. Inspired, Karna kills Bhima’s horses and gouges his charioteer deep with five arrows like streak lightning.

Visoka the sarathy falls out of his chariot, takes to his heels and finds refuge in Yudhamanyu’s ratha. Now, smiling broadly, Karna, burning like the yuga fire, fells Bhima’s flagstaff and banner.

Deprived of his bow, Bhima Mahabaho seizes up a curved dart, such as rathikas use and, whirling it round in his hand, hurls it like a meteor at Karna’s ratha. Karna shatters it with ten exact arrows. Bhima picks up a shield decked with gold and a sword, but again Karna, still smiling, calmly smashes that shield into fragments with a sizzle of shafts.

In a flash a desperate Bhima flings his sword at Karna breaking his bow in his hands so it hangs limp. Cool as ever, Karna takes up another dreadful bow and unleashes a gale of a thousand arrows at the Pandava. Struck by many of these shafts, Bhima gives an agonised cry and hops about in pain. At once, Karna’s soft heart melts in sorrow for his enemy who he knows is his brother.

Now sensing victory, Karna beguiles Bhima by concealing himself on the floor of his ratha. Bhima darts forward and seizes Karna’s flagstaff from the ground and stands firm waiting to haul Karna out of his ratha. All the Kurus and the Charanas above applaud Bhima, who means to lay hold of Karna like Garuda snatching up a snake. His bow destroyed, his ratha ruined, Bhima stands unflinching and resolute, true to Kshatriya dharma, fearless for his life, still wanting just battle.

A livid Karna now advances against Bhima in his chariot; they rush at each other, roaring out challenges, roaring like thunderheads at the close of summer. The passage-at-arms that then takes place between the two lions among men does indeed again resemble that of old between the Devas and the Danavas.

However, Bhima's store of weapons is soon exhausted, and he is forced to turn back while Karna pursues him. Seeing the elephants that Arjuna killed lying near, the unarmed Bhimasena runs into their hilly midst, for Karna cannot follow him there in his chariot. And lo, the son of Pritha and Vayu actually hefts a great elephant that Arjuna slew and he waits there even like his half-brother Hanuman with the peak of Gandhamadana!

But Karna with unearthly archery shreds that great carcass in Bhima's hands. Bhima flings the pieces of flesh at his enemy, and then laying hands on anything he can find, chariot-wheels and dead horses, hurls all these at Karna. Karna carves and smashes everything that Bhima flings at him. But Bhima rushes straight at the brother he does not know, taking Karna by surprise. Bhima raises his great fists imbued with the power of thunder and then suddenly remembers that Arjuna has sworn to kill the Sutaputra and he spares Karna's life.

Karna, beside himself, now gashes Bhima with fierce bursts of arrows and finally the Pandava collapses under the onslaught and the Sutaputra has him squarely in his sights; he can kill Bhima now. Karna's rage cools quickly; he remembers his word given to Kunti that he would not kill any of her sons other than Arjuna; he remembers that the vulnerable magnificent Kshatriya now at his mercy is his brother. Instead of taking Bhima's life, he rides up to him and repeatedly prods him with the tip of his bow.

Hissing like a snake, Bhima snatches the bow from Karna's hands and strikes him a stunning blow on the head with it! Struck by Bhimasena, Karna's rage blazes up again and, his eyes burning red once more, he says to Bhima, "Beardless eunuch, ignorant fool, and glutton! You are no archer, so don't dare fight me again. You are like an overgrown child, a lout and a laggard in battle!

Pandava wretch, you should be in either a kitchen or a dining hall, not on a battlefield. Bhima, you should pass your days in the vana eating roots and flowers, keeping vratas and doing tapasya, for as a warrior you are nothing. Great is the difference between battle and the life of a muni. O Vrikodara, you are suited to a life in the forest since battle does not suit you at all.

Otherwise, glutton, you are fit to order cooks, servants and slaves, as you did in Virata's palace and reprove them when you do not like your dinner! O dimwitted one, take sannyasa and gather fruits for your insatiable appetite. Go into the forest, O son of Kunti, for you are fit to fight a war. Employ yourself in plucking fruits and roots, or in waiting upon guests, for battle does not suit you at all."

Rajan, I believe that Karna's harsh words reflect all the wrongs done to him in his youth, the shame of being spurned as a Sutaputra. As Bhima stands helpless before him, he prods Vrikodara yet again with his bow, and, laughing loudly, says again to the red-faced Pandava, "Well, if fight you must, pick on your equals not Karna! For you now see what happens to those that dare face me in battle. Go, great lout, to where the two Krishnas are so that they protect you. Or go home, for, child that you are, what place do you have on this field of heroes?"

But Bhimasena laughs in Karna's face, and says in the hearing of all, "Evil spirit, I have repeatedly beaten you! And yet you continue to boast? In this world the ancients have witnessed the victory and defeat of Indra himself. Lowborn fellow, son of a Suta, fight me with bare arms if you dare and I will kill you before all these kings even as I did the giant Kichaka."

But the intelligent Karna refuses to be provoked into such folly before all the maharathas. Instead, having deprived Bhima of his chariot and having humiliated him, Karna mocks him again in the hearing of Krishna and the noble Arjuna. Then, incited by Kesava, Arjuna looses a blazing volley of arrows from the Gandiva at Karna, golden shafts that plunge into Karna's regal frame like cranes into the Krauncha mountains. Partha drives Karna away from the imperiled Bhima. His bow broken by Bhima, and now raked by Arjuna's terrific arrows, Karna quickly rides away from Bhima on his great ratha.

Bhimasena mounts Satyaki's chariot and they hurtle after Arjuna Savyasachin. In fury Arjuna looses a dreadful astra at Karna, a missile like Yama danda, which flashes at the Sutaputra like Garuda flying at a great snake. The shafts would have killed Karna, but in that moment, from a fair distance, Aswatthaman cuts it in two, saving the Suryaputra's life. Flaring up in anger, Arjuna strikes Drona's son with sixty-four arrows, and roars at him, "Do not run away, O Aswatthaman, but stay a moment and fight me."

But, scathed by Arjuna's shafts, Drona's son quickly finds refuge in a dense division of the Kaurava army, full of maddened elephants and teeming with rathas. Pulling on the bowstring of the Gandiva, drowning every other sound on the field, Arjuna follows the hastily retreating Aswatthaman, frightening him with his shafts. As he goes after Drona's son, Partha razes hosts of men, elephants and horses with his arrows fletched with the feathers of kankas and peacocks.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Day by day, O Sanjaya, my once radiant glory is being tarnished. Untold numbers of my army have perished. Ah, all this is from the reversal of fortune that time inexorably brings. Arjuna, stirred by the death of his son, has broken through my legions, which Drona's son and Karna protect and which the very gods could hardly breach.

United with the two of blazing tejas, Krishna and Bhima, as well as the bull of the Sinis, Satyaki, Arjuna's powers have increased manifold. Ever since I heard of Dhananjaya's success, grief, like fire burning dry grass, consumes my heart. I see that an evil destiny has descended upon all the kings of the Earth, and Jayadratha of the Sindhus among them. Having done the Kiritin grievous wrong, if Jayadratha comes within Arjuna's reach, he will not escape with his life. Why, I already infer from the way the war swings against us, that the Saindhava, my son-in-law, is already slain.

However, relate to me exactly how the battle rages on, for you are a gifted narrator, O Sanjaya; describe to me further how the Vrishni hero Satyaki fights. He entered my vast force alone, resolutely for Arjuna's sake, indeed like an elephant plunging into a lake overgrown with lotuses.'

Sanjaya replies, 'Seeing Bhima fight on though sorely wounded by Karna's shafts, Satyaki follows him on his ratha, drawn by silver horses, roaring like the clouds at the close of summer and blazing like the autumn sun, and begins to slaughter your son's army with his formidable bow. None of your maharathas can check his progress; indeed they tremble to see him ride at them.

Then a warrior king Alambusha, who never leaves a battle, rushes at Satyaki, greatest of the Sinis. The battle between them is one that defies description. All your warriors, and the enemy, too, stop fighting and become mere spectators of the duel between these two ornaments of war. Alambusha shoots ten arrows at Satyaki, which that bull of Sini's race destroys with his own shafts before they reach him.

Once more, Alambusha draws his bowstring to his ear and, with the force of fire or the wind, strikes Satyaki with three beautifully winged arrows that burn like fire and pierce Yuyudhana's kavacha and bore into his body. He next strikes Satyaki's four white horses, each with a vicious barb. Satyaki, endued with tejas and urjas like Kesava himself, looses four shafts to slaughter Alambusha's horses. With a broad-headed arrow, he strikes off Alambusha's head, handsome as the full moon and fierce as the Yuga-fire.

Having slain the descendant of a long line of kings, the Yadu bull forges on in Arjuna's wake, killing countless enemy warriors at will as he goes. Indeed, the Vrishni hero destroys your forces like a hurricane dispersing masses of clouds. Wherever this lion among men wants to go, his resplendent Sindhu horses, white as milk of the kunda snow, take him.

Then all the leaders of your various akshauhinis surround Satyaki and inundate him with arrows. Dusasana in particular attacks the Yadava fiercely. Satyaki, however, is undaunted and swiftly checks them all with fire tides from his impressive bow. Turning on Dusasana, he kills your son's horses. Watching him, Arjuna and Krishna are filled with joy.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Then the great archers of the Trigarta country, their banners woven with golden thread, surround the mighty-armed Satyaki, who has accomplished everything that was required of him, indeed far more, and now attacks Dusasana and his legion to lend Arjuna his support. They blockade him from all sides with a multitude of rathas and cover him with a barrage of arrows. The peerless, radiant Satyaki, having blasted his way through the Bharata army, which is like a shoreless sea, which is filled with the sound of twanging bowstrings, which bristles with swords, darts and maces, by himself vanquishes those fifty Trigarta princes.

Ah, Sini's grandson is past being merely wonderful, and so swift, effortless and light are his movements that he flits in moments from west to east, north to south, back to east to west again, as well as the other subsidiary directions, and the shura seems to dance all over the battlefield, as if he is a hundred warriors in his single self. Finding Satyaki with tread of a lion, the Trigarta warriors cannot withstand his dexterity and flee towards a greater division of their own countrymen.

Next the valiant Surasenas try to stop Satyaki, covering him with dark arrow showers. The noble Satyaki quells them in no time and then dashes against the Kalingas and, smashing his way through their mighty legions, he finally reaches Dhananjaya! Like a tired swimmer arriving ashore, the very sight of Dhananjaya, tiger among men, comforts the brilliant Satyaki.

Seeing him approach, Krishna says to Arjuna, “Here comes the grandson of Sini, following in your wake. Satyaki is your disciple and friend, and he has consumed the Kaurava warriors like straw to find you. Past all count are those that he has slain on his way here. This Satyaki comes to you, O Arjuna, after vanquishing Drona himself and Kritavarman of the Bhojas with his arrows!

Intent on achieving Yudhishtira’s weal, the brave and irresistible Yuyudhana comes to you after killing countless maharathas!

Having achieved the most difficult feats in the midst of the Kaurava troops, the dashing Satyaki has come to gaze on you, O son of Pandu!

Having, from a single ratha, fought and defeated so many mighty maharathas, with Drona himself at their head, does Satyaki come to you, O Partha!

Sent by Yudhishtira, Satyaki comes to you, Arjuna, after razing a vast portion of the Kaurava army all on his own. Invincible in battle, Satyaki, whom no Kaurava warrior can match, flies to join you after decimating Duryodhana’s vast legions. Look where he comes like a lion charging out of a herd of cattle.

Having strewn the earth with the heads of thousands of kings, all handsome as full-blown lotuses, does our Yuyudhana come to meet you, O Partha, after vanquishing Duryodhana himself and his brothers, and having killed Jalasandha. Having let flow a gruesome river of blood on Kurukshetra, mired with a sludge of corpses of men and beasts, ruins of rathas, look where he flashes towards you in joy!”

But Arjuna shows no great joy. He says somberly to Krishna, “I am hardly pleased to see Satyaki arrive here! I do not know how my brother Yudhishtira is. Now that he is separated from Satyaki, I doubt that he is alive. Satyaki should have protected the king. Why then, O Krishna, has he left Yudhishtira to follow in my wake, leaving the king at Drona’s mercy?

I have not yet killed Jayadratha and look where Bhurisravas now attacks Satyaki. I must now protect Satyaki as well while the sun sinks lower in the sky by the moment and I have yet to kill Jayadratha. As for Satyaki, he is weary; he has exhausted his astras, and his horses and his charioteer are worn out, O Madhava! Bhurisravas, on the other hand, is not tired and he has supporters behind him. How will Satyaki defeat him?

Having crossed the very ocean of war by himself, will this bull among the Sinis not succumb? Bhurisravas is beyond doubt among the greatest Kuru warriors. Will fortune favour Satyaki against this mighty hero? O Kesava, I think Yudhishtira has erred in his judgement to send Satyaki out here to us. Forgetting his fear of the Acharya, he has sent away Satyaki from his side. Like a sky-ranging hawk after a peace of meat, Drona is always waiting for an opportunity to seize my brother. Is the king free from danger, Krishna?"'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Satyaki, the invincible Satwata, riding to join Arjuna, Bhurisravas swiftly advances on him and says, "It is fate that has brought you within my grasp and today I will fulfil my long-cherished wish. If you do not flee from battle, you will not escape me with your life. And by killing you who are so proud of your valour, I will gladden Duryodhana's heart. Krishna and Arjuna will see you lying dead on the field riddled with my arrows.

Hearing that I have killed you will disgrace Yudhishtira, who sent you here. Arjuna will see my prowess when he sees you lying dead on the earth, covered in blood. I have always wanted to face you in a battle, like the one between Sakra and Bali during the Devasura yuddha of old. Today, Satwata, you will feel my prowess! And then you will understand the true measure of my might and manliness.

Slain by me, Yuyudhana, you will find yourself in Yamaloka, even as Ravana's son Indrajit did when Lakshmana killed him. Today, Krishna, Partha and Dharmaraja Yudhishtira will watch you die and, grief-stricken, they will concede this war. Killing you today, O Madhava, I will bring joy to the wives of all those whom you have killed. Now that you are in my sight like a deer before a lion, you will not escape with your life.”

Hearing this, Satyaki, O Rajan, laughs, “O Kurusattama, I am not frightened by my enemies’ arrows and I hardly fear your words! Only he who can vanquish me at arms can kill me, and such a one will always be victorious. What use your long-winded vainglorious bragging, O Bhurisravas? Let me see your deeds not tire of your empty threats, which are like autumn cloud that fetch no rain.

Listening to you, O Kshatriya, and your hollow roars, I can only laugh. Let us fight like men and have between us the duel that you have so long wanted. My heart also longs for this battle; let us not delay! And I solemnly swear, O wretched Bhurisravas, that I will not leave this place without killing you.”

And those bulls among men, both excited and charged with old animosity, unleash fiery storms of arrows at each other. Somadatta’s son Bhurisravas, who has been resting while Satyaki fought his way through the entire Kuru host, draws first blood. He plunges ten pugnacious shafts into Satyaki’s body, and then covers the tired Yadava in a haze of arrows.

Satyaki, summoning deep resources, invokes an astra, which quells Bhurisravas’ arrow storm before it can fall on him. And then, we watch those two shuras, enhancers of the fame and honour of the Kuru and Vrishni vamsas, fight a duel that lights up the swiftly dimming sky. They mangle each other with utmost rancour and ferocity. Quickly, blood spurts richly from both in this fresh game of death, with their lives for the wager.

Like wild tigers, like great tuskers, leaders of their clans, the two heroes battle, both ardent for either victory or death, while Kurukshetra echoes with their yells and roars, while all the Dhartarashtra army watches them transfixed, the other maharathas delighted by the sublime duel. Then each one kills the other’s horses and destroys the other’s bow, and now they fight with swords ringing together with sparks flying brightly at each dreadful stroke.

Having taken up two great and handsome shields and two shining blue swords, they stalk each other in circles, and in parallel lines, then suddenly fly at each other striking out with fabulous skill and strength. Both master swordsmen, they put their lofty skills on display. They wheel about, make side-thrusts, rush forward abruptly, and spring high into the air to strike one another, both intent on having the other’s life. And having lashed out with their blades and parried the other's strokes, they pause to rest, their gazes locked like other blades all the while.

Truly like superb dancers they are, and all the other fighting men around them their awed audience. After a brief moment's pause, the wonderful exhibition of prowess erupts again and they carve each other's beautiful shields emblazoned with a hundred moons into pieces, until both shields are useless strips, which they fling away, and their swords have been broken as well. And then they rush at each other to wrestle with bare hands.

Both wide-chested and long-armed, both equally magnificent wrestlers, they grapple. They strike each other stupendous blows and seize one another by the throat, with their arms hard as iron that resemble spiked maces. Their skills and prowess, their speed and ferocity enthrall those that watch.

Loud and fearful are their roars, yes, like thunder falling upon the mountain breast. Like two elephants goring each other with their tusks, or like two bulls locking horns, the two most illustrious Kuru and the Satwata heroes at times struggle with brawny arms entwined, at other butt heads, intertwine massive legs, now slapping their armpits in bravado, sometimes clawing each other with their nails, sometimes clasping each other in tight holds, or twining their legs round each other's waists, at others rolling on the ground locked together, sometimes advancing, sometimes retreating, sometimes rising up to their full height, and at other leaping into the air and then colliding thunderously.

Indeed, they employ all the thirty different kinds of expert tactics that characterise such encounters between masters of the art of wrestling.

When Satyaki exhausts his weapons during his duel with Bhurisravas, Krishna says to Arjuna, "Look at Satyaki, best of all archers, fighting without a chariot. He has scythed through the Bharata host, following in your wake, O son of Pandu! He has fought all the Bharata maharathas and, now in exhaustion, meets the mighty Bhurisravas, the giver of bounteous dakshina at yagnas."

The formidable Bhurisravas, excited with wrath, vigorously strikes Satyaki, Rajan, like an infuriated elephant dashing against another, blow after staggering blow. The two battle on, with Krishna and Arjuna watching.

Then Krishna says urgently to Arjuna, "Look where Satyaki, tiger of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, is succumbing to Somadatta's son. Exhausted after his superhuman exploits, he has now lost his ratha. Arjuna, you must protect your devoted sishya otherwise Bhurisravas, of countless yagnas, will have his life. Mahabaho, you must hurry!"

But Arjuna says quite cheerfully to Krishna, "The bull of the Kurus and the best of the Vrishnis sport wonderfully with each other, like a crazed elephant and a mighty lion in the forest!"

Just then, loud cries ring out from the troops, O Bharatarishabha, for suddenly Bhurisravas unleashes a flurry of thunderous blows to Satyaki's head and face and fells him to the ground. And like a lion dragging an elephant, the mighty Bhurisravas, giver of lavish dakshina at yagnas, roughly drags the supine Satyaki around as he likes, roaring in glee as he humiliates the noble Yadava before your troops.

Then Bhurisravas draws another sword from its sheath, seizes Satyaki by his hair of his head and, setting his foot upon his chest, draws his arm back to cut the Vrishni's head, its earrings glittering, from his trunk. But, fighting to save his life, Satyaki whirls his head around a few times and with it Bhurisravas's arm that grasps his hair, even like a potter wheel being whirled along with the staff.

Seeing Bhurisravas coarsely drag Satyaki along the ground, Krishna says again to Arjuna, "Bhurisravas is about to kill Yuyudhana. The very name Satyaki means the invincible one, and that name will be proven false is the wretched Bhurisravas kills my kinsman, your disciple."

At this, Arjuna mentally salutes Bhurisravas, thinking, "I am pleased that Bhurisravas, enhancer of the fame of the Kurus, is dragging Satyaki across the ground, as if in sport, without killing him."

Silently admiring his kinsman, the Kuru tiger, Arjuna replies to Krishna, "My eyes are fixed on the Sindhus, and I cannot, O Madhava, see Satyaki. Yet, for his sake and for yours, I will achieve an impossible feat."

Then, in obedience to his Lord and charioteer, Krishna the Avatara, Arjuna, although he truly cannot see Satyaki, in a blur looses a blind shaft from the Gandiva, which, like a meteor falling from the sky, hacks off Bhurisravas's bejewelled arm with the sword in its hand in a bloody eruption.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Severed by the unseen Arjuna's sudden shaft, Bhurisravas's angada-decked arm, still grasping the sword, which was raised to hew off Satyaki's head, falls onto the ground like a five-headed snake. The Kuru warrior turns around in shock and wrathfully reproves the son of Pandu.

Bhurisravas says, "O son of Kunti, what is this cruel and heartless thing you have done, for without engaging me in battle, you cut off my arm in stealth? Will you not have to say to Yudhishtira Dharmaputra, 'I killed Bhurisravas while he fought another battle?'

Were you not taught the astra shastra by the noble Indra, by Rudra, by Drona, and by Kripa? In this world, you know the dharma of war better than anyone else does. How then have you cut off the arm of a warrior who was not fighting you? Dharma requires that one should never strike those who are unaware, those that are afraid, those who are without a chariot, those who beg for life or protection, or those who are suffering. How then, O Partha, have you done this heinous, sinful and cowardly thing that only the most lowborn, ignoble and evil wretch would do?

Dhananjaya, an upright man can easily achieve a noble feat, while a dishonourable sinful deed he can do only with great pain to himself.

A man quickly adopts the behaviour of those with whom he moves. This is surely seen in you, O Arjuna! Being of royal lineage and born especially into Kuru's race, you have forgotten the dharma of a Kshatriya, although you are known for your purity and keep stern vratas. I have no doubt that you have done this vile thing, for Satyaki's sake, at Krishna's word. Who other than a friend of Krishna's would inflict such an injury upon one who was unaware of you and fighting another battle? The Vrishnis and the Andhakas are base Kshatriyas, always engaged in sinful deeds, and are, by nature, given to disreputable conduct. Why, O noble Arjuna, have you taken them to be your models?"

Arjuna replies, "My lord Bhurisravas, it is evident from all the senseless words you utter, that with the decrepitude of the body one's intellect also becomes feeble. Although you know Hrishikesa and me well, how is it that you rebuke us like this? Knowing as I do the dharma of war and conversant as I am with the meaning of all the scriptures, I would never commit a sin in battle. You of all men know this well, and you still reproach me.

The Kshatriyas fight their foes, surrounded by their own followers, their brothers, sires, sons, relatives, kinsmen, companions, and friends. They fight, relying on the strength of their leaders. Why then should I not protect Satyaki, my disciple and dear kinsman, who is fighting for our sake without caring for his life? Invincible in battle, Satyaki is like my very right hand. In war one should not look out only for oneself, but also protect those that fight for one's cause, risking their very lives.

This is what ensures that the king is protected in the press of battle. If I had not intervened when I saw Satyaki on the point of being killed, I would have been responsible for his death and would have grievously sinned for my negligence! You know all this, then why are you angry with me for saving Satyaki?

Again, you reprimand me, O king, saying, 'Though I was fighting another, you cut off my arm without challenging me first.'

In this matter, my answer is that I erred in my judgement. Sometimes adjusting my armour; sometimes riding on my ratha, sometimes drawing my bowstring, I am at war with my enemies in the midst of a host resembling the vast deep, full of rathas, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers and echoing with fierce shouts and roars. Among friends and enemies engaged with one another, how can you say that the Satwata warrior was fighting only one warrior? Having fought many and vanquished many maharathas, Satyaki is tired, wounded and disheartened.

It is under such circumstances, and while you yourself had returned freshly to battle, that you vanquished the mighty Yuyudhana and sought to display your superiority. You were about to behead him with your sword and I could not stand by and watch that with indifference, for Satyaki is my friend and my sishya and as dear to me as my brothers. You should rather rebuke yourself that you did not take care to defend yourself while attacking another. Indeed, O Shura, I ask how, if you were in my place, how you would have behaved towards someone who depends on you as Satyaki does on me?"

Thus addressed by Arjuna, the mighty-armed and illustrious Bhurisravas, who bears the device of the sacrificial stake on his banner, leaves Satyaki, and decides to die according to the vow of praya, to starve and, here, to bleed to death. A Kshatriya distinguished by many righteous deeds, he spreads with a bed of arrows for himself with his left hand, and looking to ascend into Brahmaloka, he relinquishes his senses to the care of the deities that preside over them. Fixing his gaze on the sun, setting his cleansed heart on the moon, and meditating on the mantras in the great Upanishad, Bhurisravas sits down on the bed of arrows, yokes himself in yoga, and stops speaking.

Seeing this, your entire army, led by your sons, begins to curse Krishna and Dhananjaya and to laud Bhurisravas, bull among men. Though roundly censured, the two Krishnas speak not a word distasteful to the dying hero. Bhurisravas, also, although thus lauded, feels no joy.

Then Arjuna cannot bear to listen to the curses of your sons, and what Bhurisravas said to him. Without anger and only grief in his heart, as if to remind them all, Arjuna says, "All the kings know my solemn vow that no one will succeed in killing anybody from our army within range of my bow. Knowing this, Bhurisravas, it is not appropriate, without properly understanding the laws of dharma, for one to censure others. That I have cut off your arm while you, well armed in battle, were on the point of slaying the unarmed Satyaki is not at all contrary to dharma. But what righteous man is there that would applaud the slaughter of Abhimanyu, a mere child, unarmed, deprived of his ratha, and without his armour by six maharathas uniting against him while he stood helpless?"

Hearing this, Bhurisravas of dazzling effulgence, touches the ground with his left palm—for the right one has been lost—and remains silent, with his head hanging down.

Then Arjuna says, "O eldest brother of Sala, the love I have for you is equal to what I bear Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, Bhima, Nakula, or Sahadeva. I now say to you, as does the illustrious Krishna: Go, O sire, to the realm of the righteous, and join Sibi, the son of Usinara, there!'

Krishna says, "You have constantly performed yagnas and agnihotras. Go straight into my pure realms that blaze with endless splendour, which the greatest deities, even Brahma, wish for, become equal to me, borne on the back of Garuda."

Meanwhile, Satyaki rises to his feet and, his eyes burning, draws his sword to cut off the noble, sinless head of Bhurisravas, who now sits in yoga with his senses withdrawn from battle, blood gushing from where Arjuna hacked away his right arm. All the maharathas cry out to Satyaki to stop: Krishna and Arjuna, as well as Bhima, Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, Aswatthaman, Kripa, Karna, Vrishasena and even Jayadratha. Even the other troops, watching aghast, forbid him. But Satyaki hews off Bhirusravas's head in a crimson blast even as that great Kuru sits in praya, lost in dhyana to free his soul from his body. Cries of outrage fill Kurukshetra.

The Siddhas, the Charanas, and all the fighting men, as also the Devas witness the slaying of Bhurisravas even as he sits with his eyes shut and his senses withdrawn in deep dhyana, and all of them laud that great Kuru.

Your soldiers argue the matter. "It is not Satyaki's fault; what was fated has happened. We must not yield to wrath, for anger is the root of men's sorrow. Brahma ordained that Satyaki would kill Bhurisravas in battle and there is no point in our judging what inevitably transpired."

Satyaki rages, "You sinful Kaurava wretches! You wear the outward garment of dharma, and tell me sanctimoniously that I should not have killed Bhurisravas. But where did this dharma of yours go when you slew that child, Subhadra's son Abhimanyu, while he was unarmed?

Once in a mood of pride, I vowed that I would kill anyone who flings me down alive in battle and kicks me, even if that enemy should take praya or even sannyasa. While I still struggled against Bhurisravas to stay alive, you thought me dead. This was your folly. O you Kuru bulls, the death of Bhurisravas at my hand is just and in accord with dharma!

I would have killed him anyway, but Arjuna deprived me of my glory by cutting off his arm out of his love for me and his vow to protect all that fight for Yudhishtira. Indeed, what is ordained must come to pass. Everything is destiny; fate has slain Bhurisravas in the press of battle. What sin have I committed?

Once upon a time, Valmiki sang this verse: 'You say, O Vanara, that women should not be killed. However, in all the ages, men should always and without fail do whatever brings pain to his enemies.'"

After Satyaki speaks in his ringing voice, none among the Pandavas and the Kauravas, O Rajan, say anything. However, in their hearts they are with Bhurisravas because no one there approves of Yuyudhana killing one who was like a Rishi made holy by countless yagnas, Bhurisravas who gave away incalculable gold during all his sacrifices, and who was purified beyond all common measure by the holiest mantras. The head of that hero, graced with rich blue locks and eyes red as those of a pigeon, now looks like the head of a horse decapitated at an Aswamedha yagna and placed on the sacrificial altar. Sanctified by his prowess and by the death he obtains at the edge of a weapon, the boon-giving Bhurisravas, worthy of every boon, casts off his body and ascends into swarga, sanctifying the exalted realms with his high punya.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Having crossed the ocean of the Kaurava army, unvanquished even by Drona, Karna, Vikarna or Kritavarman, to keep his word given to Yudhishtira, how was it that the heroic Satyaki was humiliated by Bhurisravas and flung down on the ground and almost killed?'

Sanjaya replies, 'Listen, Rajan, to the antecedents of Sini's grandson Bhurisravas. Maharishi Atri had a son called Soma, the Moon, and Soma's son was called Budha. Budha had one son, of the splendour of Indra, called Pururavas. Pururavas had a son called Ayus whose son was Nahusha. Nahusha's son was Yayati, a Rajarishi equal to a Deva. Yayati and his wife Devayani's eldest son was Yadu. In Yadu's race was born a prince of the name of Devamidha, whose son Sura was acclaimed in the three worlds. Sura's son was the greatest of men, the celebrated Vasudeva. Sura himself was the equal of Kartavirya in battle. Sini was born into Sura's vamsa, equal to Sura in tejas!

About this time, Rajan, there occurred the swayamvara of the noble Devaka's daughter Devaki, to which all the great Kshatriyas of the world came. During that swayamvara, Sini vanquished all the others and, for Vasudeva's sake, swept the princess Devaki into his chariot. Seeing Devaki in Sini's ratha, that bull among men, the mahatejasvin Somadatta could not bear the sight and he challenged Sini to a match of wrestling, which lasted half a day and was stunning and wonderful to witness. During the wrestling, Sini threw Somadatta down on the earth. Lifting up his sword and seizing him by the hair, Sini kicked his adversary before the many thousands of kings who stood as spectators all around. Finally, out of compassion, Sini spared Somadatta's life, saying in contempt, "Live!"

Humiliated by Sini, Somadatta worshipped Mahadeva for his blessings so he could avenge himself on Sini. Mahadeva, the great Lord of all boon-giving deities, was pleased with him and asked him what boon he wished. The royal Somadatta asked for his boon: "I want a son, O Divine Lord, who will strike Sini's son down in the midst of thousands of kings and kick him with his foot."

Mahadeva Siva said, "Tathaastu! So be it," and vanished from Somadatta's sight. It was from Siva's boon that the most noble and benign Bhurisravas was born as Somadatta's son. And that is also why Bhurisravas was able to fling down Sini's grandson Satyaki in battle and kick him before the eyes of the whole army.

This is the story, Rajan, and indeed, other than for Siva's boon, not the greatest of warriors can conquer the Satwata hero Yuyudhana in battle. The Vrishni heroes are all superlative archers, and masters, besides, in every other form of warfare. They are conquerors of the very Devas, the Danavas and the Gandharvas. They are never nonplussed and always fight, relying upon their own prowess and are never dependent on others. There is no one in this world equal to the Vrishnis. None, O Bharatarishabha, has been, is, or will be equal in might to the Vrishnis. They never show disrespect to their relatives and they are always obedient to the commands of their elders. When the very Devas, Asuras, Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Uragas and the Rakshasas cannot vanquish the Vrishni heroes in battle, what need be said of men?

They never covet the possessions of those whom they help in distress. Devoted to the Brahmanas and truthful in speech, they never display any pride although they are wealthy. The Vrishnis regard even the strong as weak and rescue them from their troubles. Always devoted to the Devas, they are self-restrained, charitable, and free from pride. This is why the abilities of the Vrishnis are never questioned. A man may uproot the mountains of Meru or swim across the ocean, but no one can defeat the Vrishnis. I believe I have cleared all your doubts, Rajan. However, O king of the Kurus, remember that all that is happening is due to your evil policy!'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'After the great Kuru warrior Bhurisravas is killed, under these extraordinary circumstances, tell me, Sanjaya, how the battle progresses.'

Sanjaya replies, 'After Bhurisravas left for the next world, Bhaarata, Mahabaho Arjuna says to Krishna, "Urge the horses, Lord, to greater speed to take me to Jayadratha, for the sun sinks swiftly towards the Asta hills. O Naravyaghra, I have yet to fulfil my vow and many maharathas still protect Jayadratha. Ah, we must fly, Krishna, racing the sun to the horizon for I must kill the Saindhava before Surya Deva sets."

Flicking his reins and whip, Krishna, greatest of all sarathies, spurs his silver horses, white as moonbeams, towards Jayadratha's chariot. At once, many great Kuru rathikas like Duryodhana, Karna, Vrishasena and, now, Jayadratha himself dash forward to stop Arjuna's careen. Finally, Arjuna sees Jayadratha before him, and glares at him fearfully, as if to burn him up with his very gaze.

Duryodhana quickly tells Karna, "O son of Vikartana, the critical hour is upon us. Now show us your true prowess, beloved friend, and ensure that Arjuna does not kill Jayadratha! The day is about to end, so cover the Pandava with clouds of arrows and slow him down! If we can protect Jayadratha until the sun sets, Arjuna would have failed to fulfil his oath, and he will take his own life by immolating himself, and then victory will be ours! For Arjuna's brothers, with all their followers, will hardly last a few moments in a world without him. And upon the death of Pandu's sons, we will enjoy the whole Earth, Karna, with her mountains, waters and forests, and without any thorn in our sides and no limit to our power!

Arjuna swore his oath in anger at his son's death; he became fate's victim for he took leave in his grief of his judgement. Karna, I have no doubt that fate favoured us at that moment, for Pandu's son, the Kiritin swore his vow to kill Jayadratha only for his own destruction.

How, when you, my great Karna, are alive, will Arjuna succeed in killing the Saindhava before the sun sets behind the Asta hills? How will he kill him when Salya of the Madras and the illustrious Kripa protect Jayadratha? How will Arjuna, who is being led to his death by fate, even reach Jayadratha when Aswatthaman, Dusasana and I protect him? Many are the heroes among us who are engaged in this battle and the sun hangs low in the sky and plummets towards the sunset mountain.

Partha will not even come near Jayadratha. So, Karna, summon your greatest determination and resolution, along with me and our other brave maharathas like Drona's son, the king of the Madras and Kripa, and resist Arjuna with all your might."

Karna replies, "Deeply has my body been injured by mighty Bhimasena, who is more of an archer that I had dreamt. I am still in battle because it is ordained that I should be here. Pain wracks my every limb from Bhima's arrows. Yet, for you I will fight with all my might. My life itself is for you and I will do everything in my power to ensure that Arjuna, greatest of the sons of Pandu, does not succeed in killing Jayadratha.

As long as I am able to fight, the ambidextrous Savyasachin, who looses his arrows with equal facility with both his hands, will not reach the king of the Sindhus. Kurusathama, all that one who bears you the great love that I do, and is always concerned for your welfare, I will do. As for victory, that depends on destiny. I will exert myself to my utmost for Jayadratha's sake and for yours. Victory, however, is dependent on fate.

Fear not, Naravyaghra, I will fight Arjuna today for you as I have never fought before. Yet, fate and fate alone will decide who wins or loses. O king of the Kurus, let all our troops witness today the fierce battle between me and Arjuna, which will make their very hair stand on end."

While Karna and your son are thus speaking together, Arjuna begins to slaughter your host again, hewing off the great arms of helpless heroes, arms like spiked clubs or the trunks of elephants. He cuts off heads, as well as actual trunks of elephants, beheads horses, and carves up the akshas of rathas all around, as well as blood-dyed horsemen armed with spears and javelins. From horses and the best of elephants, standards, royal parasols, bows, yak-tails and heads fall thick and fast on all sides. Consuming your army like a wind-fanned great fire a heap of dry grass, the invincible Arjuna covers the earth with blood, and swiftly reaches Jayadratha.

Protected by Bhimasena and Satyaki, Arjuna looks as glorious as Agni himself. Seeing Arjuna thus ablaze, the mightiest bowmen of your army, bulls among men, endowed with great energy, cannot face him at all. Then the maharathas Duryodhana, Karna, Vrishasena, Salya and Aswatthaman set Jayadratha behind them and surround Krishna and the Kiritin, who dances wildly on his ratha to the savage, reverberant music of the Gandiva's bowstring and the slap of his palms against that incomparable weapon.

Arjuna is like Death himself, with open maw, come hunting the trembling Sindhu king. The sun turns red in the sky and, wanting it to set quickly, the Kaurava warriors bend their bows with arms that resemble the tapering bodies of Nagas and cover Partha with hundreds of arrows like the very rays of the setting sun. That peerless one, however, dissects every shaft into two, three, or eight slivers, and gashes the bowmen with his raking shafts.

Aswatthaman, who flies a lion's tail on his banner, charges at Arjuna, striking him with ten whistling barbs and Krishna with seven and barring Arjuna's way to Jayadratha. Quickly, many Kurus hem Arjuna in with a mass of rathas. Stretching their bows to the fullest and shooting countless arrows, they shield Jayadratha from the Pandava, at your son's command.

And now we witness glorious Arjuna's unearthly genius; we witness the might of the Gandiva and see how his magical twin quivers well inexhaustibly with arrows. Confounding the high weapons of Aswatthaman and Kripa, he pierces all the warriors that surround him with nine bolts of thunder each. Drona's son pierces him with five and twenty arrows, Vrishasena with seven, Duryodhana with twenty, Karma and Salya with three each. And all of them roar at him and, shaking their bows, hem him in closer still and continue to strike him frequently.

They draw their rathas up in serried ranks around Arjuna and, willing the sun to set quickly, those great maharathas of the Kaurava army roar awfully at Arjuna and lash him with dense gusts of arrows. These intrepid, mighty warriors, their arms like maces, loose devastras at the battling Dhananjaya.

But the relucent Arjuna shatters all their missiles, mundane and unworldly; breaking through the encirclement of chariots he rides straight at Jayadratha. Then Karna appears as if out of nowhere, and stops Arjuna with a towering gale of arrows, in the very sight of Bhimasena and Satyaki. Arjuna cuts these arrows down and strikes Karna, before all the troops, with ten steaming shafts. Satyaki drills the Sutaputra with three stinging barbs. Bhimasena pierces him with three arrows, and Arjuna, again, with seven.

An unfazed Karna, fighting for his beloved Duryodhana to save Jayadratha's life, unleashes sixty terrific arrows, each, at Arjuna, Bhima and Satyaki. In moments, the battle between the lone Karna and his three adversaries swells to momentous proportions. Karna's skill that we then see is wondrous, as, mad with battle lust, he singly resists those three matchless maharathas.

Then Arjuna looses a torrid volley at Karna, piercing him through every limb. Bathed in blood, the Suta's son gores Arjuna with fifty lofty arrows. Arjuna breaks his bow and bloodies his chest with shafts. Seeing how the sun plunges towards the sunset mountain, Arjuna unleashes a devastra at Karna, to kill him with that single missile incandescent as the very sun. It flies inexorably towards Karna and the Dhartarashtras hold their breath for they are certain he will die. But then, from a side Drona's son Aswatthaman bisects that flaming astra and it falls tamely to the ground.

Karna takes up another bow and envelops Arjuna with a swath of thousands of arrows. Like the wind dispersing a locust swarm, Arjuna shoots them all down and covers Karna with his own arrow storms. Karna, destroyer of armies, shreds these in flight and returns Arjuna's fire, shaft for shaft. Roaring at each other like two mighty bulls, those incomparable maharathas obscure the sky with clouds of arrows. Each made invisible by the other's rain of shafts, they continue their transcendent duel, often shouting taunts at each other.

Ah, Rajan, surely unearthly is the duel between Karna and Arjuna, for each is a match of the other and they put forth their best skills and strength. All the others around stand disbelieving of what they see, lowering their own weapons and gazing at the luculent contention. Applauded by Siddhas, Charanas and Pannagas, the two fight at the limits of their prowess, entirely absorbed, each bent on killing the other.

Then Duryodhana says to his maharathas, “Do everything you can to protect Karna, for Vrisha has sworn that he will not rest until he has killed Arjuna.”

With the sun plunging down every moment, Arjuna kills Karna’s horses and with a broad-headed arrow, he fells Karna’s charioteer from his niche in the ratha. Before Duryodhana’s eyes, Arjuna Swetavahana shrouds Karna in a blizzard of arrows, overwhelming him so he stands helpless and stunned. Seeing this, Aswatthaman dashes up and, mounting Drona’s son’s chariot the two continue to assail Arjuna.

Salya of the Madras pierces Arjuna with thirty arrows while Kripacharya strikes Krishna with twenty telling shafts and Partha with a dozen. Still from a fair distance, joining the battle to save his life, Jayadratha now shoots the two Krishnas with four barbs each; Vrishasena also rakes them both with seven shafts. Radiant Arjuna lacerates them all in return—Aswatthaman with four and sixty tremendous arrows, Salya with a hundred, Jayadratha with ten flat-headed ones, Vrishasena with three and Saradwata’s son with twenty. The lustrous Dhananjaya throws back his head and roars.

Intent on stopping the Pandava from fulfilling his vow, your warriors swarm at him from all sides. And now, terrifying the Dhartarashtras, Arjuna invokes the great Varunastra, which radiates an awesome tide of fluid arrows all around his chariot. Well aware of what is at stake and that they need only contain the godly Pandava for a brief while before the sun sets, the Kauravas withstand his occult flashflood and continue to advance upon him.

Arjuna Kiritin remains serene and intent on his single purpose; arrows of all sorts, high and plain, continue to flare from the Gandiva, darkening all the field, all the directions.

The sky, dense with shafts, is ablaze with meteors and on the ghastly ground innumerable crows alight from the sky to perch on fresh corpses, picking out eyes and swallowing them whole before setting their black beaks to work on noble steaming flesh. And Arjuna continues to provide a grisly feast for these and other birds and beasts of carrion with the Gandiva, why, like Mahadeva slaying the Asuras with his Pinaka with the tawny string. So many great Kuru maharathas, riding their best horses and elephants the inescapable Pandava sends to Yama.

Then a host of kings, taking up heavy maces and clubs of iron and swords and darts and different kinds of powerful weapons of terrible forms, rush suddenly at Partha. Bending the Gandiva Arjuna consumes them all, now uncanny laughter bubbling up in him as if at some great intuition of success; he never ceases devouring your troops with their rathas, elephants, foot-soldiers and supporting bowmen and swell the population of Yama's domain.'"

"Sanjaya continues, 'Hearing the twang of Dhananjaya's bow, which is like the beckoning of Death himself, or the frightful peal of Indra's thunder, your army, Rajan, is like an ocean swept by a tempest of mountainous waves that surges up at the Yuganta. Krishna pilots Arjuna's ratha across Kurukshetra so that he seems to be in a hundred places at once, and from a hundred places apparently do his tides of arrows flare sowing death in every shaft. A hundred Gandivas afire appear all around, all bent in a constant circle, all spewing relentless, ceaseless waves of flame.

Arjuna invokes the Aindrastra, lancing terror through your legions. A hundred thousand flaming arrows issue from that fulminant celestial weapon and fetch fresh carnage to your army; so brilliant is that astra that no one can bear to look at it and then death comes for them in the twinkling of an eye. Arjuna traverses Kurukshetra at will, driven by his sarathy the Avatara, his prowess on full display, scattering the darkness that the Kauravas caused with their arrows, which no other can disperse even in imagination. But Arjuna, with his elemental devastras, summoned with ringing mantras, dispels the sinister Kaurava darkness as Surya Deva does the night when he rises over it.

Arjuna evaporates the lives of your warriors like the summer sun the waters of tanks and lakes. He mantles your legions with his shafts like the sun does the earth with his rays. With other precise arrows he enters and breaks the hearts of great enemies, even like beloved friends! He consumes your akshauhinis as a blazing fire does swarms of insects.

Devouring the lives of his enemies and their fame, Partha rides like Death embodied over Kurukshetra. He severs crowned heads, massive arms adorned with angadas, and long-lobed noble ears with earrings. He hacks away the arms of elephant-riders clutching spears to cast at him; those of horsemen with javelins clasped to fling at him; those of foot-soldiers with shields to stop his arrows; those of maharathas with mighty bows; and those of charioteers and mahouts with whips and goads. He is scintillating, a conflagration burning your army with incessant flames.

For all their resolve, the hostile Kauravas cannot even look at Arjuna, greatest of all warriors, the shura equal to Indra, the greatest bull among men. One sees him everywhere at the same time, dancing on his ratha, with no moment's pause in his apocalyptic rant of lucific astras. Ah, my lord, he is handsome, he is beautiful, and he is godly: the Kiritin like some banks of massed thunderheads adorned with many rainbows, for he is in so many places at once, in this hour that he was born for, that he learnt and suffered for.

Arjuna's immaculate inundation of devastras sees many great warriors shrink in fright, as he makes an unfordable morass upon the field of dharma and death. Strewn with elephants whose trunks or tusks have been severed, with horses that have lost hooves and heads, with rathas smashed in smithereens, eviscerated warriors with entrails hanging out, and others with legs hacked off, with corpses of men and besats lying, either still forever or convulsed in death's last throes, the vast field of Kurukshetra, which Arjuna bestraddles, resembles the coveted arena of Death, increasing the terror of the timid, or the sporting ground of Rudra when he devastated all creatures in time out of mind.

Parts of the field, strewn with the trunks of elephants cut off with razor-headed arrows, look as if scattered with thick snakes. Portions covered with the dissevered heads of warriors, look as if spread with garlands of lotuses. Variegated with beautiful head-gear, crowns, keyuras, angadas and ratha-rings with coats of mail decked with gold and with the trappings and other ornaments of elephants and horses, and scattered over with hundreds of coronets lying everywhere, the Earth looks beautiful like a new bride!

Arjuna has a gory river flow, like the Vaitarani itself and affrights the timid. The marrow and fat of men and animals forms its mire, blood its current, and limbs and bones fill it and moment by moment it grows fathomless in depth. The hairs of the dead, men and beasts, are its moss, weeds; heads and arms form the rocks and stones on its shores, and standards, and banners that brightly colour its appearance deck it. Royal parasols and bows are its wavelets and it abounds with the vast corpses of dead elephants and teems with rathas that float like countless rafts on its surface.

The carcasses of countless horses forms its banks and it is impassable because of the wheels, yokes, shafts, akshas and kuveras of rathas, and from spears, swords, darts, battle-axes and snake-like arrows. Ravens and kankas are its crocodiles, jackals, its terrible makaras, and fierce vultures, its sharks. It ripples and rings with the howls of jackals. It abounds with capering bhutas and pisachas, and thousands of other dreadful spirits that feed and drink blood from the numberless corpses of warriors that float upon it.

Seeing Arjuna's astounding prowess, the Vijaya whose visage resembles that of Yama himself, panic like never before. He obliterates all that comes before him; he seems to reveal himself truly now for what he is. His body is full of blinding light and none can even gaze upon him let alone face him in battle.

Intent on having Jayadratha's life before the sun sets, the Savyasachin demolishes all the great maharathas before him, stunning them with archery possibly never seen in this age of men. Dhananjaya, with Krishna for his charioteer, continues to blaze across Kurukshetra like streak lightning on the ground. His arrows, hundreds of thousands of them, cover the field in a cupola of endless death, his Gandiva always bent in an inscrutable circle of flames. And then blasting his bloody way through all the maharathas and other warriors arrayed in thousands before him, he finally arrives at where the terror-stricken Jayadratha is, and drills him with four and sixty deadly straight, light-swift shafts.

The Kuru warriors freeze, every one of them by now, those not dead, bleeding from Partha's arrows; they despair for Jayadratha's life. And maharatha Arjuna, greatest of victorious men, his astras blazing like pralaya fire, saturates your army with kabandhas, headless trunks of men, and fetches absolute havoc to your legions consisting of four kinds of forces.

He gashes Aswatthama with fifty thunderbolts, Vrishasena with three, mildly strikes Kripa with nine, Salya with sixteen and Karna with two and thirty. He plunges another sixty-four barbs deep into Jayadratha and gives a bloodcurdling roar. But now, actually faced with his shining hunter, Jayadratha's fear leaves him! Rage takes the place of terror, and, the Sindhu king who bears the emblem of the Varaha on his banner roars like a great tiger himself and unleashes a gale of arrows, vulture-feathered and hissing like venomous serpents, at Arjuna.

The Saindhava strikes Govinda with three shafts, Arjuna with six, Arjuna's horses with eight and his standard with one. Arjuna, unmoved, the hungry tiger, hacks away Jayadratha's sarathy's head with a wedge-tipped shaft and fells his flame like standard with another.

Meanwhile, the sun perches on the brim of the Asta mountains and Krishna tells Arjuna, "Look, Partha, they have set Jayadratha in the midst of six mighty maharathas and he waits there in fear. Bull among men, you will not be able to kill him without vanquishing the six. I will use my yoga shakti to hide the sun so everyone thinks Surya has set. They will all rejoice, thinking that, having failed to keep your vow, you will immolate yourself. Jayadratha will emerge from hiding and you must shoot him dead. Though it will seem as if night has fallen, know that the sun will not have set and kill the Saindhava!"

Arjuna replies, "Tathaastu. So be it!"

Then Krishna, the Mahatapasvin, creates darkness through his cosmic Yoga. Your warriors, O Rajan, think the sun has set and are ecstatic; they throw their heads back, including Jayadratha, gaze skywards, where the stars have appeared on high and cry out in celebration that Arjuna must now take his own life. Krishna says fiercely to Arjuna, "Look how the wretched Jayadratha look up at the sky and has lost his fear of you. Kill him now, Bhaarata. Cut off his head and fulfil your vow!"

Arjuna, in a fearsome blur, shining himself like the sun that has not truly set, strikes Kripa with twenty arrows, Karna with fifty, Salya and Duryodhana each with six, Vrishasena with eight and Jayadratha himself with sixty. Finding that he attacks them even after the sun has set, and like a great fire with its tongues of flame extended, the protectors of Jayadratha are perplexed. But they return his fire swiftly with torrents of arrows.

Shrouded by their mantle of shafts, and raging, Arjuna raises his prodigious archery and creating a mesh, a great net of intertwined flaming arrows, casts it over the Kuru maharathas. Having never seen the like of this, your warriors abandon Jayadratha in fear and flee in all directions, with no two heroes going the same way.

The prowess that Arjuna now displays is uncanny, unseen ever before and will never again be witnessed. Like Rudra himself slaughtering all creatures during the pralaya, Dhananjaya butchers elephants and elephant-riders, horses and horse-riders, maharathas and charioteers. I do not see, Rajan, a single elephant, horse or warrior that is not struck with Partha's arrows. Their vision blurred by dust and darkness, your warriors cannot distinguish one another in the sudden night, and strange blackness envelops their senses and mind as well.

Urged by fate, and with their bodies cut open and lacerated by Arjuna's arrows, they begin to wander like men in a dream, to limp and fall down. Some among them are paralysed and some deathly pale. During the ensuing carnage, Arjuna the Pandava showers, drenches the earth with rills of gore, while the air clears marvellously with the blood that sprays everywhere absorbing all the raised dust and a sudden gusting wind blowing the rest away. So deep is the river of blood that the wheels of chariots are mired almost fully and thousands of terror-stricken elephants thunder about in all directions, their limbs mangled, their riders slain, trumpeting horribly and trampling your own ranks as they go.

Horses without riders and foot-soldiers, too, as well as your great warriors, Rajan, all struck by Dhananjaya's arrows, flee in abject fear, abandoning the field, their hair dishevelled, their armour cut away and blood pouring from their wounds. Some stand frozen as if crocodiles from the macabre red river have seized their legs, while some others hide behind and under the bodies of dead elephants.

Routing your army thus, Rajan, Arjuna savagely attacks the six maharatha protectors of the Sindhu king—Karna, Aswatthaman, Kripa, Salya, Vrishasena and Duryodhana. So quicksilver is his archery that in a wink he shatters Karna's and Vrishasena's bows, and fells Salya's charioteer. With dreadful storms of shafts he deeply wounds Kripa and his nephew Aswatthaman.

All of them stricken, Arjuna invokes a mahastra of the splendour of Indra's Vajra, a great weapon that he has always worshipped with incense and garlands of flowers. He summons it with the most recondite mantras and affixes it to the Gandiva and we hear loud cries from the sky for that astra is bright and fiery as the sun himself.

Krishna says again to Arjuna, “Quick, Partha, cut Jayadratha’s head from his neck! The sun is about to set behind the Asta mountain, so listen to what I say to you now. Jayadratha’s father Vriddhakshatra is famed the world over. It was after a long time and tapasya that Jayadratha, the Parantapa, was born to him.

At his birth, an asariri, a disembodied voice deep as rumbling clouds said to Vriddhakshatra, ‘Among men in this world, in respect of blood, conduct, self-restraint and the other qualities, your son will become worthy of the two races of the Sun and the Moon. He will become one of the greatest Kshatriyas of all and will always be worshipped by heroes. However, one day in battle, a bull among all Kshatriyas, the greatest one in the world will cut off his head.’

Hearing what the asariri said, Vriddhakshatra reflected for a long while. Overwhelmed by his love for his son, he summoned all his kinsmen and said, ‘The head of the man who causes my son’s head to fall on the earth will burst asunder like a melon in a hundred pieces!’

Having said this, Vriddhakshatra installed Jayadratha on the throne and retired to the vana to devote himself to tapasya. Endowed with great tejas, Arjuna, he is still engaged in the observance of the austerest of penances outside this very Samantapanchaka. So, after you take Jayadratha’s head, you must with the great Pasupastra ensure that the head does not fall onto the ground but flies on with the arrow and falls into Vriddhakshatra’s lap! For if Jayadratha’s head falls onto the ground, have no doubt that your own head will burst apart in a hundred pieces. O son of Indra, there is nothing in this world that you cannot achieve. So do this now.”

Hearing this, Arjuna licks the corners of his mouth and looses the arrow he has charged with Siva’s astra, which has always been worshipped with incense and garlands. The ultimate ayudha, with which once Mahadeva torched the Tripura from the sky, takes Jayadratha’s head from his neck in a crimson eruption, like a hawk snatching a small bird from a tree. Arjuna follows this by shooting a dozen more shafts in a blur, arrows that carry the severed head through the sky, out to the far limits of Samantapanchaka, where your son-in-law’s father, mahatejasvin Vriddhakshatra, is at his sandhya vandana, his evening worship.

Adorned with thick black hair, with sparkling kundalas, Jayadratha's bleeding head falls perfectly into Vriddhakshatra's lap, where he sits in padmasana at his twilight prayer. So deep is his dhyana that at first Vriddhakshatra does not even notice. He duly completes his worship and then slowly rises to his feet. His son's head now falls onto the earth and Vriddhakshatra's own head blows apart in a hundred pieces of flesh bone and brain, for it is he himself who has at last made his son's head fall onto the earth! And all that learn of this wonderful, terrible feat of Arjuna laud both the Krishnas.

Rajan, after the Kiritin kills the Saindhava, Krishna withdraws the darkness, the false night that fell over Kurukshetra through his maya. As all the stars that peeped out from on high vanish, your sons and their men see that they were deceived and the sun has not yet set. And that, O Dhritarashtra, is how Arjuna kills Jayadratha and keeps his vow to avenge the death of Abhimanyu. On that day, amongst them, Arjuna, Satyaki and great Bhima slaughter eight whole akshauhinis of your army! Seeing Jayadratha killed, tears fall from the eyes of your sons that remain alive, Duryodhana weeps the most bitterly.

After Arjuna kills Jayadratha, Krishna blows a clarion blast on his Panchajanya and Arjuna raises the Devadatta to his lips and blows resoundingly on his conch. And, as if to send the message of triumph not merely to Yudhishtira but into the very heavens, Bhima fills Kurukshetra with a battery of dreadful roars drowning every other sound on the filed of dharma. Yudhishtira Dharmaputra hears these sounds across the field and knows that Arjuna has killed Jayadratha. Exultantly he has his own troops sound conches and horns and beat on drums.

And the excited, elated Yudhishtira charges at Drona to do battle with him.

By now the sun has actually set, and a most horrifying battle breaks out, by night's darkness, between Drona and the Somakas, descended from the moon. Jubilant after the killing of Jayadratha, the Pandava maharathas now attack Drona to kill him; why, they fight intoxicated with success. Having kept his vow, a celebrant Arjuna also engages many of your great chariot-warriors and now, with the great burden, upon which the very outcome of the war hinged, lifted from his shoulders, he destroys your ranks like truly the Devaputra that he is. He razes your legions like the Devas mowing down the Danavas, like the sun scattering darkness.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me, O Sanjaya, what my warriors did after Arjuna killed the heroic Jayadratha?'

Sanjaya replies, 'After Arjuna, O sire, kills Jayadratha, an angry Kripa, son of Saradwat, confronts Arjuna and envelops him with a barrage of arrows, while a furious Aswatthaman attacks him from the rear. A tiring Arjuna bleeds from the many wounds these two maharathas inflict on him and is in considerable pain. Yet, he does not want to kill his guru, Kripa or the son of his other acharya, Drona, so he treats the encounter like some exalted lesson in archery, and instruction even.

Thwarting both Aswatthaman and Kripa, he covers both in his arrows storms, but his shafts are mild and none loosed to take either of their lives. Yet, they injure Kripa and Aswatthaman fiercely, coursing pain through their bodies while avoiding all the vital marmas that, pierced, could kill them. So swift and so many are the arrows that Arjuna unleashes that Kripa faints in his ratha. His sarathy thinks that Arjuna has killed the old Acharya and whisks him away from the field. At this, Aswatthaman also flees in fear!

Seeing his guru Kripa swoon and fall, Arjuna is overcome by great grief. His face tearful and his voice full of anguish, he says, "Vidura clearly foresaw all this long ago in his mind. When Duryodhana was born, Vidura said to Dhritarashtra, 'Have this demon born into the noble house of Kuru killed. Otherwise, unimaginable calamity will overtake the greatest Kurus.'

Ah, how true Vidura's warning has proved. It is because of Duryodhana that I see my precious Acharya Kripa lying fallen to my arrows. Fie on this unholy Kshatriya dharma! Shame on my much vaunted might and prowess! Who else will fight a Brahmana who is also his guru? Kripa is the son of a Rishi; he is my Acharya; he is also Drona's great friend and brother-in-law. Alas, now he lies sprawled on his ratha, dying from my arrows.

Krishna, I had no wish to kill him, yet that is what I have done. My heart breaks to see him like this. Even if he wounded me sorely with his arrows, I should have only looked fondly at that warrior of dazzling splendour and never attacked him in return. And now, I have sent him, my first teacher, whom I always loved and revered to Yama. I say to you Krishna, this causes me more agony that even Abhimanyu's death. Ah, look at the plight I have reduced him to; look where he lies so pitiable and dying in his chariot.

Kshatriyas who acquire knowledge from their gurus and then gift them with the dakshina that they desire, attain to Godhead. On the other hand, the lowest of men, evil ones who learn from their acharyas and then do them harm: such men go straight to naraka. And I have no doubt that I will find hell for myself having done this ghastly thing today. I have horribly wounded my Acharya Kripa with ruthless showers of arrows. While I was learning the astra shastra at his feet, Kripa once told me, 'Do not, O you of Kuru's vamsa, ever strike your acharya.'

I have not obeyed that grave command of my righteous and noble guru; on the contrary today I have struck the same Kripa, my sacred master with cruel arrows and felled him. Oh, I bow to this worshipful son of Gotama, to this inexorable shura. And everlasting shame be on me for what I have done."

While Arjuna is crying in remorse at having wounded Kripa, he thinks mortally, Karna sees that Jayadratha has been slain and rushes in fury at the victorious Pandava who has kept his vow. Seeing this, the two Panchala princes, Uttamaujas and Yudhamanyu, and Satyaki attack Karna.

Arjuna now wipes his tears and, smiling wanly at Krishna, says, “Here comes Karna, viciously attacking Satyaki. No doubt, he is incensed at the death of Bhurisravas, and the manner in which Yuyudhana killed him. Take my steeds there, O Janardana, so that Karna does not make the Satwata follow in the wake of Bhurisravas.”

Krishna says, “Satyaki by himself is a match for Karna. How much more he will be with the two sons of Drupada beside him. For the time being, it is not wise for you to fight Karna. He has with him a blazing spear, like a meteor, a shakti that Indra gave him when Karna gave Sakra his golden kavacha. Parantapa, he has kept it to use against you, worshipping it with reverence. Let Karna ride against Satyaki. I know when this evil man’s hour will come, and then you will dispatch him from this world, you and no one else, Arjuna.”

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Tell me, O Sanjaya, about the battle between Karna and Satyaki, after the fall of Bhurisravas and Jayadratha. Satyaki was without a ratha; so whose chariot does he mount? How did the guardians of the wheels of Arjuna’s ratha, the two Panchala princes, fight?’

Sanjaya says, ‘I will describe to you all that happens. Listen patiently, my lord, to the consequences of your own evil conduct. Before the battle, Krishna knew in his heart that Bhurisravas, who flew a banner with the insignia of a sacrificial stake, would vanquish the heroic Satyaki. Rajan, Krishna knows both the past and the future. It was for this that, the previous night, he summoned his sarathy Daruka, and said to him, “Keep my ratha ready tomorrow and wait until you hear me blow the rishabha svara on the Panchajanya.”

Neither the Devas, nor the Gandharvas, nor the Yakshas, nor the Uragas, nor the Rakshasas, nor Manushyas can ever conquer the two Krishnas. The Devas with the Pitamaha Brahma at their head, and also the Siddhas, know the incomparable prowess of these two. But listen now to the battle as it unfolds in grim reality, as if upon the edge of Yamaloka.

Seeing Satyaki without a ratha and facing Karna ready for battle, Krishna blows his conch long and loud in the rishabha note. Daruka hears what he has been waiting for, and comes flying to Krishna on his unearthly ratha with the golden standard. With Krishna’s leave, Satyaki climbs into the deva ratha, driven by Daruka, which is like Surya or Agni in splendour. To that chariot are yoked the greatest of all - Saibya, Sugriva, Meghapushpa and Balahaka, all caparisoned in gold. These unearthly steeds fly anywhere at will, and now bearing Satyaki, they fly at Karna, while Yuyudhana looses a fresh torrent of shafts at the Sutaputra.

Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas leave Dhananjaya's side and ride to help Satyaki. The duel between Karna and Satyaki is another that has hardly ever been seen on earth or in heaven, not between Devas, Gandharvas, Asuras, Uragas, or Rakshasas. Yet again, both great armies stop fighting to watch the stunning encounter; they are as awed by the superhuman skills of the two archers as they are by Daruka's wizardly chariotry, as he flies across Kurukshetra, his unearthly horses obedient to his very thought, in the most incredible manoeuvres.

The Devas, the Gandharvas and the Danavas in the sky watch the battle between Karna and Satyaki, never blinking.

The two maharathas fight one another, each for the cause of their friends. Karna, looking like a Deva now, and the brilliant Satyaki cover each other with scathing interminable volleys. Karna still has the brutal slaying of his friend Jalasandha, whom Satyaki despatched, before his eyes, and he fights the Vrishni hero in absolute rage.

Full of grief for all the Kuru maharathas that Satyaki has killed on this day, Karna glowers at Yuyudhana as if to burn him up with his eyes. The dense swarms of steaming arrows he unleashes at Sini's grandson never pause. Sinuous and powerful as two mighty tigers, the two Naravyaghras maul each other in fury.

Satyaki drills slender iron shafts into Karna's every limb, and then he fells Karna's charioteer from his ratha with a flat-headed shaft. He kills Karna's four white horses, smashes Karna's standard into a hundred pieces with a hundred arrows, and yet again Karna finds himself without a chariot in Duryodhana's sight.

All your warriors, O Rajan, are quickly dispirited. Then Karna's son Vrishasena, Salya of the Madras, and Aswatthaman surround Satyaki and a smoking fray ensues and one can see nothing anymore. When Satyaki deprives the heroic Karna of his ratha, cries of Oh! and Alas! arise from your troops. Satyaki continues to rake the already weakened Sutaputra, until Duryodhana dashes up and helps his precious friend into his chariot. Karna is distraught, hissing and sighing like a serpent now, ashamed when he thinks of how he boldly swore that he would make your son undisputed king of the world.

After he destroys Karna's ratha, the self-restrained Satyaki stops himself from killing either the Sutaputra or your sons led by Dusasana, O king, for he honours Arjuna's oath that he would kill Karna and Bhima's that he would kill all your princes. He only wrecks their chariots and wounds them sorely with his radiant archery, weakening but not killing them.

However, although all these maharathas led by Karna tried concertedly to slay the Vrishni hero, Yuyudhana shames them all. Using just one bow, he crushes Aswatthaman, Kritavarman and other maharathas, as well as hundreds of great Kshatriyas. He fights Yudhishtira Dharmaraja's cause and to attain to Swarga, and truly Parantapa Satyaki is no less than either of the two Krishnas in tejas. Always smiling, for he, the pure Kshatriya, delights in war, he puts all your troops to rout, O best of men! I say to you with conviction that, in this world, there are only three truly matchless archers—Krishna, Arjuna, and Satyaki. There is no fourth.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Riding the invincible ratha of Krishna, with Daruka for charioteer, Satyaki, proud of the might of his arms and equal in battle to Krishna himself, destroys Karna's ratha. Did Satyaki ride any other chariot after his battle with Karna was over? I want to know this, Sanjaya, O most gifted narrator. Truly, I believe Satyaki is endowed with enormous, superhuman prowess. Tell me everything, Sanjaya!'

Sanjaya says, 'Hear, O Rajan, what transpires on the dharmakshetra. Daruka's younger brother brings out another chariot for the battling Satyaki. It has shafts attached by chains of iron, it has gold in profusion and bands of silk; it is adorned with a thousand stars and festooned with bright banners; this ratha flies the figure of a great lion on its standard, and yoked to it are horses fleet as the wind and wearing trappings of gold; and the rumble of its wheels are like thunderheads sounding. Mounting the fresh chariot, Satyaki besieges your troops again, while Daruka goes to Krishna's side.

A new ratha is also fetched for Karna, to which are yoked pedigreed horses white as milk, caparisoned in gold. Its kaksha and standard are wrought from gold. Furnished with colourful banners and a profusion of weapons of every kind, this excellent ratha has a superb sarathy as well. Mounting that chariot, Karna also mounts an unrestrained assault on his enemies.

I have now told you all that you asked me. However, Rajan, listen once more to the extent of the horrible destruction that your evil plotting caused. Bhimasena has killed thirty-one of your sons. Led by Durmukha, they were all masters of weapons. Satyaki and Arjuna also have slain hundreds of great heroes and Bhimasena more than either of them, and so has Bhagadatta. Still, the carnage begun by your evil ways is far from over.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me now what Bhima did, Sanjaya, at this stage of the war. Indeed, tell me everything!'

Sanjaya replies, 'After Bhimasena loses his ratha, Karna cuts him deep with his words like arrows, as Bhima stands helpless before him. Karna's acerbic words still burning him, Bhima says to Arjuna in some anger, "In your very hearing, Dhananjaya, Karna repeatedly mocked saying, 'Eunuch, fool, glutton, you are no warrior. Why have you come to fight, when you cannot bear the heat of battle? Take yourself where you belong, you overgrown child, to a kitchen or a dining table.'

I will kill any man who dares speak to me like that, Arjuna, and Karna said all this and more. You know the vows that we swore together in the Kuru sabha. Remember them now and let us fulfill both our oaths!"

Hearing this, Arjuna rides near Karna and tells him, "O false Karna, son of a Suta, you always brag and praise yourself. O evil one, listen to what I have to say to you. Heroes in battle meet with either victory or defeat, both of which are uncertain. It is no different even for Indra. Your ratha smashed by Satyaki and standing in a daze, exposed before Yuyudhana, you were on the point of death. But Satyaki remembered that I have sworn to kill you and to honour my oath he spared your life.

It is true that you deprived my brother Bhimasena of his ratha in fair battle. But the manner in which you taunted and abused him then was a shameful sin. No man of dharma ever humiliates an enemy after vanquishing him in battle. Your heart and mind are small, Sutaputra, as is your wisdom, and that is why you boast so loudly and speak so vilely.

Then again, the abuse that you have heaped on my brother Bhima, who is a great Kshatriya warrior and devoted to dharma, is neither true nor acceptable. In plain sight of all the troops, of Krishna, and me, how many times Bhima defeated you in battle and left you stranded without a chariot. He never once abused you, Karna. Since you have spoken harshly to Vrikodara many times, and since you were one of the six who combined to kill Abhimanyu, while I was far away, I say to you, Sutaputra, that you will find the reward for your crimes this very day. It was to call death to you, evil one, coward, that you severed Abhimanyu's bow from behind. And for that, O you of small wit, I will kill you, along with all your followers, your forces and your beasts of war.

Finish everything that you still need to do in this world, because a great misfortune will soon overtake you. I will first kill your son Vrishasena before your eyes. Then, all the other kings that ride against me I will despatch to Yama. This I swear, laying my hand on this Gandiva. You are a fool, Karna, unwise and full of vanity. I tell you that Duryodhana will soon see you lying dead on this field as carrion for vultures and jackals, and that evil prince will lament bitterly."

When Arjuna swears to kill Karna's son, a great uproar arises among the maharathas. At that very moment, when pandemonium reigns all around, the sun enters the Asta mountain.

Krishna, in the van of army, embraces Arjuna who has fulfilled his vow, and says to him, "By great good fortune, O Jishnu, you have accomplished your great vow and Vriddhakshatra has also died along with his son. Had Kumara, the Deva Senapati himself, encountered the Dhartarashtra forces, I have no doubt that he would not have prevailed. Naravyaghra, I cannot think of a single warrior in the three worlds other than you who can fight this oceanic army.

So many great maharathas of untold prowess, some equal or even superior to you, are united under Duryodhana's command. Yet, clad in armour, they cannot face you in battle when you are roused. Your tejas and urjas are equal to those of Rudra or Yama himself. No one else could have shown the prowess and genius in war that you, by yourself and alone, have done today.

And so, Arjuna, will I truly applaud and embrace you again after you kill the evil Karna and all his followers, yes, I will glorify you when you have vanquished this, your greatest, enemy."

Arjuna replies, "It is through your grace, O Madhava, that I have fulfilled my vow that even the gods might have found difficult to accomplish. And my victory is no matter of wonder for those who have you, O Krishna, for their Lord. Through your grace, Yudhishtira will regain the whole world. All this is because of your power, O Vrishni. This is your victory, O Lord! Our victory is in truth only yours; our fortune is in your care and we are your servants, O Madhusudana."

Krishna smiles slightly, and slowly drives the horses and, as they traverse the battlefield full of brutal sights, he points them out to Arjuna saying, "Having fought for victory or great fame so many heroic kings lie on the earth, struck by your arrows, their weapons and ornaments scattered, their horses, chariots and elephants mangled and their armour cloven, all of them having attained to the final sorrow. Some of them are still alive, in agony, and some dead. But look, Arjuna, even the dead still seem alive for their lustre and greatness.

Look at the field covered over with their golden-winged arrows, with their numberless other weapons, and with their dead animals. The earth is resplendent with coats of mail and necklaces of gems, with severed heads gleaming with earrings, and helmets and crowns shining with great jewels, and garlands of flowers, and kanthasutras, angadas, collars of gold and with diverse other beautiful ornaments. Strewn with anuskaras and quivers, with standards and banners, with upaskaras and adhishthanas, with shafts and crests of chariots, with broken wheels and beautiful akshas in profusion, with yokes and trappings of horses, with belts and bows and arrows, with elephants, their housings, with spiked maces and hooks of iron, with darts and short arrows, with spears and pikes, with kundas and clubs, with sataghnis and bhushandis, with scimitars and axes, with short and heavy clubs and mallets, with maces and kunapas, with whips decked with gold, with the bells and diverse other ornaments of elephants, and with rich robes, all loosened from the bodies of men and animals, the earth shines brilliantly, like the autumn sky strewn with planets and stars.

The lords of the earth, slain for the sake of earth, lie asleep on the earth clasping her like a wife. Like mountains flowing streams of liquid chalk through their caves and fissures, these elephants big as mountains, which look like Airavata himself, flow profuse streams of blood through the wounds in their bodies.

See, O Shura, where some of these vast creatures, struck by hundreds of arrows, lie spamming in death's last throes, their eyes full of pain and grief. Look where countless horses lie, their golden caparisons stained with scarlet.

Look, O Partha, at these empty chariots, which once resembled celestial vimanas of vapoury forms in the evening sky, now lying on the ground, with standards, banners, akshas and yokes cut into pieces, with broken shafts and crests, and with their warriors and charioteers slain and flung out of them. Foot-soldiers, also, holding bows and shields and slain in hundreds of thousands, lie everywhere, bathed in blood, clasping the earth with every limb and their long hair undone and smeared with dust.

Look, O Mahabaho, at all the warriors who lie unmoving, their bodies mutilated by your astras. Look at Kurukshetra scattered with yak-tails and fans, parasols, standards, steeds, chariots and elephants with diverse kinds of rich blankets, and the cut away reins of horses, and exquisite garments and the costly varuthas of the rathas. The field appears as if it is spread over with embroidered tapestry.

Many warriors fallen from the backs of elephants look like lions struck down by thunder and fallen from mountaintops. Lying among their horses and their bows, horsemen and foot-soldiers welter in blood. Ah, look how fearful this earth is to gaze upon, covered over with multitudes of slain elephants, horses, maharathas, and mired with blood, fat, and rotten flesh, on which wild dogs and wolves and pisachas and diverse fell wanderers of the night feed and around which they dance in sinister glee!

Only you, O Arjuna, or Indra himself, could have accomplished such a feat and fetched such carnage."

Thus showing the Kiritin the grisly field of devastation, Krishna raises his Panchajanya and blows triumphal thunder on it and the joyful soldiers of the Pandava army respond by blowing their conches too. And Janardana drives his chariot swiftly towards Yudhishtira Ajatasatru and brings him news of the killing of Jayadratha.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After Arjuna kills Jayadratha, Krishna drives to Yudhishtira, worships him with a glad heart and says, "Through good fortune, Rajan, your prosperity increases and you have killed your enemy. By great good luck, your brother has fulfilled his vow."

Yudhishtira, the subjugator of hostile towns, is overjoyed and climbs down from his ratha! His eyes fill with tears of joy and he embraces the two Krishnas and then, wiping his bright and lotus-like face, he says to Kesava and Arjuna, "Mighty Maharathas, it is destiny that I see both of you now after you have accomplished your mission. It is indeed great good fortune that you have killed the sinner Jayadratha.

You Krishnas have filled me with untellable joy, and plunged our enemies into an ocean of grief. You are the sovereign Lord of all the worlds, Krishna, O Madhusudana! In the three worlds, there is nothing that those who have you for their lord and master cannot achieve.

Through your grace, O Govinda, we will conquer our enemies, as Indra did the Danavas in olden times. Be it the conquest of the world, or be it the conquest of the three worlds, everything is assured for those with whom you are pleased. They can be stained by no sin, nor can they meet with defeat in battle, O Lord of all the gods!

It is through your grace, Hrishikesa, that Indra became the king of the Devas. It is through your benevolence that he won the sovereignty of the three worlds on the field of battle. It is through your kindness, O Devadeva, that he gained immortality and enjoys the eternal regions of bliss. Having slain thousands of Daityas with powers acquired by your grace did Indra win lordship over the Devas.

It is through your grace, Hrishikesa, that the mobile and immobile universe, without swerving from its ordained course, is engaged in prayers and homa. In the beginning, this universe, enveloped in darkness, was one vast expanse of water, the Ekarnava. Through your grace, O Mahabaho, the universe became manifest! You are the Creator of all the worlds, you are the Supreme Soul, and you are immutable.

Those who see you, O Hrishikesa, are never mystified. You are the Supreme God, you are the God of the gods, and you are Ananta. Those who seek refuge with you, O Lord of the Devas, are never lost. Without beginning and without death, you are Divine; you are the Creator of all the brahmandas, and Absolute. Those who are devoted to you, O Hrishikesa, always tide over every difficulty. You are Supreme, the Ancient One, the Divine Being, and that which is the Highest of the high. He who attains your Supreme Self obtains the highest felicity.

You are sung in the four Vedas and the four Vedas sing of you. By seeking your protection, O noblest one, I will enjoy unrivalled prosperity. You are the Supreme God, you are the God of the highest gods, you are the lord of winged creatures, and the lord of all humans. You are the Supreme Lord of everything. I bow to you, O Best of beings!

You are the Lord, the Lord of lords, O Omnipotent One! Prosperity to you, O Madhava! O you of the louts eyes, O Universal Soul, You are the origin of all things.

He, who is a friend of Arjuna or is devoted to Arjuna's welfare, finds you who are the Guru of Dhananjaya and attain ultimate bliss."

Thus addressed by him, Kesava and Arjuna cheerfully say to Yudhishtira, "The fire of your wrath has consumed the sinful Jayadratha, O puissant one. Although the Dhartarashtra host is vast and swells in pride, yet it daily faces death and diminution; the Kaurava host is being annihilated. It is because of your wrath that the Kauravas are being destroyed. Having angered you, most gentle and patient soul, who can kill with just your gaze, the evil Duryodhana with all his friends and kinsmen will have to lay down his life in battle. Already slain because of your ire, and struck down by the gods themselves, the invincible Bhishma, Pitamaha of the Kurus, now lies on a bed of arrows.

O Parantapa, victory in battle is impossible, and death waits for those who have you for their enemy. Kingdom, life, dear ones, children, and all kinds of bliss will soon be lost by him with whom you are angry. I look upon the Kauravas as having already lost their sons and kinsmen, when you, who observe, why, embody Rajadharma, are wroth with them."

Then Bhima, O king, and Satyaki, both lacerated and bleeding by arrows past count, come and pay their salutations to Yudhishtira. Those two mighty bowmen then sit on the ground surrounded by the Panchalas. Seeing the two heroes brimming with joy and waiting with folded hands, Yudhishtira embraces them both and cries, "It is through good fortune that I see you both before me, O Shuras, see you after you have escaped with your lives from the raging sea of enemy legions, the sea in which Drona is an invincible crocodile and Kritavarman, the son of Hridika, a ravening shark. It is destiny that you two have vanquished all the greatest kings of the earth.

It is by good fortune that I see both of you victorious in battle. It is by good fortune that you have defeated Drona as well as the mighty Kritavarman. It is by providence that you have defeated Karna in battle with your barbed shafts. It is by good fortune that Salya was forced away from the field by you both, O you bulls among men. By good fortune, I see you both returned from battle safe, you who are the greatest of all maharathas and masters of war!

It is my good fortune that I see you heroes again, who have forded that sea of enemy troops at my command, you who went into battle to honour me! You are true and pure Kshatriya heroes who revel in battle. You are dear to me like my own life. Ah, it is through great good fortune that I see you both again alive!'

Having said this, Yudhishtira embraces Satyaki and Bhima, the Naravyaghras, again, and tears of joy flow down his noble face. Then, the entire Pandava army is full of good cheer and a tide of joy surges through all the warriors. All of them are once more determined to give battle and win this war to end all wars.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Upon the fall, O Rajan, of Jayadratha, your son Duryodhana, his face bedewed with tears, breathing hot sighs like a snake whose fangs have been drawn, this offender against the whole world, experiences bitter sorrow. Seeing the terrible slaughter of his troops that Arjuna, Bhimasena and Satyaki have wrought, he becomes pale and dejected. He begins to believe that no warrior on earth can compare with Arjuna.

"Neither Drona, Karna, Aswatthaman, nor Kripa can stand up to Arjuna when he is provoked," Duryodhana says to himself, "After defeating all the maharathas of my army, Arjuna has kept his vow and killed Jayadratha. No one can resist him and the Pandavas have almost exterminated my once vast army. Ah, no one can protect my army, no, not even Purandara himself. He, upon whom I relied most in this war, Karna, has been defeated and Jayadratha slain. I believed so much in Karna's prowess that I thought of even Krishna, who came to me to sue for peace, as being but a straw in gale; and now, Karna has been vanquished in battle."

Grieving thus, his dark and powerful spirit all but broken, Duryodhana comes to see Drona. He informs the Acharya of the immense slaughtering of the Kurus, the victory of his enemies, and the grim catastrophe that faces the Dhartarashtras.

Duryodhana says fervidly, “Look, Acharya, at this vast carnage of kings. Setting the invincible Bhishma at our head, I came to war. Having cut the Pitamaha down, Sikhandin, his aspirations fulfilled, leads his troops, surrounded by all the Panchalas and seeking another triumph. Another disciple of yours, the invincible Savyasachin, decimated seven akshauhinis of troops and has despatched Jayadratha to Yama. How, Acharya, will I ever free myself of the debt that I owe those allies of mine who, fighting this war for my sake, have lost their lives? Ah, those lords of the earth now lie prone and lifeless upon the earth, having lost their kingdoms, possessions and prosperity.

Alas, it is true that I am a coward! Having caused such a massacre of my friends, I dare not believe that I can purify myself with even a hundred Aswamedha yagnas. I am covetous, sinful and a transgressor of dharma. Because of my greed and envy, and nothing else, these lords of the earth, in their quest for victory, have gone to Yama’s halls. Why, in presence of all these kings, does the kindly Earth not yield me a hole through which I can sink, for I am the greatest sinner ever and the sole fomenter of this horrible war between cousins? Alas, what will the Pitamaha of bloodshot eyes, the invincible shura who has conquered the other world, say to me in the midst of all the great kings when he meets me?

There lies the mighty bowman Jalasandha, killed by Satyaki. How proudly he came to fight, ready to lay his life down for me. Looking at the dead king Kambojas, as well as Alambusha and so many, many other allies of mine, all slain, what reason can I have to continue living? Ah, all of them died savage deaths, even as they put forth their great valour to vanquish my enemies.

Acharya, today I will give my all in battle to free myself from the debt that I owe them and then gratify them with oblations of water by going to the Yamuna. O greatest of warriors, I tell you truly and swear by all the punya I have ever done, by the prowess and skill that I possess, and on my sons’ heads, that I will kill all the Panchalas along with the Pandavas, and find peace of mind, or, killed by them in battle I will go to the realms where my friends and allies have gone while fighting my cause during this war.

Seeing that we are not able to protect them, our allies that still live no longer wish to stand by us, Mahabaho, and they now regard the Pandavas as being preferable to us. And you, Acharya, have fetched doom upon us by showing your favourite sishya Arjuna softness and leniency in battle. This is why all these heroes, who endeavoured to secure victory for us, have been slain. It seems that only Karna now truly wishes us victory. A man of weak understanding, who without properly examining another, accepts him for a friend, and enlists him in matters that require true friends for their achievement, is certain to suffer disappointment. You, upon whom I so relied, have brought dreadful disappointment and defeat to me, O Drona.

I am inordinately covetous, sinful, crooked, and avaricious! Alas, Dussala's husband Jayadratha has been killed, and Somadatta's son Bhurisravas of great tejas, and the Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Sibis, and the Vasatis. And I myself mean to leave this world today and join those bulls among men, whom Arjuna slaughtered while they fought for me. With them gone, I have no wish to live on. O Acharya of the sons of Pandu, let me have your leave to die fighting.'""

"Dhritarashtra says, 'After Savyasachin kills the king of the Sindhus, after the death of Bhurisravas, what was the state of mind of our army? After Duryodhana passionately addressed Drona in the midst of the Kurus, what did the Acharya say to him? Tell me, Sanjaya!'

Sanjaya says, 'Loud wails arise among your troops, O Bhaarata, after the killing of Bhurisravas and Jayadratha. Now all of them show scant regard for the command and policy of Duryodhana, based on which hundreds of great maharathas have died.

As for Drona, he listens to what your son says and is full of grief. Reflecting for a short while, Rajan, he says in anguish, "Duryodhana, why do you pierce me so with your wordy shafts? I have already told you that no one can defeat Arjuna in battle. Protected by Kiritin, Sikhandin cut Bhishma down. This feat by itself, O Kuruttama, should have convinced you of the invincible prowess of Arjuna. For myself, I was certain on that day, seeing Bhishma, whom the Devas and the Danavas could not vanquish, felled, that this Bharata army is doomed. After the fall of Bhishma, whom we all looked upon as the greatest Kshatriya in the three worlds, whom else can we rely upon now?

The loaded dice that Sakuni spun in the Kuru sabha were not dice but keen arrows that would claim countless lives. The same arrows, unleashed now by Jaya, are now decimating us. Though Vidura said this even then, you did not understand him or chose not to. With tears in his eyes, he begged you to make peace with the Pandavas, but you did not listen to him. The calamity that he foretold has come to pass.

This horrible carnage, Duryodhana, is the result of your defiance of Vidura's sage counsel. The foolish man who disregards the precious advice of true and trusted friends, and follows only his own lusts, falls swiftly into deep trouble and distress. O son of Gandhari, you had Draupadi dragged into the Kuru court before us all, while she was in her period and wore but a single cloth. How did you dare do this to one as pure as her, she who owns every virtue, she who was born from the sacred fire?

Yet, know Duryodhana that all this is as nothing, for in the next world you will be visited with retribution before which this carnage will seem pale. Beating the Pandavas at dice by deceit, you sent them into the forest, wearing deerskins. Which other Brahmana in this world, other then I, would seek to harm the sons of Pandu, Kshatriyas of dharma, who are like my own sons. In the Kuru sabha, with your father Dhritarashtra's approval, you, with Sakuni for your collaborator, provoked the ire of the Pandavas. Together with Dusasana, Karna then fanned that wrath. Disdaining Vidura's wisdom, you repeatedly stoked that fire yourself.

With great determination and resolve, all of you surrounded Arjuna, to save Jayadratha. Why, then, have you all been vanquished and why has Jayadratha been killed? Why, when you, Karna, Kripa, Salya and Aswatthaman are alive, O Kauravya, has the king of the Sindhus been killed? All the mighty kings who fight this war for you spared no effort to save his life; how was Jayadratha beheaded in their very midst? Relying on me, Jayadratha thought he would be saved from Arjuna. He did not find the rescue he expected.

Suyodhana, I too do not see any safety for myself. Until I succeed in killing the Panchalas with Sikhandin, I always feel like one sinking deeper in the mire that is the fire prince Dhrishtadyumna. Having failed to save Jayadratha's life, why do you pierce me with your words like arrows of fire, when you plainly see that I too burn with grief?

No more do you see Kurukshetra adorned with the golden standards of Bhishma, who knew no tiredness in battle, whom no warrior could face.

How, then, can you have any hope for victory? When the king of the Sindhus and Bhurisravas have been slain in the very midst of so many mighty maharathas, do you still not see how this war must inevitably end?

Kripa, well nigh impossible to defeat, is still alive, Rajan! He did not follow Jayadratha out of this world, and I applaud him. When I saw Bhishma himself, whom not the Devas led by Indra, could vanquish in battle, felled before your very eyes, I thought that the Earth had abandoned you.

Look where the troops of the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, united, come rushing at me. To bring you victory, I swear that I will not remove my armour until I have killed all the Panchalas. Rajan, go and tell my son Aswatthaman that even at the risk of his life he must attack the Somakas without let.

Say to him and yourself follow what I tell you now: Observe all the teachings you have received from your father. Be firm in deeds of humility, in self-restraint, in satya and dharma. Observe dharma, artha, and kama, but, most of all, you must always follow the way of dharma. You must always gratify the Brahmanas with gifts. All of them deserve your worship. You must never do anything to hurt them. They are like flames. As for myself, I will break into the enemy army, O Parantapa, for a great battle, for you have pierced me with words sharper than arrows. If you can, Suyodhana, go and protect the troops. Both the Kurus and the Srinjayas are full of rage. They will fight even during the night."

Saying this to Duryodhana, Drona rides against the Pandavas. He, the Brahmana warrior, goes forth to eclipse the tejas of the Kshatriya like the sun dimming the light of the stars.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana, a being of absolute rage now, sets his heart on battle: to kill or be slain. He says to Karna, "Look how the Kiritin son of Pandu, with only Krishna going with him, penetrated three vyuhas of Drona, formations that the Devas themselves could not pierce and, in the very sight of the illustrious Acharya and all our other maharathas, killed Jayadratha.

Look, Karna, at the countless great kings lying dead on the earth, killed by Arjuna, like a host of little creatures by a single great lion, despite Drona and I doing our utmost to stop Arjuna. The son of Indra has reduced my army to a small remnant of what it was. How could Arjuna have kept his impossible vow unless Drona himself allowed it? Ah, truly, Arjuna always was and still is exceedingly dear to our illustrious Acharya! And for this he allowed Arjuna into the great Sakata vyuha, without properly fighting him.

My friend, look at my misfortune! Having first assured Jayadratha of his protection, Drona let Arjuna into our army like a tiger into a calf-pen. If the Brahmana had allowed Jayadratha to return to his kingdom, as the Saindhava so dearly wanted to, this day's unimaginable carnage would never have occurred and our army would not have been reduced to a mere fraction of its great size. Ah, I was a fool to believe Drona when he swore to protect Jayadratha! I should have let Dussala's husband return to his kingdom. And for my foolishness, today so many of my brothers, led by mighty Chitrasena, have perished before our very eyes."

Karna says, "Do not blame the Acharya, for he is giving his all in battle, and without a care for his very life. If Arjuna broke into our army, no fault attaches to Drona. Arjuna is a great maharatha, and he is young compared to the Acharya; the Pandava is renowned for his speed. Armed with devastras and mounted on his ratha that flies the Hanuman banner, with the reins of his horses in the hands of Krishna, cased in impenetrable armour and wielding the celestial Gandiva, Arjuna bested Drona, who is old now. There is nothing to wonder at this and certainly nothing to blame Drona for. He has not betrayed you in any way, only that his age slows him and tires him quickly, and, most of all, Arjuna has Krishna for his sarathy!

For myself, I believe that whatever Fate had ordained will come to pass, for while Arjuna swept his way deep into our vyuhas and slew Jayadratha, Drona, for all his prowess, could not vanquish the Pandavas and take Yudhishtira captive. Despite all our concerted efforts, despite all of us giving our all in battle, Arjuna yet succeeded in killing Jayadratha and fulfilling his impossible vow. Surely, this could only have happened because Fate did not smile on us.

Duryodhana, the truth is that we have always tried to harm the Pandavas, resorting to both deceit and strength. Whatever a man crossed by Fate attempts is undone by Fate, however the man himself may strive to achieve his end. Whatever a persevering man should do, he must do fearlessly, without caring for the outcome of his exertions. Success and failure depend on destiny!

We have wronged the sons of Pandu. We first tried to poison them, and then immolate them in the house of lac. Finally, we vanquished them deceitfully at the game of dice; we humiliated them and banished them to the forest. Fate seemed to be with us at that time and now seems to have turned against us. It appears, Duryodhana, that now you must reverse the present course of fate as well as fight the Pandavas. Fight resolutely, fight with all your might and valour and only then can you still possibly prevail. Fight without doubt and fear and the side which excels the other will triumph.

The Pandavas have used no superior intelligence or strategy in this war, and neither have your methods been inferior or wanting. I say to you again that inscrutable Fate alone decides the outcome of all karma, wise or unwise. Fate, ever intent on its own purposes, is awake when all else sleeps. Vast was your army, and your warriors numberless, when the battle began. Though their host was smaller, it would seem that their warriors were more effective in battle and we find ourselves terribly reduced. I fear it is the work of Fate that has frustrated our efforts."

Rajan, while Karna and Duryodhana thus confer, the Pandava akshauhini comes into view, eager for fight. Another fevered battle breaks out between your legions and theirs, with chariots, horsemen and elephants flying at each other.

Remember, O Dhritarashtra, that your evil policy towards the Pandavas is the single root and cause of all this bloodshed!'"

Ghatotkacha-vadha Parva

"Sanjaya says, 'Your elephant force, Rajan, burgeoning with might, fights everywhere, prevailing over the Pandava forces. Determined either to find the next world or to triumph, the Panchalas and the Kauravas fight for admission into the swelling domains of Yama. Fearless warriors face valiant rivals, drawing geysers of blood with arrows, spears and darts and despatch one another to Yama's abode in thick streams. Dreadful and savage is the battle between the maharathas who cause blood to flow furiously across Kurukshetra.

Infuriated elephants gore each another deep with great curved tusks. Horsemen, seeking glory, cut one another down in the terrific melee with lances, arrows and battle-axes. Foot-soldiers too, in hundreds, repeatedly attack one another with resolute ferocity! So great is the bedlam, that the Panchalas and the Kurus can only be distinguished from the tribal, family and personal names they shout as battle cries. Horrible and relentless is the carnage everywhere, and darkness mantles the field of death for by now the sun has set. Deranged with wrath at the slaying of Jayadratha, and more than willing to lay down his life, Duryodhana charges straight into the midst of the Pandavas. Filling the earth with the rumble of his chariot-wheels and making Bhumi tremble, your son and his forces attack the Pandava host headlong and terrific is the battle between the two forces and blood runs in frothing streams on the ground.

Like the meridian sun that burns everything with his rays at midday, the blazing Suyodhana scathes the enemy forces with relentless flights of arrows so that the Pandavas cannot even look at him. Indeed, so terribly and gloriously does he fight, that the sons of Pandu and their legions despair of defeating the Kauravas and, slaughtered by your lustrous son, his tides of gold-winged arrowheads ablaze, the Panchalas flee in all directions.

Duryodhana mows down the Pandava legions as he pleases, heads and severed arms falling like rain onto the gory ground. Truly, Rajan, none among the Pandavas has achieved the feats that Duryodhana now does on the darkling field. He ravages the enemy like great Surya and Vayu wilting a pool of lotuses with their searing rays and arid winds.

He strikes the Panchalas and Bhimasena with ten shafts, each of the sons of Madri with three, Virata and Drupada each with six, Sikhandin with a hundred, Dhrishtadyumna with seventy, Yudhishtira with seven, Satwata with five, each of the five sons of Draupadi with three, Ghatotkacha also with many barbs, and the Kaikeyas and the Chedis with innumerable keen arrows, and then roars like a mythic lion from time out of mind. Annihilating hundreds of other warriors as well as elephants and horses with his fierce shafts, he is like Rudra devouring the creatures at the pralaya.

Then Yudhishtira rives his bow in three with two immaculate broad-headed arrows. He strikes Duryodhana with ten potent shafts loosed in an unbroken line that pass clean through Duryodhana's limbs and pierce the earth behind him. The Pandava troops surround Yudhishtira, as the Devas did Purandara when he killed Vritra.

Another mighty shaft from Yudhishtira fells Suyodhana onto his knees in his great ratha. Thereupon, the Panchala troops roar in jubilation, "Duryodhana is slain!"

Now we hear a great and wild buzzing of countless arrows, like many swarms of bees, O Bhaarata, and Drona appears, holding up the enemy with a firestorm of arrows that light up the early night. Meanwhile, Duryodhana recovers, seizes up a fresh bow and charges Yudhishtira, roaring, "Stop and fight!" Sensing victory, the Panchalas charge Drona, who, unruffled, implacable, has rushed to the rescue of your son and now beats back the Panchalas and decimates their troops spraying blood copiously everywhere. Yet another pitched and lethal battle erupts and rills of blood flow glimmering in the soft and dreadful dark.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'When the mighty Drona breaks through the Pandava ranks and rides his ratha all over the battlefield, how do the Pandavas stop him? Who protects the right wheel and who the left wheel of his chariot as he slaughters the enemy? Who are the brave warriors who follow him and protect his back? Who are those who confront the maharatha? When that the greatest of all warriors, dancing in his chariot scythes his way into the Pandava host, his enemies must feel an unseasonable cold in their very bones. They must tremble like cattle exposed to wintry blasts. How does the bull among rathikas, who consumes all the Panchala troops like a raging conflagration, meet his death?'

Sanjaya says, "After killing Jayadratha at the twilight hour, Arjuna meets Yudhishtira and Satyaki, and then rides at Drona, as do Yudhishtira and Bhimasena, each with an akshauhini of troops. The intelligent Nakula, the invincible Sahadeva, and Dhrishtadyumna, with their divisions, Virata, and the king of the Salwas with a large force, also advance against Drona. Dhrishtadyumna's father, king Drupada, leads the Panchalas against the Acharya as do the sons of Draupadi and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha with his feral army. The Prabhadraka–Panchalas, too, six thousand strong and all great fighters led by Sikhandin, advance against Drona. Other leading Kshatriyas and maharathas among the Pandavas unite and take the field against Drona.

As these heroic warriors, O Bharatarishabha, fly into battle, the night by now is pitch dark, increasing the terrors of the timid. During this hour of darkness, Rajan, numberless warriors, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers die and jackals howling all around create great fear with their blazing mouths and predatory owls with lamp like eyes perch on the standards of the Kauravas and hoot abysmally, foretelling further murdering.

A grim and resounding uproar arises everywhere from the troops, mingling with the loud beating of drums and cymbals clashing, deep grunts of elephants, neighing of horses, and stamping of horses' hooves and a truly dreadful battle ensues between Drona and all the Srinjayas. The world is enveloped in utter darkness; the sky is obscured by the dust raised by the combatants and nothing can be seen. The blood of men, horses and elephants flow freely together with palls of dust and disappears into the thirsty earth and all of us are overwhelmed by dejection and panic.

During this grimmest night, we hear weapons clashing, which sound like a burning forest of bamboos upon a mountain. With the sounds of drums like mridangas, anakas, vallakis and patahas, with the shouting and neighing, horrific pandemonium rules the dark. No one can tell friend from foe and madness possesses all in the night. The showers of blood everywhere quickly settle the dust arisen, O Bharatarishabha, and the golden coats of mail and the bright ornaments of the warriors glint some light through the gloom.

When the blood-drenched dust settles, the air clears and the Bharata host adorned with gems and gold and wielding spears and standards looks like the sky strewn with dim twinkling stars. Kurukshetra resounds with the howls of jackals, the cawing of crows, the grunts of elephants, and the shouts, roars and screams of warriors. All these sounds mingle into a hair-raising din and fill all the points of the compass like the report of Indra's thunder.

At dead of night, the Bharata host is illumined by the angadas, earrings, cuirasses, and the other weapons of the fighting men. The elephants and chariots, adorned with gold, look like clouds charged with lightning. Swords, arrows, maces, scimitars, clubs, lances and axes, as they fall, are dazzling flashes of fire. Duryodhana is the gust of wind that is the precursor of the two tempestuous armies. Chariots and elephants are its dry clouds and the loud noise of drums and other instruments form the peals of its thunder and the bright standards and bows its lightning flashes.

Drona and the Pandavas are its rainclouds, while swords, darts and maces are its thunder, arrows are its downpour, and ceaseless flights of every other kind of weapon are its blasting winds. Hot are these deadly storms that blow, or agonisingly cold, as they claim lives past all count. There is nothing that can protect the warriors from death's night gale. Brave men who still lust after battle enter into the frightful fray on this dread night that echoes with horrifying sounds, which sharpen the fears of the timid and swell the joy of heroes.

As the war at night swells, the Pandus and the Srinjayas unite and attack Drona. However, Rajan, all who advance against the illustrious Drona are either forced to turn back or despatched to the halls of Yama. Indeed, on this appalling night, Drona by himself cuts down thousands of elephants, tens of thousands of chariots, and millions of foot-soldiers and horses.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'As the invincible Drona Mahatejasvin, his wrath stirred by Jayadratha's death, wreaks havoc upon the Srinjayas, what do my sons and the rest of you feel? After the death of Jayadratha and of the great Bhurisravas, and after the Acharya says what he did to my recalcitrant Duryodhana, when that maharatha Brahmana breaks viciously on the Panchalas by night, scattering them, what does Arjuna do? What does Duryodhana think that he should do now? Who follows the boon-giving hero, the foremost of Brahmana warriors, and stands behind him while he fights so dreadfully, like all the spirits of darkness embodied, and who fights in his van? Ah, Suta, as you speak I can feel upon my very skin the fear and devastation that Drona brings to the Pandava host; I feel them tremble like cows under a wintry sky.

After he breaks into the midst of the Panchala forces, how does this Parantapa, the Naravyaghra, meet with his death? When on that night all the troops unite and all the great Pandava maharathas combine and Drona still rules the dark disdainfully, imperiously, which of our best warriors stand and face him?

You also say that my troops are either being slain or huddle together, and that my maharathas have lost their chariots having had them shattered by the sons of Pandu. While the Pandavas fetch terror and death to our forces, how do they withstand those shuras in the gruesome dark? You say that the Pandavas are heartened and full of hope for victory, while my troops are dejected and panic-stricken. How, O Sanjaya, do you perceive this distinction between the Kurus and the advancing Parthas? Tell me all, old friend, and in every detail.'

Sanjaya says, 'As the red and black night deepens, Rajan, the Pandavas and the Somakas all attack Drona. As if he sees through the dark as clearly as by daylight, Drona kills all the Kaikeyas and the sons of Dhrishtadyumna, as well as many other maharathas. At this, king Sibi, master archer, challenges the heroic son of Bharadwaja, and seeing this great hero riding at him, maharatha Drona strikes him with ten thick iron barbs. Sibi drills Drona with thirty arrows, fitted with kanka feathers; smiling fiercely, he fells Drona's charioteer with a broad-headed shaft. Drona kills the illustrious Sibi's horses and his charioteer and, quicker than it takes to tell, hacks off Sibi's head, with its crown and helmet.

Duryodhana sends a charioteer out to Drona and as soon as this sarathy takes up the Brahmana's reins, the Acharya resumes his savage decimation of his enemies.

Full of rage at Bhima having slain his father, the Kalinga king, supported by his troops, attacks Bhimasena. He first strikes Bhima with five arrows and again with seven more; rakes Bhima's sarathy Visoka with three perfect shafts and cuts a wedge from his proud standard with another. Roaring, Vrikodara leaps off his chariot straight onto his adversary's ratha, kills the Kalinga with his bare hands, tears him limb from limb, and strews black Kurukshetra with the pieces of his body!

Karna, the brother of the slain prince and others cannot bear to watch the brutal deed and looses narachas like venomous serpents at the giant Pandava. Jumping down from Kalinga's ratha, Bhima, covered in gore, runs to the chariot of Dhruva, the brother of the king whom he has just dismembered, and strikes that Kalinga prince a single blow with his fist that shatters his royal head like a melon and Dhruva dies.

Bhimasena, now roaring like a king lion in great fury, runs to the chariot of Jayarata, and dragging Jayarata down onto the ground with his left hand, kills him with a slap of his right, which blasts his head off his neck and inundates Bhima with his blood as well. All this he does before Karna's eyes and Karna casts a golden spear like a gash of lightning at him. But, smiling hideously, the Pandava seizes the golden lance and hurls it back at Karna! In the very nick of time, Sakuni divides that lance before it can reach Karna.

Having killed these three Kalingas, Bhima returns to his own chariot in some satisfaction, dripping scarlet, and charges your troops again, mowing them down before him like Yama himself enraged. Your sons steel themselves to stand firm against the advent of the horrible apparition and cover the hulking Pandava with ceaseless showers of arrows.

Grinning fiendishly, Bhima unleashes a gust of arrows at Durmada's charioteer and horses, sending them in a wink to Yama. Durmada quickly mounts Dushkarna's chariot and together they charge Bhima, even like Varuna and Surya rushing against Taraka, that best of Daityas. They pierce Bhima with a hundred arrows. However, in the very sight of Karna, Aswatthaman, Duryodhana, Kripa, Somadatta and Balhika, Bhima stamps his great foot with such violence that the wheels of Dushkarna's ratha sink into the earth. In a flash, Bhima is upon them, striking them wildly with inexorable blows of his prodigious fists, beating both into a pulp of blood, bone and flesh so they are a single mangled corpse. Horrified wails arise from your watching troops.

Their kings look at Bhima and say, "That is Rudra who fights from Bhima's body. This is Rudra come among the Dhartarashtras." And deranged by the titan's awful ferocity, they all flee in all directions whipping their horses to their greatest speed. Indeed, no two of them can be seen fleeing together such is their absolute panic in the hellish night.

Many kings applaud Vrikodara when he brings bloody havoc to your army in the night. His eyes as beautiful as full-blown lotuses, he goes to Yudhishtira and pays his respects to his brother. Nakula and Sahadeva, Drupada, Virata, the Kaikeyas, and Yudhishtira are overjoyed and honour Vrikodara just as the Devas did Mahadeva after he had killed Andhaka.

Then your sons, all equal to the sons of Varuna, and fulminant with wrath, ride with the awesome Drona and a large force of chariots, foot-soldiers, and elephants, and they surround Bhima, intent on putting an end to him. On this terrible night, Rajan, when everything is enveloped in darkness as if by a black thunderhead, another dreadful battle erupts between those illustrious warriors, an unbridled contention that pleases the ravening hearts of wolves, crows and vultures.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After Satyaki kills his son Bhurisravas, while he sat in praya, an outraged Somadatta says to Yuyudhana, "Why, O Satwata, have you abandoned the Kshatriya dharma that the great Gods ordained and taken to the ways of base bandits? Why would one who observes Kshatriya dharma and possesses wisdom strike a man who turns his back on battle, or one who has become helpless, or one who has laid down his weapons, or one who begs for quarter? Two among the Vrishnis are reputed to be the best of great maharathas—Pradyumna of mighty tejas and you, Satyaki! Why then did you act so cruelly and sinfully towards one who sat on praya and who had, besides, his arm hewn off by Partha?

Now reap the fruit of what you did to my son, sinner! For I mean to cut your head off with a winged and powerful astra. I swear by my two sons who are dear to me and by all my deeds of punya, that if I do not kill you before this night passes, you who are so proud of your heroism, with your sons and younger brothers, unless Pritha's son Arjuna protects you, then let me sink into terrible hell, O wretch of the Vrishnis!"

Saying this, and demented with grief, the mighty Somadatta blows his conch and gives a leonine roar. Satyaki, with eyes like lotus-petals and teeth like a lion's, says angrily to Somadatta, "O you of Kuru's race, whether fighting you, or any other, no trace of fear enters my heart. Even if you fight me protected by all your troops, I will have no complaint! I always observe Kshatriya dharma and you cannot frighten me with brave, brash words or with insults. If you want to fight me today, strike me with arrows and I will do the same.

Your son, the maharatha Bhurisravas, Rajan, I have slain; and Sala, and Vrishasena, I have vanquished. And I will kill you as well today with all your sons and kinsmen. Fight with resolve for you, Kaurava, are endowed with great strength. Yet Somadatta, you are already dead for you fight against mahatejasvin Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, of the drum banner, in whom there is always charity, self-restraint, purity of heart, compassion, modesty, intelligence, forgiveness, and all else that is indestructible. You will die along with Karna and Subala's son Sakuni. I swear by Krishna's feet and by all my punya that I will kill you and your sons. You will save yourself only if you flee from battle.

After addressing each other thus, their eyes red with fury, the two great Kshatriyas begin to fight with arrows. Then with a thousand rathas and ten thousand horsemen, Duryodhana casts a defensive circle around Somadatta, as does Sakuni armed with every kind of astra and supported by his sons, grandsons and brothers: why, a power to equal Indra's. Your brother-in-law, Rajan, young in years and his body hard as the Vajra, and canny and wise, has a hundred thousand brave horsemen with him with which force he defends Somadatta. Protected by these powerful ones, Somadatta shrouds Satyaki with clouds of arrows.

Seeing Satyaki so besieged, Dhrishtadyumna rushes up to protect him with a large force, and the two vast legions collide with a sound like that of many oceans lashed into fury by tearing hurricanes. Somadatta pierces Satyaki with nine arrows; Yuyudhana strikes him back also with nine shafts of such power that Somadatta staggers and sits down abruptly in his chariot, fainted. His sarathy whisks him away from the battle. Drona sees this and arrives swiftly to face the Yadu hero.

Seeing the Acharya attack him, many Pandava warriors led by Yudhishtira come to Satyaki's rescue. Then commences a battle between Drona and the Pandavas, like that between Bali and the Devas for the sovereignty of the three worlds. Drona covers the Pandava host with a barrage of arrows and sharply wounds Yudhishtira. He strikes Satyaki with ten barbed shafts, Dhrishtadyumna with twenty, Bhimasena with nine, Nakula with five, Sahadeva with eight, Sikhandin with a hundred, and each of the five sons of Draupadi with five. Next, he shoots Virata with eight arrows, Drupada with ten, Yudhamanyu with three and Uttamaujas with six. And piercing many other warriors, he rushes towards Yudhishtira whose troops run in all directions wailing.

Seeing Drona slaughter his forces, an incensed Arjuna quickly rides up to contain the Acharya. Now Yudhishtira's army rallies to support him and, again, the fierce battle between Drona and the Pandavas ensues. Drona, supported by your sons, begins to consume the Pandava host like a fire devouring a heap of cotton. He is radiant like the sun at dead of night, and like a blazing fire he looses his ray-like arrows without any moment's lapse from his bow, which is always drawn into a circle. Like the sun he scorches everything around him and consumes his enemies, and there is none in that army who can stop him.

Drona's shafts hack away the heads of all who venture to confront him before burrowing into the earth. Butchered by the illustrious Brahmana, the Pandava host once more turns tail and flees in the very presence of Arjuna. Seeing the rout that Drona perpetrates, at Arjuna's instance, Krishna guides his ratha harnessed to horses white as silver, or milk, or the kunda flower, or the moon, towards Drona's chariot. Bhimasena, too, seeing Phalguna ride at Drona, says to his charioteer, "Take me towards Drona's legion."

Visoka urges his horses down Arjuna's wake. Seeing the two brothers ride towards Drona's akshauhini, the greatest maharathas among the Panchalas, the Srinjayas, the Matsyas, the Chedis, the Karushas, the Kosalas, and the Kaikeyas, all follow them. Then, Rajan, a hair-raising battle breaks out as two mighty squadrons of rathas led by Arjuna and Bhima attack your host; the former on the right and the latter in the van. Seeing them dimly in the night lit by flaming astras, Dhrishtadyumna and Satyaki rush to support them.

The two hosts come together with a sound that is like the noise made by many seas lashed into fury by many tempests. Spying Satyaki in the battle, Aswatthaman, wroth at the killing of Bhurisravas, rides furiously against him. However, Bhimasena's Rakshasa son, the towering Ghatotkacha, riding on a massive chariot of black iron covered with bear-skins, which is twelve thousand cubits tall and wide, swoops down on Drona's son, coming like another night himself.

The eerie creatures yoked to it are neither horses nor elephants, but strange beasts big as elephants. On its lofty flagstaff is perched a prince of vultures with outstretched wings and outspread talons, with glaring, unwinking eyes, and shrieking dreadfully. The immense ratha is festooned with red flags, decked with the entrails of various animals and fitted with eight wheels. Riding on it, is a full akshauhini of the most ferile and macabre Rakshasas armed with spears, great clubs, rocks and trees, all surrounding their prince Ghatotkacha.

Seeing Ghatotkacha come to battle at night, the time when his kind are at their strongest, the enemy kings are struck with fear. He, the prince of Rakshasas, looms like some great black hill of terrible aspect, altogether frightful, with terrible fangs bared and his visage fierce, with arrowhead-like ears and high cheek-bones, stiff hair rising straight up from his head, glittering eyes, a sunken belly, a blazing mouth yawned wide as a chasm, and a crown on his head, darkly splendid, and waves of terror sweep your son's army even like the current of the Ganga agitated by the wind.

At his dreadful roars, elephants spray urine and dung and the kings tremble. Then the Rakshasas, whose day is night, cover the field with a shower of stones, with wheeling chakras, bhundis, darts, lances, spears, sataghnis and axes. Rajan, all your sons and Karna flee from that ghastly phalanx. Only Drona's proud son Aswatthaman, ever arrogant of his valour, stands fearlessly and quickly dispels the mayic illusions that Ghatotkacha creates.

His rage mounting, Ghatotkacha looses a tirade of arrows at Aswatthaman, which pass through his body, emerging dyed with his blood and streak into the earth like snakes into an anthill. However, an inspired Aswatthaman does not flinch but wounds Ghatotkacha deeply in all his marmas with ten arrows that lance agony through the great Rakshasas so he throws back his head and howls abysmally. Bhima's son takes up a chakra with a thousand spokes and an edge sharp as a razor, shining like the rising sun and adorned with diamonds, and hurls it at Aswatthaman. As the wheel flies spinning towards Drona's son, he shatters it into fragments with a tremendous volley and it falls onto the earth, like the cherished hopes of an ill-fated man.

Ghatotkacha swiftly mantles Aswatthaman with a torrent of thunderbolts, even like Rahu swallowing the Sun. Meanwhile, Ghatotkacha's splendid son Anjanaparvan, looking like a mass of shining antimony, checks the Brahmana warrior like Meru, king of the mountains, checking the coursing wind. Beleaguered and bleeding profusely from the recalescent arrows of Bhimasena's grandson, Aswatthaman looks like Sumeru receiving a lashing of rain from a mighty cloud.

By the moment battle fury mounts in Aswatthaman, who is no less than Rudra, of whom he is often called an amsa, or Upendra in prowess, and with one shaft he smashes Anjanaparvan's standard, with two more kills his two charioteers, and with three others, his trivenuka. Next, with a single astounding shaft he destroys his bow and slaughters his horses with four more thick barbs. His ratha rendered useless, Anjanaparvan picks up a sword engraved with golden stars but Aswatthaman breaks it in two in his hands with a single arrow.

Hidimba's grandson hefts a gold-chased mace and, whirling it over his head casts it like fell lightning at Aswatthama, who calmly smashes it into dust even as it flares at him. Now, Anjanaparvan flies up high into the air, snatching up some trees as he goes! Roaring like a thunderhead from above, he hurls the trees down over Aswatthaman like thunderbolts. Adroitly avoiding these, Drona's son covers Anjanaparvan, the mayavi hanging in the sky, with an upward storm of shafts.

The Rakshasa descends again on to his gold-decked chariot, still looking like a high and beautiful hill of antimony running rillets of blood. And finally, Aswatthaman kills Anjanaparvan, cased in a heavy iron coat of mail, even like Mahadeva killed the Asura Andhaka in olden days. Seeing his mighty son slain, Ghatotkacha's roars erupt like peals of thunder across dark Kurukshetra; he rides up to Drona's son who now consumes the Pandava troops like a raging forest-fire, and cries: "Stop and fight me, O son of Drona! You will not escape me alive! I will kill you today like Agni's son did Krauncha."

Aswatthaman replies, "Go, child, and fight others, O you who have the power of a Deva. It is not proper, O son of Hidimbi, that I should have battle with one who is like a son to me. I have no grudge against you! Yet, when one's ire is roused, one may even kill one's own self."

Ghatotkacha, stricken at the death of his son, and his eyes red as copper, tells Aswatthaman, "Am I a coward, O son of Drona, that you try, like some vulgar fellow, to frighten me with this talk? Your words do not become you. I have been sired by Bhima in the celebrated Kuru vamsa and I am a son of the Pandavas, the heroes who never retreat from battle. I am also the king of the Rakshasas, equal to the ten-headed Ravana in prowess. Stop, Stop, O son of Drona! Brahmana, I will remove your very wish for battle and you will not escape me alive today!"

With that, Ghatotkacha, son of Bhima, attacks Aswatthaman like a lion a prince of elephants. He unleashes a gale of arrows of the measure of akshas at the Brahmana bull among maharathas. Aswatthaman consummately cuts down the furious shafts before they can reach him. The night sky is lit up bright with the astras the two loose at each other, and the sparks that flow down in cascades from the unearthly weapons locked together are like vast swarms of fireflies.

Ghatotkacha uses fluent sorcery, maya, against Drona's son, who, however, is particularly adept at dispelling such illusions and proud of his prowess at this. Ghatotkacha quickly makes himself invisible with maya and again suddenly assumes the towering form of a great mountain appeared out of nowhere, crowded with cliffs, trees and fountains from which spears, lances, swords and heavy clubs flow in a cataract. Aswatthaman remains unmoved and invokes the Vajrastra, imbued with the force of thunder, which blasts the mayic mountain into the stuff of dreams of which it is made.

Now the Rakshasa becomes a mass of deep blue clouds in the sky, decked with a rainbow, and begins to hurl down storms of stones and rocks on Drona's son. Then summoning the Vayavyastra, Aswatthaman blows away the sorcerous cloud mass. Seamlessly, he turns his attention back to the ground and the battlefield plunged in night and now using every devastra at his command, without the least restraint, covers all the points of the compass with his flaming arrows and, in moments, kills a hundred thousand maharathas.

He sees Ghatotkacha riding fearlessly at him, with bent bow and a large cohort of tigerish Rakshasas, some riding elephants, some on dark chariots and some on enormous horses, all followers of the son of Hidimbi, their faces fearsome, their heads and necks great and outlandish. These Rakshasas are from the strains of both Paulastyas and Yatudhanas, their powers equal to that of Indra, and they carry large and exotic weapons and wear diverse kinds of mail not seen among human warriors. So terrible are they and so obviously hard to quell, and swollen with rage, that Duryodhana looks at them and is plunged into swift dejection.

Aswatthaman tells him, “Stop, O Duryodhana! You need have no fear. Stand aside with your brothers and these lords of earth, powerful as Indra. I swear that I will kill all your enemies and you will not face defeat. Meanwhile, reassure your troops of this.”

Duryodhana replies, “I do not find what you say surprising for your heart is great, O son of Drona, and your love for us greater.”

Then he says to Sakuni, “Arjuna fights supported by a hundred thousand maharathas of untold valour. Ride against him, Matulan, with sixty thousand rathas, while Karna, Vrishasena, Kripa, Nila, Kritavarman, the sons of Purumitra, Dusasana, Nikumbha, Kundabhedin, Puranjaya, Dridharatha, Hemakampana, Salya, Aruni, Indrasena, Sanjaya, Vijaya, Jaya, Purakrathin, Jayavarman, Sudarshana, and the Northerners will follow you with sixty thousand foot-soldiers. O my uncle, kill Bhima, the twins and Dharmaputra Yudhishtira, as Indra did the Asuras. You are my hope of victory. Drona’s son has already grievously wounded them, mauling all their limbs; so now kill the sons of Kunti, O Sakuni, like Kartikeya slaying the Asuras.”

Sakuni hears this and, without hesitating a moment, rides forth to have the Pandavas’ lives, filling your son’s heart with delight. Meanwhile, Rajan, a fearsome battle is underway between the Rakshasas and Aswatthaman, truly like that between Sakra and Prahlada in days of yore. A raging Ghatotkacha strikes Drona’s son in the chest with ten powerful shafts, fierce as poison or fire, and Aswatthaman trembles on his ratha like a tall tree shaken by a storm. With a broad-headed arrow, Bhima’s son severs the bright bow in Aswatthaman’s hands.

Aswatthaman sweeps up another mighty bow and looses an occult, spreading torrent of shafts at all the Rakshasas. These shafts draw gushes of blood from the great Rakshasa legion and they are like a herd of elephants harried by a pride of lions. Drona’s son overwhelms Ghatotkacha’s Rakshasas with their horses, charioteers and elephants, and blazes forth like Agni consuming all the living at the end of the Yuga.

With astras of recondite fire, he incinerates a full akshauhini of Rakshasa troops, and looks as magnificent as the divine Maheswara in Swarga after the Lord torched the triad city of Tripura from the sky. Aswatthaman shines forth on dark Kurukshetra like the apocalypse of the pralaya after it has cremated every creature.

A wild Ghatotkacha roars at his vast Rakshasa force, "Slay the son of Drona!"

Their fangs curved and bright like diamonds, their faces great and frightful, their mouths agape with long tongues lolling out, and their eyes burning in the darkness like ominous slitted flames, the night-rangers fill the world with their devastating roars; armed with strange and glinting weapons, they rush headlong at Aswatthaman, attacking him ferociously with thousands of sleek lances, sataghnis, spiked maces, asanis, axes, scimitars, maces, short arrows, heavy clubs, thick spears, swords, polished kampanas, kunapas, hulas, strange keening rockets, stones, vats of hot oil, thunas of black iron, and massive mallets, all dreadful and eerie.

Seeing this downpour of weapons fall upon the head of Drona's son, your warriors are shaken. Aswatthaman, however, nervelessly destroys the entire lot of ayudhas, looming in magnificence like a golden cloud rising by dark. Never pausing, he yet again razes entire hordes of the demons. The skill that Aswatthaman displays is wondrous, my lord, incomparable.

Alone and unsupported, an expert with great and mighty weapons, he consumes the seething Rakshasa army with his blazing astras in the very presence of Ghatotkacha, so they turn into pillars of ashes, which the wind scatters. Drona's son is irradiant in the night as the Samvartaka fire.

Indeed, Rajan, there is no warrior among all the thousands of great kings and Kshatriyas on that chasmal field that can face Aswatthaman as he devours the Pandava host as he pleases, none except Bhima's son Ghatotkacha. His coppery eyes by now rolling in wrath, biting his lips until they bleed, Ghatotkacha says in deathly quiet to his sarathy, "Take me to the son of Drona."

Riding on the formidable chariot that flies banners of victory, Bhima's son by Hidimbi rides again at Aswatthaman ablaze. With a roar to drown all gone before, he whirls a grave asani, an iron mace of celestial craft fitted with eight golden bells, and flings it like a thunder flash at Drona's son. But in a blink, Aswatthaman leaps high in his chariot, seizes the lethal weapon in his hands and casts it right back at the Brahmana! Now Ghatotkacha hurls himself out of his ratha and the incandescent asani explodes on his massive chariot, turning it to a heap of ashes along with its horses, charioteers and standard, and then lies still smouldering on the ground before subsiding in a reverberant susurrus.

Everyone applauds this feat of Drona's son. Ghatotkacha now runs to Dhrishtadyumna's chariot, takes up a bow as great as that of Indra himself, and shoots again at Aswatthaman. Dhrishtadyumna, too, pierces Aswatthaman's chest with many gold-winged shafts, all vicious as serpents. Drona's son retaliates with burning arrows by the thousands, which Ghatotkacha and Dhrishtadyumna repel with their own shafts of fire. The battle that swells between Ghatotkacha and Aswatthaman is awesome, terrible and it enthralls all the warriors around them, O Bharatarishabha!

Then, with thousands of rathas, three hundred elephants, and six thousand horsemen, Bhimasena arrives there. With unflagging zeal, Aswatthaman continues to fight Ghatotkacha and Dhrishtadyumna with his forces. Wondrous, past describing is the genius that Drona's son displays; why, one might well say that no one else could match his valour. In the flash of an eye, he slaughters a full akshauhini of Rakshasa troops with horses, charioteers, rathas and elephants, in the presence of Bhimasena, Ghatotkacha, Dhrishtadyumna, the twins, Yudhishtira, Arjuna and Krishna.

Struck deep by Aswatthaman's arrows, elephants fall on elephants like crestless mountains. Strewn all around with the still convulsing trunks of elephants lopped off, Kurukshetra looks as if it is overspread with writhing snakes. The field is resplendent with golden staves and royal parasols, like the sky at the end of the Yuga, shining with planets, stars, and many moons and suns. He lets flow a river of the blood of elephants, horses and warriors. Tall standards are its great frogs; drums its large tortoises; white royal parasols its rows of swans; yak-tails its kankas, vultures, and crocodiles; weapons its fish; elephants the rocks on its banks; horses, its sharks; chariots, its broad and shifting banks; and banners, its rows of fine trees. With arrows for its smaller fish, the frightful river has spears, darts and swords for snakes; marrow and flesh for its mire, and trunkless bodies floating on it for its rafts. It is choked with the hair of men and beasts, which are its moss and it filled the timid with fear. We see bloody waves on its surface and it is frightful because of the corpses of foot-soldiers that fill it. Yama's world is the ocean towards which this river flows.

After killing the Rakshasas, Aswatthaman now turns his supernatural archery on Ghatotkacha. He also lacerates the mighty Parthas, Vrikodara, the sons of Dhrishtadyumna and hacks away the head of Suratha, one of Drupada's sons. He kills Suratha's younger brother Satrunjaya, and then Valanika, followed by Jayanika and Jaya. He beheads Prishadhra with a roar, and next the proud Chandrasena and, with ten exact arrows, despatches Kuntibhoja's ten sons.

Then, Rajan, he sends Srutayus to Yama, the Lord of Death. Now Aswatthaman, the terrible, affixes a devastra to his bowstring, draws it to his ear and unleashes that celestial weapon, like the very Yama danda, the rod of death, at Ghatotkacha. The astra blasts through Ghatotkacha's chest and bores into the ground behind him. Bhima's son collapses in his chariot.

Believing him dead, maharatha Dhrishtadyumna spirits him away and sets him on another chariot. And, Rajan, Yudhishtira's chariot legion flees the battle from Drona's invincible son, who throws back his head and gives a triumphant roar that shakes the earth, while all your sons and your army cry out his name and hail his feat. The earth, strewn all around with the fallen, hilly bodies of dead rakshasas, mangled and shredded by thousands of arrows, presents the face of an indescribable nightmare. The Siddhas, Gandharvas, Pisachas, Nagas, Pitris, black ravens, large numbers of pisachas, bhutas, Apsaras and Devas, all laud Aswatthaman, the son of Drona.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'On finding the sons of Drupada, Kuntibhoja and the Rakshasas, in their thousands, killed by Aswatthaman, Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Dhrishtadyumna and Satyaki converge on him together, determined to stop him.

Somadatta sees Satyaki and rage surges up again in him and he looses a cataract of arrows at Yuyudhana. A bloody and thrilling battle breaks out again between your army and the enemy, Seeing Satyaki beset, Bhima attacks the Kaurava hero Somadatta, raking him with ten searing arrows. Somadatta replies with hundred frenzied shafts.

Then an angry Satyaki looses ten razor like thunderbolts at the grand old warrior, grieving over the death of his son Bhurisravas—Somadatta blessed with every estimable virtue, who is even like Yayati, the son of Nahusha. Yuyudhana strikes him again with seven excruciating shafts, while Bhimasena casts a dreadful adamantine parigha at the ancient. Satyaki gores Somadatta's chest with an exceptional astra fierce as fire. The parigha and the fire shaft, both strike him at once and fell the heroic Somadatta.

Seeing his son fallen into a swoon, Balhika rushes at Satyaki, covering him with arrows as a cloud does a mountain during the monsoon. Bhima, defending Satyaki, strikes the illustrious Bahlika with nine arrows, at which the mighty-armed son of Pratipa casts a javelin like Indra's Vajra at Bhima's great chest. Struck squarely, mighty Bhima trembles on his ratha and faints for a moment.

Recovering quickly, with a shattering roar, the titanic Pandava hurls a mace at Balhika, which strikes his head off in a scarlet explosion and that aged shura falls like an old and great tree struck by lightning. Upon his death, your sons Nagadatta, Dridharatha, Virabahu, Ayobhuja, Dridha, Suhasta, Viragas, Pramatha and Ugrayayin, each equal in prowess to Dasaratha's son Rama, rush at Bhima, their bows streaming deadly fire. Seeing them, Bhimasena's eyes light up and with nine marvellous arrows, loosed in a single moment, he kills them all, either taking their heads or blowing their hearts to shreds.

After killing your nine sons, Bhima shrouds Karna's favourite son in a swathe of arrows. The vaunted Vrikaratha, Karna's brother, strikes Bhima with a slew of powerful shafts but growling, the mighty Pandava takes his head from his neck with a wide-headed arrow. Next, O Bhaarata, he slays seven maharathas of Sakuni's forces, and strikes Satachandra down and rides over him with his chariot, crushing him into the earth. Unable to bear watching this savagery, Sakuni's brothers, five mighty Kshatriyas, Gavaksha, Sarabha, Vibhu, Subhaga and Bhanudatta rush at Bhimasena showering arrows at him. A calm Bhima gladly kills all five with five heavy shafts. Seeing those heroes killed, many other great Kshatriyas feel the touch of fear upon them and waver.

Showing uncommon fury, now Yudhishtira attacks your troops and begins to raze them as he pleases, in full view of Drona and your sons. He despatches the Ambashtas, the Malavas, the brave Trigartas, the Sibis, the Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Bahlikas and the Vasatis, turning the earth soggy with flesh and blood. Turning in another direction, with ferocity so unexpected of the Ajatasatru, he sends the Yaudheyas and a large host of the Madrakas to Yama.

Now a loud tumult arises around Yudhishtira's chariot, and we hear roars and cries of, "Kill!" "Hack him to pieces!" "Seize him!"

Seeing the Dharmaraja raze your troops, Drona, urged on by your desperate son, unleashes the Vayavyastra at Yudhishtira. But the son of Pandu counters the astra of the Wind with his own weapon of Vayu. Inflamed by this, Drona looses a clutch of unearthly astras at the Dharmaputra—the Varuna astra, the Yamya astra, the Agneya astra, the Tvashtra astra and the Savitra astra. But amazingly the gentle Yudhishtira, now turned into a pure Kshatriya warrior, easily negates every unworldly weapon that his Acharya aims at him.

Drona, determined to keep his vow to Duryodhana, invokes the Aindra and the Prajapatya astras to kill the son of Dharma. However, Kuruttama Yudhishtira, with the gait of an elephant or lion, of broad chest, large red eyes and endowed with tejas hardly less than that of Drona, summons the Mahendrastra to confound all Drona's celestial ayudhas. The Mahendra extinguishes Drona's entire volley. A livid Drona, his eyes aflame to kill the Pandava, his disciple, summons the Brahmastra so the dark filed is suddenly illumined as if by another blinding sun and all that watch are terror-stricken.

Seeing the Brahmastra invoked, Yudhishtira summons his own Brahmastra and the two great weapons extinguish each other. All the great maharathas there applaud both Drona and Yudhishtira.

In frustration, in great rage, his eyes turning the colour of copper, Drona turns away from Yudhishtira and begins to annihilate Drupada's akshauhini with the Vayavyastra. Before the very eyes of Bhimasena and Arjuna, the Panchala forces flee from the Acharya. Arjuna and Bhima check the flight of their troops and attack the enemy with two large divisions of rathas. Arjuna assails the right and Bhima the left, and they confront Bharadwaja's son with two veritable tornadoes of arrows. The Kaikeyas, the Srinjayas, and the vigorous Panchalas again follow the two brothers, Rajan, as do the Matsyas and the Satwatas.

And now Arjuna Kiritin brings such devastation to your army, already besieged by exhaustion and sleep, that they break ranks and flee. Drona and Duryodhana try to rally them but they cannot check their troops in their flight.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Looking at the vast, seething army of the Pandavas your son Duryodhana now thinks it impossible to withstand the enemy. He says to Karna, "Loyal friend, the hour has come when your friends need you most. O Karna, save us! Our army is encircled by the Panchalas, the Kaikeyas, the Matsyas, and their maharathas, all full of rage and like hissing snakes. There, the Pandavas, sure of victory, shout for joy. The teeming chariot-force of the Panchalas is now as powerful as Indra himself."

Karna replies, "If Purandara himself comes here to save Arjuna, I will vanquish even the Deva king before I kill that son of Pandu. Believe me that this is the truth. Be of good cheer, O Bhaarata! I will kill Arjuna and all the Panchalas and bring you victory even as Pavaka's son gave Vasava. I will achieve whatever you need to win this war.

Among all the Pandavas, Arjuna is most powerful and I will use Indra's shakti against him. Upon his death, his brothers will either surrender themselves to you or retire once more to the forest. As long as I am alive, O Kauravya, never yield to grief or despair. I will vanquish the united forces of the Pandavas, the Panchalas, the Kaikeyas, and the Vrishnis. I will make porcupines of them with my arrows and I will give you the Earth and everything in it."

At this, Kripa, who is near enough to hear what Karna says, tells him with a sardonic smile, "Your speech is fair indeed, Karna! If fine words could fetch victory, surely with you for his protector, this Bharatarishabha Duryodhana would be thought to have abundant protection. But you boast so much in the presence of the Kuru king, but we seldom see you prove yourself with deeds to match.

Many times we have seen you fight the sons of Pandu, and on every occasion, O Suta's son, they have beaten you soundly. When the Gandharvas captured Duryodhana, all the men fought except you, who were the first to run away. Outside Virata's city, Arjuna defeated all the Kauravas including you and your younger brother. You are no match for even one of the sons of Pandu in battle; how can you expect to vanquish all of them together led by Krishna?

Karna, you brag too much! Sutaputra, good men, men of true worth, do not talk they prove themselves with their deeds. You, on the other hand, are always thundering like the dry clouds of autumn, and you have shown yourself to be a man of no substance. Sadly, Duryodhana does not seem to understand this.

You rant and roar, Karna, as long as you do not see Arjuna. And, as soon as you see him near, you fall silent. Indeed, you roar as long as you are out of range of Arjuna's arrows and your bragging is stanched the moment Partha's thunderbolts strike you. Kshatriyas prove themselves by their feats of arms; Brahmanas, by their wise and sacred speech; Arjuna proves himself with his bow, but Karna only by the castles he builds in the air.

Fool, who is there that can stand up to Pandu's son Partha who pleases Rudra himself?"

Thus railed at by Saradwat's son, Karna answers, "Heroes always boom like the clouds of the monsoon, and just like seeds planted in fertile soil, quickly sprout. I do not see any fault in heroes who accept great loads on their shoulders before making boastful speeches on the field of battle. When a man mentally resolves to bear a burden, Destiny itself helps him in its execution. Wishing in my heart to accept a great responsibility, I am always firm and resolved. If before killing the sons of Pandu with Krishna and Satwatas, I do proclaim what I will do, what is it to you, O Brahmana? True heroes never roar fruitlessly like autumn clouds. Conscious of their own might, only the wise dare tell of it.

In my heart I am determined to vanquish Krishna and Partha today! It is for this that I declare myself, O son of Gotama! Now behold the fruit of my roars, Brahmana. Slaying the son of Pandu with all their followers, Krishna and the Satwatas, I will bestow this whole Earth on Duryodhana without a thorn in it."

Kripa replies, "I do not give much credence, Sutaputra, to your delirious boasting, for they are mere words not deeds. You always deprecate the two Krishnas and Dharmaraja Yudhishtira. But Karna, Yudhishtira will have victory for he has the two Krishnas on his side. I tell you, the Devas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, Manavas, the Nagas, and the Garudas cannot defeat Krishna and Arjuna.

Yudhishtira Dharmaputra is devoted to the Brahmanas, truthful in speech and self-controlled. He reveres the Pitris and the Devas, is devoted to the practice of satya and dharma, is a master of weapons, possesses great intelligence, and he is also grateful. His brothers are endowed with great strength and are masters of war. They are devoted to the service of their elders, possess wisdom and fame, and practise dharma. Their kinsmen are all powerful as Indra and great warriors, and they are all exceptionally devoted to the Pandavas. Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandin, Janamejaya, the son of Durmukha, Chandrasena, Madrasena, Kritavarman, Dhruva, Dhara, Vasuchandra, Sutejana, the sons of Drupada, and Drupada himself, all maharathas and owners of devastras, and the king of the Matsyas with his younger brothers, all fight resolutely for Yudhishtira's cause.

Gajanika, Virabhadra, Sudarshana, Srutadhwaja, Balanika, Jayanika, Jayapirya, Vijaya, Labhalaksha, Jayaswa, Kamaratha, the handsome brothers of Virata, and the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, the five sons of Draupadi and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha all fight for the Pandavas. The sons of Pandu cannot be destroyed. Why, Bhima and Phalguna with their cosmic weapons can annihilate the entire universe, with the Devas, Asuras, and Manavas, with all the tribes of Yakshas and Rakshasas and with all the Gajas and Nagas, and all other creatures.

As for Yudhishtira, he can consume the whole world with just an angry look from his pure eyes. How, Karna, can you vanquish these enemies for whom Krishna of immeasurable might has donned armour? This intention of yours, Sutaputra, is just your folly, that you dare contend with Sauri himself, who is the Lord of the universe."

Karna replies, smiling, "O Brahmana, whatever you say about the Pandavas is true. All the virtues you see in them, and many more besides, can be found in the sons of Pandu. It is true also that even the Devas led by Vasava, the Daityas, the Yakshas, and the Rakshasas cannot vanquish the Parthas. For all that, I, Karna, will defeat the Parthas using the inexorable astra given me by Indra. With that shakti, I will kill Arjuna and when he dies, all his brothers, and Krishna too will never enjoy sovereignty over the Earth, not without Arjuna. They will all perish. And then, this Bhumi, with her seas, will belong undisputedly to Suyodhana.

In this world, one can achieve anything one wants, as long as one plans carefully for it. This I know well, and that is why I venture to proclaim what I will do, O Kripa. As for you, you are old, a Brahmana by birth, and no Kshatriya. You bear too much love for the Pandavas and that is why you repeatedly belittle me. I have been patient, but if you speak mockingly to me again, I will cut out your tongue, O wretch!

You want to praise the Pandavas to frighten all our troops and the Kauravas. Listen to what I say now. Duryodhana, Drona, Sakuni, Durmukha, Jaya, Dusasana, Vrishasena, Salya, you, Somadatta, Drona's son and Vivimsati—all these maharathas are here with us, clad in armour. Which enemy, even if he has the power of Indra, can vanquish you all? All that I have named are great warriors, knowers of dharma, and have earned their place in Swarga. They can match the very gods in battle, and they have taken the field to kill the Pandavas for Duryodhana's sake.

I regard victory and defeat to depend on destiny, even in the case of the greatest maharathas. When Mahabaho Bhishma himself lies pierced with a hundred arrows, and Vikarna, Jayadratha, Bhurisravas, Jaya, Jalasandha, Sudakshina, Sala the great, Bhagadatta mahatejasvin and many others equal to them, heroes all and mightier than the Pandavas, lie on Kurukshetra, killed by the Pandavas, what can you think, O wretched Brahmana, except that all this is the result of destiny?

As for the enemies of Duryodhana, whom you so adore, their brave warriors, too, have been slaughtered in thousands. The armies of both the Kurus and the Pandavas diminish with every passing moment; I do not see in this the prowess of the Pandavas! For Duryodhana's sake, O lowest of men, I will challenge the sons of Pandu with all my heart and all my might. As for victory, that depends on destiny.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Aswatthaman is at hand and, hearing his uncle Kripa spoken to so harshly and contemptuously by Karna, Drona's son draws his sword and, in the very presence of Duryodhana, rushes roaring at Karna.

Aswatthaman says, "Vile of men, Kripa speaks of the virtues that Arjuna truly has. And you dare rebuke him from being evil-minded and malicious. Your pride and insolence make you brag without a sane care for any of the world's great bowmen! Where was your great prowess when, after chasing you away like a dog, the Gandivi slew Jayadratha in your very sight? Vainly, O wretch of a Suta, do you carry in your mind the hope of beating him who once fought Mahadeva himself.

The very Devas and the Asuras united, and with Indra at their head, failed to vanquish Arjuna, with only Krishna for his ally. How then do you, Sutaputra, hope to defeat the greatest shura in the world, the unconquered Arjuna? But look now, vile Karna, what I, Aswatthaman, do to you today. Lowest of men, dimwitted, evil-minded Karna, I will cut your head from your neck!"

And Aswatthaman rushes furiously at Karna but Duryodhana and Kripa seize him together and firmly restrain him.

Then Karna says, “This dark-hearted dog of a Brahmana thinks he is great and boasts of his strength. Set him free, Duryodhana, and let him feel the might of Karna.”

Aswatthaman replies, “Son of a Suta, O you with an evil mind, we may pardon you, but Phalguna will quell your rising pride.”

Duryodhana intervenes and says, “Aswatthaman, control your anger. You must forgive, Anagha, and not be angry with Karna. Upon you, him, Kripa, Drona, Salya and Sakuni a great burden rests. Drive away your wrath, O best of Brahmanas! Look where all the Pandava troops advance to attack Karna. Indeed, here they come, challenging us all.”

Pacified by the king, Aswatthaman, the noble son of Drona, suppresses his fury and forgives Karna. Then the quiet and mild Acharya Kripa says to Karna, “Dark-hearted Sutaputra, we forgive you, but Arjuna will quell your pride.”

Meanwhile, the Pandavas and the Panchalas charge your army unitedly, with reverberant roars. Mahatejasvin Karna maharatha, leading many great Kuru warriors and looking like Indra in the midst of the Devas, waits, his bow drawn. As if each battle that erupts is more frightful and deafening than the ones gone before, so is the one that now breaks out between the Pandavas and the Panchalas and Karna and his forces.

The enemy warriors roar, There stands Kana in his ratha! and Evil one, come fight us now! Others, with eyes bulging in rage, cry, “Let our great Kshatriyas kill this arrogant wretch of little discernment, this son of a Suta. He must not live. This sinner is the Pandavas’ worst enemy. Loyal to Duryodhana, he is the root of all these evils that we have seen on Kurukshetra. Kill him!”

With these and other cries, and exhorted by Yudhishtira, many great Pandava and Panchala maharathas rush at Karna, unleashing a cataract of arrows at him. But the Sutaputra is supremely unmoved; no trace of fear lays its fingers on his heart and a mocking smile curves his fine lips. Seeing that sea of troops, Karna, like Death himself, begins to mow them down with clouds of arrows.

The Pandavas respond with arrows from their lakhs of bows; they fight Radha’s son as the Daityas of old fighting with Indra. Indeed, so evenly matched are the two vast forces that the gory, magnificent contention between them is like the Devasura yuddha of old.

Karna's archery is wonderful, for not all his enemies combining against him can find a home in his body for a single arrow. He cut down all the barbs that streak at him in flight and responds by severing royal parasols, smashing chariots and killing enemy horses—all with arrows that bear his name upon them, every one. Harried by Karna so they quickly lose all assurance, the Pandava Kshatriyas begin to wander across the field like a herd of cattle stricken by bitter cold.

Struck by Karna's transcendent, godlike volleys, countless horses, elephants and maharathas fall dead and yet again the entire field is strewn with the severed heads and limbs of noble Kshatriyas. With the dead, the dying, and the wailing of wounded warriors, Kurukshetra by night truly resembles Yama's realm.

Duryodhana watches Karna at his splendid best, goes to Aswatthaman and tells him proudly, "Look where Karna torments and routs all the enemies massed against him! Why, he overwhelms them as Kartikeya did against the Asura host. And look where Arjuna now rides to kill him. Aswatthaman, my friend, you must protect Karna!"

Aswatthaman, Kripa, Salya and the great maharatha Kritavarman, son of Hridika, all ride against against Partha dashing towards them like Sakra against the Daitya host. They go gladly to support the heroic Karna. However, Rajan, Arjuna surrounded by the Panchalas presses on against Karna, like Purandara against the Asura Vritra.'

Dhritarashtra asks, 'Finding Phalguna advancing like Rudra himself, as he appears at the end of the Yuga, what does Karna do? Maharatha Karna, son of Vikartana, has always challenged Partha and always maintained that he can defeat the invincible Arjuna. What then, O Suta, does he do when he is suddenly face to face with his inveterate enemy?'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Arjuna rushing towards him like an elephant towards a rival elephant, Karna stands fearlessly up to him. Partha covers Karna with showers of shafts with wings of gold, and Karna envelops Vijaya with his arrows. Clouds of golden-winged, uncanny barbs they exchange, until, his rage boiling up, Karna strikes Arjuna with three deadly missiles. Arjuna can hardly bear to watch his adversary's virtuosity and looses a swath of thirty shafts at him, all with burning heads.

Arjuna strikes Karna through his left wrist with another long arrow, smiling, and forcing Karna to drop his bow. But Karna recovers in a flash, picks up his bow again and once more covers Arjuna with gales of wondrous fire, now showing his true unearthly skill. Not to be outdone, Dhananjaya cuts down Karna's arrow storms with his own.

Approaching each other quite close, these two greatest of all archers, fighting for honour, fighting at the outer limits of their incomparable prowess, continue to shoot at each other in an astounding display of genius, which makes one's hair stand on end.

Arjuna, inspired by his antagonist's prowess and swiftness of hand, lifts his archery and breaks Karna's bow at the very grip, kills his four horses with a scathe of wedge-headed shafts, and decapitates Karna's charioteer. As Karna stands vulnerable, Partha drills him with deadly volleys, so blood spouts from the golden Sutaputra. Karna leaps down from his useless ratha and quickly finds sanctuary in Kripa's chariot. Seeing Karna beaten again, your warriors run in all directions.

Duryodhana roars to them to stop. "Shuras, do not turn your backs on the battle. You bulls among Kshatriyas, stop! I will kill Partha myself, and all the Panchalas. When I fight the Gandivi today, he will see that my prowess is as that of Rudra at the end of the yuga. Today the Pandavas will find my arrows among them like locust swarms, like the torrents of rain that fall at summer's end.

Today I will put the proud Arjuna to rout and remove your fear of him. Arjuna will not withstand me today, brave heroes, even as the ocean can only dash helplessly against the continents."

His eyes red, Suyodhana rides at Arjuna, taking a teeming host with him. Seeing this, Kripa tells Aswatthaman, "Look, where Duryodhana, made mad by anger, goes to fight Arjuna, like an insect flying into a blazing fire. Stop him before this great king loses his life, in our very sight. He will certainly die if comes within range of Partha's arrows. My son, stop the king before Arjuna's astras make ashes of him. While we are still here and alive, it is a crime for the king to go into battle himself as if he has no one to fight for him. And if he engages Arjuna, his life will be good as lost!"

Aswatthaman rides quickly to the canny Duryodhana and says to him, "When I who love you am alive, O son of Gandhari, you must not go into battle yourself! Do not be anxious about vanquishing Arjuna, for I will stop him for you. Stay here, O Suyodhana, and watch me fight the son of Pandu."

Duryodhana replies, "Drona always protects the sons of Pandu, as if they are his own sons. You, also, either do not put forth your true prowess against the Pandavas or it is my fate that your awesome might wanes as soon as you are faced with Kunti's sons. Perhaps, you bear Yudhishtira or Draupadi some exceptional love for otherwise I cannot fathom why you do not fight the Pandavas as you do our other enemies.

Ah, shame on me for my bottomless greed, for whose sake all my dearest friends, who dearly want to please me, find themselves vanquished and shamed on the field and plunged into great grief! But you, Aswatthaman, who are Mahadeva's very equal and can destroy the enemy, will not do it. O son of my Acharya, I beg you, be pleased with me and vanquish my enemies!

Neither the Devas nor the Danavas can stand your astras, O son of Drona. For my sake, for all our sakes, kill the Panchalas and the Somakas with all their followers. The rest, with your protection, we ourselves will slay. Look, O Brahmana, where the famed Somakas and the Panchalas blaze among my troops like a great forest fire. Douse them, Aswatthaman, as only you can, and the Kalikeyas; otherwise, led by Arjuna, they will annihilate us all.

O Aswatthaman, Parantapa, ride there in haste. Whether you achieve it now or later, you must accomplish this feat and fetch us victory. The Rishis have all said that you have been born for the destruction of the Panchalas and that you will remove them from this world. It will be as they have predicted. O Naravyaghra, fulfil your destiny and kill the Panchalas with all their forces. When even the Devas with Indra at their head cannot face your astras, what can these Parthas and Panchalas do?

I speak truly when I say that the Pandavas united with the Somakas are no match for you. Ride, O Mahabaho! Do not delay another instant for look, where stricken by Arjuna's tides of arrows, our army breaks up and flees. Use your celestial tejas, my friend, for you can bring ruin to the enemy by yourself!"""

“Sanjaya says, ‘After Duryodhana speaks to him, Aswatthaman the insuperable is determined to annihilate the enemy. He tells your son, “It is as you say, O Kuruttama! The Pandavas are always dear to both my father and to me just as both of us are precious to them. But not in battle. We fight fearlessly, to the best of our abilities, and reckless of our lives. Karna, Salya, Kripa, Kritavarman and I could destroy the Pandava host in the twinkling of an eye just as the Pandavas could destroy the Kaurava host, if we were not here.

We fight the Pandavas to the best of our might, and they too fight us with their best strengths. Power, encountering power, is neutralised, O Bhaarata! I say to you, the Pandava army cannot be overcome as long as the sons of Pandu themselves are alive. The Pandavas are born with unworldly prowess and they are fighting in their own interest. Why, Duryodhana, should they not be able to kill your troops?

However, you are covetous and deceitful, Rajan, beyond all measure. You are vainglorious and suspicious of everything, which is why you suspect even us. I also think that you are evil, mean-spirited, selfish, why, an embodiment of sin, that you question us after everything that we do for you, day after harrowing day.

As for myself, I fight with determination for your sake, always prepared to lay down my life for you. I will return to battle now, O Kuruttama, and will fight and kill a great host of your enemy. I will do battle with the Panchalas, the Somakas, the Kaikeyas, and the Pandavas as well, only to please you. Seared by my arrows today, the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Somakas will scatter like a herd of cattle hunted by a lion. Today, seeing my prowess, the Dharmaputra with all the Somakas will find the whole world filled with Aswatthamans. Yudhishtira will be heartbroken to watch me slaughter the Panchalas and Somakas.

I will, O Bhaarata, slay all who dare come near me and no one will escape me alive today."

Saying this to your son, the mahabaho Aswatthaman charges the enemy, his arrows flaring in all directions. He cries to the Panchalas and the Kaikeyas, "Great maharathas, strike me! Show me your prowess."

At this, all the enemy warriors shower their shafts upon Drona's son. Easily cutting down all their arrows, Aswatthaman kills ten brave warriors among them, in the very sight of Dhrishtadyumna and the sons of Pandu. The Panchalas and the Somakas abandon the fight and flee. Dhrishtadyumna rides into the fray surrounded by a hundred unflinching maharathas in their chariots, the rattle of whose wheels is like the thunder of rain-charged clouds.

Looking at this, Dhrishtadyumna says to Aswatthaman, "O foolish son of Drona, of what use is killing common warriors? If you are a hero, then fight me. I will kill you, wretched Brahman. Stop and fight me for a moment without fleeing."

He shoots the Acharya's son countless savage barbs, which fly in an unbroken line and pierce Aswatthaman's body like honey bees entering a flowering tree. Deeply wounded and swelling with rage like a snake trodden upon, Aswatthaman, astra in hand, says, "Dhrishtadyumna, stop for a moment and I will send you straight to Yama!"

With astonishing dexterity, bending his arrows in flight at impossible trajectories, he covers Dhrishtadyumna from every side with a cascade of gold-winged shafts. Dhrishtadyumna says, "You know nothing of my birth, evil Brahmana, or of my vow. I will not kill you today when Drona himself is still alive. After this night passes and day dawns, I will first kill your father and then send you to your ancestors. This is my purpose today.

So, until then display the hatred you bear towards the Parthas, and the devotion you cherish for the Kurus. Come morning and you shall not escape me with your life. The Brahmana who abandons his svadharma and takes to the dharma of a Kshatriya can be killed by any Kshatriya, O lowest of men. So I will break no law by killing both your father and you."

So harshly does Dhrishtadyumna speak, as if to a servant, insulting the finest of Brahmanas, that, mustering all his choler, Aswatthaman answers him, saying, "Stop! Stop and fight, you Panchala wretch!" And he glares at him as if to burn him up with his eyes.

Sighing with rage like a snake, Aswatthaman looses a scorching volley at Dhrishtadyumna, striking him squarely and drawing blood. Dhrishtadyumna hardly winces but returns the fire with his own torrid salvo. The two are matched so evenly that no arrow separates them, one from the other. The duel escalates and each one kills hundreds of the other's common soldiers on every side even as they fight one another. Such is that marvellous contention between Drona's son and Dhrishtadyumna that the Siddhas, Charanas and other sky-ranging beings applaud them from above.

Filling the sky and all the points of the compass with veritable cloudbursts and covering the dim stars therewith, the two great warriors continue to duel and none can see them or where their arrows fly, land or claim countless lives in pitch darkness. As if dancing with their bows drawn into circles, intently trying to kill each other, those mahabahos fight so remarkably that even the greatest maharathas around them tremble in wonder, while others are terrified. Indeed, loud cheers and handclapping breaks out among both armies and every true warrior is filled with elation to watch that duel among duels. We hear loud shouts and so many combatants blow their conches, and begin to sound thousands of musical instruments.

This duel blazes equally but for a brief while. Then, darting forward suddenly, Aswatthaman cleaves Dhrishtadyumna's bow, standard, royal parasol, and kills his two Parshni charioteers, the principal sarathy, and his four horses. Roaring aloud, he then massacres the unprotected Panchalas in thousands! The Pandava host quakes with fear, for Drona's son is no less than Indra himself in the night.

In the very sight of Dhrishtadyumna and Arjuna, Aswatthaman slays a hundred Panchalas that face him with a hundred arrows, including three maharathas with three thunderbolts. The Panchalas and the Srinjayas turn tail with their banners torn. Having vanquished his enemies, Drona's son give a roar like stormclouds thundering at summer's end. He is as resplendent as the blazing fire at the end of the Yuga, after it has consumed all living creatures. Cheered deafeningly by all the Kauravas after he kills thousands of enemies, the valiant Aswatthaman shines in splendour, like the king of the Devas himself after vanquishing his enemies.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Now Yudhishtira and Bhimasena besiege Aswatthaman. Seeing this, Duryodhana and Drona ride against the Pandavas and a tumultuary battle ensues, to make the timorous tremble. A furious Yudhishtira despatches vast numbers of Ambashtas, Malavas, Vangas, Sibis and Trigartas to the land of the dead. Bhima, too, mauls the Abhishahas, the Surasenas and other mighty Kshatriyas, and makes the earth a swamp of blood.

Then, Rajan, Kiritin Swetavahana sends the Yaudheyas, the Madrakas, the Malavas and the Mountain-men to the regions of Yama. Struck by arrows shot with terrific force, elephants fall onto the earth like twin-peaked hills. Strewn with the lopped-off trunks of elephants that still writhe in convulsions, the field again looks as if covered with wriggling snakes. Kurukshetra is horribly magnificent, covered with the fallen golden chatras of kings; it looks like the firmament at the end of the Yuga, spangled with suns, moons and stars beyond count.

At this very time, there is an uproar near Drona's chariot, in which one can hear the words, "Kill!", "Strike!", "Hack!", "Pierce!", "Cut him to pieces!" Drona swiftly summons the Vayavyastra and begins to decimate the enemies that surround him, like a mighty tornado destroying gathering masses of clouds, and the Panchalas run away from fear, while Bhimasena and the noble Partha look on. However, they soon check the flight of their troops and lead a large force of chariots against the equally vast force of Drona. Arjuna attacking the right and Vrikodara the left, they lash Bharadwaja's son with two heavy torrents of arrows.

The maharathas among the Srinjayas and the Panchalas, with the Matsyas and the Somakas, Rajan, follow the two against Drona. While, many maharathas loyal to your son, bringing a great host with them, rush forward to support Drona. However, swiftly slaughtered by Arjuna and overcome by the turgid darkness, your Bharata host falls apart. Your son and Drona try to rally them but to no avail. Indeed, razed mercilessly by the arrows of the incomparable Arjuna, your army takes to its heels in all directions in that hour when the world is plunged in night. Abandoning the animals and chariots they ride, many great kings flee, Rajan, overwhelmed with fear of the hunting Kiritin.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Finding Somadatta brandishing his massive bow, Satyaki tells his charioteer, "Drive me towards Somadatta. I tell you truly, O Suta, I will not return from battle today without killing that worst of the Kurus, the son of Balhika."

The sarathy whips his fleet horses of the Sindhu breed, white as conch shells, and strong, so they fly at Somadatta, bearing Satyaki towards him even as the steeds of Indra bore him in the olden days against the Danavas. Seeing the Satwata hero coming like a storm, Somadatta turns fearlessly turns towards him and shrouds Yuyudhana in a cloudburst of shafts.

Satyaki, who knows no fear ever, returns Somadatta's calescent fire, and two gales of flaming shafts light up the thick darkness of Kurukshetra. Somadatta strikes Satyaki's chest with sixty shafts, while Satyaki draws blood all over Somadatta's body with arrows like streaks of lightning. Lacerated by each other the two look magnificent, like a couple of flowering kinsukas in spring. Dyed all over with blood, those illustrious warriors of the Kuru and the Vrishni races glare at each other as if they will ignite the darkness and each other with their eyes.

Riding on their chariots, these maharathas of terrible countenances circle each other, glowering like two baleful planets. Their bodies torn all over by arrows that still protrude from them, Rajan, they are like two porcupines. Pierced with countless golden-winged shafts, the two warriors glitter like a pair of tall trees covered with fireflies. Their bodies bright with the blazing arrows planted in them, the two maharathas look like two angry elephants caparisoned with burning torches. Then, Rajan, all at once, with a crescent-tipped arrow, Somadatta cleaves Satyaki's bow and, with dazzling swiftness, strikes him with thirty thunder flashes loosed quick as a thought.

Satyaki snatches up another bow, pierces Somadatta with five iron shafts and, with another broad-headed arrow smilingly rives his golden standard. Somadatta drills Satyaki with five and twenty shafts and in rage, with a razor-faced arrow, Satyaki breaks Somadatta's bow and savages him with a hundred straight gold-winged barbs, reducing him to the state of a snake without fangs.

However, Somadatta picks up another bow and looses banks and banks of arrows at Satyaki, who responds in kind. Somadatta continues to assail Satyaki without let. Then Bhima joins the fight to support Satyaki and gashes Somadatta with ten arrows and the great Kuru strikes back with many fanged shafts of his own properly inflamed Satyaki aims a terrible parigha at Somadatta's chest, an astra with a golden shaft and hard as the Vajra itself. However, smiling the while, Somadatta slices the dreadful astra as it flashes toward him, and riven in two, it falls to the earth like some mountain peak cloven by lightning.

With a broad-headed arrow, Yuyudhana severs Somadatta's bow again, and with another five arrows, cuts the leather gauntlet that covers his fingers into shreds. Never pausing, he cuts down Somadatta's four great horses, and with another immaculate shaft, beheads his sarathy. He now draws a stone-whetted, oil-slicked, gold-winged and occult arrow, a most exceptional shaft, and unleashes it at his hated enemy with such ferocity that it ignites into blinding light and flame as it falls like a hawk upon the old Kuru warrior, plunges into his chest, blows his heart into pieces and maharatha Somadatta, the hitherto invincible Kuru Kshatriya, falls dead without a murmur.

Seeing maharatha Somadatta killed, your warriors attack Satyaki with a force of rathas. Meanwhile, the Pandavas also, Rajan, with all the Prabhadrakas, and a large legion, tear into Drona's army. Yudhishtira leads this attack and puts Drona's forces to rout, killing hundreds of brave soldiers in his Acharya's very presence. Drona rushes in to defend his troops and strikes Yudhishtira deep with seven keen arrows. Yudhishtira responds by goring his master with five whistling shafts. Bleeding profusely, Drona licks the corners of his mouth and cuts down Yudhishtira's standard and breaks the bow in his hands.

Quicker than seeing, when speed is of the essence, Yudhishtira sweeps up another bow and covers Drona, his horses, charioteer, standard, and grand chariot with a thousand arrows! And all are spellbound with amazement, for they can hardly believe that this is the gentle, patient Dharmaraja they are watching.

Wounded and in great pain, Drona, the bull among Brahmanas, sits down for a while on the floor of his chariot. Then, recovering, sighing like a snake and full of rage, the Acharya invokes the Vayavyastra. However, Yudhishtira calmly summons a weapon of the Wind himself and nullifies Drona's astra; in the same moment, he breaks the Acharya's bow in two. Drona takes up another bow, which Yudhishtira again breaks.

Now Krishna says to Yudhishtira, speaking into his heart from afar, "Listen to me, O Mahabaho. Do not fight Drona anymore for he means to take you his captive. He who has been born to kill Drona will slay him; that task is not yours. Leave the Acharya and fight Duryodhana, for kings should battle kings, and not others. Surround yourself with elephants, horses and chariots and come where Dhananjaya and I, and Naravyaghra Bhima are fighting the Kurus with but a small force."

Yudhishtira reflects for a moment and then goes to that part of the field where Bhima, fighting in fury, is slaughtering your troops like Death himself with maw agape. Making the earth resound with the rumble of his chariot, like the roar of thunderheads at the end of summer, Yudhishtira forms the flank of Bhima's forces. Meanwhile, Drona, too, in the horrible night, turns away and begins to destroy his most detested enemies, the Panchalas.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'While the dreadful war is being fought, when the world is enveloped in darkness and dust, the warriors on the field cannot see each other; they battle with sheer instinct and by calling out names to discern friend from foe. O Bharatarishabha, during this unmentionable carnage of maharathas, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers, Drona, Karna, Kripa, Bhima, Dhrishtadyumna and Satyaki wreak havoc on one another's troops. The common soldiers of both armies, demoralised all around by these great maharathas in the hour of darkness, break and flee in all directions. Even as they run, they are massacred and thousands of leading maharathas slaughter one another, while they are blind in the dark and full of fear.

All this is the result of the evil counsels of your son. Indeed, at the hour when the world is shrouded in darkness, all creatures, even the greatest Kshatriyas, are overcome with panic, and quite lose their minds.'

Dhritarashtra asks, 'What is the state of mind of the troops when, in the dark, all of you are sapped of your courage and sorely pressed by the Pandavas? O Sanjaya, when everything is swathed in darkness how do the Pandava and my troops become visible again?'

Sanjaya replies, 'Drona somehow masses again in a compact array the remnants of the army of the Kauravas, under their leaders. He sets himself in the van, Salya at the rear, Aswatthaman and Sakuni on the right and the left flanks. Duryodhana on this most dreadful night busies himself with protecting all his legions. The king, your son, puts heart into the foot-soldiers, Rajan, and tells them, "Lay aside your weapons and take up torches and lamps in your hands instead. Let the maharathas alone continue to fight."

The foot-soldiers gladly take up burning lamps and the Devas, Rishis, Gandharvas, Deva-rishis, the diverse tribes of Vidyadharas and Apsaras, Nagas, Yakshas, Uragas, Kinnaras, looking on from the heavens, also joyfully take up blazing celestial lanterns. We see many wondrous floating lamps, filled with sweet-scented oil, fall from the Regents of the principal and the subsidiary directions. For Duryodhana's sake, we see many come down especially from Narada and Parvata, lighting up the stagnant darkness so full of death. Now arrayed in a compact vyuha, the Kaurava army looks dazzling with the light of the marvellous lamps shining on their costly ornaments and the Devastras blazing as they are shot or hurled. On each chariot five lamps are set, three on each maddened elephant and on each horse one large lamp. Thus, the Kuru warriors light up the field and the army, revealing now the true extent of the massacre that has occurred by darkness.

Set in their places quickly, these lamps light up your army wonderfully. All the great Kshatriyas, made radiant by the foot-soldiers with oilfed lamps in their hands, are as handsome as clouds in the night sky illumined by flashes of lightning. When the Kuru host has been thus lit up, Drona, of the effulgence of fire, scorching everything around, looks as radiant Rajan, in his golden armour as the midday sun. The light of the lamps reflects from the golden ornaments, the bright cuirasses, the bows and the other polished weapons of the warriors, from their maces twined with strings, from the bright parighas, their chariots, arrows and javelins, as they fly in scintillating arcs and streaks.

The royal parasols, yak-tails, swords, blazing brands and necklaces of gold, as they are whirled or moved, mirror the lamplight and the spectacle of Kurukshetra is now entirely beautiful. Your army burns with soft splendour that no artist has beheld or captured. Ornaments, beautifully wrought weapons, red with blood and whirled by heroes, create a glowing effulgence like dim flashes of lightning in the sky at the end of summer.

The faces of warriors, impetuously pursuing foes to strike them down and themselves trembling in the ardour of battle, are altogether breathtaking. As the sun is fierce when a forest is on fire, in the same manner, the terrible night grows in grandeur both from the fighting and the now lamplit host.

Seeing our army illuminated, the Parthas too with great alacrity exhort the foot-soldiers throughout their army to imitate what ours have done. On each elephant, they place seven lamps; on each chariot, ten; and on the back of each horse, two; and on the flanks and rear of their rathas as well as on their flagpoles, they place multiple lamps. Also, on the flanks of their army, at the rear, in the van, all around and within, they light numberless lamps. And now, both armies are strangely and gloriously lit up in the fleeting night of all horrors.

Throughout your army, foot-soldiers carrying lamps mingle with elephants and chariots and cavalry. The army of Pandu's son is also illuminated by foot-soldiers with blazing torches in their hands. The twin hosts are refulgent as fire and sun when they burn together. As more and more lamps are lit, the splendour of both armies seems to illumine not just the field of war but the very sky and all the directions. Both armies are clearly visible and distinguishable from each other.

Awakened by the light that reaches into the sky, the Devas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Rishis, other Mahatapasvins and the Apsaras all gather directly above Kurukshetra. Thronged with Devas, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Maharishis, Apsaras, and the spirits of slain warriors about to enter the celestial realms, the battlefield looks like a second Swarga. Teeming with chariots, horses and elephants, by now brilliantly illumined with a million lamps, with wild warriors either lying in the poses of death or wandering bemused across the field like madmen, and horses slain or roaming dazed, the immense hosts resemble the vyuhas of the Devas and the Asuras in days of old when they fought.

The dense swish of shafts form the fierce winds; great rathas, the clouds; the neighing and trumpeting of horses and elephants, the thunder; the lash of arrows landing and the spraying, gushing blood of warriors and animals is the flood of the tempestuous nocturnal encounter between all those godlike men.

In the very midst of the battle, the greatest of Brahmanas, the noble Aswatthaman, scorching the Pandavas with flames from his bow, is the midday sun at the end of the season of rains, burning everything with his fierce rays.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'When the battlefield which had been plunged in darkness is illumined, great warriors, maharathas, again attack each other ferociously. With so many thousands of lamps burning all around and with the unearthly lanterns of the Devas and the Gandharvas now set on golden stands decked with jewels, and fed with fragrant oil, Kurukshetra, O Bhaarata, is wonderfully resplendent, bright as the earth lit by the lesser flames of the pralaya! With every side scintillating with lamps, of this world and the one above, the field of death looks like a forest covered over by fireflies on a monsoon evening.

At your son's command, maharathas engage with other maharathas, elephants with elephants, horsemen with horsemen, all filled with joy on this fiercest night. Terrible and now plainly visible is the war between the Kaurava army and that of the Pandavas without the sun above.

Then Arjuna begins to annihilate the Kaurava ranks with unprecedented ferocity and swiftness, weakening the position of all the kings who fight for you.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'When the invincible Arjuna breaks into the ranks of my son's army, what is the state of their minds? Indeed, what do our soldiers feel and think? What steps does Duryodhana take to contain Partha?

Who challenges the Kiritin? When Swetavahana breaks into our army, who protects Drona? Who guards the right wheel, who the left wheel and who the rear of Drona's ratha? Who are they that fight in his van? The mighty Drona battles his way into the midst of the Panchalas, dancing on his ratha, and shatters a huge number of Panchala chariots with his arrows; alas, how does the Acharya meet with his death?

You always speak of my enemies as cool, unvanquished, cheerful and swelling with might. However, you do not speak of my men in such words. On the other hand, you describe them to be dead, pale, and beaten, and you speak of my maharathas as always deprived of their chariots in all the battles they fight!'

Sanjaya replies, 'Understanding the wishes of Drona who is determined to give his all in the war at night, Duryodhana says to his brothers Vikarna, Chitrasena, Suparsva, Durdharsha, Dirghabahu, and all the men who follow them, "You heroes of great valour, fight with resolve and protect Drona's rear. Kritavarman will protect his right and Sala his left flanks."

Saying this, your son sets these brothers of his in the van of his forces, and then himself advances with the remnant of the Trigarta maharathas, saying, "The Acharya is merciful! The Pandavas fight with great resolution, so unite and protect him well. Drona is mighty; he is endued with great agility and valour. He can vanquish the very Devas; what need then be said of the Pandavas and the Somakas? All of you, however, must remain united and support the invincible Acharya against the dangerous maharatha Dhrishtadyumna. Other than Drupada's fire-born prince, I do not see the man among all the Pandava warriors who can vanquish Drona. And so, we must, with all our souls, guard the son of Bharadwaja against the Panchala prince.

Protected by us, Drona will massacre the Somakas and the Srinjayas, one after another. After the slaughter of all the Srinjayas at the head of the Pandava army, Aswatthaman will kill Dhrishtadyumna, and Karna will vanquish Arjuna maharatha. As for Bhimasena and the other sons of Pandu, I myself will kill them all. After that, our army will easily raze what remains of the Pandava forces. It is all plain to me now. And when we have won the war, my victory will last forever, and I will rule the earth unopposed, with all of you beside me.

I have given you the reasons. Now go forth, taking courage in both hands and, at all costs, protect Acharya Drona.”

Saying this, Duryodhana charges headlong into the fray with his best troops around and behind him. The two armies collide again, each side intent on securing victory. Arjuna continues to inflict heavy losses on the Kauravas, and now the massed Kauravas begin to trouble Arjuna with diverse kinds of weapons.

Aswatthaman attacks Drupada of the Panchalas, while Drona covers Srinjaya with multitudes of deadly straight shafts. And as the Pandava and the Panchala troops on the one side and the Kaurava troops on the other, O Bhaarata, are engaged in butchering each other, absolute bedlam and bloody mayhem hold sway over lamplit Kurukshetra, field of truth. The war by night is more brutal than it has ever been. Great spirits of darkness crowd the field, unseen.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'During the ghastly bloodbath by night, Yudhishtira exhorts the Pandavas, the Panchalas and the Somakas to destroy men, rathas and elephants without mercy, and cries to them, "Attack Drona! Kill the Acharya!"

At this command, Rajan, the Panchalas and the Somakas rush at Drona with terrifying roars. We, on our part, are equally energised, and roaring dreadfully in return, rush to confront the enemy to the utmost limits of our prowess, courage and might.

Kritavarman, son of Hridika, challenges Yudhishtira, as the Dharmaraja charges towards Drona, like an infuriated elephant against another. The great Kuru warrior Bhuri bars the way of Satyaki, who comes flying into the thick of battle, spraying arrows all around with incredible power and swiftness. Karna faces Sahadeva, as Madri's brilliant son rides at Drona, and Duryodhana himself faces the stupendous Bhimasena, riding on his chariot like the Great Destroyer.

Sakuni, son of Subala, stands firm against maharatha Nakula, who is an adept at every kind of battle. Kripa, son of Saradwat, sets himself in the way of Sikhandin, while Dusasana contends vigorously with Prativindhya whose chariot is yoked to steeds coloured like peacocks, their skins glistening marvellously by the now glaring lamplight! Aswatthaman defies Ghatotkacha, master of maya, a hundred different kinds of sorcery and illusion. Vrishasena quells the mighty Drupada with his troops as the Panchala king aims to cut Drona down. Salya, king of the Madras, holds up Virata, as the Matsya king also rushes towards Drona. Chitrasena forcefully holds up Nakula's son Satanika with a thousand shafts, as that prince also rides at Drona. Alambusha, the Rakshasa prince, defies Arjuna, and Dhrishtadyumna gladly contains Drona as the seemingly demented Acharya devours the Pandava forces with devastras, making no distinction between great warrior and common foot-soldier.

As for the maharathas of the Pandavas who advance against Drona, other maharathas of your army attack them ferociously. Elephant riders meet elephant riders in this frightful battle by lamplight, and grind each other down in their thousands. In the dead of night, as bright horses charge each other recklessly, they look like winged hills. Horsemen encounter horsemen, armed with lances, darts and swords and give vent to loud roars. Vast numbers of bold foot-soldiers slaughter one another, with corpses heaping up, with maces, short clubs and diverse other weapons.

Kritavarman fights Yudhishtira in rage, like a continent, a great dwipa, resisting the surging sea. Yudhishtira first pierces Kritavarman with five arrows and then with twenty more, and roars, "Stop! Stop and fight."

Kritavarman breaks Yudhishtira's bow with a wedge-headed arrow and draws blood from him with seven more. Yudhishtira picks up a fresh bow and gashes his adversary's arms and chest with ten arrows, making him tremble and retort with seven veritable thunderbolts. At which, Yudhishtira demolishes his bow, shreds his leather gauntlet and pierces him fiercely with five long shafts that rip through his gold-inlaid armour, his body and dive into the ground like snakes into an ant-hill.

In a wink, Kritavarman takes up another bow and blasts the son of Pandu first with sixty arrows and then with ten more. Yudhishtira puts down his bow and casts a serpentine javelin that passes through Kritavarman's right arm and into the earth. Taking up his formidable bow again Yudhishtira covers Kritavarman in a lashing downpour of exact barbs, making him cry out in pain.

In swift rage, the mighty Bhoja kills Yudhishtira's horses and charioteer and makes a wreck of his chariot. The Pandava hefts a sword and shield only to have them instantly shattered by the maharatha of the Madhu vamsa. Yudhishtira sweeps up a spear with a golden staff and hurls it like light at the illustrious son of Hridika; smiling arrogantly, Kritavarman neatly slices the missile along its length as it flashes at him.

He then shrouds Yudhishtira with a hundred arrows and, utterly roused by now, disjoints the Dharmaputra's golden armour so it falls from his body like a cluster of stars from the sky. His chariot in shambles, his armour cut away and bleeding from Kritavarman's hail of arrows, Yudhishtira quickly retreats from battle. Having vanquished the Dharmaputra, the mighty Kritavarman returns to once more protect the right wheel of Drona's chariot.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Bhuri, Rajan, stands in the way of Sini's grandson Satyaki who comes charging like an elephant towards a lake full of water. An angry Satyaki makes five springs of blood spurt from Bhuri's body. The Kuru warrior retaliates with great speed and pierces splendid Satyaki with ten arrows through his chest. Drawing their bows to their fullest stretch and with eyes red, these two begin to maul each other. Their cascades of lethal arrows are like rays of the sun; their duel is as if Death has taken two forms to do battle against himself. For a while, the battle is perfectly even. Until, with a terrible smile, Satyaki breaks Bhuri's bow and plunges nine arrows deep into his breast, and gives a terrible roar.

Bhuri quickly picks up another bow and strikes the Satwata with three light like barbs, and then, he also smiling, splits his antagonist's bow a wide-headed shaft. Beside himself, Satyaki flings a mighty javelin right into Bhuri's heart, and that great Kuru warrior, covered in blood, falls dead out of his chariot, like the sun from the sky when he sets.

Seeing Bhuri slain, Aswatthaman charges Satyaki recklessly. He shouts, "Stop! Stop and fight!" at Yuyudhana and covers him with a blistering flight of arrows, like clouds lashing Meru's crown with a torrential rain.

Seeing the grim Aswatthaman rush towards Satyaki, Ghatotkacha gives a roar that makes all of Kurukshetra cringe; he says to Drona's son in the most dreadful voice, "Stop, O son of Drona! You will not escape me with your life and I will kill you like the six-faced Karttikeya did the Asura Mahisha. Stay and fight me, for today I will purge your heart of all desire for battle."

And the coppery-eyed Rakshasa, Bhima's tremendous son, attacks Aswatthaman like a prince of elephants, unleashing indescribable shafts at him, each the size of a chariot's axle-rod! Quicker than thinking, Aswatthaman smashes those massive arrows into dust and pierces Ghatotkacha deep with hundreds of keen barbs.

The handsome Rakshasa resembles an incredible porcupine with quills all erect! Unmoved, Bhima's son looses a terrific tirade of shafts at Aswatthaman, missiles that fly roaring like thunder at Drona's son, crashing into the Brahmana's shining body, making him stagger in his ratha. Ghatotkacha does not pause but looses volley after volley of different arrows over Aswatthaman; some have razor like heads; others are crescent-tipped; some have elongated points; some are frog-faced; other have heads like boar's ears; some are barbed, and there are others as well.

Drona's son remains immaculately calm throughout this onslaught and with hands moving quicker than thoughts, like the wind scattering large cloud masses, he consumes every shaft shot by Ghatotkacha, common and strange, with the handful of devastras that he invokes. And when Ghatotkacha also discharges his own unworldly astras, the dark sky is lit up by other suns where his astras and Aswatthaman's fuse and hang until falling away in showers of sparks. Ah, the firmament is exquisitely lit up, as if with a swarm of fireflies at twilight.

Aswatthaman fills all the points of the compass with his arrows and envelops Ghatotkacha in his storm of shafts—for the sake of your sons. The duel that develops between the two is like the one of yore between Indra and Prahlada. Ghatotkacha pierces Aswatthaman's chest with ten arrows that burn like the yuga fire, and the Brahmana trembles like a tall tree shaken by the wind. He supports himself briefly by clinging to his flagstaff, then collapses. There is an outcry of woe from yours troops who think him slain, while the Panchalas and the Srinjayas shout in glee.

However, maharatha Aswatthaman recovers quickly and, drawing his bowstring to his ear in a blur, looses a torrid astra at Ghatotkacha, a shaft like Yama's danda. The arrow with golden wings ploughs right through the Rakshasa's chest and enters the earth behind him. Gored savagely through, spouting blood, the prince of Rakshasas sits down in his ratha and his eyes glaze over. Seeing this, his charioteer spirits him away from the field. Having wounded Ghatotkacha grievously and driven him from the fray, Aswatthaman gives a ringing roar of triumph. Your sons and all your warriors cheer him deafeningly, O Bhaarata, and Aswatthaman's body blazes like the midday sun.

Looking at Bhimasena who battles like ten maharathas in front of Drona's chariot, Duryodhana strikes him with a fierce and heartfelt volley of utmost hatred. Bhima pierces him in return with nine arrows and Duryodhana strikes back with twenty. Quickly mantled over by each other's arrows, the two magnificent maharathas look like the sun and the moon covered by clouds in the sky. Then Duryodhana pierces Bhima deeply with five gold-winged thunderbolts and roars, "Stop! Stop and fight!"

In a flash, Bhima shatters Suyodhana's bow, cuts down his standard and strikes him in a dazzle with full ninety barbs. Duryodhana takes up an even more formidable bow and returns his cousin's fire so that blood flowers sprout all over the Pandava's vast body, in full view of all the other maharathas. Destroying many of Duryodhana's shafts in flight, Bhima pierces him with five and twenty short, heavy arrows. Duryodhana smashes Bhimasena's bow with a razor-faced arrow and pierces him with ten more.

Bhimasena snatches up another bow and rakes your son with seven violent shafts. Displaying great lightness of hand, Suyodhana cuts Bhima's bow in two. The second, third, fourth and the fifth bows that Bhima picks up, also, Suyodhana demolishes. Indeed, Rajan, full of self-assurance and feverish eagerness to kill the cousin whom he has always detested the most, your son breaks every bow that Bhima picks up immediately as he does so.

Finding his bows repeatedly broken, Bhima hurls an iron spear at Duryodhana, hard as diamonds, which ignites in the air as it flies at your son, which resembles Yama's sister Mrityu. Before all the watching warriors, Suyodhana cuts the lance into three pieces, even as it flares at him through the sky straight as the parting in a woman's hair. Bhima now picks up a heavy mace alight, and casts it like doom at Duryodhana's chariot and that weapon kills your son's horses, charioteer and blows his chariot apart.

Now afraid of dreadful Bhima, your son uses the anima siddhi to make himself little and hastily climbs into the illustrious Nandaka's chariot. In the half-light of the lamplit night, Bhima thinks he has killed Duryodhana and gives an earthshaking triumphant roar, challenging the Kaurava host. Your warriors also believe their king dead, and dismal cries echo across Kurukshetra.

Yudhishtira hears Bhima's repeated roaring and the howls of your terrified warriors, Yudhishtira also thinks that Duryodhana has been killed, and rushes to Bhima. The Panchalas, the Srinjayas, the Matsyas, the Kaikeyas, and the Chedis turn their chariots and charge Drona all together, and another horrible battle erupts between Drona and the enemy, during which thousands on both sides die scarlet deaths.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Karna, son of Vikartana, Rajan, faces the mighty maharatha Sahadeva, who is closing in dangerously on Drona. In a flash, Sahadeva strikes Karna with nine sizzling arrows and then another nine in a blink. Karna returns his fire with a full hundred storming shafts; he severs Sahadeva's bowstring. Sahadeva takes up another bow and strikes Karna squarely with twenty arrows, a wonderful feat. Karna, roused, despatches Sahadeva's horses with a flock of perfect arrows and his sarathy with a single wedge-headed one. Without a ratha, Sahadeva picks up a sword and shield, which Karna shatters with a lofty smile.

Sahadeva flings a heavy mace of power at Karna, a dread weapon adorned with gold; Karna demolishes that, too, with a rash of incredible arrows. His mace shattered, Sahadeva casts a whistling spear at Karna, which that greatest bowman slices in two along its length. Madri's red-eyed son leaps down from his chariot, pulls a wheel free from his ruined ratha and hurls it spinning at the brother he does not know. Karna, still with the mocking, maddening smile, looses a thousand arrows in a moment and smashes that chariot wheel flying at him like Death's very chakra.

In a frenzy, the desperate Sahadeva pulls off the yokes, shafts and other parts of his chariot, the traces of his horses, and casts all these like deadly weapons at the Sutaputra. Karna disdainfully shoots them all down. Now Sahadeva picks up whatever he finds lying around him—the limbs of elephants, horses and even dead men—and hurls these at his enemy. Karna's speed artistry as he shreds all these in flight is amazing to behold, my lord. Deprived of all his weapons and fairly mangled by Karna's barrage of shafts, Sahadeva quits the unequal duel and leaves the field.

Karna pursues him for a while and, with the same smile, now turned so mysterious, mocks him, "Kshatriya, do not fight your superiors. Seek out your equals to do battle with, O son of Madri! Listen to me, what I say is for your own good!"

Karna then prods Sahadeva with the tip of his bow, and says, "Look where your great brother Arjuna fights so resolutely against the Kurus. Go to him or, if you prefer, go back home!" And he laughs at Sahadeva, a sound more cruel than any arrow.

Thus, Karna, when he could have done so, does not kill Madri's son, remembering his word given to Kunti before the war. Instead, he now rides away against the troops of the king of the Panchalas. A dispirited Sahadeva, wounded equally by Karna's arrows and by his words, is humiliated, crestfallen, even wishes for death, proud Kshatriya that he is. He sadly climbs into the Panchala prince Janamejaya's chariot.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Salya, king of the Madras, holds up Virata and his troops, with clouds of missiles as they advance to attack Drona. The duel between Salya and Madra is like the one between Bala and Vasava of old. Salya strikes Virata, who commands a large akshauhini, with a hundred immaculate shafts. Virata, in return, pierces him first with nine sharp arrows, then with three and seventy, and again with a hundred. Salya kills the four horses yoked to Virata's chariot and cuts down his royal parasol and standard.

Virata jumps down from his useless ratha and, standing on the ground, continues to loose storms of arrows at Salya with undimmed ferocity. Seeing his brother exposed on the ground, Satanika rides swiftly to rescue him. With a flurry of lethal barbs, Salya sends the advancing Satanika to Yama. At the fall of Satanika, his brother Virata climbs into the fallen hero's chariot, and his prowess fuelled, doubled by his rage, glares his eyes wide at Salya and mantles the Madra and his ratha with a cloudburst of arrows.

But the mighty Salya responds in strength and strikes Virata squarely through his chest with a hundred slender shafts, forcing the Matsya king to sit down in a swoon. His charioteer quickly takes his king away from the field, and, its spirit broken, the vast Matsya force flees, pursued, O Bhaarata, by the thousands of arrows that Salya, that ornament of battle, shoots after them. Seeing their troops run, Krishna and Arjuna come dashing up to confront Salya.

Now, Rajan, the Rakshasa prince Alambusha appears, looming on an altogether macabre and wondrous chariot of black iron, harnessed to eight awful pisachas with equine faces, flying blood-red banners, festooned with wildflower garlands, covered with bear-skins and mounted with a lofty standard atop over which a fierce-looking and incessantly shrieking vulture with spotted wings and gaping eyes perches. The Rakshasa looks like a heap of antimony; and he stands up to the advancing Arjuna like Meru withstanding a tempest, and rains down showers of arrows on Arjuna's head. Ah, pitched and intense is the ensuing battle between the Rakshasa and the human warrior; it fills all that watch with awe and it adds to the glee of the vultures, crows, ravens, owls, kanakas and jackals that patrol death's abysmal field.

Arjuna strikes Alambusha with six bolts of lightning and cuts off his standard with ten more. He beheads his strange demon sarathy in a burst of slimy green blood, severs his weirdly shining bow in his hands and kills the equine pisachas with four occult barbs. Alambusha takes up another sinister bow, but that too Arjuna rives. Bharatarishabha, Partha strikes that vile prince of Rakshasas with four such formidable shafts that Alambusha takes to his heels.

Having vanquished the fiend of darkness, Arjuna rides swiftly towards Drona, on his way slaughtering innumerable men, elephants and horses that fall like trees laid low by a storm, while the remaining soldiers run away like a frightened herd of deer.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Your son Chitrasena, O Bhaarata, confronts Nakula's son Satanika who is consuming your army with his missiles. Satanika strikes Chitrasena with five arrows and your prince responds with ten whetted shafts. Chitrasena gashes Satanika with nine bolts, at which the son of Nakula responds with a fusillade of arrows that rip Chitrasena's armour from his body: a wonderful feat. Without his armour, your son looks remarkable, like a snake that has just cast off his slough. Satanika cuts down the struggling Chitrasena's standard, and then breaks his bow.

The beleaguered Chitrasena seizes up another powerful dhanusha and plunges countless arrows at Satanika. His fury mounting, Satanika kills Chitrasena's horses and his charioteer, at which his powerful opponent jumps down from his ratha and drills Satanika with five and twenty arrows. Satanika destroys Chitrasena's gold-decked bow with a crescent-tipped arrow. Deprived of his bow, chariot, horses and charioteer, Chitrasena quickly runs to Kritavarman's chariot and climbs aboard.

Karna's son Vrishasena leads his legion against maharatha Drupada, spraying multitudinous arrows at the Panchala king, who is closing rapidly on Drona. Yajnasena challenges the son of Karna and plunges sixty barbs into his arms and chest. The doughty Vrishasena responds with astounding speed and draws spouts of blood from Drupada's chest. These two, as well, with each other's arrows protruding from their bodies, look startlingly like a couple of huge porcupines with quills erect. Bathed in blood from wounds taken from golden-winged arrows, they are especially striking during their wrathful duel. Indeed, the spectacle they present is as that of a pair of radiant Kalpa vrikshas or of two kinsukas laden with blood flowers.

Vrishasena strikes Drupada with nine arrows, then with seventy more and again with another three. Loosing a gale of arrows, Karna's son, Rajan, makes a resplendent spectacle. An inflamed Drupada splits Vrishasena's bow in two with a broad-headed arrow. Vrishasena picks up another gold chased bow, invokes a great astra and, taking careful aim at Drupada, while he ignores the slew of barbs that the Panchala king looses at him, unleashes the blazing thing at the Acharya, filling all the Somakas with fear. The astras plunge straight through Yagnasena's chest and he collapses onto the floor of his chariot. His sarathy whisks him away from the field. Seeing the great Panchala maharatha leave the battle in a faint, the Kaurava army fervidly attacks Drupada's troops.

The lamps fallen from the hands of slain warriors light up the earth all around so Kurukshetra looks even like the firmament lit by stars and planets. The ground sparkles with the angadas of fallen heroes, like a great cloud mass during the monsoon, in which streaks of lightning flash. From fear of Karna's son, the Panchalas flee on all sides, as the Danavas did from terror of Indra during the great Devasura yuddha.

Thus stricken by Vrishasena, the Panchalas and the Somakas, illumined by lamps, present an unusual and arresting sight. Having vanquished them, Vrishasena looks like the sun, O Bharata, when he reaches his zenith. Among all those thousands of kings on your side and theirs, the valiant Vrishasena seems to be the only resplendent luminary. Having vanquished many heroes and all the great maharathas among the Somakas, Karna's son races on towards the Pandava king Yudhishtira.

Your son Dusasana rides against the mighty Prativindhya, who charges at Drona who unabatedly devours the enemy troops with his devastras. The duel that erupts between them is like the contention between Mercury and Venus, Budha and Sukra, in a cloudless sky. Dusasana pierces Prativindhya, who is accomplishing fierce feats, with three arrows shot straight into his forehead. Gushing blood from the wounds Prativindhya looks like a three crested hill with streams of red chalk flowing down.

Prativindhya strikes back in fury, first piercing Dusasana with three arrows and again with seven. Now your son achieves a difficult feat. He first fells Prativindhya's horses with a dense volley, then, with one broad-headed shaft, kills his sarathy and then cuts down his standard. Dusasana then smashes Prativindhya's chariot under him into a thousand pieces, shreds his banner, his quivers, bowstrings and the traces of his ratha.

Deprived of his chariot, the virtuous Prativindhya stands, bow in hand, and contends with your son, shooting an opacity of arrows at him, until Dusasana, showing marvellous dexterity, breaks his adversary's bow and then lacerates him with ten brutal arrows. Seeing Prativindhya's plight, his brothers, maharathas all, come dashing forward with a large force to protect him. Prativindhya climbs onto Sutasoma's splendid chariot and, taking up another bow, continues to shoot at your son. A strong force of your warriors arrives swiftly to support Dusasana.

Another dreadful battle ensues between your troops and theirs, O Bhaarata, at the midnight hour, and swells the population of Yama's domain.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Roaring "Stop! Stop!" Subala's son Sakuni in sudden fury attacks Nakula, who is decimating your forces.

Bows drawn in circles, both show the same measure of skill, lashing each other with arrows. Soon, these two also resemble strange porcupines. Their armour cut away and each bathed in blood, they resemble two beautiful and brilliant Kalpa vrikshas, or flowering kinsukas, or Salmali trees with prickly thorns on them.

Eyes red and bulging with rage, they cast sidelong glowers at each other, as if to kill the other with their gazes. Then, with a fiendish grin, Sakuni pierces Nakula's chest with a barbed arrow and Madri's son swoons in his chariot. Sakuni roars as loud as the clouds at the end of summer.

Nakula recovers quickly and attacks his vile enemy again, now like the Destroyer himself with jaws agape; Nakula drills him first with sixty arrows and again with a hundred long shafts right through his chest. He breaks Sakuni's bow, and fells his haughty standard. He plunges an arrow shot with all his might deep into Sakuni's thigh and drops him onto the floor of his chariot, clasping his flagstaff like an amorous man his mistress.

Seeing your brother-in-law felled and fainted, his charioteer quickly rides away from the van of the battle. At this, the Parthas and all their followers give a loud and triumphal shout.

Nakula, the Parantapa, says to his sarathy, “Take me towards the forces that Drona commands.” The man does as he is commanded. Seeing Nakula ride against Drona, Kripa rides to stop him but a smiling Sikhandin pierces Kripa with nine arrows from a flank. Turning, Kripa strikes Sikhandin first with five arrows, and then with twenty more. The duel that breaks out between the two is hair-raising, my lord, even like the one between Sambara and the king of the Devas in the war of antiquity between the Devas and the Asuras.

Both maharathas cover the heavens with their missiles, like clouds at the end of summer. The night is full of terror and evokes all sorts of fears in the warriors. Then Sikhandin splits Kripa’s large bow with a crescent-headed arrow and ravages him with a flurry of other shafts. The infuriated Kripa casts a polished golden spear at the Panchala prince, which Sikhandin shatters in flight with ten immaculate arrows.

Kripa takes up a fresh bow and looses such a rage of arrows at the prince who was once a princess that Sikhandin collapses onto the floor of his ratha. Kripa continues to strafe him with many more shafts, trying to kill him, but his charioteer bears Sikhandin away to safety.

The Panchalas and the Somakas see the mighty maharatha son of Yajnasena retreat from battle, and rush to his rescue, while your sons surround Kripa, best of Brahmanas, with a large force to support him. Another ferocious battle ensues; a great tumult arises, full of roars and screams, and the thunder of horses’ hooves and lumbering elephants, filling the hour past midnight like massed thunderheads. The earth trembles with the tread of running foot-soldiers, why like a woman shaking with fear.

Maharathas dash manically at one another, in their thousands, slaughtering numberless common soldiers as they go. Great elephants, with ichor flowing down their bodies, rush at other mastodons, and fight furiously with trunks and curved, glinting tusks that are soon dyed in red. Horsemen and foot-soldiers, too, fight without any vestige of restraint or sanity.

In the heart of night, the sound of troops attacking and retreating is deafening and bizarre. The blazing lamps placed on chariots, elephants and horses are like meteors fallen from the sky and smouldering still. Lit by these, the night, O lord of the Bharatas, is a strangest day. As the sun dispels the darkness of every night, do the blazing lamps the turgid darkness of the war.

Indeed, the sky, the earth, the cardinal and the subsidiary points of the world, enveloped by dust and darkness, are all illuminated by the lamplight, which is increased many times over by being reflected by splendid weapons, coats of mail and the jewels of famed Kshatriyas. Yet, during the tumultuary war at night, few of the fighters, O Bhaarata, can distinguish ally from enemy and father kills son, son kills father, friend slays friend, relatives slay relatives, uncles kill sisters' sons, countless warriors kill other warriors of their own side.

Absolute brutal chaos and madness rule everywhere, and all that appears to matter is to kill or be killed, regardless of who kills and who is slain.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Dhrishtadyumna, fire-prince of the Panchalas faces Drona in this night. His formidable bow raised and repeatedly twanging its string, Drupada's meridian son, supported by his own troops and those of the Pandavas, charges toward Drona's gold-bedecked ratha. Seeing the great Acharya thus assailed, your son resolutely protects Drona on all sides and the two hosts collide again in vast numbers, even like two awesome seas lashed into fury by a tempest surging into each other, with all their marine creatures frantically agitated.

Dhrishtadyumna pierces Drona's torso with five arrows and gives a roar of triumph. Drona strikes his most feared enemy with five and twenty arrows and, with another broad-headed shaft, severs his bright bow. Dhrishtadyumna casts aside his broken bow, bites his lip in rage and, picking up another awesome weapon, drawing its string to his ear in a flash, looses an astra that can have Drona's life. The missile illuminates the whole army like another sun. Seeing the incandescent astra, the Devas, the Gandharvas and the Danavas pray: "May Drona live!"

At that moment, from a far flank, Karna, showing godlike genius, shatters the fulminant astra into a dozen pieces even as it flies inexorable towards the Acharya; extinguished, the astra falls onto the earth like a snake that has lost its fangs and venom. Karna inundates Dhrishtadyumna with a torrent of arrows. Maharatha Aswatthaman strikes him with five singing barbs, Drona with another five, Salya with nine, Dusasana with three, Duryodhana with twenty and Sakuni with five of his own. Thus, seven mighty maharathas come quickly to Drona's rescue and vigorously assault the burning prince of the Panchalas.

He, however, draws blood from every one of them: Drona, Karna, Drona's son and your son with three arrows each. Their roaring, Rajan, all this while, is truly horrible, as they combine to wildly beset Dhrishtadyumna. Then Drumasena wounds the fire-prince deep with a gold-winged shaft, and again with another three, shouting, "Stop! Stop and fight me!"

Dhrishtadyumna strikes back with three deadly accurate arrows, fletched with wings of gold and shining slick with oil; with another crescent-headed arrow he blasts Drumasena's head from his neck, and its earrings sparkle red as the grisly thing falls onto the ground, a final cry frozen on its lips curled in fury still. The head of that hero falls like a ripe palmyra fruit blown from its stalk by a powerful gust of wind.

Dhrishtadyumna, the irradiant, sprays fire all around him despatching thousands to Yamaloka; with a wedge headed arrow he splits Karna's bow in two. Karna cannot abide this; he is like a wild lion that has its tail cut off! He takes up another bow, and with eyes red as plums and breathing hard, envelops mighty Dhrishtadyumna with riptides of arrows. Seeing Karna in this mood, your six other maharathas quickly surround the prince of the Panchalas, determined to kill him.

Seeing their Senapati facing the six greatest warriors of your army, all your troops consider him as being already delivered into the jaws of death. But then, Satyaki of the Dasarha vamsa arrives to support the embattled Dhrishtadyumna; the Satwata hero comes loosing a tide of arrows before him. Karna greets him with ten arrows. Before the watching maharathas, Satyaki responds with ten thunderbolts and cries tauntingly, "Do not run away again, Karna! Stay and fight me."

And once more, the blazing duel that ensues between mighty Satyaki and the redoubtable Karna resembles, O Rajan, that between Bali and Vasava in the days of old. Satyaki, bull among Kshatriyas, terrifies all your warriors with the rumble of his ratha, and he strikes the lotus-eyed Karna deep with countless arrows. Making the earth shudder with the twang of his bow, the majestic Sutaputra covers the relucent Satyaki with a barrage of long, barbed, tall-toothed and razor-headed arrows and diverse other missiles. Satyaki of the Vrishnis also shrouds Karna in a mantle of fire.

For a time, that duel is magnificent and equal. Then, your sons, keeping Karna at their head, shoot at Satyaki from every side. Fending them all off, including Karna, with his own astras, Satyaki abruptly strikes the valiant Vrishasena through his chest so that he falls down in his chariot, casting aside his bow.

Believing his son, the maharatha Vrishasena, dead, shock plunges through Karna and he attacks Satyaki in reckless frenzy. Satyaki serenely pierces Karna with many strong shafts. He first strikes the Sutaputra with ten arrows, then Vrishasena, who has arisen again, with five, and finally shreds the leather gloves and severs the bows of both father and son. Stringing fresh bows, father and son assail Satyaki from two sides and lacerate him with countless arrows.

During the course of the war by night that kills so many heroes, we hear the loud twang of the Gandiva, O Rajan, over every other sound. Hearing the rumble of Arjuna's ratha as well as reverberant Gandiva, Karna tells Duryodhana, "Arjuna strums his great bow after slaughtering our leading warriors, so many great archers among the Kauravas, and, indeed much of our entire army. The thunder you hear is the rumble of his ratha. It is plain that this son of Pandu tonight achieves feats truly worthy of him and that he will swiftly raze all our forces.

Many of our troops already flee and no one dares stand up to Arjuna as he scatters our legions as the mighty wind may a rising mass of clouds. Encountering Arjuna, our soldiers all capsize like small skiffs on the raging ocean. You hear the wails, Duryodhana, of our best warriors as they run from the field, or fall to the arrows loosed in great waves from the Gandiva.

Listen, O tiger among maharathas, to the sound of drums and cymbals being beaten near Arjuna's ratha at dead of night like the deep roll of thunder in the sky. Listen to the screams of wounded soldiers and the tremendous roars and victorious shouts around Arjuna's chariot.

However, here Satyaki, the greatest of the Satwata vamsa, holds us all up. If Yuyudhana can be brought down, we might conquer all our enemies. Also, Dhrishtadyumna battles Acharya Drona, and many of our best rathikas encircle those two. If we can kill Satyaki and Dhrishtadyumna, victory will certainly be ours. So let us surround these two shuras even as we did Abhimanyu in the chakravyuha and kill them both. Arjuna already turns his chariot toward Drona's chariot, for he knows that Satyaki holds up so many of our Kuru maharathas. Let another goodly number of our greatest warriors ride to prevent Partha from coming to the beleaguered Satyaki's rescue. And let those that remain attack Satyaki all together, putting forth their fiercest prowess so that Yuyudhana of Madhu's race is despatched swiftly to Yama's abode."

Duryodhana concurs with Karna's view and, like the illustrious Indra requesting Vishnu, says to his uncle Sakuni, "Matulan, ride against Arjuna with ten thousand elephants and ten thousand chariots. Dusasana, Durvishaha, Subahu and Dushpradharshana will follow you with an akshauhini of foot-soldiers. Kill the two Krishnas; kill Yudhishtira, Nakula, Sahadeva and Bhima. My hope of victory rests in you, as that of the gods on their lord Indra. O Sakuni, slay the sons of Kunti, like Kartikeya slaying the Asuras."

Clad in armour and taking your sons and a large host with him, Sakuni rides against the Parthas to have their lives. Another great and general battle begins between the warriors of your army and the enemy. When Subala's son Sakuni advances against the Pandavas, Karna leads a teeming force against Satyaki, unleashing a gale of arrows. Your warriors all combine and surround Satyaki. Then, Bharatarishabha, Drona advances against Dhrishtadyumna's ratha and fights a wonderful and bloody night battle against the Panchalas.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'All the indomitable kings of your army besiege Satyaki's ratha in fury, to put an end to his lustrous and terrible exploits. Mounted on their fine chariots decked with gold and encrusted with jewels, and accompanied by cavalry and elephants, they surround the Satwata hero and, roaring an earthshaking challenge at him, cover him with their arrows. Even as they come at him, Sini's grandson snips off countless heads even as if he were plucking flowers from their stems. With his razor-faced arrows, he hacks away the trunks of so many elephants, the necks of numerous horses and the arms of countless warriors, wearing sparkling angadas.

The field of dreadful dharma is covered over by fallen chamaras and white chatras, O Bhaarata, and resembles the sky with stars in it. The screams of the host slaughtered by Satyaki is as awful as those of shrieking ghosts in hell. The world is filled by the horrible uproar and the night becomes still more brutal and appalling. Seeing Yuyudhana desiccate your army, hearing the incredible bloodcurdling din at dead of night, your mighty Duryodhana cries to his sarathy, "Ride to where this dreadful sound comes from."

Duryodhana, master archer, rides at Satyaki, who greets him with a dozen blood-drinking arrows shot from his bow drawn to its fullest stretch. A maddened Duryodhana gashes Yuyudhana with ten shafts like streaks of lightning. Meanwhile, the battle that rages between the Panchalas and your troops presents an exceptionally wonderful sight. Satyaki bores Duryodhana's brawny breast with eighty arrows, then despatches his horses to Yama's realm and fells his charioteer from his ratha.

Your son, Rajan, remains standing on his immobile chariot and looses a brilliant arrow storm at Satyaki, the Satwata cuts down with luculent skill. Then, with a broad-headed shaft, Satyaki breaks your son's formidable bow. Deprived of both his ratha and bow, Suyodhana, powerful ruler of men, quickly mounts Kritavarman's bright chariot and rides away. After Duryodhana's retreat, Satyaki harries and routs your army all around.

Meanwhile, surrounding Arjuna on all sides with thousands of rathas, elephants and horses, Sakuni lays violent siege to the glorious Pandava. Many of the Kuru maharathas loose devastras of great power at Arjuna. Indeed, these Kshatriyas fight Arjuna, accepting the certitude of death. An inspired Arjuna single-handedly arrests the progress of the thousands of chariots, elephants and horses; he is awesome, he is a god on the darkling field, and he forces them all to turn back. His eyes glittering coppery with rage, Sakuni strikes Arjuna powerfully with twenty shafts, drawing fonts of blood; with another hundred vicious barbs, he halts the sweeping advance of Partha's great chariot.

Arjuna first strikes Sakuni with twenty arrows and then each of the maharathas who ride with him with three. Stopping all of them with his scintillating volleys, Arjuna razes your army's warriors at will, with arrows shot with the force of striking thunder. Strewn with corpses of man and beasts, and arrows cut down, the earth looks as if it is covered with morbid yet fascinating flowers. Spread over with the heads of Kshatriyas, heads wearing crowns, their faces with noble noses, noble ears with beautiful earrings, lower lips bitten through in rage and pain, and staring eyes; covered by these heads graced with rich collars and crowned with gemstones, and lips that spoke sweet, eloquent words when life was in them, the earth looks splendent as if with hillocks covered with champaka flowers.

Having perpetrated this carnage, Arjuna pierces Sakuni once more, strikes his son Uluka with an arrow, and gives a roar that fills the world. He smashes Sakuni's bow and sends his four horses to Yama's realm. Sakuni, O Bharatarishabha, jumps down from his chariot and clambers into Uluka's ratha. Riding on the same chariot, the maharatha father and son shower arrows over Partha like twin clouds lashing a mountain with rain. Arjuna rakes both with ferocious shafts and scuttles your troops so violently that they run in their thousands. Like a vast cloud mass dispersed on all sides by an irresistible wind, your army runs in all directions, in full view of their commanders. In the sinister night, many abandon the beasts they are riding; others urge their horses to their greatest speed and flee. Having put your forces to complete rout, Krishna and Arjuna sound their conches echoingly.

Dhrishtadyumna stabs Drona with three arrows, and severs the Acharya's bowstring. Throwing down that bow, Drona, the Kshatriya grinder, takes up another and, quicker than seeing, strikes Dhrishtadyumna with five arrows, and his charioteer with another five. Holding the Brahmana up, Dhrishtadyumna begins to destroy the Kaurava host like Maghavat annihilating the Asura army. He lets flow a ghastly, frothing river of blood, which glimmers in the lamplight. It runs between the two hosts, and bears away men, horses and elephants on its current! It resembles, O Rajan, the Vaitarani that flows down to the domain of Yama.

Harrying and decimating your army, the valiant Dhrishtadyumna blazes with tejas as Indra in the midst of the Devas. Then Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin blow their great conchs, as do the twins, Nakula and Sahadeva, and Bhima as well. Thus, O Dhritarashtra, do these inexorable maharathas vanquish thousands of your illustrious kings before the eyes of Duryodhana, Karna, Drona and Aswatthaman!'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing his army being massacred by the illustrious enemy maharathas, your son, O Rajan, rides up in fury to Karna and Drona and says to them, "You two started this battle in resentment, after Arjuna killed Jayadratha. And now you watch with indifference as the Pandavas decimate my army although you are both entirely able to vanquish them. If you intend to abandon me now, you should have warned me before we went to war.

'Together we will vanquish the sons of Pandu,' is what you said to me then. Listening to you, I went to war. If you had said otherwise, I would never have provoked hostilities with the Parthas, this dreadful battle that is killing our heroes past all count. If I do not deserve to be abandoned by you two, then fight as you truly can, O you bulls among men!"

Prodded by the shrewd Duryodhana with his goad of words, Karna and Drona attack the enemy again, like two snakes prodded with sticks. These two greatest maharathas in the world rush forward against the Parthas led by Satyaki and others. And uniting, the Parthas, with all their troops advance against these two shuras, who now repeatedly roar their ringing challenges at the Pandava forces.

Great Drona, master of all weapons, pierces Satyaki, bull of the Sinis, with ten arrows while Karna strikes him with ten, your son with seven, Vrishasena with ten, and Sakuni with seven. They join the unbreachable wall of Kauravas built around the Satwata. Seeing Drona mow down the Pandava army with his astras, the Somakas cover him from every side with dense showers of arrows. Drona continues to annihilate the Pandava Kshatriyas around him, Rajan, as the sun destroys darkness with his rays.

We then hear an uproar among the Panchalas, who call out pitifully to one another, while Drona the Brahmana butchers them. Some abandoning sons, some fathers, some brothers, some uncles, some their sister's sons, some other relatives and kinsmen, all run to save their own lives. Many are so panic-stricken that they run straight at Drona himself. Ah, past all count are the common Pandava soldiers and great Kshatriyas that the incendiary Acharya sends to Yama. Set upon in the night by the blazing master, the Pandava host flings down its weapon and runs from the terrible Acharya in full view of Bhimasena, Arjuna, Krishna, the twins, Yudhishtira and Dhrishtadyumna.

The world being plunged in darkness, one might otherwise see nothing; but by the light of the lamps from the Kaurava troops, one sees the flight of the enemy. Drona and Karna pursue your legions, killing countless men from behind with ruthless volleys of arrows and devastras too.

Seeing the Panchalas thus butchered, Krishna tells Arjuna and the rest of the Pandavas, "Dhrishtadyumna and Satyaki, with the Panchalas, have confronted Drona and Karna. But they have been soundly beaten and the Brahmana and the Sutaputra have put our vast forces to flight and not all our persuasions will fetch the men back to fight.

Yet have no fear, O sons of Pandu, for the two Krishnas will now descend upon Drona and Karna like doom!"

Krishna sees Bhima riding up, and says again to Arjuna, to put heart into him, "There comes Bhima, leading the Somakas and the Pandavas, to confront Drona and Karna. O Pandava, fight now for the morale of all your troops, supported by Bhima and the rest of the many maharathas we have with us!"

The two Naravyaghras, the two Krishnas, ride to the van of their forces and advance on Drona and Karna. Now, Yudhishtira's army returns to the battle again, to the place where Drona and Karna are decimating their forces. Another horrific battle erupts between the two hosts, like two oceans swollen at moonrise and surging into each other in tide. And now, the warriors of your army throw away the burning lamps they hold and, with the world plunged in darkness again, they rush at the Pandava soldiers again, guided only by the names they call out.

We hear the names that the kings fighting there proclaim, O Rajan, as if they are being announced at a swayamvara. Suddenly, a grim silence spreads over the field and lasts for a moment. Then, once more, we hear the bedlam raised by the roars and cries of the fighting men, both victors and vanquished. The heroes rush to where they see lamps still burning, like insects to a blazing fire. One by one, the lamps all die down and, as the Pandavas and the Kauravas wage bloodthirsty war between them, the darkness of the night thickens around them.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Karna, slayer of enemy Kshatriyas, sees Dhrishtadyumna and strikes him powerfully through his chest with ten excoriating arrows. Dhrishtadyumna swiftly returns Karna's fire with five searing arrows and shouts, "Halt! Stop and fight!"

They shroud each other in arrow clouds shot from bows drawn into circles. Then Karna kills Dhrishtadyumna's four horses; Karna destroys his enemy's best bow and, with a broad-headed shaft, fells the Panchala prince's sarathy from his niche in the chariot. Dhrishtadyumna jumps down from his chariot with a mace in hand. Though continuously gashed by Karna's arrows, he runs at him, clubs his horses so their heads are crushed, and then running back climbs nimbly into Arjuna's chariot. From there, Dhrishtadyumna wants to continue his duel with Karna but Yudhishtira stops him.

Mahatejasvin Karna, whose leonine roars mingling with the resounding twang of his bow, pauses, raises his conch to his lips and blows a blast on it like age-ending thunder. Seeing Dhrishtadyumna beaten, the Panchalas and the Somakas, mighty maharathas all, attack Karna all together, intent on killing him and with no care for their lives. Meanwhile, Karna's charioteer has great Sindhu horses, white as moonbeams and fleet as thoughts, attached to his ratha.

Karna resumes battle with great energy, harrying the Panchala maharathas with a torrent of blazing arrows. The Panchala soldiers flee in terror, like some little does frightened by a lion. O Rajan, we see horsemen fall from their horses all around, elephant-riders from their elephants and maharathas from their chariots, all slain by Karna's supernal archery. In this battle being fought surely in a zone of hell, Karna lops off the arms of fleeing warriors with razor-faced shafts, their heads decked with chariot-rings, the thighs of others that are seated on elephants, or on horseback, or stand upon the earth. So sharp are his arrows that many of these fleeing maharathas do not realise for a while that they have lost their limbs or their mounts.

Killed by the Sutaputra's terrible shafts, the Panchalas and the Srinjayas are so seized by fear that they begin to see Karna everywhere; they imagine that the wind stirring a blade of grass for that awesome, superhuman maharatha. Why, they lose their wits to the extent that they see Karna in the forms of their friends and comrades and flee from them in terror. Karna pursues the broken and retreating army, his arrows flaring everywhere as he mows down the hapless enemy at his great will.

Others run away when Drona just looks at them. Seeing his army turn tail, Yudhishtira thinks it would be advisable for them all to retreat, and says to Arjuna, "Look where mighty Karna stands like Rudra himself with his Pinaka. In the dead of night, look how he scorches everything around him like Surya himself. All we hear are the helpless screams of those whom Karna tears apart with his arrows. So swiftly does he aim and loose his shafts that it appears to be an unbroken movement. He will annihilate all our friends, so quickly do whatever you must to kill Karna, for his time may have come."

Hearing this, Partha says to Krishna, "The Dharmaputra is frightened today by Karna's great skill. His legions repeatedly overwhelm ours and our men are fleeing. The rest of our army is already in shreds from the Acharya's arrows. Slaughtered and terrified by these two, we cannot seem to make a stand against them. I see Karna ride fearlessly everywhere and our best maharathas fleeing from him.

He unleashes his fervid tirade as he likes and I cannot bear to watch this anymore than a trodden-upon serpent. O tiger of Vrishni's vamsa, let us ride at mighty Karna. I will either kill him, or let him kill me."

Krishna says, "Naravyaghra, this superhuman warrior rides across the field at will sowing death all around him, and he is like Indra himself. Arjuna, no one can challenge the Sutaputra other than you or Ghatotkacha. I do not think that the time has come for you to face the Suta's son. He still has the astra given him by Indra, which he has kept carefully to use against you. It has now assumed a terrible form.

Ghatotkacha is devoted to you and wishes to serve you, so let the great Rakshasa ride against Karna. Bhima is his father and Ghatotkacha is as powerful as a Deva. He has the astras of the Devas as well as those used by Rakshasas."

They send for Ghatotkacha and he appears before them, Rajan, clad in black armour and armed with a sword, a bow and arrows. Saluting Krishna and Arjuna, he proudly says, "Here I am, command me!"

Krishna says to Hidimbi's Rakshasa son of the blazing mouth and fiery eyes, his body the hue of clouds, "Listen, O Ghatotkacha, to what I have to say. The time has come for you, and none else, to display your prowess. Become the raft in this battle to save the sinking Pandavas. You have a myriad of weapons, and many kinds of Rakshasa maya. Look where Karna decimates the Pandava army as if it were a herd of cattle before him. Karna, mahabuddhi, mahatejasvin, consumes our greatest Kshatriyas in the flames of his astras as if offering them as havis to the gods.

The Pandava warriors cannot withstand him; burnt and shredded by the Sutaputra's arrows, the Panchalas also run from him like deer chased by a lion. You are the only one who can face him in battle, Ghatotkacha. Your time for glory has come. O Mahabaho, do what is worthy of your mother's race, as well as that of your sires. Men wish for sons to be delivered by them from strife. You must rescue your kinsmen tonight, Ghatotkacha, at this hour of your great strength.

Fathers wish for sons in order to accomplish their own objectives. Sons are the source of everything good, and are expected to save their fathers both here and in the hereafter. Illustrious you are and your might is dreadful and unrivalled; there is no one to equal you in battle. Become tonight the ship in which the Pandavas, whom the terrible Karna routs with his astras, and who are sinking in the Dhartarashtra ocean, safely come ashore. By night, all Rakshasas are infused with limitless powers, great might and untold courage. At this hour, they turn into invincible warriors of matchless valour. Using your maya shakti and all your astras, slay Karna in this heart of the night. The Parthas, with Dhrishtadyumna, will then easily do away with Drona."

Arjuna adds, "Ghatotkacha, the long-armed Satyaki, Bhimasena and you are, in my judgment, our greatest warriors. Go and fight Karna tonight in single combat. Satyaki will protect your rear and, with his help, kill the brave Karna, as Indra did, with Skanda's, the Deva senapati's help, the Asura Taraka."

Ghatotkacha replies, "I am a match for Karna, and for Drona, O Bhaarata, or for any great Kshatriya maharatha. This night I will fight such a duel with the Suta's son that it will be spoken of as long as the world lasts. Tonight, I will spare neither the brave nor the timid, nor even those who, with joined hands, pray for quarter. Following Rakshasa dharma, I will kill all that come before me."

Saying these words, Hidimbi's Parantapa son, does not tarry a moment but rushes at Karna, attacking him with such ferocity that your troops are terrified. The Sutaputra, the Naravyaghra, smilingly meets the Rakshasa warrior of the blazing mouth and wild flaming locks down to his shoulders. And there is no doubt, O tiger among kings, that the battle between Karna and Ghatotkacha resembles the one between Indra and Prahlada in the old days.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the mighty-armed Ghatotkacha attack Karna's chariot in frenzy, Duryodhana says to Dusasana, "Stop the dangerous Rakshasa! Take a strong force with you and ride to Karna's help. Put forth all your prowess, my brother, and ensure that the terrible demon does kill Karna out of our heedlessness."

Meanwhile, Jatasura's mighty son, Alambusha, comes to Duryodhana and says, "O Suyodhana, I seek consent to go into battle. I mean to kill your celebrated enemies, the mighty Pandavas and all their followers. The despicable sons of Pritha killed my father Jatasura, greatest of all Rakshasas, by using some occult mantras. O king of men, I wish to worship my dead sire by offering him the blood of his enemies, and their flesh as tarpana and pinda! It is only just that you allow me this."

Duryodhana is delighted and says to that vile and powerful one, "I can vanquish my enemies with the might of Drona, Karna and others. However, you may, O Rakshasa, go and kill the monstrous Ghatotkacha, this Rakshasa who is always devoted to the Pandavas and now kills our elephants, horses and maharathas from the sky. Go, O Alambusha, and send Bhima's bestial son to Yamaloka."

Saying, “Tathaastu, so be it,” Alambusha roars an echoing challenge to Ghatotkacha and attacks him furiously with diverse kinds of missiles. However, Hidimbi and Bhima’s prodigious son blows in indescribable fury at Alambusha, Karna and the vast Kuru host like some unprecedented tempest banishing a mass of clouds. Seeing the power of Ghatotkacha’s maya, his dreadful sorcery, Alambusha strikes Ghatotkacha with a slew of different kinds of arrows; he then ravages the Pandava army with many strange and sinister astras, which consume whole legions with dark fires, in the twinkling of an eye. The Pandava troops break and flee from the tameless Rakshasa.

Mangled by Ghatotkacha’s missiles, your troops also flee in their thousands, throwing down their torches as they go. Alambusha strikes Bhimasena’s rampaging son with countless volleys. Ghatotkacha shatters Alambusha’s chariot, kills his weird sarathy and incinerates all his weapons, then laughing frightfully, Bhima’s son unleashes a cataract of seething barbs down on Karna, Alambusha and all the Kurus, like a cloudburst over the mountains of Meru. Hunted mercilessly by the staggering Ghatotkacha, unearthly panic and terror seize the Kuru host of the four kinds of forces, and in their haste to flee the awful Rakshasa, who is sometimes in the air and at others on the ground, your soldiers push, shove, trample and ride over one another in absolute pandemonium.

Without a chariot or a charioteer, Alambusha leaps at Ghatotkacha and fetches him several blows like thunder with his fists. Ghatotkacha trembles like a mountain with its trees, creepers and grasses struck by an earthquake; his eyes the colour of sunset, he raises his own arm like a spiked mace and strikes Jatasura’s son a stupendous blow that fells him onto the ground. He kneels on his back and grinds Alambusha into the earth. Alambusha frees himself and, springing up, attacks Ghatotkacha wildly, trips him and throws him down. Now he kneels on the supine son of Bhima and batters him in fury.

Awful and bloodcurdling is the hand-to-hand battle between the two Rakshasas, their fangs glinting in the night. They fight like Indra and Virochana’s son Bali; now they begin to use maya, dark sorcery, as they fight. Turning into fire and water, then into Garuda and Takshaka, then into a cloud and a tempest, and after that into thunder and a mountain, then two elephants and then Rahu and the Sun, they employ a hundred different kinds of illusions to kill each other.

Alambusha and Ghatotkacha strike each other with clubs, maces, lances, mallets, axes, short cudgels and crags. Riding on horseback or on elephants, fighting on foot or from chariots, the great Rakshasas, both gifted with ample powers of magic, fight on bewildering and mystifying those that watch them. Then, Ghatotkacha leaps down again from his ratha in a flash, like a hunting hawk, gives a horrible roar and, seizing the gigantic Alambusha, he flings him down on the earth, like Vishnu slaying the Asura Maya. With a gleaming stroke of a magnificent curved and serrated scimitar, he hews off his ferile enemy's head in an eruption of gore, even as Alambusha is still roaring hideously. The head roars on even after its has been cut from its neck.

Holding the blood-dyed head by its long red hair, Ghatotkacha runs to Duryodhana's chariot and, with a smile, flings Alambusha's frightful head down at your son's feet. With a roar deep as clouds during the rains, he says to Duryodhana, "Here is the head of your monster on whom you relied! I will bring you your precious Karna's head next, and then take yours, vile Duryodhana! One who observes dharma, artha and kama never visits a king, a Brahmana, or a woman with empty hands. Take this head as my tribute to you, O king of evil. And live happily still, until I bring you Karna's head."

Duryodhana stands frozen in shock, and Ghatotkacha lopes away into the night, mounts his chariot and rides straight at Karna, loosing a hundred arrows at his head. A duel breaks out between the two that is altogether wonderful and well nigh indescribable.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me about this battle in the middle of the night between Karna and Ghatotkacha. Describe the form of the Rakshasa to me. What kind of chariot does he ride and what is the nature of his horses and his weapons? How big are his horses, the standard on his chariot and his bow? What kind of armour and what type of casque does he wear? Describe all this to me, O Sanjaya, for you are a marvellous narrator!'

Sanjaya says, 'The gigantic Ghatotkacha has eyes the colour of blood, a face the colour of copper; his belly is low and sunken and the bristles on his body all point upwards. His head is green, his ears are like arrowheads, his cheekbones are high, and his mouth is wide, extending from ear to ear. His teeth are sharp, with four of them high and curved fangs; his tongue is long and his lips are heavy, both coppery. His brows are long and thick, his nose is heavy, his body is blue and his neck is red. Tall as a hill, he is terrible to behold and has strength to match his massive frame. By the standards of men he might be called ugly, yet he is striking, O king. His limbs are as tough as tree-trunks or rocks; the hair on his head is tied up in topknot of a fearful shape. His hips are large and his navel is deep. Although he is enormous, he is muscular and lithe.

The ornaments on his arms are both dark and bright, rough and beautiful. He wears heavy angadas and a corselet on his torso like a circle of fire upon the breast of a mountain. On his head is a brilliant golden crown, exquisitely wrought, and rising over his lofty brow in an arch. His earrings are as bright as the morning sun, and his garlands are made of gold and also scintillating. Apart from the cuirass, he wears a great and heavy coat of polished brass armour of great effulgence.

His chariot is decked with a hundred tinkling bells, and on his flagstaff flutter numerous blood-red banners. Of prodigious proportions, and of the measure of a nalwa, the ratha is covered with bearskins. Carrying all kinds of mighty weapons, it has a tree-tall standard, eight wheels, is adorned with every kind of wildflower garland, and its rumble is like the roar of the clouds. His horses are immense, of unknowable breed; they are like infuriated elephants and they have red eyes that shine in the night; of utterly terrible appearance, they are variegated in hue and, for all their bulk, are gifted with great speed as well as strength. Untiring, with long manes and neighing repeatedly in voices that horrify, they bear the Rakshasa hero into battle. A rakshasa of sinister eyes, with a fiery mouth and earrings like circles of flame, is his charioteer, holding reins bright as the rays of the sun in his claw like yet elegant hands. With this charioteer, Ghatotkacha comes to battle, like Surya with his legless sarathy Aruna.

He looks like a small mountain encircled by a mighty cloud; the standard he flies seems actually to scrape the skies. A carnivorous vulture, its feathers also the hue of blood, perches on top of the flagstaff. Bhima's son comes into battle drawing his bow with a sound like Indra's Vajra; his bowstring is hard as diamonds and sparkles; his bow is twelve cubits long and one cubit wide. Filling all the points of the sky with missiles the length of the aksha of a chariot, the Rakshasa attacks Karna, on this night that has already destroyed so many heroes.

The Rakshasa stands looming and erect, proudly on his chariot, and his bow roars as he stretches it. O Bhaarata, your troops tremble like an agitated sea when they see Hidimbi's son ride toward them. However, Karna gazes calmly at the fearsome apparition advancing wrathfully on him. A smile curving his haughty lips, the Sutaputra stands unmoved and does battle with the monstrous one, at close quarters, like one great tusker against another, or a hilly bull against another lord of a great herd. The duel between the two cannot be described as being any less than that between the one of yore between Indra and Sambara.

Each wields a formidable bow, its twanging like thunder, and lays unbridled siege to the other with arrows of untold power. The shafts shot from the bows drawn to their fullest stretch, pierce brazen armour and draw geysers of blood. With these, with spears as long as akshas, they maul each other like tigers with fang and talon. Ah, searing one another with arrow storms they are peerless, resplendent.

Their limbs pierced and gashed, bathed in blood, they look like two hills of chalk, with crimson rillets running down their breasts. Neither can make the other flinch, Rajan. For a long while, the duel by night between Kara and Ghatotkacha is even, nothing separates the twain.

The reverberations of Ghatotkacha's bow fill both friends and foes with fear. Karna cannot prevail over the Rakshasa with common arrows and he invoke devastras and discharges these at Ghatotkacha; at which, Ghatotkacha promptly begins to uses maya, the sorcery of illusions. He appears as if surrounded by a teeming akshauhini of frightful Rakshasas armed with lances, great rocks, hillocks and cudgels. Seeing Ghatotkacha himself advance towards Karna with a mighty and bizarre weapon raised in his hands, like the Destroyer himself armed with his club, all the kings there pierced through with fear and panic.

Terrified by Ghatotkacha's horrible roars, the elephants spray urine and dung, and all the warriors tremble with fright. Then a thick rain of rocks and stones falls everywhere, flung incessantly by all the Rakshasas, for their strength swells many times at the midnight hour. Iron wheels, bhusundis, strange darts, lances, spears, sataghnis and axes also fall in torrent. At this, all the kings of your army, as well as your sons and the rest of their soldiers flee. Only one stands unmoved, a grim smile still curving his handsome lips; Karna stands quite unmoved, like a god upon dark Kurukshetra.

Why, he dispels every illusion of dread that Ghatotkacha creates. Seeing his sorcery dispersed, an infuriated Ghatotkacha once more aims deadly astras at the radiant Sutaputra. These bolts of lightning, fire, wind and water plough right through Karna's body and, covered in blood, flash into the ground hissing like angry snakes. The Suta's son looses ten excruciating barbs at Ghatotkacha, which plunge into his very marmas. Agony screams through the Rakshasa's blood, yet never wavering, he summons an unworldly chakra from patala, thousand spoked, sharper than razors, brilliant as the morning sun, shimmering with dark and resonant gemstones, and he hurls that wheel of death at Karna.

But Karna blows the wheel of death, spinning at him like a hurricane, into dust with his superhuman archery; the dazzling and eerie chakra falls as powder on to the ground, dashed like the hopes and plans of an unfortunate man.

His fury mounting by the moment, Ghatotkacha envelops Karna with lashing showers of shafts, like Rahu covering the Sun. However, invested with the skill of Rudra or of Indra's younger brother or of Indra, Karna shrouds Ghatotkacha's chariot in a darkness of arrows. Ghatotkacha whirls a golden mace and casts it ardently at Karna, who demolishes that exceptional weapon as well.

The titanic Rakshasa flies up into the sky and, roaring deep like a mass of thunderheads, rains down a shower of occult golden trees, their leaves like swords, over the Sutaputra. Karna desiccates these and strikes the mayavi poised above him so that now his blood rains down over the Sutaputra's ratha; ah, Radha's son is truly like Surya piercing ominous cloud with his ineluctable rays. Slaughtering Ghatotkacha's horses, smashing his chariot into a hundred pieces, Karna assaults him with arrows like streak lightning, blinding astras.

Quickly, Ghatotkacha is so covered by Karna's shafts that stick quivering in his body that nowhere upon him can even two finger widths of space be found that are arrowless. The Rakshasa resembles the most astounding porcupine with quills erect. So entirely is he covered with arrows that we no longer see Ghatotkacha or his dead horses, his broken chariot or even his lofty standard with the sinister vulture on top.

Ghatotkacha repels and destroys Karna's devastras with his own astras. Showers of dark shafts fall from an invisible source in the sky, O Bhaarata, and he assumes a terrifying form that chills the blood of the Kauravas. With maya, he assumes many ferocious and grim heads and faces, and he consumes all Karna's devastras. Then, all of a sudden, the enormous Rakshasa, bleeding from a hundred wounds on his body, lays down on the field, as if life has left him. Thinking him dead, the Kauravas erupt in joy.

However, next moment, Ghatotkacha appears everywhere! He runs all across Kurukshetra, changing shapes every moment, until he again looms over the field in a giant form with a hundred heads and a hundred bellies, and looking like the Mainaka Mountain. He next becomes minuscule, about the measure of a thumb, and flits about on the ground and through the air. He burrows down into the earth, then soars up into the sky, then dives down into the pools and lakes of blood, dyeing himself in scarlet.

We see him near us one moment, then far away the next. With his maya, we see him blaze across earth and sky and all the directions, and then again standing mountainous wearing his brazen armour on a massive golden chariot. His pendulous kundalas waving about, the Rakshasa comes right up to Karna's chariot and fearlessly says to the Sutaputra, "Stop a while, O Suta's son. Where will you go tonight? You will not escape me alive. For tonight, I mean to quench forever your consuming thirst for battle by killing you, O Karna!"

Saying this and laughing like thunder, the coppery-eyed Ghatotkacha once more soars steeply up into the sky, from where he lashes down a downpour of arrows over Karna, all of them big as akshas, the axlerods of chariots. The unruffled Karna fluently destroys the heavy cascade before it comes anywhere near him.

Ghatotkacha uses maya again and makes himself invisible. Then he turns into a mountain with many summits and covered with tall trees. From that black mountain, streams of spears, swords and clubs issue incessantly. Karna remains unmoved and, still smiling, invokes a great devastra, which consumes the barrage of weapons and blows the mountain of illusion apart.

Ghatotkacha turns himself into a blue cloud with a glimmering rainbow in the sky and begins to pelt the Suta's son with a storm of hard stones. Vikartana's son Karna, also called Vrisha, the greatest of all men that know of weapons, invokes a Vayavyastra and destroys the cloud. Ghatotkacha casts down another weapon like a bolt of lightning at him; Karna douses this with a weapon of water. The mighty son of Bhimasena laughs uproariously, shaking earth and sky; he conjures up an all-powerful illusion against the mighty Karna.

Karna sees Ghatotkacha advance wildly on him, surrounded by a host of Rakshasas who resemble lions and tigers and infuriated elephants; some ride on elephants, some on chariots, and some on horseback; all are armed with diverse, uncanny weapons and clad in diverse kinds of armour and wear sundry kinds of ornaments. Seeing Ghatotkacha with his fiends like Indra surrounded by the Maruts, Karna gives him violent battle.

Ghatotkacha pierces Karna with five arrows and gives a roar that again terrifies all the kings and maharathas. He looses an Anjalikastra and shatters the bow in Karna's hands, as well as all the shafts that the Sutaputra has shot at him. Karna takes up another bow as big and mighty as Indra's dhanusha, draws its bowstring back powerfully and unleashes a lethal volley of golden-winged arrows at the sky-ranging Rakshasas. Ravaged by these shafts, the host of wide-chested Rakshasas is as agitated as a herd of wild elephants chased by a kingly lion. Karna devours all the Rakshasas in the air and upon the ground, along with their elephants and other extraordinary mounts; the Sutaputra, Suryaputra looks like apocalyptic Agni burning all creatures at the pralaya.

Having destroyed the Rakshasa army, the Suta's son is as resplendent as the Lord Maheswara when he once razed the triad city of the Asuras, the Tripura in the sky. Among the thousands of kings on the Pandava side, O sire, there is not one who can match Karna then, save Ghatotkacha, prince of Rakshasas, invested with unearthly strength and who, inflamed with battlelust and fury, looks like Yama himself. The Rakshasa's eyes seem to spew flames, even like burning drops of oil from two blazing brands. Striking palm against palm like thunderclaps, biting his lower lip, we see the Rakshasa again mounted on a chariot wrought from maya to which are yoked a number of macabre fanged green donkeys, which as big as elephants and have the faces of Pisachas.

He says to his charioteer, "Take me to the Suta's son."

Riding at Karna again on his fearful ratha, Ghatotkacha hurls an asani of Rudra's workmanship, dreadful and furnished with eight wheels at the Suta's son. Throwing down his bow, Karna jumps down onto the ground, seizes the asani in his hands and hurls it back at Ghatotkacha. The Rakshasa also leaps out of his chariot before the dreadfully blazing weapon burns the dark chariot to ashes in a flash of fire, taking with it horses, charioteer and standard, and then plunges down into the earth and deep into its very bowels, filling even the Devas with wonder. All who see Karna's incredible feat applaud him.

Karna climbs back into his ratha and once more unleashes a tirade of arrows. Indeed, O Maharajan, there is none among all living creatures who could have done what Karna does during his battle with Bhima's awesome son. Struck by Karna's missiles, like a mountain lashed by torrents of rain, Ghatotkacha vanishes again from the field with maya.

Fighting with sorcery, the great Rakshasa destroys Karna's lustrous devastras with his maya. Karna is not intimidated but battles on splendidly. The mighty son of Bhimasena divides his body into many sorcerous forms, frightening all the maharathas of the Kuru army. There bound onto the field of war lions, tigers, hyenas, snakes with fiery tongues, and birds with iron beaks.

Whenever Karna strikes him deep with mighty arrows and astras, the Rakshasa, looming large as Himavat, vanishes using his maya. Immediately, many Rakshasas, Pisachas, Yatudhanas, teeming wolf packs, and leopards of frightful aspect rush towards Karna to devour him. They run at the Suta's son, with fierce roars and howls to frighten him. Karna strikes each of the mayic beasts and apparitions with golden-winged arrows that drink their unnatural blood; finally, with a Gandharvastra he dissipates all the Rakshasa's illusions.

Karna never pauses but looses a brutal volley at Ghatotkacha's freshly appeared horses so they buckle and fall before the Rakshasa's eyes, their bodies mangled, their backs torn open by the Sutaputra's virile shafts. Seeing his maya dispelled, Hidimbi's son vanishes again, warning Karna, "I will be back soon to kill you, Sutaputra!"'

"Sanjaya says, 'As Karna and Ghatotkacha battle luciferously, the valiant and grotesque Rakshasa appears on the field, leading a large force of fiends, and approaches Duryodhana. Thousands of sinister Rakshasas, of diverse forms and endowed with great heroism, come with him. He has come because of his old animosity for the Pandavas. Bhima had killed all his kinsmen—the great Baka, who ate Brahmanas, as well as the powerful Kirmira—and his friend Hidimba.

Alayudha has waited for a long time, brooding over his old enmity. Learning now that a nocturnal battle rages, he arrives like an angry elephant or a provoked snake, driven by the wish to kill Bhima.

The awful Alayudha says to Duryodhana, "You know how Bhima killed my kinsmen, Baka, Kirmira and Hidimba. He deflowered the virgin Hidimbi, dishonoring us Rakshasas. I am here to kill Bhima with all his followers, horses, chariots and elephants, as well as the son of Hidimbi and his warriors. I will slaughter all the sons of Kunti today, and Krishna and all that walk before them. I will devour them with all their followers. Command all your troops to desist from battle for we will fight the Pandavas."

Duryodhana, surrounded by his brothers, is delighted! He tells the Rakshasas, "I will place you in the van of army but my own troops will not stand by as spectators for their enmity has not cooled."

Alayudha, bull among Rakshasas, saying, "Tathaastu, so be it!" to the king, and sweeps at Bhima with his horrible army. He has a blazing form, and rides a chariot bright as the sun and very like Ghatotkacha's ratha. The rumble of Alayudha's huge chariot is as deep as Ghatotkacha's and it too is covered with bearskins and measures a full nalwa. His horses, like those of Ghatotkacha, are swift as thoughts, are as big as elephants, have faces like pisachas and bray like donkeys. They live on warm flesh and blood, and a hundred of these gigantic creatures are yoked to Alayudha's black chariot. Truly, Rajan, the sound of Alayudha's chariot is just as loud as Ghatotkacha's and his bowstring too is hard and strong as diamonds. His arrows, winged with gold and whetted on stone, are as big as Ghatotkacha's, measuring as much as an aksha.

Alayudha is as mighty-armed as Ghatotkacha, and the banner of his ratha is fiery and has the splendour of the sun, and like Ghatotkacha's, vultures and great ravens perch on it. In form, he is more handsome than Ghatotkacha, and his face blazes in wrath. With dazzling angadas, shining coronet and wildflower garlands, a glittering helmet, a great curved sword, a mace, bhusundis, short clubs, ploughshare weapons and bows and arrows, his skin black, and thick and hard as an elephant's, riding on the magnificent chariot, the dreadful Alayudha looks indeed like some great storm cloud gashed by flashes of lightning.

The greatest Pandava kings and maharathas joyfully ride forward to meet Alayudha the Rakshasa's onrush. Yet another battle that makes one's hair stand on end breaks out between the demons and the Pandava forces, at dead of night.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The advent of Alayudha puts heart into your sons; also knowing that Duryodhana himself leads them now, they are in high spirits, like men wanting to cross the ocean when they find a raft. The surviving kings and maharathas of the Kuru army regard themselves having obtained a new lease of life and all of them accord a respectful welcome to Alayudha, who is such a vile Rakshasa that Bhishma would never have allowed him near his army as long as he had command. But now, the Kali yuga has risen over the world and this is the war at night, the soul of darkness.

The preternatural battle between Karna and Ghatotkacha's Rakshasa, which though savage and horrible is yet magnificent, holds the Panchalas and all the other Kshatriyas who watch it spellbound in irresistible fascination. Meanwhile, your soldiers, though protected on all sides by Drona, Aswatthaman, Kripa and the others, are all seized by absolute terror and we hear loud wails everywhere, dismal cries of "All is lost!"

Having watched his unimaginable feats on Kurukshetra, your warriors are all frantic with fear of Ghatotkacha, frightened out of their very wits. Your troops give up all hope of Karna surviving the duel with Bhima's son.

Seeing his precious Karna in grave distress, Duryodhana summons Alayudha and says to him, “Look where Karna battles Hidimbi’s son by himself. Look at the corpses of the thousand great kings that lie askew upon the ground, all slain by Bhima’s monstrous son with his dark and bright astras; ah, look where they lie like trees struck by lightning or uprooted by an elephant in rage. If you agree, mighty Alayudha, from this moment, among all my warriors, let it become your sole mission to slay Bhima’s horrible son. My friend, you must see that Ghatotkacha does not take Karna’s life on this night, using his maya shakti, or our cause will be lost and the war. And all who have died for our sake will have sacrificed their lives in vain. Grave and great is the mission with which I entrust you, noble Alayudha; I know you will not disappoint me.”

Alayudha says “Tathaastu—so be it,” and attacks Ghatotkacha. Turning away from Karna, Ghatotkacha greets Alayudha with a terrific volley. An epic battle ensues between the two night rangers. Karna turns his attention to Bhima, riding his chariot of solar effulgence. Bheema sees Alayudha locked in battle with Ghatotkacha and, troubled like the great bull of a herd facing a lion, Vrikodara ignores Karna charging at him and dashes instead at Alayudha, covering him with gusts of arrows.

At this, Alayudha abandons Ghatotkacha and turns to face Bhima. Bhima, the Rakshasa slayer, lays violent siege to him and Alayudha too shrouds the Pandava in clouds of arrows. All Alayudha’s dreadful Rakshasas turn on Bhima, for it is him that they have come to kill and avenge Hidimba, Kirmira, Baka and the others that the son of Pandu despatched. Bhima Mahabaho strikes each fiend deep with five scalding arrows at which they scream horribly and flee.

Seeing Bhima drive away his Rakshasas like some dogs, Alayudha assails the Pandava ever more fiercely. Bhimasena also shoots back at him with great violence, but the Rakshasa cuts down Vrikodara’s shafts in flight and some he even catches with his hands. Bhima pauses, gazes for a long moment at his enemy and casts a mace like a thunderbolt at him. Alayudha smashes that weapon with a mace of his own.

Kunti’s son again unleashes squalls of arrows at the Rakshasa prince and Alayudha cuts these down with his own arrow storms. Seeing their lord Alayudha contain Bhima by himself, the Rakshasas who fled in fear return to battle and begin to slaughter Bhima’s elephants; they also harry the Panchalas, the Srinjayas and the horses of Bhima's army, considerably disconcerting them.

Watching the battle between Bhima and Alayudha, Krishna says to Arjuna, "Bhima is succumbing to this prince of Rakshasas. We must leave everything else and protect Bhima. Let Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandin, Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, along with the sons of Draupadi, ride against Karna. Let Nakula, Sahadeva and Satyaki kill Alayudha's Rakshasas! As for you, O Mahabaho, face this akshauhini led by Drona for great is the danger that threatens us now."

At Krishna's command, the Pandava and Panchala maharathas ride against Karna and the Rakshasas that fight for the Kurus.

Alayudha draws his bow into a circle and looses some astras like venom spitting cobras at Bhima, breaking his bow. The mighty Rakshasa kills Bhima's horses and charioteer, so Bhima leaps down from his ratha. With an echoing roar, Vrikodara casts a mace heavy as a hill at his adversary. Alayudha shatters that gada with one of his own and the report deafens all the war by night; the Rakshasa gives a bloodcurdling roar. Bhimasena seizes up another massive mace, and the battle that now erupts between the human prince and the Rakshasa makes brave men tremble.

They swing their maces at each other with such violence that the very earth trembles and both are covered in brilliant showers of sparks. When the maces shatter, they cast them aside and fight with bare arms and fists: with blows that echo like spring thunder. In frenzy they fight, soon with chariot wheel, yokes, akshas, adhishthanas, upaskaras, and indeed with anything that comes to hand. Both are covered in blood and present such a magnificent spectacle, O Rajan!

Then, Krishna sends Hidimbi's son Ghatotkacha to protect Bhimasena.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Bhima sorely tried and wounded by Alayudha, Krishna rids to Ghatotkacha and says to him, "O Mahabaho, look where the Rakshasa violently besets Bhima in front of all the troops and you. Leave Karna for now and kill Alayudha. You can despatch Karna later."

Ghatotkacha immediately abandons his duel with Karna and confronts Alayudha. The battle between them is intolerably ferocious, O Bhaarata. Meanwhile, the mighty Yuyudhana, with Nakula and Sahadeva, looses a firetide of blazing shafts at Alayudha's terrible-looking and heroic Rakshasas. Spraying arrows all around him Arjuna Kiritin claims the lives of many great Kshatriyas.

Karna continues to harangue so many kings and maharathas amongst the Panchalas led by Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandin and others. Bhima rushes at Karna, covering the Sutaputra with a tempest of arrows. Having slain Alayudha's Rakshasas, Nakula, Sahadeva and Satyaki ride at Karna, while the Panchalas confront Drona.

The raging Alayudha strikes Ghatotkacha on his head with a huge parigha, making him swoon and forces him to sit in his chariot, where he remains still. Bhima's son recovers soon and hurls a golden gada, with a hundred little bells, at his enemy with untold force. This mace of power kills Alayudha's steeds, his charioteer, and shatters his loud ratha. Using sorcery, Alayudha jumps down from his smashed chariot and decants a copious shower of blood. The sky appears overspread with a mass of black clouds adorned with flashes of lightning. We hear a booming thunderstorm with the strangest peals of thunder on high, all created by Alayudha's maya.

Ghatotkacha soars up from his chariot and dispels this threatening illusion. Alayudha now rains down a storm of smooth hard pebbles over Ghatotkacha, who blows the stones into smithereens with his astras. The two inundate each other with cascades and cataracts of iron parighas, spears, maces, short clubs, mallets, pinakas, swords, lances, long spears, kampanas, keen shafts, both long and flat-headed arrows, quoits, battle-axes, ayogudas, short-arrows, weapons with heads like those of cattle and ulukhalas.

Tearing up great sami, pilu, karira, champaka, ingudi, badari, the flowering kovidara, the arimeda, plaksha, banyan and peepul trees, they batter each other with these; they tear mountain peaks and hurl these at each other and large crags and balls of iron. Kurukshetra quakes with the sound of these weapons crashing against each other and the battle between Alayudha and Bhima's son is like the one between Vali and Sugriva, the two Vanara princes of old.

They hew and smite each other with other missiles, with countless powerful spells, and with glinting swords curved like half moons. The two titanic Rakshasas pause often to wrestle and strike one another with their bare hands, as blood and sweat run profusely down their great bodies; they seize each other by their locks of wild hair. Finally, Ghatotkacha darts low and bodily hefts Alayudha over his head. Whirling him around, he dashes that Rakshasa down onto the ground so Alayudha briefly faints. Before he awakes, Ghatotkacha, quick as light cuts his grisly head from its thick neck with a sweeping arc of his great sword. Hidimbi's half-human son throws back his head and roar after echoing roar erupts from him.

The Pandavas and Panchalas also roar out their relief and exhilaration at seeing the great Alayudha slain; they blow ten thousand conches and beat a thousand batteries of drums. Lamps are lit again everywhere. Victory clearly belongs to the Pandavas and the grim night is bright and magnificent with the din of celebration that your enemies raise. Once more, Ghatotkacha lopes up to Duryodhana's chariot and flings Alayudha's still warm and bleeding head down at his feet.

Duryodhana is stricken with dread for his troops. Alayudha had come to Duryodhana on his own, wanting to avenge his kinsmen whom Bhima had killed, and Duryodhana had rejoiced thinking that this great demon would surely kill his most hated cousin. Suyodhana had thought that Bhima's death would break the spirits of the other sons of Pandu and that victory would then be his. Besides, with Bhima killed, he had thought that his own brothers' lives would be safe.

Now with Alayudha killed by Ghatotkacha, Duryodhana hangs his head and feels instead that Bhima's vow is already as good as fulfilled and he, Duryodhana, and his brothers are as good as slain by Pandu's second son who blows everywhere on Kurukshetra, irresistibly as a hurricane of his father Vayu the Wind.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After killing Alayudha, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha is overjoyed and, standing in front of the army, he gives all kinds of shouts and roars. Hearing these inhuman sounds that make elephants tremble, a great fear, O Rajan, lays hold of your warriors. Karna, apparently unmoved, attacks the Panchalas. He draws blood from Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin with ten strong and perfect arrows, each; with a flurry of other powerful barbs, he makes Yudhamanyu, Uttamaujas and even the great Satyaki shudder as the shafts crash into their great bodies. These warriors, too, draw their bows into circles and shoot at Karna from all sides.

During the war by night, the twanging of their bowstrings and the rumble of their chariot-wheels are loud and deep as the thunder of clouds massed at the end of summer. Their arrows are streaks of lightning; they are the driving deadly rain. Standing immovable like a hill, a prince of the mountains, Parantapa Karna cuts down every arrow shot at him. With speed that defies imagination, he strikes his enemies viciously with javelins flung with the force of thunder and with arrows that have golden wings.

He destroys the standards of some maharathas and mauls the bodies of others, deprives some of their charioteers, and some of their horses. Unable to withstand the Suryaputra, thousands flee from him and seek refuge with Yudhishtira's force.

Seeing them thus broken and fleeing, Ghatotkacha who has just killed Alayudha, gives a roar more dreadful than any heard before, and rushes towards Karna unleashing a torrent of savage shafts, big as axle rods. Locking quickly into another frenetic duel, both loose barbed bolts, cloth-yard shafts, frog-faced arrows, nalikas, dandas, asanis, arrows with heads like the calf's tooth or the boar's ear, broad-headed arrows, those pointed like bulls' horns, and others with heads like razors. All these have golden wings and as they fly through the air they seem to drape a garland of unworldly lotuses around the throat of the sky.

Evenly matched, they loose blazing devastras at each other and astra consumes astra lighting up the night sky with many small suns. No one can see the slightest difference between the two, in speed or prowess, and the scintillating duel between the son of Surya and the son of Bhima presents a breathtaking spectacle even like the contention between the Sun and Rahu in the firmament.

Rajan, when Ghatotkacha finds that he cannot prevail over Karna, he invokes an astra with which he first kills Karna's horses and then his charioteer, after which he vanishes.'

Dhritarashtra asks, 'When the Rakshasa, fighting deceitfully, vanishes, tell me, O Sanjaya, what the warriors of my army think.'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the Rakshasa disappear, all the Kauravas cry, "The Rakshasa will reappear as suddenly as he has disappeared and he will kill Karna."

Karna Mahabuddhi is aware of the danger and covers all the directions with dense showers of shafts darkening earth and sky so everything becomes invisible. So great is the lightness of hand Karna displays that no one can discern when he touches his quiver, when he fits his arrows to his bowstring and when he aims and shoots them. The whole sky is shrouded by his shafts.

In the sky, the Rakshasa creates a profound and deadly illusion of maya in the firmament. We see above us what appears to be a mass of red clouds blazing like fire. From this cloud issue flashes of lightning, and many burning brands, O Kuru king! Frightful roars also emanate from there, like the sound of thousands of drums beaten at once. From it fall, all around, countless golden-winged shafts, darts, lances, weighty clubs, battle-axes, scimitars washed with oil, axes with blazing edges, short spears, long spears with keen points, spiked maces emitting strange bright rays of light, beautiful maces of iron, others of solid gold and twined about with silver string and sataghnis. Huge crags fall from it, and thousands of thunderbolts with deafening reports, and hundreds of chakras and razor sharp blades, brilliant as the fire.

Karna's missiles cannot destroy all that thick and blazing deluge. Loud is the sound of falling horses killed by the wizardly weapons pouring down, mighty elephants struck with thunder, and great maharathas slain. Ravaged by Ghatotkacha, Duryodhana's host wanders demented and in agony all over the battlefield. With piteous cries, even as those of women, your host drifts lost and aimless, on the point of being annihilated.

Only their leaders, great Kshatriyas noble of heart, do not turn their faces from the battle but stand steadfast waiting for death. Seeing the carnage Ghatotkacha fetches upon their host, terror and dismay grip your sons. Hundreds of jackal packs, with tongues blazing like fire and terrible voices, begin to howl, further petrifying the Kaurava warriors. The Rakshasas that tread air on high, with fiery tongues and burning mouths, fangs like thick needles and forms big as hills, lash down arrows over your hapless forces. Struck by shafts, darts, lances, maces and spiked clubs, by thunderbolts, pinakas, asanis, chakras and sataghnis, the Kaurava troops are on the very verge of complete collapse and surrender. The maya Rakshasas further assail them with sthunas made of black iron and twined about with strings of jute.

All your combatants are in a nightmarish stupor. The bravest warriors have their weapons broken, or their heads hewn off, or limbs fractured and fall like grass being mown, while falling rocks crush horses, elephants and rathas. The Yatudhanas of terrible forms that Ghatotkacha creates with maya spare neither those who are terrified nor those who cry for mercy. During the brutal carnage of Kuru heroes, and the extermination of majestic Kshatriyas brought on by Death himself, the Kaurava warriors break ranks and flee all together, crying, "Fly, you Kauravas! All is lost! The Devas with Indra at their head are killing us for the sake of the Pandavas!"

And at this horrible juncture, there is not a soul that can rescue the Bharata troops. During the mayhem, no one can distinguish friend from foe; all run any way they can from the horror with which Ghatotkacha visits them in that very soul of darkness. All your warriors and soldiers having fled, Kurukshetra seems eerily empty as if no living man is anywhere near the gruesome field of fate.

We see only Karna, Rajan, shining by himself, drowning in the awful shower of weapons that falls incessantly from above.

Karna covers the sky with his missiles, resisting the unworldly sorcery of the Rakshasa. In truth, we see that he is endowed with deep humility, which enables him to achieve the most difficult and noble feats; Karna remains calm, unmoved by the horrors that flare down from the sky. All the Saindhavas and Balhikas are frightened and look just to Karna for protection. They worship him in their thoughts, while Ghatotkacha continues to wreak havoc upon them.

Ghatotkacha casts down a sataghni of a hundred fire, fitted with scything chakras, and kills Karna's four horses simultaneously and they fall dead on their knees. Jumping down from his horseless chariot and seeing the Kauravas run away, and finding his own devastra nullified by the Rakshasa's maya, Karna still remains calm and turns his thought inward in dhyana to reflect on what he should do next.

Watching Karna and the infernal Rakshasa maya that Ghatotkacha uses, all the Kauravas and your sons cry out in despair, "Karna, kill the Rakshasa with your shakti or he will kill us all tonight! What will Bhima and Arjuna do to us? Slay this wretched Rakshasa or he will consume us all. Only those who escape from this monster tonight will live to fight the Parthas. Karna, you must use the shakti you had from Indra and slay Ghatotkacha. Karna, there is no other way. You must kill Bhima's dreadful son or we will lose everything within the hour."

Karna seeing the Rakshasa ablaze at dead of night, and the Kuru army struck with terror; hears the piteous entreaties of the Kauravas and knows he has no choice but to use Indra's shakti. Quivering all over his mighty form like some mythic lion, magnificent Karna summons Indra's shakti, which he has kept so carefully and worshipped for years so that, when the time came, he could kill Arjuna with it. But now, he summons the awesome weapon that looks like the very tongue of Death lolling out to drink copious blood, or Yama's sister Mrityu herself descended on dark Kurukshetra being laid waste by Ghatotkacha.

Karna invokes that burning weapon called Naikartana and casts it at Bhima's son. Seeing that inexorable shakti in the Sutaputra's hands, Ghatotkacha in a flash assumes a body as big as the foot of the Vindhya mountain! Bhima’s Rakshasa son tries to flee. Seeing that apocalyptic shakti all creatures, visible and hidden, human, divine and all the rest, on the ground and in the air, cry out in fear.

Fierce winds begin to blow, and thunderclaps resound as if to break the very sky into shards. Indra’s fulminant shakti consumes all of Ghatotkacha’s mighty maya in a wink. It then courses straight through the Rakshasa’s massive breast, flares on upwards and flies into a constellation deep in the heavens, leaving a flaring trail in its wake! Sky shaking roars erupt from great Ghatotkacha and he keels over dead. Indra’s shakti claims the life of Bhima and Hidimbi’s son who had razed so many great heroes, both human and demonic, who had by himself devoured a vast portion of your army by night.

Rajan, listen to a final astounding feat that Ghatotkacha accomplishes even as he falls dead. He shines like a sun and having assumed a form as great as the Vindhya mountain, falls in death upon a teeming akshauhini of your army, crushing thousands of your men with his stupendous body. Even as life quits him, out of his fathomless love for the Pandavas, he obliterates a full akshauhini of your troops.

A bedlam of triumphant sounds erupts from your sons and their forces —lion’s roars, blaring conches, the thunder of drums and cymbals. Unbridled is the joy of the Kauravas when they see Ghatotkacha’s maya cloven and the Rakshasa himself slain. Idolised, worshipped, eulogised by the Kurus even as Sakra had been by the Maruts after he slew Vritra, a smiling Karna climbs into your son Duryodhana’s chariot and, watched by all, joins the Kuru host.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Meanwhile, the Pandavas are pierced through by savage grief when they see Ghatotkacha die; they see him lying on Kurukshetra like a cloven mountain and weep bitter tears. But Krishna seems in a transport of delight! He roars as jubilantly as the Kauravas and embraces Arjuna fervently. Tying up his horses, he leaps down from his chariot and dances in ecstasy, still giving vent to joyous shouts and roars. He embraces Arjuna yet again, and repeatedly slapping his own armpits, the Krishna Mahabuddhi climbs back onto his ratha and continues to roar in some unnatural rapture.

The Pandavas and their troops are shocked to watch this display.

His heart bursting with grief, Arjuna cries at Krishna in anguish, "Madhusudana, how are you so delighted at this hour of tragedy when Bhima's precious son has died? Our troops flee in all direction to see Ghatotkacha slain and we too are filled with anxiety. Yet, you are so full of joy! There must be some great cause for your celebration, Krishna. If it is not a secret, you must share the reason for your strange delight with me. Tell me why you appear to have lost your very mind and rejoice when the rest of us grieve. Ah, you terrify me, Krishna, for looking at your levity I feel as if Meru has moved from his proper place or as if the ocean has dried up!"

Krishna replies, "Great is the joy I feel. Listen to me, Dhananjaya, and what I say to you will dispel your sorrow and infuse delight into your heart as well. Understand clearly what has happened—Karna has used his inexorable astra against Ghatotkacha and for that Karna is already as good as dead. Hear me well, O Pandava. There is no man in this world, including you, who could have vanquished Karna, who straddled Kurukshetra like Kartikeya himself, in battle as long as he had Indra's shakti with him.

He would have been invincible anyway, but through good fortune the kavacha and kundalas that he was born with were both taken from him. Now, again through fate, his infallible astra has also been lost to him. You do not know who Karna is. I say to you that, wearing his golden armour and earrings, Karna could vanquish the three worlds by himself and the very gods. Not Indra, Varuna or Yama could withstand mighty Karna. If this bull among men had his natural armour and earrings, neither you, bending the Gandiva, nor I with my Sudarshana chakra, could kill him.

For your weal, your father Indra took Karna's golden kavacha and kundalas away from him. And even knowing the reason why Indra went to him as a Brahmana to ask him for these as a gift at the hour of his noonday prayer, the noble Karna cut them from his body and gave them away. And for that is he known as Vaikartana.

Now having exhausted the shakti he had from Indra in exchange for the armour and earrings, Karna is like a virulent serpent that has lost his venom; he is like an inextinguishable fire whose flames have turned mild. As long as he had Indra's astra, which he kept just to kill you, Karna always knew that you were as good as dead!"

Krishna pauses, then continues gravely, "But listen well to me Arjuna, even without his kavacha, kundalas and the shakti of Sakra, there is no man on earth, or any warrior in heaven, who can kill great Karna other than you. It is because he is devoted to Brahmanas, is always truthful in speech, engages himself in tapasya, observes his vratas and is kind even to his enemies, that Karna is called Vrisha. He is heroism embodied; there is no archer in the world like Karna; his bow is always ready and he is the lion in the jungle that takes his pride from great lords of elephants. Karna is he who strips the greatest maharathas of their pride on the filed of battle. He blazes like the midday sun at his zenith, at whom no one can gaze.

Fighting all the most illustrious warriors of your army, O Naravyaghra, Karna, shooting his arrows, looks like the autumn sun with his thousand rays. The Sutaputra is like a great cloud that rains devastras. Not the Devas can quell him; he could carve them up so their divine flesh and blood fell copiously onto the earth. But deprived of his armour and his earrings, and now without the astra given him by Vasava, Karna is like a mere mortal and no longer like a god.

You will find an opportunity to kill him when his chariot-wheels sink into the earth. You must not hesitate or let pity rule at that moment. I will give you a sign when the moment arrives and you must act instantly and kill this hero like whom there is no other.

The vanquisher of Bala himself, Indra wielding his Vajra, cannot kill invincible Karna while he stands with a weapon in his hand. Indeed, Arjuna, for your benefit, using different stratagems I have killed, one after the other, Jarasandha, Sisupala of the Chedis and the mahabaho Nishada Ekalavya. Other great Rakshasas among which Hidimba, Kirmira, Baka were the greatest, as well as Alayudha, grinder of hostile troops, and Ghatotkacha, crusher of his foes and warrior of fierce deeds, have all been killed.'"

'Arjuna asks, "How, O Janardana, for our sake, and by what stratagems, were these lords of the earth, Jarasandha and the others, killed?"

Krishna says, "If Jarasandha, Sisupala of the Chedis, and Ekalavya, the peerless son of the Nishada king, had not been slain, they would have become terrible. Duryodhana would have had these maharathas to fight for him. They have always been hostile to us, and they would all have supported the Kauravas. They were all heroes and mighty archers, accomplished in weaponry and resolute. Like Devas they would have protected Dhritarashtra's sons. Indeed, if Karna, Jarasandha, Sisupala and Ekalavya had been with Duryodhana, he would have conquered the whole world.

Listen, Dhananjaya, to how they were killed. Without using strategy, the very gods could not have slain them. Each of them, O Partha, could fight the entire celestial host protected by the Lokapalas, regents of the world.

Once, when Balarama attacked him, a livid Jarasandha hurled a gada that could destroy any creature at our city from his own city of Girivraja. With the splendour of fire, the mace flew towards us dividing the sky like the line on her head that parts the tresses of a woman; it blazed at us like Sakra's Vajra. Seeing the mace fly at us, Rohini's son Balarama loosed the astra called Sthunakarna at Jarasandha's mace. Its vigour destroyed by the energy of Balarama's weapon, that mace fell onto the earth, splitting her open with its force and making the very mountains tremble.

There once lived a terrible Rakshasa called Jara, gifted with great powers. She joined together the infant Jarasandha, who had been born as a child cloven in two halves. For this, that mighty king was called Jarasandha, joined by Jara. Jarasandha's mace, when it plunged down into the earth along with the Sthunakarnastra, killed Jara in her subterranean cave home and her son and kinsmen. Later, it was in your presence and mine that Bhima killed Jarasandha by tearing his body along its length, where once the Rakshasi Jara had joined it. If Jarasandha had stood armed with his mace, the very Devas led by Indra could not have quelled him.

O best of men, It was for your sake that Drona, whom Ekalavya worshipped from afar as his Acharya, asked for the Nishada's thumb as his guru dakshina. Ekalavya was no less an archer than Rama of Ayodhya himself! With all his digits, he too was invincible even to the Devas, the Danavas, the Rakshasas and the Uragas all together. Even without his thumb, he was far greater than any mere mortal. I killed Ekalavya on another field of battle, to protect you, Arjuna.

I killed Sisupala, king of the Chedis, before your very eyes during the Rajasuya yagna. Him, also, the Devas and the Asuras together could not overwhelm. I was born to kill him, as well as the other enemies of the Devas, and so were you. O Naravyaghra, for the weal of the world Bhimasena killed Hidimba, Baka and Kirmira. All these Rakshasas were as powerful as Ravana and all of them were destroyers of Brahmanas and yagnas.

Ghatotkacha killed Alayudha who possessed awesome powers of maya. And Ghatotkacha I sacrificed through strategy, using Karna and his astra. If Karna had not killed Ghatotkacha, I myself would have had to kill Bhima's son. I did not kill him earlier, only for your sake. Much as he loved you and your brothers, the Rakshasa was inimical to Brahmanas and yagnas and he had to be slain. He would have grown altogether too powerful in this world if he had been left alive.

O sinless one, with Ghatotkacha's death Indra's shakti can no longer be used against you. I have come to this world to establish dharma and I will kill all those who are destroyers of dharma, for I have sworn a solemn vow to establish righteousness on earth. Wherever the Vedas, truth, self-restraint, purity, dharma, modesty, prosperity, wisdom and forgiveness need to be maintained, there I will always be.

Now you have no need to fear great Karna, for I will tell you how and when to kill him. And Bhima will kill Duryodhana. I will also tell you how that final death shall be achieved. Meanwhile, listen, the uproar of the hostile army swells by the moment. Your troops are fleeing on all sides. Having killed Ghatotkacha, the triumphant Kauravas are mowing down your troops at will. Ah, look where Drona, the terrible Brahmana, devours our men with blazing astras, burning whole legion to ashes.”””

"Dhritarashtra says, 'When Karna had an astra with which he could kill any one warrior, why did he not use it against Arjuna? If he had killed Partha with the Naikartana, all the Srinjayas and the Pandavas would have been as good as dead. If Arjuna had died, nothing could have stood between us and victory. Arjuna had sworn a vow that he would never refuse to accept a challenge to fight. The Sutaputra's son should have challenged Dhananjaya and killed him with Indra's Naikartana. Oh, why did he not do this? Truly, my son Suyodhana is without both intelligence and proper counsellors!

When the wretched sinner is constantly confounded by the enemy, how can he ever hope to defeat them? Ah, how cunningly Krishna had Karna use the one weapon that could have won the war for us against Ghatotkacha! Why, he snatched it right out of Karna's hands like a fruit from the withered hand of a cripple.

In a fight between a boar and a dog, upon the death of either, the hunter is the one profited. So, too, Krishna is the one benefited by the battle between Karna and Hidimba's son. If Ghatotkacha had killed Karna, that would have been a great gain for the Pandavas. If, as has happened, Karna killed Ghatotkacha, that also would have favoured the sons of Pandu for then the Naikartana would have been lost anyway.

Krishna is the only real lion among all men and, in his great wisdom, he saw this clearly and had Karna kill Ghatotkacha with Indra's astra, while shielding Arjuna from the Suta's son. How canny this Yadava is, Sanjaya—he contrived a subtle battle that he could not lose!'

Sanjaya says, 'Knowing that Karna had Indra's astra and that he was saving it to kill Arjuna, Krishna knowingly sent Ghatotkacha into battle against the Suryaputra, for he also knew that Karna would be obliged to exhaust the Naikartana against Bhima's mighty son.

Rajan, do not forget that all this is the fruit of your evil rule! We would certainly have achieved victory, O Kuruttama, if Krishna had not saved Arjuna's life by sacrificing Ghatotkacha's. Karna would have consumed Arjuna along with his horses, standard, and chariot, if the Master, the Lord of yogins, Krishna had not saved him. Without Krishna's grace upon him, Arjuna would have been blasted like a tree struck by lightning.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'My son is addicted to violence, his advisers are foolish and he is vain about his own intelligence of which he has dire little. It is for this that the only weapon with which Arjuna could be killed has been lost to us. O Sanjaya, why did Duryodhana not command Karna to cast the fatal astra at Dhananjaya? O son of Gavalgana, you who are so wise, why did you also forget to remind Karna of what he should have done?'

Sanjaya says, 'Indeed, O Rajan, this was the subject of deliberation between Duryodhana, Sakuni, Dusasana and me every single night. We would tell Karna, "Forget every other warrior, O Karna, and kill Arjuna. With Arjuna slain, we can keep the Pandavas and the Panchalas for your slaves. If at Partha's death, Krishna exalts another son of Pandu in his place, we must kill Krishna himself. Krishna is the very root of the great Pandava tree, and Arjuna is its trunk. The other sons of Pritha are its branches, while the Panchalas are just its leaves.

The Pandavas have Krishna for their protection, Krishna for their might and Krishna for their Lord. Indeed, Krishna is their essential support even as the Moon is of the constellations. Therefore, O Sutaputra, ignore the leaves, branches and trunk, and kill Krishna who is everywhere and is always the root and foundation of the Pandavas."

If Karna had killed the dark lion of the Dasarha vamsa, the delighter of the Yadavas, there is no doubt that all the world would have belonged just to you and your sons. Have no doubt that if this illustrious Krishna could be slain, Rajan, all this Bhumi, with her mountains and forests would have accepted your sovereignty.

Although we would rise every morning resolved to eliminate the Lord of the very gods, Hrishikesa of immeasurable tejas, uncannily once the fighting began, we would forget our resolve. Kesava always protected Arjuna and never allowed Arjuna to face Karna as long as the Suta's son had Indra's astra. Indeed, Krishna would always turn his chariot away from Karna and set some other great maharatha to fight him, intent on making Karna use his Naikartana, intent on saving Arjuna's life. O Rajan, when the noble Krishna protected Arjuna thus from Karna, how would Arjuna, greatest of all warriors, not protect Krishna? I have reflected deeply on all this and concluded that there is no one in the three worlds who can even dream of vanquishing this Parantapa, Janardana Krishna, the hero who wields the Sudarshana Chakra!

Why, Satyaki, the invincible tiger among maharathas asked Krishna, "Janardana, Karna is resolved to kill Arjuna with Indra's weapon. Why, then, does he not do so?"

Vasudeva replied, "Dusasana, Karna, Sakuni and Jayadratha, all led by Duryodhana, have frequently discussed this very matter. They would say to the Sutaputra, 'O Karna, matchless bowman, O you of immeasurable prowess, O foremost of all victors in battle, you must not even think of casting this astra at anyone other than Kunti's son Dhananjaya. He is the greatest among the enemy; he is like Vasava amongst the Devas. If he dies, all the other Pandavas and the Srinjayas will be broken in spirit and might, even as the Devas without Agni to fuel and feed them!'

Karna agreed to this, saying 'Tathaastu—so be it!'

O Satyaki, bull of the Sinis, the wish to kill the Gandivi was always in Karna's heart. However, I would subtly bewilder and distract his mind and he would forget to cast the Naikartana at Arjuna! As long as I could not remove the dire threat to Phalguna's life, I had neither sleep nor joy in my heart. But today, seeing the Naikartana spent against Ghatotkacha, I know that Dhananjaya has been saved from the jaws of Death.

Satyaki, I do not view my father, my mother, my brothers, you, or my own life as being as precious as Arjuna's. If there is anything more valuable than the sovereignty of the three worlds, I do not want to have it without Dhananjaya to share it with me. That is why, Yuyudhana, that seeing Arjuna saved from Karna's astra and a certain death, I am in a transport of delight. And this is the reason I sent Ghatotkacha into battle against Karna. No one else could defy the Sutaputra at night. Only Ghatotkacha could try Karna so gravely that he would be forced to use the Naikartana against Bhima's son."

This is what Devaki's son Krishna, who is for ever devoted to Arjuna, told Satyaki.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'I see clearly that what Karna, Duryodhana and Sakuni and you did was against the dictates of all good sense and strategy. Indeed, when you knew that the astra could always slay only one warrior, and that it could not be either contained or confounded by the very Devas led by Vasava, why then, O Sanjaya, did Karna not cast it against Arjuna or Krishna whenever he fought them earlier?'

Sanjaya says, 'As I told you, Rajan, we would return from battle every day and all of us would confer about this very thing, and we would say to Karna, "Tomorrow morning, Karna, you must cast the Naikartana against either Arjuna or Krishna."

However, when the morning came, either through fate or Krishna's subtle power, both Karna and the rest of us would completely forget this resolve. Surely, fate reigns supreme, for Karna did not kill either Krishna or Arjuna, although he faced them repeatedly on the field. I have no doubt that the gods themselves clouded his mind, and destiny conspired against us that time and again, whenever he had ample opportunity, he did not yet cast the astra against either of the two Krishnas!'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Destiny, your own lack of understanding, and Krishna destroyed you! Indra's astra is gone, having effected the death of Ghatotkacha who was as insignificant as a straw. To my mind, through this single act of folly, Karna, my sons and all the other kings have already entered the halls of Yama.

Tell me now how the battle continues between the Kurus and the Pandavas after the fall of Hidimbi's son Ghatotkacha. How do the Srinjaya and the Panchalas fight great Drona? How do the Pandus and Srinjayas defy the battling Acharya when he attacks them in fury, agitated at the death of Bhurisravas and Jayadratha, reckless of his own life and like some tiger from antique times or Rudra himself with jaws agape? What do Aswatthaman, Karna, Kripa and the others led by Duryodhana do to protect the Acharya?

Tell me, O Sanjaya, how my warriors contain Dhananjaya and Vrikodara who are intent on killing Drona. Frantic as they are with anger, how do they fight the battle by night, for some have been moved to wrath by the death of Jayadratha, and others at the death of Ghatotkacha, and both sides cannot abide their loss?'

Sanjaya says, 'After Karna kills Ghatotkacha, your troops are exuberant and roar and shout with joy. In the darkness, they fall wildly upon the Pandava troops and begin to slaughter them. Yudhishtira is crestfallen to see this; besides, Ghatotkacha was always his most favourite nephew.

He tells Bhimasena, "I am dazed by my child Ghatotkacha's death. Bhima, Mahabaho, go and confront Dhritarashtra's army. Lead our men into battle, for my head spins and my body is weak with grief."

Having said this to Bhima, Yudhishtira sits down in his ratha with a tearful face, sighing repeatedly and utterly afraid and dejected by Karna's awesome archery. Seeing him suffering, Krishna consoles him, "O son of Kunti, do not grieve so much. It does not become you, as it may an ordinary man. Arise, fight and bear the heavy burden that is your! If you, our king and lord, are plunged in gloom, how will we win this war?"

Yudhishtira wipes his eyes, and says to Krishna, "O mighty one, the golden path of dharma is not unknown to me. The dire consequences of Brahmahatya, killing a Brahmana, visit those who forget the services he receives at another's hands. Janardana, while we lived in the forest, Hidimbi's noble son Ghatotkacha, although he was then a mere child, did us so many services!

When he learnt that Arjuna had gone to acquire the devastras, Ghatotkacha came to me in the Kamyaka vana and lived with us until Dhananjaya returned. When we journeyed through inaccessible regions of the world, he carried the tired Draupadi on his back. The feats he achieved on the war showed that he was a great and unequalled warrior. Ah, that noble child accomplished so many difficult tasks for my sake. My love for Ghatotkacha is twice that I bear for Sahadeva. The Rakshasa mahabaho was devoted to me; I was dear to him and he was precious to me. This is why I am numb with grief, burning with it.

Look, O Madhava, where our troops are being routed and butchered by the Kauravas. Look where now, in this abysmal night, Drona and Karna fight in earnest. Look as the Pandava host being crushed this night, like some light woods by two musth maddened elephants. Listen to the terrible celebrant roaring of Drona, Karna and Duryodhana, even as they annihilate our hapless fighting men.

How, O Krishna, when we Pandavas are still alive and you as well, could the Sutaputra kill Bhima's son? Karna fetched untold carnage to our legions and then, as if to crown his dreadful achievements, he slew our precious nephew in the very presence of Arjuna. Arjuna was far away when the evil Dhartarashtras killed Abhimanyu; at that time, Jayadratha used his boon from Lord Siva to keep the rest of us from breaking into the chakravyuha.

Drona and his son Aswatthaman perpetrated that dastardly deed. The Acharya himself told Karna how to kill Abhimanyu. While Abhimanyu fought with his sword, it was the Acharya himself who destroyed the weapon. And while he was in lonely distress, Kritavarman ruthlessly killed his horses and his Parshni charioteers. And then other Kaurava maharathas brought down our splendid child like a throng of huntsmen a golden stag.

For his small enough offence, O Krishna, Arjuna killed Jayadratha. I found no great joy in that killing. If it is our dharma to kill our enemies, then Drona and Karna should have died first. O Lord, these two are the root of Duryodhana's confidence and of all our sorrows. Arjuna should have despatched Drona or Karna to Yama, instead he chose to kill the insignificant Jayadratha, whose role in Abhimanyu's death was hardly direct."

Suddenly, a great rage takes hold of Yudhishtira. His frame shudders in anger, his eyes turn red as plums, and he says, "Bhima now fights against Drona's legion. So I will myself fight and kill the Suta's son. Yes, Karna shall die at my hands today!"

Yudhishtira raises his bow, blows resoundingly on his conch and dashes at Karna. Leading a combined force of Panchalas and Prabhadrakas numbering a thousand rathas, three hundred elephants and five thousand horses, Sikhandin swiftly follows the wake of the king. Now, with some heart restored, the mail-clad Panchalas and the Pandavas led by Yudhishtira all beat their drums and blow their conchs.

Krishna says urgently to Arjuna, "Look where Yudhishtira, beside himself with grief and anger, rides against Karna. You must not allow him to do this or his life will be in danger!"

And Krishna also rides quick as the wind after the distraught Dharmaraja, who by now has gone some way.

In his mind's eye, Vyasa sees Yudhishtira, deranged by grief, rushing recklessly at Karna. Vyasa appears before the eldest Pandava and says, "Through Krishna's wisdom and good fortune, Arjuna still lives. Krishna kept him from facing the Sutaputra in single combat when Karna still had his Naikartana that he had kept to use against your brother. If Karna had killed Arjuna, then truly great would your grief have been, O Yudhishtira.

O bestower of honours, it is your great good fortune that Ghatotkacha has sacrificed himself for Arjuna's sake. Why, Death himself has taken Ghatotkacha using the Vasava astra as merely an instrument. It is for your good, O Pandava, that the Rakshasa has died. Do not yield to anger, and do not grieve, Yudhishtira. This war is war to end all others and a new and evil age has risen over the earth. Unite with your brothers and all the illustrious kings that are with you and dharma, and fight the Kauravas!

O Naravyaghra, on the fifth day from today, the earth will be yours, so set your mind on dharma. Set aside this mad sorrow and rage. With a serene heart, practise karunya to all creatures, and tapasya, daana, kshama and dharma. Jaya is where dharma is."

Having said these words to the son of Pandu, Vyasa vanishes before Yudhishtira's eyes.'"

DRONA-VADHA PARVA

"Sanjaya says, 'His holy grandsire, the profound Maharishi, arrests Yudhishtira's insane careen; the Dharmaputra's blind fury leaves him and he stops himself from riding ahead to fight the dangerous Karna, the older brother he does not know. However, grief still wracks the Pandava king from of the death of Ghatotkacha.
